

THE BOOK WAS DRENCHED

TIGHT BINDING BOOK

Text problem book

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OU_166530

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

CARPENTER'S BIBLICAL COMPANION,

Imp. 8vo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

CLARKE'S (DR. ADAM) MISCELLANEOUS WORKS,

13 vols. 12mo. cloth, £2 5s. 6d.

4 vols. 12mo. cloth, 14s. GERMANIA UNIVERSITY COLLEGE LIBRARY

COLE'S (ELISHA) PRACTICAL DISCOURSE OF GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY, fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

COTTAGE (THE) BIBLE AND FAMILY EXPOSI-
TOR, by T. Williams, 3 vols. demy. 8vo. cloth, £1 4s.

CRUDEN'S CONCORDANCE OF THE OLD AND
NEW TESTAMENT, imp. 8vo. cloth, 12s.; 4to. cloth, 21s.

CUDWORTH'S INTELLECTUAL SYSTEM OF THE UNIVERSE, with a Translation of Mosheim's Notes, 3 vols. 8vo. cloth,
£1 4s.

DODDRIDGE'S FAMILY EXPOSITOR.

Imp. 8vo. cloth, 15s.

DWIGHT'S (DR.) SYSTEM OF THEOLOGY,

5 vols. 18mo. cloth, 10s. 6d.

EDWARDS'S (REV. J.) DEVOTIONAL EXPOSI-TION OF THE BOOK OF PSALMS, 8vo. cloth, 4s.

ELLIS'S (DR. JOHN) KNOWLEDGE OF DIVINE
THINGS, 12mo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

FARINDON'S (REV. ANTHONY, B.D.) SERMONS,
Lift by Rev. T. Jackson, Indices, Translations, &c., 4 vols. 8vo. cloth,
£1 16s.

FINNEY'S (REV. C. G.) LECTURES ON SYSTE-MATIC THEOLOGY, 8vo. cloth, 16s. 6d.

GUIDE TO THE SAVIOUR,
18mo. cloth, 1s.

FLEURY'S MANNERS OF THE ISRAELITES,
Translated by Dr. Ad. Clarke, 12mo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

GOODWIN'S (REV. JOHN) REDEMPTION RE-DEEMED, New Edition, 8vo. cloth, 5s.

GOOD'S (J. MASON, M.D.) LIFE AND WRITINGS.
By Olinthus Gregory, LL.D., fcp. 8vo. cloth, 2s.

GRAY AND PERCY'S KEY TO THE OLD AND
NEW TESTAMENT, crown, 8vo. cloth, 4s. 6d.

GURNEY'S DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE,
24mo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

HAWKER'S (REV. R.) DYING PILLOW MADE
EASY FOR A DEATH-BED, with Preface, by the Rev. R. Shutte,
M.A., royal 18mo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

HILL'S VILLAGE DIALOGUES,

With New Dialogues, and the Author's final Corrections, 12mo. cloth, 4s.

W. Tegg, 85, Queen St., Cheapside, London, E.C.

MOSHEIM'S
INSTITUTES OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY,
—
ANCIENT AND MODERN.

A NEW AND LITERAL TRANSLATION FROM THE ORIGINAL LATIN, WITH COPIOUS ADDITIONAL NOTES, ORIGINAL AND SELECTED,

BY JAMES MURDOCK, D.D.

REVISED, AND SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES ADDED,

BY JAMES SEATON REID, D.D.
PROFESSOR OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF GLASGOW.

LONDON:
WILLIAM TEGG, 85, QUEEN STREET, CHEAPSIDE.
1860.

R. ID. No. 00022-810

PREFACE.

WHEN the enterprising publishers of this volume applied to me to edit a new edition of Maclaine's translation of these Institutes of Mosheim, I declined to undertake the task, on account of the numerous defects of that translation, and the impossibility of rectifying them without undergoing the labour of an entirely new version. At the same time, I directed their attention to this excellent translation by Dr. Murdock, which had been very favourably received both in the United States and in this country; and stated my belief that a cheap reprint of it in one volume was much wanted, in order the more effectually to supersede Maclaine's unsatisfactory translation, and to furnish English readers with an accurate version of a work which, under many disadvantages, has long been one of our most popular works on Ecclesiastical History. The publishers adopted this suggestion, and I have accordingly endeavoured to execute the task assigned me with diligence and fidelity, but without the advantage of having had time to make any special preparation before engaging in it.

The first American edition of Dr. Murdock's translation was used so far as the fourth century, when the second and, I believe, last edition of 1845 was obtained from New-York, and thenceforward adopted as the basis of this edition. I have ventured to revise the translation in various places, either to bring it closer to the original text, or to correct a few inaccuracies of style. Several lengthy documents elsewhere accessible in English, and some details of inferior interest, have been occasionally omitted from the notes of the translator, lest the work might prove too bulky for a single volume; and I have supplied throughout a number of additional notes which are marked with the letter—R.

In compiling these notes, my object was not so much to supply new facts or corrections overlooked by preceding editors, because it appeared to me that the text had been already rather too much overlaid by supplementary matter of this sort. My principal aim was, to point out to the student additional sources of information, and especially to direct the English reader to those works in his own language, whether original works or translations, which illustrated the topics discussed in the text or the accompanying notes. I was induced to keep in view the wants of this class of readers from the conviction that this work of Mosheim had long furnished, and I have no doubt will continue to furnish, a larger number of English readers than is generally supposed, with all the knowledge they possess of the history of the church. I thought it right, therefore, to render this new edition, adapted as it is from its cheapness for general use, as profitable as possible to those who may not be conversant with ancient or modern languages. At the same time, I hope the learned reader, and especially the professional student, will derive from the notes I have supplied, some further assistance in their study of this branch of history, in addition to what the erudite translator had already so abundantly furnished in his many valuable notes, both original and selected.

I cannot take leave of this work without expressing my regret that more time had not been allowed me for preparing for and perfecting this edition. The greatest care however has been taken, both by the publishers and myself, to render all the quotations and references as faithful and correct as possible; and this new edition is now offered to the public in the confident hope that, though capable of further improvement, it will be found more complete and valuable than any other which has yet appeared.

J. S. R.

GLASGOW COLLEGE, October, 1748,

CONTENTS.

Dr. Murdock's Preface to first American Edition.	xxi
Advertisement to second American Edition	xxvi
Mosheim's Preface.....	xxvii

INTRODUCTION	1
Sec. 1.—Ecclesiastical History defined—2, Its divisions—3, The external history of the church—4, which treats of the prosperous—5, and the adverse events—6, The internal history—7, which treats of—(I.) Ministers—8, 9, (II.) Doctrines—10, (III.)

Worship—11, (IV.) Heresies—12, Events must be traced to their causes—13, Means of discovering these causes, general—14, and particular, in the external—15, and internal history—16, The sources of ecclesiastical history—17, Qualities of the historian—18, He must be free from all prejudices—19, Faults of historians—20, Uses of ecclesiastical history, general—21, and special—22, 23, Method in ecclesiastical history, division into periods—24, Distribution under heads.
--	--

BOOK I.

FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST TO CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.

CENTURY FIRST.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE WORLD AT THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOUR	7
---	---

Sec. 1.—State of the Roman empire—2, Its evils—3, Its advantages—4, Then in peace—5, Other nations—6, All were idolaters—7, They worshipped different gods—8, They were tolerant—9, Most of their gods were deceased heroes—10, Pagan worship—11, It was confined to times and places—12, The mysteries—13, Paganism not the parent of virtue—14, Its votaries sunk in vice—15, How supported by the priests—16, The Roman and Grecian religions—17, The mixed religions of the provinces—18, Religions beyond the Roman empire classed—19, Philosophers unable to reform the world—20, The Oriental and the Grecian philosophy—21, Some philosophers subverted all religion—22, Others deluded it; e.g. Aristotelians—23, Stoics—24, Platonics—25, The Eclectics—26, Use of this chapter.
---	--

CHAP. II.—THE CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE JEWS AT THE BIRTH OF CHRIST..	13
--	----

Sec. 1.—Herod the Great then reigned—2, State of the Jews after his death—3, Their troubles and calamities—4, which were increased by their leading men—5, Their religion greatly corrupted, both among the common people—6, and among their teachers, who were divided into three sects—7, Their dissensions—8, Their toleration of each other—9, The Essenes—10, The Therapeutæ—11, Moral doctrines of these sects—12, Low state of religion among the people—13, The Cabala, a source of error—14, Their form of worship debased by pagan rites—15, Causes of the corruption of the nation—16, Yet religion not wholly extinct—17, The Samaritans—18, State of the Jews out of Palestine.
--	--

---	--

CHAP. III.—THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.....	17
--	----

Sec. 1.—The birth of Christ—2, His childhood and youth—3, His precursor, John the Baptist—4, His subsequent life—5, He appoints twelve apostles, and seventy disciples—6, Reason of this number—7, Fame of Christ out of Judea—8 Success of his ministry—9, His death—10, His resurrection and ascension to heaven.
---	--

CHAP. IV.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	19
---	----

Sec. 1.—Effusion of the Holy Spirit on the apostles—2, They preach to Jews and Samaritans—3, Election of a new apostle—4, Paul's conversion—5, Attention to the poor, and a community of goods in the church—6, Many churches planted by the apostles—7, Respect for Christ among the pagans—8, Causes of the rapid progress of Christianity—9, Extraordinary gifts of the early Christians—10, Fictitious causes assigned for the progress of Christianity.
--	--

CHAP. V.—THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	23
---	----

Sec. 1.—Persecutions of the Christians by Jews in Palestine—2, By Jews out of Palestine—3, Divine judgments on the Jews—4, Ten persecutions by the pagans—5, Laws against the Christians—6, Causes of hostility to them. Charged with hatred to mankind—7, Other causes of persecution—8, Slanders against Christians—9, Modes of trial and punishment—10, The martyrs and confessors—11, Number of them—12, Acts of the martyrs—13, Persecution by Nero—14, Its extent—15, Persecution under Domitian.
---	--

PART II. THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LEARNING AND PHILOSOPHY	28
Sec. 1.—The state of philosophy in the East, little known—2, Philosophy of the Persians, Chaldeans, and Arabians—3, Jewish and Egyptian wisdom—4, The proper oriental philosophy—5, Its first principles—6, Its patrons not agreed in their opinions—7, Its precepts concerning God—8, Concerning the origin of the world—9, Concerning human souls—10, The Jewish philosophy—11, Grecian learning—12, Roman learning and philosophy—13, Attention to science in other nations.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS, AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	32
Sec. 1.—Necessity of teachers in the church—2, Extraordinary teachers—3, Authority of the apostles—4, The seventy disciples—5, Christ nowhere determined the form of his church. Constitution of the church of Jerusalem—6, Rights of the people. Contributions for the public expense—7, Equality of the members. Rites of initiation. Catechumens and the faithful—8, Order of rulers. Presbyters—9, Prophets—10, Deacons of the church at Jerusalem. Deaconesses—11, Bishops—12, Character of episcopacy in this century—13, Origin of Dioceses, and rural bishops—14, Whether there were councils and metropolitans in the first century—15, The principal writers; the apostles—16, Time of completion of the canon—17, Apocryphal writings and spurious scriptures—18, Clement Romanus—19, Writings falsely ascribed to him—20, Ignatius of Antioch—21, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas—22, Character of the apostolic fathers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES AND RELIGION.....

PAGE

39

Sec. 1.—The nature and the standard of the Christian religion—2, Interpretation of the scriptures—3, Mode of teaching Christianity—4, The Apostles' Creed—5, Distinction between catechumens and the faithful—6, Mode of instructing catechumens—7, Instruction of children; schools and academies—8, Secret doctrine—9, Lives and characters of Christians—10, Excommunication—11, Controversies among Christians—12, Contest about the terms of salvation—13, Judaizing Christians.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES

42

Sec. 1.—Baptism and the Lord's Supper appointed by Christ—2, Rites instituted by the apostles—3, The Jewish rites retained—4, Public assemblies of Christians, and times for meeting—5, Places of meeting—6, Mode of worship—7, Lord's Supper and Love-feasts—8, Baptism—9, Anointing the sick—10, Fasting.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SEPARATIONS OR HERESIES

45

Sec. 1.—Sects sprung up in the very times of the apostles—2, They gradually increased—3, Sect of the Gnostics—4, It originated from the oriental philosophy—5, They occasioned various errors in regard to the holy scriptures, and other subjects—6, Gnostic opinions concerning Christ—7, Their moral doctrines—8, How they supported their doctrines—9, Causes of disagreement among themselves—10, Dositheus—11, Simon Magus was not a heretic—12, His history—13, His doctrines—14, Menander—15, Whether there was a sect of Nicolaitans—16, Cerinthus and the Cerinthians—17, Nazarenes and Ebionites, properly belong to the second century.

CENTURY SECOND.

PART I. THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	51
Sec. 1.—Character of the Roman emperors—2, Propagation of Christianity in the Roman empire—3, Countries enlightened by Christianity—4, Conversion of the Germans—5, The Gauls converted—6, Translations of the N. T.—7, Apologies and other writings of Christians—8, Miracles and extraordinary gifts—9, Miracle of the thundering legion—10, It is uncertain—11, Sedition and slaughter of the Jews—12, Philosophers become Christians.
CHAP. II.—THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	55
Sec. 1, 2, The persecution of Trajan—3, That of Adrian—4, That of Antoninus Pius—5, That of Marcus Antoninus—6, Its calamities—7, The reigns of Commodus and Severus—8, Calumnies against Christians.

PART II. THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LEARNING AND PHILOSOPHY	58
Sec. 1.—State of learning in general—2, 3, Learned men—4, Rise of the new Platonics—5, Eclectics at Alexandria—6, Approved by the Christians—7, Ammonius Saccas—8, His fundamental principles—9, His principal doctrines—10, His austere system of moral discipline—11, His opinions concerning God and Christ—12, Ill effects of this philosophy on Christianity—13, The state of learning among Christians.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH ..	62
Sec. 1.—The form of church government—2, Union of churches in a province. Origin of councils—3, Their too great authority gave rise to metropolitans and patriarchs—4, Parallel between the Jewish and Christian priesthood—5, The principal writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY 66

Sec. 1.—Religion yet simple—2, was gradually changed—3, This proved by an example—4, Attention to the scriptures—5, Faults of interpreters—6, State of dogmatic theology—7, Polemics of this age—8, Excellences and defects of the controversialists—9, Writers on practical religion—10, Merits of the fathers in regard to practical religion—11, Twofold system of practical religion—12, Hence the Ascetics—13, Causes of their rise—14, Their progress—15, Origin of pious frauds—16, A Christian life, and the discipline of offenders—17, Public penitence modelled according to the rules of pagan mysteries.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF CEREMONIES 71

Sec. 1.—Ceremonies much increased—2, Reasons, (I.) A desire to enlarge the church—3, (II.) Hope that they would silence calumnies—4, (III.) Abuse of Jewish terms—5, (IV.) Imitation of the pagan mysteries—6, (V.) Mode of instructing by symbols

—7, (VI.) Habits of the converts—8, The assemblies for worship—9, Contests about the time for Easter—10, Their importance—11, The Astartes and the Romans, the principal parties—12, Celebration of the Lord's supper—13, Baptism.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SEPARATIONS OR HERESIES 75

Sec. 1.—Discord among the Jewish Christians—2, Hence the Nazarenes and Ebionites—3, Their impiety—4, The sects originating from the oriental philosophy—5, Elxai and Elcesaites—6, Saturninus, his extravagances—7, Cerdo and Marcion—8, Bardesanes—9, Tatian and the Enderites—10, Peculiar sentiments of the Egyptian Gnostics—11, Basilides—12, His enormities—13, His moral principles—14, Carpocrates—15, Valentinus—16, His extravagances—17, Various sects of Valentinians—18, The minor sects of Valentinians—19, The Ophites—20, Monarchians and Patropassians—21, Theodotus, Artemon—22, Hermogenes—23, The illiterate sects, Montanus—24, The success of Montanus and his doctrine.

CENTURY THIRD.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH 85

Sec. 1.—Rights and immunities of Christians enlarged—2, under various emperors, Good-will of Alexander Severus towards Christ—3, Other emperors favourable to the Christians. The religion of the emperor Philip—4, The number of Christians augmented; from causes partly divine—5, and partly human—6, Countries added to the kingdom of Christ—7, State of the church in France, Germany.

CHAP. II.—THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH 87

Sec. 1.—The persecution of Severus, 2, of Maximus, the Thracian—3, The cruelty of Decius led many Christians to deny Christ—4, Controversies in the church on this subject, Libelli pacis—5, Persecutions of Gallus and Volusian—6, of Valerian—7, State of the church under Gallienus, Claudius, and Aurelian—8, Attempts of the philosophers against the Christians—9, Comparisons of some philosophers with Christ—10, Injury thence arising—11, Attempts of the Jews against the Christians.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE 90

Sec. 1.—Decay of learning—2, State of philosophy, especially the Platonic, Plotinus—3, This philosophy prevails everywhere—4, Different sects of it—5, State of learning among Christians.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH 91

Sec. 1.—Form of the government of the church—2, What rank the bishop of Rome held in this century—3, Gradual progress towards a hierarchy—4, The vices of the clergy—5, Hence the inferior orders of the clergy—6, Marriage of the clergy. Their concubines—7, The principal writers, Grecian and Oriental—8, Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THEOLOGY 99

Sec. 1.—State of Christian theology—2, Sources of the mystical theology—3, Thence the monks and Eremites—4, Attention to the holy scriptures—5, Origen's principles of interpretation—6, Other interpreters—7, State of dogmatic theology—8, Moral or practical theology—9, Polemic divines—10, Faults of the disputants—11, Spurious books—12, The Chilastic controversy—13, Controversy respecting the baptism of reclaimed heretics—14, Disputes concerning Origen.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS RITES 105

Sec. 1.—Rites multiplied—2, Public worship—3, Administration of the sacred supper—4, Baptism—5, Various other rites.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF DIVISIONS OR HERESIES IN THE CHURCH 107

Sec. 1.—Remains of the ancient sects—2, Manes and the Manichæans—3, His principles—4, His doctrine concerning man—5, Concerning the nature of Christ and of the Holy Spirit—6, Concerning the offices of Christ and the Comforter—7, Concerning the purification and future condition of souls—8, Concerning the state of souls not purified—9, His opinion of the Old and New Testament—10, The severity of his moral principles, and the classification of his followers—11, The sect of the Hieracites—12, The Nottian controversy—13, Sabellius—14, Beryllus—15, Paul of Samosata—16, Disturbances in Arabia—17, Novatian controversy—18, Severities of the Novatians towards the lapsed.

BOOK II.

FROM CONSTANTINE THE GREAT TO CHARLEMAGNE.

CENTURY FOURTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF
THE CHURCH.CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS AND THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH..... 114

Sec. 1.—Peaceful state of Christians at the beginning of the century—2, Persecution of Diocletian—3, The causes and the severity of it—4, The Christian cause reduced to great extremities—5, Tranquillity restored on the accession of Constantine to supreme power—6, Defeat of Maxentius—7, 8, Different opinions concerning the faith of Constantine—9, The cross seen by him in the heavens—10, Persecution of Licinius—11, State of the church under the sons of Constantine the Great—12, Julian persecutes the Christians—13, His character—14, The Jews attempt to rebuild their temple in vain—15, State of the church after the death of Julian—16, Remains of the pagans—17, Efforts of the philosophers against Christianity—18, Injuries it received from them—19, Propagation of Christianity among the Armenians—20, The Abyssinians and Georgians—21, The Goths—22, The Gauls—23, The causes of so many revolutions—24, Severe persecutions in Persia.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF
THE CHURCH.CHAP. I.—THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE
AND SCIENCE..... 126

Sec. 1.—State of literature—2, Progress of the Platonic philosophy—3, Its fate—4, State of learning among Christians—5, Many illiterate Christians.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH, AND OF ITS TEACHERS 127

Sec. 1, 2—Form of the Christian Church—3, Conformed to the civil establishment—4, Administration, internal and external, of the church—5, Rank of the bishop of Rome—6, Limits of his jurisdiction—7, The bishop of Constantinople—

8, Vices of the clergy—9, Distinguished writers in the Greek church—10, Principal writers in the Latin Church.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THEOLOGY 143

Sec. 1.—State of theological learning—2, Increase of superstition—3, Hence innumerable pious frauds—4, Interpreters of the sacred volume—5, Mode of explaining the Christian doctrines—6, Doctrinal writers—7, State of controversial theology—8, Disingenuous methods of disputing—9, The principal disputants—10, Practical theology—11, Faults of the moral writers—12, The number of mystics increased, and their doctrines established—13, 14, Monkish societies—15, Different orders of monks—16, Two pernicious moral doctrines—17, Lives and morals of Christians—18, Controversy with Meletians—19, The Eustathian troubles—20, The Luciferians—21, The Arian controversy—22, Jovinianus—23, Controversies relating to Origen—24, Their extension—25, Controversy respecting his writings.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND
RITES 153

Sec. 1, 2—Ceremonies multiplied—3, Form of public worship—4, Some parts of it changed—5, Festal days—6, Fasts—7, Administration of baptism—8, and of the Lord's supper.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF THE HERESIES 157

Sec. 1.—Remains of the former sects—2, 3, Origin of the Donatist controversy—4, History of the Donatists—5, 6, Origin of the Circumcelliones—7, State of the Donatists under the emperors Julian and Gratian—8, Their principal crime—9, The doctrine of this age concerning the sacred Trinity—10, the rise of Arianism—11, its progress—12, The Nicene council—13, History of Arianism after that council—14, under the sons of Constantine—15, under Julian, Jovian, &c.—16, Sects among the Arians—17, Heresy of Apollinaris—18, Marcellus of Ancyra—19, Heresy of Photinus—20, That of Macedonius. The council of Constantinople—21, 22, The Priscillianists—23, The minor sects. Audzus—24, 25, Messalians, or Euchites.

CENTURY FIFTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF
THE CHURCH 173

Sec. 1.—State of the Roman empire—2, Further decline of idolatry—3, Nations converted to Christianity—4, Conversion of the German nations—5, The Franks—6, The Irish—7, Causes of these conversions.

CHAP. II.—THE CALAMITIES OF THE CHURCH 176

Sec. 1.—The evils suffered by the Christians in the Roman empire—2, Attempts of the pagans against them—3, Their persecutions—4, In Persia—5, Individual enemies of Christianity.

PART II. THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	177
Sec. 1.—State of learning among Christians—2, In the West—3, State of philosophy in the West—4, In the East—5, The younger Platonists—6, Aristotelian philosophy revived.
CHAP. II.—THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH, AND ITS TEACHERS	179
Sec. 1, 2.—The outward form of church government somewhat changed—3, The prerogatives of patriarchs—4, Evils arising from their authority—5, Contests between them—6, The power of the Roman pontiff—7, Vices of the clergy—8, Causes thereof. The saints—9, Monks—10, Teachers in the Greek church—11, In the Latin church.
CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THEOLOGY	190
Sec. 1.—Many points in theology better ascertained—2, Increase of superstition—3, Interpretation of the scriptures—4, Most of the interpreters incompetent—5, Some were more able—6, State of dogmatic theology—7, Theological disputants

—8, Their faults—9, Hence superstitious books—10, Moral writers—11, Mystics—12, Superstition of the Stylites—13, Further defects of the moralists—14, Jerome's controversy with Vigilantius—15, Controversies respecting Origin.
CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES	196
Sec. 1.—Rites greatly augmented—2, General description of them—3, Love-feasts. Penitence.
CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SCHISMS AND HERESIES	197
Sec. 1, 2, 3.—Old heresies remaining. The Donatists—4, State of the Arians—5, Origin of the Nestorian sect—6, 7, The occasion of it—8, The council of Ephesus—9, Opinion respecting this controversy—10, Progress of Nestorianism after this council—11, 12, Its propagator, Barsumas—13, Eutychian sect—14, The council called Conventus Latronum —15, Council of Chalcedon—16, Subsequent contests—17, In Syria and Armenia—18, Troubles occasioned by Peter the Fuller. Theopaschites—19, The Henoticon of Zeno—20, produces new contests among the Eutychians—21, Among the defenders of the council of Chalcedon—22, The doctrines of Eutyches and the Monophysites—23, The Pelagian controversy—24, Its progress—25, The Predesstinarians—26, The semi-Pelagians—27, Various controversies concerning grace.

CENTURY SIXTH.

PART I. THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	213
Sec. 1.—Progress of Christianity in the East—2, and in the West—3, Jews converted in several places—4, The miracles of this century.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES	215
Sec. 1.—Pagans still remaining among the Christians—2, Writers opposed to Christianity—3, Persecutions and vexations.

PART II. THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	217
Sec. 1.—The state of learning in the West—2, The sciences badly taught—3, The study of philosophy—4, State of learning among the Greeks—5, and in the East.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS IN THE CHURCH	219
Sec. 1.—Contests between the bishops of Constantinople and Rome—2, Endeavours of the latter to obtain supreme power—3, 4, Corrupt lives of the clergy—5, The monks—6, Order of Benedict—7, Its propagation—8, Principal authors among the Greeks—9, Latin writers.
CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THEOLOGY	229
Sec. 1.—Continued deterioration of theology—2, This exemplified—3, State of exegetical theology—4, Faults of the interpreters—5, Dogmatic theology, 6, Practical theology—7, Lives of saints—8, Polemic theology—9, Contests about Origenism—10, about the three chapters—11, The fifth general council—12, Contest about one of the Trinity being crucified.
CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES	234
Sec. 1.—Rites multiplied—2, Explanations of the ceremonies—3, Public worship. The Eucharist. Baptism—4, Temples. Festivals.
CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES AND SEPARATIONS FROM THE CHURCH	235
Sec. 1.—Remains of the ancient sects. Manichæans, Pelagians—2, Donatists—3, Arians—4, State of the Nestorians—5, Eutychian contests. Severus—6, Jacobus Baradaeus, the father of the Monophysites—7, Their state—8, Controversies among them—9, The Agnostæ—10, Trithelists.

CENTURY SEVENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.....	239
Sec. 1.—Christianity propagated in China—2, The English converted—3, Also the Gauls, Suevi, Frieslanders, Franks, and Helvetii—4, Judgment concerning these apostles—5, Jews compelled to embrace Christianity.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSITIES OF THE CHURCH	241
Sec. 1.—Persecutions of the Christians—2, Mohammed—3, Judgment concerning him—4, Causes of the rapid progress of his religion—5, Disposition of the Mohammedans towards the Christians 6, Sects among them.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH

CHAP. I.—HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	244
Sec. 1.—State of learning The monks its patrons —2, Ignorance of the bishops—3, History and other sciences corrupted—4, State of philosophy.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS, AND OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH	245
--	-----

Sec. 1.—Disputes about pre-eminence between the bishops of Rome and Constantinople—2, The former opposed by many—3, Vices of the clergy —State of the monks—5, Greek writers—6, Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY	250
---	-----

Sec. 1.—Miserable state of religion—2, Expositors of the scriptures—3, Dogmatic theology—4, Practical theology—5, Renewal of penitential discipline—6, State of polemic theology.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES	253
---	-----

Sec. 1.—Rites multiplied—2, Some examples.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF HERESIES.....	254
------------------------------------	-----

Sec. 1, 2.—Remains of the earlier sects—3, Nestorians and Monophysites—4, Monothelites—5, Their prosperous circumstances—6, Their adversities—7, Contests arising out of the ichthys and the rhombos—8, The sixth general council—9, Sum of the controversy—10, Different opinions among the Monothelites—11, Their condition after the council of Constantinople—12, The council called Quinisextum.

BOOK III

FROM CHARLEMAGNE TO THE REFORMATION BY LUTHER.

CENTURY EIGHTH.

PART I.

HISTORY OF THE OUTWARD STATE OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THIS CENTURY	260
Sec. 1.—Propagation of Christianity in Hyrcania and Tartary—2, Conversion of the Germans by Boniface—3, Other expeditions and successes of Boniface—4, Estimate of his apostleship—5, Other apostles of Germany—6, Expedition of Charlemagne against the Saxons—7, Estimate of his conversions—8, The reputed miracles of this century.

CHAP. II.—THE ADVERSITIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH	264
---	-----

Sec. 1.—In the East, from the Saracens and Turks —2, In the West, from the Saracens.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF SCIENCE AND LITERATURE	265
Sec. 1.—The state of learning among the Greeks—

2, Progress of the Aristotelian philosophy—3, Learning among the Latins, restored by Charlemagne—4, Cathedral and monastic schools—5, They were not very successful.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	267
--	-----

Sec. 1.—Vices of the religious teachers—2, Veneration for the clergy in the West—3, Increase of their wealth—4, They possessed royal domains —5, Causes of extravagant donations to the clergy —6, and especially to the pope—7, His good offices to Pepin—8, The rewards of his obsequiousness to the French kings. The donation of Pepin—9, Donation of Charlemagne—10, The grounds of it —11, Nature of the pope's jurisdiction—12, His prosperity checked by the Greeks; origin of the contests between the Greeks and Latins—13, The monastic discipline wholly corrupted—14, Origin of canons—15, 16, Power of the popes circumscribed by the emperors—17, Greek and oriental writers—18, Latin and occidental writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND OF THEOLOGY	277
--	-----

Sec. 1.—The Christian doctrine corrupted—2, The piety and morals of this age—3, Exegetical theology—4, Charlemagne's zeal for sacred learning—5, It led to neglect of the bible—6, Manner of treating didactic theology—7, Practical theology—8, Polemic theology—9, Origin of the controversy about images—10, Progress of it under Leo the Isaurian—11, Conflicts of the image-worshippers with the Iconoclasts—12, Progress under Copronymus—13, Under Irene—14, Council of Frankfort—15, Controversy respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES 284

Sec. 1.—Ceremonies multiplied—2, Zeal of Charlemagne for the Romish rites.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES 246

Sec. 1.—Ancient sects recover strength—2, Clement and Adalbert—3, Felix and Elipandus.

CENTURY NINTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH 287

Sec. 1, 2.—The Swedes, Danes, and Cimbrians converted—3, The Bulgarians, Bohemians, and Moravians—4, The Slavonian tribes, the Russians 5, Estimate of these conversions.

CHAP. II.—THE ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH 289

Sec. 1.—Success of the Saracens—2, 3, The Norman pirates.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE 291

Sec. 1.—State of learning among the Greeks—2, State of philosophy—3, Learning among the Arabians—4, State of learning under Charlemagne and his sons—5, Impediments to its progress—6, List of learned men—7, John Scotus.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF CHURCH GOVERNMENT 293

Sec. 1.—The lives of the clergy very corrupt—2, Causes of this—3, The Roman pontiffs—4, Their frauds for establishing their power; popes Joanna—5, 6, Friendship of the popes for the kings of France—7, The emperors suffered their rights in matters of religion to be wrested from them. The power of bishops curtailed—8, Documents forged by the Roman pontiffs. Decretal Epistles—9, Success of these frauds—10, Monks gain access to courts and to civil offices—11, Attempts to reform their profligate lives—12, Canons and canonesses—13, The principal Greek writers—14, The more distinguished Latins.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY 306

Sec. 1.—The low state of religion and learning—2, Causes of this evil—3, The corruption of the age manifest in the worship of saints and relics—4, Canonization of saints—5, Biographies of saints—6, Attachment to relics—7, Regard for the holy scriptures—8, Faults of the Latin expositors—9, The Allegorists—10, Method of treating theological subjects—11, State of practical theology—12, Progress of mysticism—13, Polemic theology—14, 15, Controversy respecting images, among the Greeks—16, Among the Latins—17, Iconoclasts among the Latins—18, Controversy respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit continued—19, Paschasius Radbert's controversy respecting the Lord's supper—20, His opposer, Bertram—21, The involved controversy about sterocoranism—22, Controversy respecting grace and predestination; Godeschalvus—23, History of this contest—24, Judgment respecting it—25, Ilincmar and Godeschalvus contend about a threefold Deity—26, Strife respecting the parturition of St. Mary—27, 28, First controversy between the Greeks and Latins, respecting Photius—29, 30, 31, 32, Their second controversy.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES 318

Sec. 1.—Writers who explained the sacred rites—2, The rites themselves—3, Superstitions in civil and private life.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF SECTS AND HERESIES 320

Sec. 1.—Ancient sects—2, The Paulicians—3, Persecution of them—4, Their condition under Theodora—5, Whether they were Manichæans—6, Their religious opinions.

CENTURY TENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH 324

Sec. 1.—Propagation of Christianity—2, Presbyter John—3, Rolla embraces Christianity—4, Conversion of the Poles—5, Christianity established in Muscovy—6, Hungary becomes a Christian country—7, Denmark—8, Norway—9, Zeal of Otto the Great for Christianity—10, Protect of a crusade.

CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH 328

Sec. 1.—Progress of the Turks and Saracens—2, In the West, the barbarians distress the Christians—3, Effects of these evils

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	329
Sec. 1.—State of learning among the Greeks—2, Few good writers among them—3, State of learning among the Saracens—4, 5, The Western nations—6, The state of philosophy—7, Sylvester a restorer of learning—8, Arabian learning.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	332
Sec. 1.—The clergy corrupt—2, History of the Roman pontiffs—3, John X. pope—4, John XI. and John XII—5, Fate of the latter—6, John XIII. and Benedict VII—7, John XIV. and John XV—8, Aggrandizement of the popes—9, The bishops and abbots increase in power—10, Principal vices of the clergy—11, Low state of discipline in the monasteries—12, Principal writers in the Greek church—13, Writers in the Latin church.

CHAP. III.—THE HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY

PAGE

339

Sec. 1.—The state of religion—2, Contests respecting predestination and the Lord's supper—3, Belief that the day of judgment was at hand—4, Multitude of the saints—5, 6, The different branches of theology neglected—7, Controversy between the Greeks and Latins.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES

341

Sec. 1.—The multitude of ceremonies—2, Feast days—3, Office of St. Mary; the Rosary.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES

342

Sec. 1.—The more ancient heresies—2, The Paulicians—3, Commotions excited by Lutthard—4, The Anthropomorphites.

CENTURY ELEVENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	345
Sec. 1.—Propagation of Christianity—2, Fruitless efforts of some for the conversion of pagan nations—3, The Saracens driven from Sicily. The Sicilian monarchy—4, Expedition against the Saracens in Palestine—5, Progress of the holy war—6, 7, The history of it—8, Causes of these crusades—9, Evils of them—10, Injurious to the church.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	350
Sec. 1.—Sufferings of Christians from the Saracens and Turks in the East—2, Also in the West.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE HISTORY OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE	351
Sec. 1.—State of learning among the Greeks—2, Their most celebrated scholars—3, State of learning in the West—4, Schools opened in various places—5, The sciences taught in these schools—6, 7, Dialectics in high repute—8, 9, Disputes among the logicians. Nominalists and Realists.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	355
Sec. 1.—Corruption of the clergy—2, 3, 4, 5, The Roman pontiffs—6, Prerogatives of the Cardinals by their election—7, 8, Their authority—9, Hildebrand a pope—10, 11, His acts—12, The decrees of Gregory VII. against simony and concubinage—13, Commotions arising from the severity of the pope against concubinage—14, The enactments against simony produce the contest about investitures—15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, History of this contest—21, 22, State of monkery—23, The Cluniacensians—24, The Camaldulensians, Vallombrosians, and Hirsaugians—25, The Cistercians—26, New orders of monks; the Grandimontensians—27, The Carthusians—28, The order of St. Anthony—29, The order of Canons—30, The most distinguished Greek writers—31, The Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—THE HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY

PAGE

375

Sec. 1.—The state of religion—2, 3, Witnesses for the truth—4, Expositions of the scriptures—5, 6, Scholastic theology—7, Moral theology—8, Polemic theology—9, 10, 11, Controversies between the Greeks and Latins—12, New contest respecting the holiness of images—13, Contentions in the Latin church. Controversy respecting the Lord's supper—14, 15, 16, 17, The pontiffs labour in vain to settle it—18, The result as to Berengarius and his friends—19, Dispute in France respecting Martial.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND
RITES

383

Sec. 1.—Use of the Roman liturgy extended—2, Worship in a foreign tongue—3, Rebuilding and adorning the churches.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF THE SECTS AND HERESIES

304

Sec. 1.—Ancient sects. The Manicheans—2, The Paulicians in Europe—3, The Manicheans of Orleans seem to have been mystics—4, So likewise others—5, The contest with Roscelin.

CENTURY TWELFTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH	389
Sec. 1, 2, Conversion of pagan nations—3, The Finns—4, The Livonians—5, The Slavonians—6, Estimate of these conversions—7, The Tartars and Presbyter John—8, Unfortunate issue of the expeditions to Palestine—9, Renewal of the crusades—10, Extinction of the kingdom of Jerusalem—11, The third crusade—12, Its result—13, Orders of knights militant. First, the order of St. John—14, Second, that of the Templars—15, Third, that of the Teutonic knights.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	395
Sec. 1.—Adverse events in the West—2, In the East—3, Prester John slain.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE	396
Sec. 1, 2, State of learning and science among the Greeks—3, 4, Among the Latins—5, Study of the civil law—6, Canon law—7, Philosophy among the Latins—8, Disagreements among the philosophers—9, Contests of the dialecticians. The realists and nominalists.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH....	400
Sec. 1.—Lives of the clergy—2, Efforts of the pontiffs to aggrandize themselves. The contest respecting investitures—3, 4, 5, Its progress—6, Compromise between the pontiff and the emperor—7, Two popes, Anacletus and Innocent—8, The other pontiffs of this century—9, Renewal of the contest under Hadrian IV. and Frederic Barbarossa—10, 11, Contests in the election of pontiffs—12, Contest of Alexander III. with Henry II.—13, Alexander advances the Roman see by various arts—14, His successors—15, 16, The rest of the clergy and their vices—17, Contentions between the Cistercians and Cluniacensians—18, Lives of the canons—19, New monastic orders—20, Præmonstratensians—21, Carmelites—22, The Greek writers—23, The Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY

416
Sec. 1.—Corrupt state of religion—2, Corruption of the mass of people, and extreme superstition, shown by examples—3, Scandalous traffic in indulgences—4, The pontiffs soon claim a monopoly of it—5, Biblical theology—6, Doctrinal theology—7, The proper scholastics—8, The biblical and dogmatic theologians—9, Opponents of scholastic theology—10, Its principal antagonist, St. Bernard—11, and others—12, State of moral or practical theology—13, Polemic theology—14, Controversies between the Greeks and the Latins—15, Slighter contests among the former—16, Their controversy respecting John xiv. 28.—17, Concerning the God of Mohammed—18, Controversy among the Latins respecting the Lord's supper—19, Concerning the immaculate conception of Mary.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES

423
Sec. 1.—Rites of the Greeks—2, Rites of the Latins.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES

423
Sec. 1.—Fanatics among the Greeks—2, The Bogomiles—3, Sects among the Latins and the cause of them—4, The Cathari—5, Two sects of them—6, Their organization—7, The Petrobrussians—8, The Henricians—9, The impiety of Tanquelin—10, Disturbance of Arnold of Brescia—11, The Waldenses and their history—12, Their doctrine and opinions—13, Constitution of their churches—14, Minor sects. The Pasagini—15, The Caputiati—16, Eon and his folly.

CENTURY THIRTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	432
Sec. 1.—Christianity in northern Asia and China—2, Pontifical legates to the Tartars—3, The Crusades—4, A new crusade—5, 6, The remaining crusades—7, The expedition of Lewis IX.—8, His second attempt—9, Conversion of the Prussians—10, The Arabians.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	436
Sec. 1.—Adversities of Christians in the East—2, Pretended atheists among the Latins—3, Frederic II. and the book respecting the three impostors.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	438
Sec. 1.—Learning among the Greeks—2, Learning in the West—3, State of the Academies—4, The academic course—5, The Belles lettres—6, The Greek and Oriental languages—7, Progress of philosophy—8, The favourers of Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas and others—9, Promoters of general knowledge—10, Study of jurisprudence and medicine.

	PAGE		PAGE
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	443	—42, The Lollards—43, The Greek writers—44, The Latin writers.
Sec. 1.—Corruption of the clergy—2, The Roman pontiffs—3, Their power of creating bishops, &c.—4, The authority of their legates—5, The pontiffs increase in wealth—6, 7, 8, The arrogant tyranny of Innocent III. shown by several examples—9, Honorius III.—10, Wrong conduct of Gregory IX.—11, Innocent IV.—12, Alexander IV. and Urban IV.—13, Gregory X.—14, Innocent V., Hadrian VI., John XXI., and Nicolaus III.—15, Martin IV. and Nicolaus IV.—16, Celestine V.—17, Boniface VIII.—18, New orders of monks—19, Orders of monks which have become extinct—20, Orders which still flourish—21, The Mendicants—22, Their history—23, They acquired great veneration in Europe—24, The Dominicans—25, The Franciscans—26, Both did good service to the pontiffs—27, Their contests with the university of Paris—28, Their adversary—29, Insolence of the Mendicants—30, Conflicts between the Dominicans and the Franciscans—31, 32, Discord among the Franciscans respecting the true meaning of their rule—33, Other jars among them respecting the Everlasting Gospel of Joachim—34, The book of Gerhard is condemned—35, The constitution of Nicolaus III. respecting the rule of St. Francis—36, It produces new commotions and rouses up the Spirituals—37, 38, Continuation of these commotions—39, The Fratricelli and the Beguards—40, 41, The Tertiarii, Boccasoti, and Beguins
Sec. 1.—The general state of religion—2, New articles of faith introduced by Innocent—3, The sect of Flagellants—4, Exegetical theology—5, Dogmatic theology—6, The greater part pursued positive theology—7, A few Sententiarii—8, The opponents of the dialecticians—9, The mystics—10, Moral theology—11, Its character—12, Polemic theology—13, Controversies between the Greeks and the Latins—14, Dispute concerning Christ's presence in the eucharist.		CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY	469
CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES	474	Sec. 1.—Increase of rites—2, Eucharistial rites—3, Year of Jubilee.
Sec. 1.—The Nestorians and Jacobites—2, Conflicts of the pontiffs with heretics little known—3, Commencement of the inquisition in Languedoc, in France—4, 5, Its form—6, Its prerogatives. General odium against it—7, Severer measures against the heretics, especially the Albigenses—8, The count of Toulouse in vain opposes the pontiff—9, The brethren and sisters of the free spirit—10, Their mystic theology—11, Some of them held better sentiments and others worse—12, Amalric—13, Joachim. Wilhelmus—14, The sect called Apostles—15, The grievous fault of Joachim.		CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES	475

CENTURY FOURTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	484
Sec. 1.—Crusades attempted in vain—2, State of the Christians in China and Tartary—3, The Lithuanians converted. The Jews compelled by persecution to become Christians—4, Project for the expulsion of the Saracens from Spain.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	485
Sec. 1.—Christianity prostrate in various parts of Asia—2, its overthrow in China and Tartary.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE	486
Sec. 1.—The state of learning among the Greeks—2, Philosophy—3, The state of learning among the Latins—4, The languages—5, The arts and sciences—6, Philosophy—7, The Realists and Nominalists—8, Astrology, credulity as to magic—9, The art of Lully.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH	490
Sec. 1.—Corruption of the clergy—2, Philip, king of France, opposed the domination of the pontiffs—3, Issue of the conflict—4, The pontifical court is removed to Avignon—5, Decrease of the pontifical authority—6, New arts devised by the pontiffs for acquiring wealth—7, Obscquiousness of Clement V. to Philip—8, John XXII. and Nicolaus V.—9, The former charged with heresy—10, Benedict XII.—11, Clement VI.—12, Innocent VI.—13, Gregory XI.—14, The great schism of the West commences—15, The evils of it—16, Projects for terminating it—17, Vices of the monks, especially the mendicants—18, Hence general hatred against them—19, John Wickliffe—20, His opponents—21, Impiety of the Franciscans. Book of the conformities of St. Francis—22, Vices of the Fratricelli, &c.—23, 24, Projects for terminating the disorders of the Franciscans—25, Their ridiculous contests—26, They produce more serious disturbances—27, A new contest arose respecting the poverty of Christ—28, Its continuation—29, Their conduct with John XXII.—30, Their attempts against the pontiff—31, Their patron, Lewis the Bavarian—32, Peace with the pontiff—33, Sufferings of the Spirituals, the Beghards, &c. in Germany—34, Yet they were not exterminated. Two great sects of Franciscans are produced—35, New religious orders—36, The sect of the Cellite brethren and sisters. The Lollards—37, The Greek writers—38, The Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY	514
Sec. 1.—Corruption of religion—2, Exegetical theology—3, Dogmatic theology—4, Opponents of the scholastics. Biblical theologians—5, Contest among the scholastics. Scotists and Thomists—6, The Mystics—7, Moral or practical writers

—8, Polemic writers—9, Controversies between the Greeks and Latins—10, Contest of the university of Paris with the Dominicans. Montesonus.	PAGE
CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES	516
Sec. 1.—Alteration of the Jubilee—2, Feast-days. Prayers.
CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES	517
Sec. 1.—Controversies of the Hesychasts—2, State of the question between the Hesychasts and the Barlaamites—3, Severities of the Inquisition among the Latins—4, Severe edicts against the Cathari, the Beghardi, Beghins, &c.—5, Yet the Brethren of the Free Spirit could not be extirpated—5, Persecution of the Beguins. Its tragical issue—7, The sect of Flagellants again appears—8, The Dancers—9, The Knights Templars are extirpated—10, The alleged cause of the severity was the extreme impleity of the Knights. An estimate of their guilt.

CENTURY FIFTEENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	PAGE
522
Sec. 1.—The Moors and Jews—2, The Samogetas and Indians converted.
CHAP. II.—ADVERSE EVENTS IN THE HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	523
Sec. 1.—Decay of Christianity in the East—2, Constantinople taken.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAP. I.—THE STATE OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.....	PAGE
523
Sec. 1.—Learning flourishes among the Latins—2, The Greeks add its progress in the West—3, Elegant literature and languages—4, Philosophy, the Aristotelian and the Platonic—5, The platonic Syncretists—6, The Aristotelian has still the preponderance—7, The contests of the Nominalists and Realists continue.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH ...	526
Sec. 1.—Vices of the clergy—2, Continuance of the schism of the West—3, The council of Constance called by the emperor Sigismund—4, Its proceedings and issue—5, John Huss—6, Causes of hatred against him—7, John Huss is burned. Jerome of Prague—8, Decree of the council against the books and the ashes of Wickliffe—9, Sentence against John Petit—10, The reformation of the church—11, Council of Basil. Reformation of the church again attempted in vain 12, Decrees and acts of this council—13, Council of Ferrara under Eugene IV—14, Schism of the church renewed—15, Schism terminates under Nicolaus V.—16, Pius II.—17, Paul II.—18, Alexander VI.—19, The monks—20, The mendicants—21, Condition of the Fratricelli—22, New orders. Brethren and Clerks of the common life—23, Greek writers—24, Latin writers.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY

547
Sec. 1.—Corrupt state of religion—2, Witnesses for the truth everywhere—3, Commotions in Bohemia—4, The Hussite war. Its conductors 5, The Calixtines—6, The Taborites—7, The Bohemian commotions terminated—8, Expositors of the Scriptures—9, The dogmatic and moral theologians much disliked—10, Especially by the well educated—11, and by the Mystics—12, Polemic theology—13, Schism between the Greeks and Latins not yet healed—14, Controversies among the Latins.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES

551
Sec. 1.—Rites of the Greeks—2, Rites of the Latins.

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF HERESIES.....

552
Sec. 1.—The Manicheans and Waldenses—2, Beghards, Schwesetriones, Picards or Adamites—3, The White Brethren—4, The Men of Understanding—5, The New Flagellants.

BOOK IV.

FROM THE REFORMATION BY LUTHER TO THE YEAR A.D. 1700.

CENTURY SIXTEENTH.

SECTION I.

HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION.

INTRODUCTION	PAGE
557
Sec. 1, The order of the narration must be changed—2, The history divided into the general and the particular—3, The general history—4, The particular history—5, History of the Reformation.

ARRANGEMENT OF THE SECTION	PAGE
558

CHAP. I.—STATE OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH WHEN THE REFORMATION COMMENCED.....

559
Sec. 1.—At the beginning of the century all was

	PAGE		PAGE
tranquill—2, Complaints against the pontiffs and the clergy were ineffectual—3, Revival of learning—4, The Pontiffs Alexander VI. and Pius III.—5, Julius II.—6, The council of Pisa—7, Leo X.—8, Avarice of the pontiffs—6, They are inferior to councils—10, Corruption of the inferior clergy—11, State of the monks—12, The Dominicans—13, State of the universities and of learning—14, Theology—15, Liberty to dispute about religion—16, The public religion—17, Miserable condition of the people—18, A reformation desired—19, The Mystics.		Marpurg, in 1529—23, The diet to be assembled at Augsburg—29, The state of the reformation in Sweden about the year 1530—30, Reformation effected in Denmark by Christiern—31, It was completed by Frederic and by Christian III. 32, A discrimination to be made in regard to the Swedish and Danish reformation—33, The reformation in France—34, Reformation in other countries in Europe.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE COMMENCEMENT AND PROGRESS OF THE REFORMATION TO THE PRESENTATION OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION [OR FROM A.D. 1517—1530]	565	CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION, FROM THE PRESENTATION OF THE AUGSBURG CONFESSION [1530] TO THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE WAR OF SMA LCALD [1546]	586
Sec. 1.—The beginning of the reformation—2, Luther—3, John Tetzel preaches indulgences in 1517—4, State of the question between these two persons—5, The opponents of the former and patrons of the latter—6, Conference of Luther with Cajetan at Augsburg—7, The issue of it—8, Proceedings of Miltitz. All plans for peace frustrated—9, The discussions at Lepsic. Eck. Carlstadt—10, Philip Melancthon—11, Beginning of the reformation in Switzerland—12, Luther is excommunicated by the pope in 1520—13, He withdraws from the communion of the Romish church—14, The rise of the Lutheran church—15, The diet of Worms in 1521—16, The events of it. Luther is proscribed—17, His pursuits, after leaving the castle of Wartburg—187 Hadrian VI. The diet of Nuremberg in 1522—19, Clement VII. A.D. 1524—20, Carlstadt. Zwingli—21, War of the peasants in 1525—22, Death of Frederic the Wise. John his successor—23, The diet of Spire in 1526—24, Subsequent progress of the reformation—25, The diet of Spire in 1529. The protestants—26, Their alliance—27, The conference at		Sec. 1.—The Augsburg confession presented to the emperor—2, Its character—3, Confutation of it 4, Deliberations for settling the religious controversies—5, Result of the diet of Augsburg—6, The league of Smalcald—7, The peace of Nuremberg—8, 9, The council—10, Commotion of the Anabaptists—11, Revolt of Great Britain from the pontiff—12, Character of this reformation—13, Renewed attempts at compromise. The conference at Worms. The diet of Ratisbon—14, Preparations for war.
		CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION, FROM THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE WAR OF SMA LCALD [A.D. 1546], TO THE CONCLUSION OF THE RELIGIOUS PEACE [A.D. 1555]	593
		Sec. 1.—Commencement of the war of Smalcald—2, The war and the reverses of the protestants—3, Form of the Interim—4, Commotions arising from it—5, The council of Trent resumed—6, Maurice disconcerts the plans of the emperor—7, His war against the emperor. The transaction at Passau—8, Diet of Augsburg. Religious peace—9, The reformation in England—10, Scotland—11, Ireland—12, The Netherlands—13, Spain and Italy—14, Estimate of the reformation.

SECTION II.

THE GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE		PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	601	The enemies of Christianity—6, Advantages of the revival of learning—7, The study of the Greek and Latin classics everywhere flourished—8, The state of philosophy—9, Mode of teaching theology—10, Religion purified and morals reformed.
Sec. 1.—Extension of the Christian church—2, Zeal of the pontiff in this respect—3, Propagation of Christianity in India, Japan, and China—4, Zeal of the protestants on this subject—5,

SECTION III.

THE PARTICULAR HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

PART I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES.

	PAGE		PAGE
CHAP. I.—THE HISTORY OF THE ROMISH OR LATIN CHURCH	605	Missions—6, The Egyptians and Armenians—7, 8, Nestorians. Indians—9, Internal state of the Romish church regulated and fixed—10, Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits—11, Nature and character of this order—12, Its zeal for the pontiffs—13, The Roman pontiffs—14, The clergy—15, Their lives—16, The monks. Old orders reformed—17, 18, New orders—19, The state of learning—20, Philosophy—21, Theological writers—22, Principles of the Romish religion—23, The council of Trent—24, Substance of
Sec. 1.—The Roman pontiff and his election—2, His power circumscribed—3, Disagreement respecting it—4, Diminution of the Romish church—5, Plans of the pontiffs for remedying this evil.

	PAGE		PAGE
the catholic faith—25, Exegetic theology—26, Interpreters of Scripture—27, Dogmatic theology—28, Practical theology—29, Polemic theology—30, Controversies in the Romish church—31, Their greater controversies—32, First controversy—33, The second—34, The third—35, The fourth—36, The fifth—37, The sixth—38, Controversy with Michael Baius—39, Controversy with the Jesuits, Less and Hamel—40, Molinist Controversy—41, Congregations on the A.I.s—42, Ceremonies and rites.		of these controversies—46, The principal divines and writers.
CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE GREEK AND ORIENTAL CHURCH.....	627	CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE REFORMED CHURCH	658
Sec. 1.—Division of the Oriental Church—2, The proper Greek Church—3, 4, is chiefly under the patriarch of Constantinople, and divided into four provinces—5, The patriarch—6, The religion of the Greeks—7, They were in vain solicited to unite with the protestants—8, Their wretched state—9, The independent Greek Church, that of Russia—10, The Georgians and Mingrelians—11, The oriental churches not connected either with the Greek or the Latin Church. The Jacobites—12, The Copts and Abyssinians—13, Doctrines and rites of the Monophysites—14, The Armenians—15, The Nestorians or Chaldeans—16, Their patriarchs—17, Remains of the ancient sects. The Sabians—18, The Jastidians—19, The Durizi or Druzi—20, The Greeks who have revolted to the Romans—21, Vain attempt to unite the Russian church with the Roman—22, Romish Christians among the Monophysites, Nestorians, and Armenians—23, The Romish Missionaries effect little among them—24, The Maronites.		Sec. 1.—General character of the Reformed Church—2, Causes of this character—3, Origin of this church—4, Zwinglian contests respecting the Lord's Supper—5, History of them till Luther's death—6, Transactions after his death—7, Controversy respecting predestination—8, The height of it—9, Two periods in the early history of this church—10, Points of difference between the Swiss and the Lutherans—11, John Calvin a principal founder of this church—12, The doctrine and discipline inculcated by Calvin—13, All the reformed did not embrace his views—14, Progress of this church in Germany—15, Progress in France—16, Progress in England and Scotland—17, Rise of the Puritans—18, 19, Their opinions—20, Their fundamental principles—21, Sects among them. Brownists—22, The Dutch Reformed Church—23, Reformed Church of Poland—24, The Bohemian Brethren—25, Waldensians, Hungarians, Transylvanians—26, Churches which joined the reformed—27, Diversity among the reformed—28, Their doctrines—29, Their dissent from the Lutherans—30, Importance of the difference—31, Ecclesiastical power—32, Organization of the church—33, Church discipline—34, State of learning—35, Biblical expositors—36, Dogmatic theology—37, Practical theology—38, Calvin's contest with the spiritual libertines—39, His contests with the Genevans—40, Castallo—41, Boleae—42, Ochlin—43, 44, Controversy between the Puritans and the Episcopalians.
PART II.		CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THE SECT OF ANABAPTISTS OR MENNONITES	684
HISTORY OF MODERN CHURCHES.		Sec. 1.—Origin of the Anabaptists obscure—2, 3, Their probable origin—4, Their first movements—5, Their progress—6, Punishments decreed against them—7, Those of Munster—8, Menno Simonis—9, His doctrine—10, Origin of sects among the Anabaptists—11, The more gross and the more refined—12, Source of the Mennonite religion—13, It was late reduced to a system—14, What it is—15, The first principle of their common doctrines—16, Their doctrines themselves—17, Their practical doctrines—18, Singular doctrines of certain sects—19, Their learning and erudition—20, Many sects among them—21, Permanent seat of the Mennonites first in Holland—22, The English Anabaptists—23, General and particular, what their views—24, David George—25, Henry Nicolai. The Familists.
CHAP. I.—HISTORY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH	637	CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF THE SOCINIANS ..	699
Sec. 1.—Commencement of the Lutheran church—2, Its faith—3, Public worship and ceremonies—4, Ecclesiastical laws and government—5, Liturgy, public worship, education—6, Feast-days, discipline—7, Prosperous and adverse events—8, Cultivation of learning among the Lutherans—9, Polite learning and languages—10, Philosophy—11, Philosophical sects: Aristotelians, Ramists—12, Fire philosophers—13, Hofmann's controversy with his colleagues—14, Theology gradually improved and perfected—15, State of exegetic theology—16, Merits of the biblical expositors—17, Dogmatic theology—18, Practical theology—19, Polemic theology—20, Three periods of the Lutheran church—21, Contests in Luther's lifetime with fanatics—22, Carlstadt—23, Schwencfeld—24, His opinions—25, Antinomians—26, Estimate of the sentiments of Agricola—27, Contests after Luther's death under Melancthon—28, Adiaphoristic controversy—29, That of George Major, respecting good works—30, Synergistic controversy—31, Flacius, the author of many dissensions—32, His contest with Strigelius—33, His disputation—34, Effects of his imprudence—35, Controversy with Oslander—36, Controversy with Stancarus—37, Plans for settling these disturbances—38, Crypto-Calvinists in Saxony—39, The formula of concord—40, It produces much commotion on the part of the reformed—41, Also on the part of the Lutherans—42, Proceedings of Duke Julius—43, New Crypto-Calvinistic commotions in Saxony—44, Huber's contest—45, Estimate		Sec. 1, 2.—The name and origin of the Socinians—3, Their first beginnings—4, Michael Servetus—5, His doctrines—6, Other Anti-Trinitarians—7, False originations of Socinianism—8, Its true origination—9, Its progress—10, Summary view of this religion—11, Proceedings of Faustus Socinus—12, He modified the Unitarian religion—13, Propagation of Socinianism in Transylvania and Hungary—14, In Holland and England—15, The foundation of this religion—16, Its fundamental principle—17, Summary of it—18, Moral principles—19, Racovian Catechism—20, State of learning among Socinians—21, Method of teaching theology—22, Controversies of the Socinians, Budnists or Budnians—23, Succeeded by Davides, Franken, and others—24, The Farnovian Sect.

CENTURY SEVENTEENTH.

SECTION I.

GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—GENERAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH	713
Sec. 1.—The Romish congregation for propagating the faith—2, Urban VIII. The college for propagating the faith—3, French congregations of this kind—4, Hence many Missionaries, among whom the Jesuits are distinguished—5, Yet the Jesuits became suspected—6, The plans of the Jesuits cause contention—7, Propagation of Christianity in India—8, The kingdoms of Siam, Tonquin, &c.—9, China—10, Progress there—11, The Jesuits accused—12, The principal accusation. History of it—13, Chinese controversy. The first question—14, The second question—15, Christianity in Japan—16, destroyed and overthrown—17, Protestant Missions in Asia—18, In Africa—19, 20, In America—21, The enemies of Christianity in England—22, Hobbes, the Earl of Rochester, &c.—23, Vanini, Rugger, Leazynski, Knutzen—24, Benedict do Spinoza—25, Literature and science cultivated and improved—26, Mathematical science especially—27, History—28, Languages and eloquence studied—29, The law of nature—30, Aristotelian and Paracelsic philosophy—31, Peter Gassendi—32, The Cartesian philosophy—33, Its principal adversary, Gassendi—34, Two sects of philosophers, the mathematical and metaphysical—35, Propagation and improvement of the metaphysical philosophy—36, Progress of the mathematical philosophy—37, Philosophers who were not of these schools.

	PAGE

SECTION II.

THE PARTICULAR HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

PART I.

THE HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT CHURCHES.

	PAGE
CHAP. I.—HISTORY OF THE ROMISH OR LATIN CHURCH.....	738
Sec. 1.—The sovereign pontiffs of this century—2, Solitude of the Romish church to oppress the Protestants—3, Commotions in Austria and Bohemia—4, The Bohemian war. Frederic V. defeated—5, Progress of the Bohemian German war—6, Gustavus Adolphus arrives. Termination of the Thirty Years' War—7, The peace of Westphalia—8, Injuries done to Protestants by the Romanists—9, The Moors driven out of Spain. Oppression of the reformed in France—10, Attempts upon England fail—11, Milder measures of the Popists to overcome the Protestants—12, Theological conferences attempted—13, The Popish pacificators—14, Pacificators on the side of the Protestants—15, The Popish Methodists—16, Protestant apostates—17, Losses of the Romish church in the East—18, Authority of the pontiffs gradually diminished—19, Controversy of Paul V. with the Venetians—20, War with the Portuguese—21, Contests of the French with the pontiffs—22, Louis XIV. in particular—23, State of the Romish clergy—24, The monks—25, The congregation of St. Maur—26, Port Royal. Reformed Bernardins de la Trappe—27, New sects of monks—28, The Jesuits—29, State of literature in the Romish church—30, Philosophy—31, Merits of the Jesuits, the Benedictines, the Fathers of the Oratory, and the Jansenists—32, The principal writers—33, The Romish religion corrupted still more—34, Morality subverted by the Jesuits—35, Condition of exoteric theology—36, Dogmatic, moral, and polemic theology—37, Contest of the Jesuits and Dominicans respecting the Aids of Grace, under Clement VIII.—38, Its continuation under Paul V. and its issue—39, 40, Commencement of the Jansenists—41, Arguments and measures of both parties—42, Five propositions condemned by Innocent X.—43, Bull of Alexander VII. against Jansenius—44, Peace of Clement IX. Subsequent events—45, Austere piety of the Jansenists—46, The convent of Port Royal—47, Controversy respecting the immaculate conception of St. Mary—48, Quietistic controversy. Molinos—49, His followers—50, Madame Guyon. Fenelon—51, La Peyrere, White, Sfondrati, and Borri—52, Canonizations.

	PAGE

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE GREEK AND ORIENTAL CHURCHES..... 778

Sec. 1.—State of the Greek church—2, Cyril Lucaris. Hope of a union of the Greeks and Latins disappointed—3, Whether the latter corrupted the religion of the former—4, The Russian church. The Roskolski—5, Revolution in it—6, State of the Monophysites—7, The Armenians—8, The Nestorians.
--	--

PART II.

THE HISTORY OF THE MODERN CHURCHES.

CHAP. I.—HISTORY OF THE EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCHES..... 785

Sec. 1.—Adverse events in the Lutheran church. Hesse became reformed—2, Brandenburg reformed—3, Attempted union between the Lutherans and reformed—4, Decree of Charonton. Conference at Lepsic—5, Conferences at Thorn and Cassel—6, Pacific acts of John Duraus—7, John Matthiæ and George Calixtus—8, External advantages of the Lutherans—9, Literature everywhere cultivated—10, State of philosophy. Aristotelians everywhere reign—11, Liberty in philosophizing gradually increases—12, Excellences and defects of the teachers—13, The faults of the times often, rather than of the persons—14, Ecclesiastical government, divine right—15, The more distinguished Lutheran writers—16, 17, History of the Lutheran religion
--	--

—18, Dogmatic theology—19, 20, Commotions in the Lutheran church—21, Commencement of the Calixtine controversies—22, Continuation and issue—23, The doctrines of Calixtus—24, Contests with the divines of Rinteln and Königsberg—25, With those of Jena—26, Origin of the Pietists—27, Commotions at Lepsic—28, Their progress—29, Rise of the controversies with Spener and the divines of Halle—30, 31, Their increase—32, Some sought to advance piety at the expense of truth, Godfrey Arnold—33, John Conrad Dippel—34, Fictions of John Will. Petersen—35, John Casp. Schade, and John Geo. Bosius—36, Contests on the Omnipresence of Christ's Body, between the divines of Tübingen and Glossen—37, Herman Rathman—38, Private controversy—39, Those of Pretorius and Arndt—40, Boehme—41, Prophets of this age—42, Ezekiel Meth, Esaias Stiefel, and Paul Nagel—43, Christopher Hoberg, Frederic Breckling, and Seidenbecher—44, Martin Seldelius.

CHAP. II.—HISTORY OF THE REFORMED CHURCH 810

Sec. 1.—Enlargement of the Reformed church—2, Its decrease. Fall of the French church—3, Persecutions of the reformed French church—4, Revocation of the edict of Nantes—5, Persecutions of Waldensians and the Palatines—6, State of learning and philosophy—7, Biblical interpretation—8, Dogmatic theology—9, State of moral theology—10, Controversies concerning grace and predestination—11, The Arminian schism—12, Its effects—13, Singular opinions of the French church—14, Contest of the hypothetical universalists—15, La Place and Cappel—16, Lewis le Blanc—17, 18, Claude Fajon—19, State of the English church under James I.—20, Charles I.—21, The Independents—22, Cromwell's reign—23, English Antinomians—24, Latitudinarians—25, Church of England under Charles II. and his successors—26, High church or non-jurors among the English—27, Their opinions—28, Contests among the Dutch—29, The Cartesian and Cocceian controversies—30, The Cartesian—31, The opinion of the Cocceians respecting the Holy Scriptures—32, Their theological opinions—33, Roëllian contest respecting the use of reason—34, Respecting the generation of the Son of God, &c.—35, Becker—36, Dutch sects. Verschorists, Hattemists—37, Commotions in Switzerland. The Formula Consensus.

CHAP. III.—HISTORY OF THE ARMINIANS OR REMONSTRANTS 837

Sec. 1.—The name of Arminians—2, Their origin—3, Their progress—4, The five points—5, 6, Maurice resolves on their destruction—7, Opinion of the Synod of Dort—8, Condition after the Synod of Dort—9, Recalled from exile—10, Early and later theology of the Arminians—11, Its aim and principal heads—12, Their confession of faith—13, Present state of the Arminians.

CHAP. IV.—HISTORY OF THE QUAKERS .. 845

Sec. 1.—Origin of the quakers. George Fox,—2, First movements of the sect under Cromwell—3, Progress in the times of Charles II. and James II. 4, Propagation out of England—5, Their controversies—6, Their religion generally—7, First principle—8, Its consequences—9, Concerning Christ—10, Discipline and worship—11, Moral doctrines—12, Form of government.

SUPPLEMENT ON THE QUAKERS .. 853

I.—DOCTRINE.—General belief.—Universal and saving light.—Worship.—Ministry.—Women's preaching.—Baptism and the supper.—Universal grace.—Perfection.—Oaths and war.—Government.—Deportment.—Conclusion.

II.—DISCIPLINE.—Its purposes.—Meetings for discipline.—Monthly-Meetings.—Poor.—Convinced persons.—Certificates of removal.—Overseers.—Mode of dealing with offenders.—Arbitration.—Marriages.—Births and burials.—Quarterly-Meetings.—Queries.—Appeals.—The Yearly-Meeting.—Women's meetings.—Meetings of ministers and elders.—Certificates to ministers.—The Meeting for sufferings.—Conclusion 855

CHAP. V.—HISTORY OF THE MENNONITES OR ANABAPTISTS 857

Sec. 1.—The adverse and the prosperous circumstances of the Mennonites—2, Union established among them—3, Sects of the Anabaptists—4, External form of the Mennonite church—5, The Uckewallists—6, The Waterlanders—7, The Galenists and Apostoolians.

CHAP. VI.—HISTORY OF THE SOCINIANS AND ARIANS 860

Sec. 1.—Flourishing state of the Socinians—2, Socinians at Altorf—3, Adversities of the Polish Socinians—4, 5, Fate of the exiles—6, The Arians.

CHAP. VII.—HISTORY OF SOME MINOR SECTS 863

Sec. 1, 2, The Collegiants—3, The Labadists—4, 4, Bourignon and Polret—5, The Philadelphia Society.

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY..... 866

Sec. 1—Preface—2, Prosperous events of the church generally, and especially of the Popish church—3, The Jesuits and their regulations in China—4, Protestant missions—5, Adverse events. Private enemies of Christianity—6, Atheists, Deists—7, Romish church, the pontiffs—8, Prospects of reconciliation between the evangelical churches and the papists frustrated—9, Intestine discords of the Romish church. Jansenist contests—10, Quesnel, the bull Unigenitus—11, Commotions from it in France—12, Supports of the Jansenists in France. Abbé de Paris—13, State of the Eastern church—14, External state of the Lutheran church—15, Its internal state—16, Intestine foes—17, The Herrenhutters. Zinzendorf—18, Cultivation of philosophy among the Lutherans—19, The Wertheim translation—20, Pietistic controversies—21, State of the Reformed church—22, Projects for union between the Lutherans and the reformed—23, State of the English church—24, Various sects in England. Whitefield—25, State of the Dutch church—26, Controversy in Switzerland respecting the Formula Consensus—27, The Socinians. Arians.

POSTSCRIPT 874

PREFACE BY DR. MURDOCK

TO

THE FIRST AMERICAN EDITION.

To produce a general history of the Christian church, adapted especially to the wants of the younger clergy but suitable for intelligent readers of all classes, a history so comprehensive as to touch on all the more important facts, briefly indeed but distinctly, with suitable enlargement on the points of peculiar interest and a constant reference to authorities and to the writers who give more full information, so that the work, while itself affording a good general knowledge of the whole subject, might serve as a guide to more thorough investigations—such was the design of Mosheim in the following work, and such has been the aim of the present translator.

The great need of such a work at the present day, when every other branch of theology is much cultivated, is so generally felt, that it is unnecessary to say anything to evince its importance or to excite an interest on the subject. The only things, therefore, which here claim attention are the character and history of Mosheim, the reasons for giving a new translation of his work, and the additions made to it by way of notes.

John Lawrence von Mosheim was nobly born at Lubec, October 9, 1694. His education was completed at the university of Kiel, where at an early age he became professor of philosophy. In his youth he cultivated a taste for poetry, and he actually published criticisms on that subject. But pulpit eloquence, biblical and historical theology, and practical religion, were his favourite pursuits. He published seven volumes of sermons, and left a valuable treatise on preaching which was printed after his death. The English and French preachers, particularly Tillotson and Watts, Saurin, Massillon, and Flechier, were his models. The Germans admit that he contributed much to improve the style and manner of preaching in their country. While a professor at Kiel, he gained such reputation that the King of Denmark invited him to a professorship at Copenhagen. But the Duke of Brunswick soon after, in the year 1725, called him to the divinity chair at Helmstadt, which he filled with great applause for twenty-two years. In 1747, when George II. king of England, the founder of the university of Göttingen, wished to place over that institution men of the highest rank in the literary world, Mosheim was deemed worthy to be its chancellor and the head of the department of theology. In this honourable station he remained eight years or till his death, September 9, 1755. His works were very numerous, consisting of translations into Latin or German of various foreign works, Italian, French, English, and Greek, with learned notes, an immense number of disquisitions relating to historical, dogmatic, and moral subjects, besides orations, sermons, letters, &c. On church history in which he most distinguished himself, he published, among other works, two volumes of essays on detached subjects; a compendious church history, in two volumes, 12mo; a full church history of the first century, 4to; Commentaries on the affairs of Christians to the time of Constantine, 4to; and he had just published the revision and enlargement of his compendious church history under the new title of INSTITUTES OF ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, ANCIENT AND MODERN, in one volume, 4to, when he was removed by death at the age of 61.*

The character of Mosheim is thus given by his disciple and translator, J. R. Schlegel: "We may have had, perhaps, biblical interpreters, who like Ernesti and Michaelis expounded the Scriptures with more philosophical and critical learning, perhaps also theologians and moralists who have treated dogmatic and practical theology with more metaphysical precision; we may likewise have had, and perhaps still have, pulpit orators who, among the many unsuccessful imitators of Mosheim's method, have even rivalled him, and perhaps come nearer to that ideal perfection which he wished to see realized. But in ecclesiastical history, the merits of Mosheim are so decisive and peculiar, that I will not venture to compare him with any who preceded or followed him in this department of learning. He is, as Schroeckh says, our first real historian in church history."† Dr. Maclaine informs us that, after he had commenced his translation, he received a letter from Bishop Warburton, saying, "Mosheim's compendium is excellent, the method admirable; in short, the only one deserving the name of an ecclesiastical history. It deserves and needs frequent notes."

Mosheim's Institutes, as well as most of his other historical works, being written in Latin, were accessible to learned foreigners. And Dr. Archibald Maclaine,‡ the son of a dissenting minister in the north of Ireland, and himself one of the ministers of an English congregation at the Hague, published an English translation of these Institutes so early as the year 1764, only nine years after the appearance of the original. Dutch and French translations were also made; but I know not by whom or at what time. In 1769, J. A. C. Von Einem, a pious but not profound German minister, commenced his German translation of the Institutes. His design was to bring down the work to the capacities of the unlearned, and to render it an edifying book for common Christians. Accordingly, he omitted nearly all the marginal references and discussions, and introduced much religious biography and historical detail. His translation fills six volumes, octavo, and the continuation of the history three additional volumes.

* A full list of his works is appended to the edition of his Institutiones, Helm. 1764, 4to. p. 958.—R.

† Schlegel's [German translation of] Mosheim, vol. i. Preface.

‡ As very little is known of this first translator of Mosheim, I subjoin a few particulars. Dr. Archibald Maclaine was the son of the Rev. Thomas Maclaine, minister of the Irish Presbyterian church at Monaghan from 1718 to 1740. His grandfather, of the same name with himself, was a Presbyterian minister at Market-hill, in the county of Armagh, from about 1700 till his death in 1734; and he had also two uncles in the ministry in Ireland, one at Banbridge in Down, and the other successively at Ballynahinch and Antrim. The translator was born at Monaghan, in 1722, and was educated at the University of Glasgow, where I find he was matriculated in 1739, and where he enjoyed the friendship of the celebrated Francis Hutcheson, professor of Moral Philosophy here at that time, and himself the son of an Irish Presbyterian minister in the city of Armagh. Dr. Maclaine was minister at the Hague from 1745 to 1794, and died at Bath in England, in 1804, aged 82 years.—R.

In the year 1770, John R. Schlegel, rector of the gymnasium of Heilbronn, a learned and judicious man, commenced another German translation, which is very literal and close, free from all interpolations, and accompanied with learned notes. This translation in four large volumes octavo, was completed in 1780, and a continuation of the history in two volumes appeared in 1784 and 1788.

The lectures and the printed works of Mosheim on ecclesiastical history kindled up such ardour for this science in Germany, that in the course of fifty years, Baumgarten, Semler, Schroeckh, Henke, and Schmidt, severally produced large and valuable church histories. Of these the most full and complete is that of Schroeckh, a pupil of Mosheim, continued by Tzschirner, in forty-five vols. 8vo. And next, that of Henke, continued by Vater, in nine vols. 8vo. Nor has the ardour for this branch of theology yet subsided in Germany; for professor Neander of Berlin is now publishing a profound and philosophical church history, which if completed on the plan commenced will probably fill twenty-five or thirty volumes 8vo. The limits assigned to this Preface will not allow a discussion of the merits of these several successors of Mosheim. Suffice it to say, that a careful examination of them all has resulted in the decided conviction that Mosheim's history, in a form similar to that given to it by Schlegel, is the best adapted to the wants of this country, and the most likely to meet approbation among the American clergy.

The necessity for a new English version of the Institutes arises principally from the unauthorised liberties taken by the former translator, under the mistaken idea of improving the work and rendering it more acceptable to the public. He says in his preface: "The style of the original is by no means a model to imitate in a work designed for general use. Dr. Mosheim affected brevity, and laboured to crowd many things into few words; thus his diction, though pure and correct, became sententious and harsh, without that harmony which pleases the ear, and those transitions which make a narration flow with ease. This being the case, I have sometimes taken considerable liberties with my author, and followed the spirit of his narrative without adhering strictly to the letter; and have often added a few sentences to render an observation more striking, a fact more clear, a portrait more finished." Thus Dr. Maclaine frankly owns that his chief design was to render the work interesting to those superficial readers who delight in that harmony which pleases the ear, and in those transitions which make a narration flow with ease; and that he often added a few sentences of his own, to give more vivacity and point to the sentiments of his author, or more splendour to their dress. And whoever will be at the pains of comparing his translation with the original, may see that he has essentially changed the style, and greatly coloured and altered in many places the sentiments of his author; in short, that he has paraphrased rather than translated a large part of the work. The book is thus rendered heavy and tedious to the reader by its superfluity of words, and likewise obscure and indefinite, and sometimes self-contradictory, by the looseness of its unguarded statements. Its credibility also as a history of facts is impaired, and it fails of carrying full conviction to the mind, because it is stripped of its native simplicity, precision, and candour. For no wise man will confide in a writer who appears intent on fabricating sonorous and flowing periods, who multiplies splendid epithets, and habitually deals in loose and unqualified assertions. Nor is this all, for the old translation has actually exposed Mosheim to severe and unmerited censure from different quarters; and Maclaine has long stood accused before the public as a translator "who has interwoven his own sentiments in such a manner with those of the original author, both in the notes and in the text, that it is impossible for a mere English reader to distinguish them, and in divers instances he has entirely contradicted him. This (add the accusers) will be evident to all, if a literal translation of Mosheim shall ever be published."* It is not strange, therefore, that so large a portion of the community have been dissatisfied with Maclaine's Mosheim, and have desired a more faithful and literal version of this valuable author.

If the translation here offered to the public is what it was intended to be, it is a close, literal version, containing neither more nor less than the original, and presenting the exact thoughts of the author in the same direct, artless, and lucid manner, with as much similarity in the phraseology and modes of expression as the idioms of the two languages would admit. That all the elegancies of the Latin style and diction of the author have been retained, is not pretended. The translator can only say he has aimed to give Mosheim, as far as he was able, the same port and mien in English as he has in Latin.

But writing out an entirely new and independent translation of the Institutes has not been half the labour bestowed on the work. Everywhere the statements of Mosheim have been compared with the sources from which they were drawn, and with the representations of other standard writers of different communities, so far as the means of doing this were at hand. The reasonings also of Mosheim have been weighed with care. And nothing has been suffered to go before the public, without first passing an examination by the best criteria within the reach of the translator. Often days and weeks have been consumed in such examinations, when the results were, that Mosheim's statements needed no correction, or at least that no palpable errors were discovered in them; and it was therefore thought advisable to allow him to express his own views without note or comment. But in many instances the translator supposed that he discovered such mistakes or defects in his author as called for animadversion. In these cases he has given, in the form of notes, such statements and criticisms as he deemed necessary. Numerous other instances occurred in which Mosheim was found to differ from other standard writers, or to have simply omitted what the translator or others deemed worth inserting; and in such cases the opinions or statements of other writers have been given, that the reader might be able to compare them, and the omitted matter has been supplied. In the history of the primitive church, for two or three centuries, the translator deemed almost everything interesting which can be learned with any degree of certainty. Accordingly, his notes and animadversions here are more frequent and minute than in the subsequent parts of the work. In regard to what are called the fathers, especially those of the first four centuries, and likewise the leading men in the church in all ages, he has deemed it proper greatly to enlarge the account given by Mosheim; not so much by minutely tracing the history of their private lives, as by more fully stating their public characters and acts, and mentioning such of their works as have come down to us. In no one respect has the history been more enlarged than in this. Through all the ages down to the reformation, the eminent men whom Mosheim thought proper to name particularly, have each a distinct note assigned them, containing all of much importance which can be said of them; and in each century, at the close of Mosheim's list of eminent men, nearly a complete catalogue of all those omitted by him is subjoined, with brief notices of the most material things known concerning them.—On the controversies and disputes among Christians, especially those which related to religious doctrines, much and critical attention has been bestowed. So also the reputed heresies and the different sects of professed Christians, which Mosheim had treated with great fullness and ability, have been carefully re-examined and subjected to critical remarks. Here great use has been made of the writers who succeeded Mosheim, and particularly of the younger Walch.—The propagation of Christianity, especially among the nations of Europe in the middle ages, and among the Asiatics by the Nestorians, has been the subject of frequent and sometimes long notes.—The origin and history of the reformation, particularly in countries not of the Augsburg confession; also the contests between the Lutherans and the Reformed, and the history of the English and Scotch churches, and of the English dissenters, have received particular attention; and the occasional mistakes of Mosheim have been carefully pointed out. Yet the enlargements of the history since the time of Luther, and particularly during the seventeenth century, have been the less considerable, because there was danger of swelling the work to a disproportionate size, and because another opportunity is anticipated for supplying these omissions.

* See the New-York edition of Maclaine's Mosheim, in 1824, vol. iv. p. 284.

These remarks may give some idea of the extensive additions to the original by way of notes. All additions to the work are carefully distinguished from the original by brackets. They are also accompanied by a notice of the persons responsible for their truth and correctness. What the translator gives as his own is subscribed, Mur. When he borrows from others, which he has done very largely, he either explicitly states what is borrowed and from whom, or subjoins the name of the author. Thus several notes are borrowed directly from Maclaine, and these have the signature Macl. annexed. A few others are translated from Von Einem's Mosheim, and these have the signature Von Ein. affixed. But the learned and judicious Schlegel has been taxed for the greatest amount of contributions. Throughout the work his notes occur, translated from the German, and with the signature Schl. annexed.

A continuation of the history to the present time is deemed so important, that the translator intends, if his life and health are spared, to attempt a compilation of this sort as soon as the printing of this work shall be completed.

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE SECOND AMERICAN EDITION.

For the very kind reception of his work, the translator feels himself under great obligations to the enlightened public who have passed so favourable a judgment upon it; and he would now offer them the best return he can make—a new edition of the work, carefully revised and somewhat enlarged, and, as he hopes, more worthy of approbation and better suited to the wants of students in this branch of theology.

The translation has been again compared with the original throughout, sentence by sentence, and subjected to a rigid criticism. In a very few instances, it was discovered that a word or clause of the original had been overlooked in the translation, and that in several instances the import of the original had been inadequately or obscurely expressed. Yet no very important departure from the sense of the original author has been discovered. Nearly all the numerous alterations and changes, therefore, relate to the phraseology, or to the choice of words and the structure of the sentences. The difficulty of combining a neat and perspicuous anglicism with a close adherence to the sense and to the very form of thought in the original, throughout so large a work, must be obvious to all who have had experience in the business of translating; and they will not need to be told that numberless corrections and improvements will always occur to a translator, who revises his work after a lapse of several years. In this manner the diction and the style of this edition, it is believed, have been considerably improved, without any sacrifice of fidelity in the translation. If it be not so, more than half a year's labour has been expended unsuccessfully.

The references, to a considerable extent and where the means were at hand, have been verified; and a considerable number of errors, some occasioned by the transcription but more by the mistakes of the printer, have been corrected. Many new references to authorities and to modern authors have also been added in various parts of the work; and these, it is hoped, will add considerably to the value of the present edition. Several topics have likewise been subjected to further investigation, and some new notes of no inconsiderable length have been added.

NEW-HAVEN, 1839.*

* A re-issue or third edition appeared in 1845, but without any additional preface.—R.

MOSHEIM'S PREFACE.

My *Institutes of Christian History having been long out of print, the worthy person at whose expense they were published has often requested me to give a new edition of them, somewhat improved and enlarged. This request I resisted for many years, for I was reluctant to suspend other works then on my hands which were deemed more important; besides, I must acknowledge that I shrunk from the irksome task of correcting and enlarging a book which needed so much amendment. The importunities of the publisher, however, and of other friends who joined with him, at length overcame my tardiness; and now, after the leisure hours of two years have been spent on the work, it is brought to a close, and these Institutes of Ecclesiastical History now make their appearance, not only in a new form and dress, but so materially changed as to be almost entirely a new work.

The distribution of the materials under certain heads, which I once deemed the best form for the learner, is still retained; for, notwithstanding weighty reasons have occurred to my mind for preferring a continuous and unbroken narrative, I have chosen to follow the judgment of those excellent men whom experience has led to prefer the former method. And indeed a little reflection must convince us, that whoever would embrace in a single book all the facts and observations necessary to a full acquaintance with the state of the church in every age of it, must of course adopt some classification and distribution of those facts; and as such was the design of the following work, I have left its primitive form unchanged, and have directed my attention solely to the correction, improvement, and enlargement of the work, so as to render it a more useful book.

My principal care has been to impart fidelity and authority to the narrative. For this purpose I have gone to the primary sources of information, that is, to the best writers of all ages who lived near the times they describe; and I have consulted them with attention, and have transcribed from them whenever they were sufficiently concise, and at the same time clear and nervous. It is often the case that those who write summaries of history only abridge the more voluminous historians; and this method I myself before pursued to a considerable degree. But such a procedure, though sometimes justifiable and not to be wholly condemned, is attended with this evil, that it perpetuates the mistakes which are apt to abound in very large and voluminous works, by causing them to pass from a single book into numerous others. I had long been apprized of this danger; but I felt it with no little mortification when I brought the testimony of the best authorities to pour their light on the pages of my own work. I now perceived that writers pre-eminent for their diligence and fidelity are not always to be trusted, and I found that I had abundant occasion for adding, expunging, changing, and correcting in every part of my book. In performing this task, I know that I have not been wanting in patience and industry, or in watchfulness and care; but whether these have secured me against all mistakes, which is confessedly of no easy accomplishment, I leave them to judge who are best informed in ecclesiastical affairs. To aid persons disposed to institute such inquiries, I have in general made distinct reference to my authorities; and if I have perverted their testimony either by misstatement or misapplication, I confess myself to be less excusable than other transgressors in this way, because I had before me all the authors whom I quote, and I turned them over and read and compared them with each other, being resolved to follow solely their guidance.

* A work in 2 vols. 12mo, first published in 1737-41, and afterward abridged by J. P. Miller, in 1 vol. 12mo, Hamb. 1752.—Mur.

This effort to render my history faithful and true, that is, exactly coincident with the statements of the most credible witnesses, has caused many and various changes and additions throughout the work; but in no part of it are the alterations greater or more remarkable than in the Third Book, which contains the history of the church, and especially of the Latin or Western Church, from the time of Charlemagne to the Reformation by Luther. This period of ecclesiastical history, though it embraces great events and is very important on account of the light it casts on the origin and causes of the present civil and religious state of Europe, thereby enabling us correctly to estimate and judge of many things which occur in our own times, has not hitherto been treated with the same clearness, solidity, and elegance as the other parts of church history. Here the number of original writers is great; yet few of them are in common use or of easy acquisition, and they all frighten us either with their bulk, the barbarity of their style, or their excessive price; not a few of them too, either knowingly or ignorantly, corrupt the truth, or at least obscure it by their ignorance and unskilfulness, and some of them have not yet been published. It is not strange, therefore, that many things in this part of ecclesiastical history should have been either silently passed over or less happily stated and explained, even by the most laborious and learned authors. Among these, the ecclesiastical annalists and the historians of the monastic sects, so famous in the Roman church, as Baronius, Raynald, Bzovius, Mauriquez, Wadding, and others, though richly supplied with ancient manuscripts and records, have often committed more faults and fallen into greater mistakes than writers far inferior to them in learning, reputation, and means of information. Having therefore bestowed much attention during many years on the history of the church from the eighth century onward, and believing that I had obtained from works published or still in manuscript, a better and more correct knowledge of many events than is given in the common accounts of those times, I conceived that I might do service to the cause of ecclesiastical history by exhibiting to the world some of the results of my investigations; and that by throwing some light on the obscure period of the Middle Ages I might excite men of talents and industry to pursue the same object, and thus to perfect the history of the Latin Church. Claiming the indulgence allowed an old man to boast a little, I flatter myself that I have brought forward some things which are new or previously little known; that other things which had been stated incorrectly or obscurely, I have here exhibited with clearness and traced back to the proper authorities; and that some things which were accredited fables I have now exploded. Whether I deceive myself in all this or not, the discerning reader may ascertain by examining and comparing with the common accounts what I have here said respecting Constantine's donation, the Cathari and Albigenes, the Beghards and Beguines, the Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit (that pest to many parts of Europe during four centuries) and of the Fratricelli [or Little Brethren], the controversies between the Franciscans and the Roman pontiffs, the history of Berengarius and of the Lollards, and several other subjects.

If in these enlargements of ecclesiastical history, and while giving views either partially or wholly new, I had used the same brevity as on the subjects well stated and explained by many before me, I should neither have satisfied the inquisitive reader nor have done justice to myself. For I should have appeared to many as a writer of fables, and their apprehensions on these subjects would have been indistinct, and consequently useless and fallacious. Therefore, when I have departed widely from the common statements or advanced apparent novelties, I have not only aimed to be very explicit, but in order to give credibility to my narrative, I have gone into more ample disquisitions and citations of authorities, because full statements and demonstrations, though out of place in an epitome of history, were here indispensable.

In addition to these causes for changing materially the character and increasing the size of my book, another occurred soon after I commenced its revision. I had at first designed my work especially for lecturers on church history, who need a compendious text for the basis of their instructions, and had therefore only touched upon many things which I supposed would be dilated and explained more fully by the lecturer. But when I began to revise and correct the work for a new edition, it occurred to me that it would be more satisfactory to many and better subserve the cause of sacred learning, if the book were adapted not merely to the convenience of lecturers, but also to the wants of those who attempt without a teacher to gain a general knowledge of ecclesiastical history. As soon as this thought occurred my views were changed, and I began at once to supply omissions, to explain more fully what was obscure, and to give greater precision and distinctness to the whole narrative. And hence it is that, in describing the calamities in which the Christians of the first ages were involved, more pains are taken than is commonly done to state precisely the truth, and in tracing the origin and progress of the sects which disturbed the church greater accuracy is attempted; so likewise the new forms of religion, devised by those who love new things, are calmly and candidly described and with all possible fidelity; religious contests and disputes are more clearly stated, and their importance more carefully determined; and the history of the Roman pontiffs after the time of Charlemagne, their conflicts and their enterprises, have received more careful attention. I mention these as specimens only of what has been attempted for the advantage of those who cannot pursue a regular course of church history from their want of books or leisure, and who yet wish to obtain a clear and correct view of the principal facts and transactions. The book for the most part may be safely trusted by such readers; it will afford them as much knowledge as will satisfy one who reads only for practical purposes; and besides, it will direct to the authors from whom more full information may be obtained.

It would be folly and would betray ignorance of human imperfection, if I should suppose that no errors could be detected and that nothing needed correction in all the details of so large a history; yet, conscious of my own integrity and good faith and of the pains I have taken to avoid mistakes, I cannot but hope that I have rarely so failed that serious evils will result from my errors.

I could add some other prefatory remarks which would perhaps not be useless; but nothing more need be added to enable those who will be candid and ingenuous, and who are competent judges in such matters, to judge correctly of the present work. I therefore conclude by offering the just tribute of my gratitude to Almighty God who has given me strength, amid the infirmities of age and the pressure of other labours and cares, to surmount the difficulties and bear the fatigue of completing the work now given to the public.

GÜTTINGEN, March 23, 1755.

INTRODUCTION.

1. The Ecclesiastical History of the New Dispensation is a clear and faithful narrative of the external condition and of the internal state and transactions of that body of men who have borne the name of Christians, and in which events are so traced to their causes, that the providence of God may be seen in the establishment and preservation of the Church, and the reader's piety no less than his intelligence be advanced by the perusal.

2. The best form of such a history seems to be that which considers the whole body of Christians as constituting a community subjected to lawful authority and governed by certain laws and institutions. To such a community many external events must happen which will be favourable to its interests or adverse to them; and since nothing human is stable, many things will occur in the bosom of such community, tending to change its character. Hence its history may very suitably be divided into its external and its internal history. In this manner the history of the Christian community, in order to its embracing all the details and promoting the greatest usefulness, should be divided.

3. The external history of Christians, or of the Christian community, is properly called the history of the Church, and embraces all the occurrences and changes which have visibly befallen this sacred society. And as all communities are sometimes prosperous and sometimes meet with adversity, such also has been the lot of Christians. Hence this part of ecclesiastical history is fitly divided into an account of the prosperous and of the calamitous events which Christians have experienced.

4. The prosperous events; or those tending to the advancement and progress of the Christian interest, proceeded either from the heads and leaders or from the subordinate members of this community. Its leaders were either public characters, as kings, magistrates, and sovereign pontiffs; or private individuals, as the teachers, the learned, the influential, and the wealthy. Both classes have contributed much, in all ages, to the increase of the Church. Men in power, by their authority, laws, beneficence, and even by their arms, have contributed to establish and enlarge the Church. And the doctors and men of learning, of genius, and eminent piety, by their vigorous and noble efforts, their travels, their writings, and their munificence, have successfully recommended the religion of Christ to those ignorant of it. And common Christians, by their faith, their constancy, their piety, their love to God and men, have induced many to become Christians.

5. The calamitous events which have befallen the Church, arose either from the fault of Christians, or from the malice and stratagems of their adversaries. There is abundant evidence that Christians themselves, and especially those who presided in the Church, have brought much evil upon the body by their negligence, their unholy lives, and their strifes and contentions. The enemies of Christ's kingdom were also either public or private men. Public enemies, namely kings and magistrates, by their laws and penalties, obstructed the progress of Christianity. Private men, the philosophers, the superstitious, and the despisers of all religion, assailed the Church with false accusations, stratagems, and hostile writings.

6. The internal history of the Christian Church treats of the changes to which the Church, in every age, has been exposed, in regard to its distinguishing characteristics as a religious society. It may not unsuitably be called the history of the Christian religion. The causes of these internal changes are found, for the most part, in the rulers of the Church. These often explained the principles and precepts of Christianity to suit their own fancy or convenience; and as many acquiesced and were submissive, and others not unfrequently resisted, insurrections and internal wars were the consequence. To all these subjects the intelligent ecclesiastical historian must direct his attention.

7. The first subject in the internal history of the Church is the history of its rulers and of its government. Originally the teachers and the people conjointly administered the affairs of the Church; but these teachers, in process of time, assumed a loftier spirit, and, trampling on the rights of the people, they claimed sovereign power both in sacred and secular affairs. At last things gradually came to this, that one person held supreme power over the whole Church, or at least affected to hold it. Among these governors and guides of the Church, some obtained by their writings pre-eminent fame and influence; and as these were by after ages regarded as oracles and blindly followed, they ought to rank among the governors of the Church, whether they held offices in it or not.

8. The history of the laws by which this religious society was governed naturally follows the history of its ministers. The laws peculiar to the Christian community are of two kinds. Some are divine, proceeding from God himself. These are written in those books which Christians very properly believe to be divinely inspired. Others are human, or are enactments by the rulers of the community. The former are usually called doctrines, and are divided into two species; namely, doctrines of faith, which are addressed to the understanding; and moral doctrines, which address the heart or will.

9. In the history of these laws or doctrines, it should be our first inquiry, in what estimation has the sacred volume been held from age to age, and how was it interpreted? For, in every period, the state of religion among Christians has depended on the reverence paid to the sacred volume and on the manner of expounding it. We should next inquire how these divine instructions and laws were treated—in what manner they were inculcated and explained—defended against gainsayers or debased and corrupted. The last inquiry is, how far Christians were obedient to these divine laws, or how they lived; and what measures were taken by the rulers of the Church to restrain the licentiousness of transgressors.

10. The human laws of which we speak are prescriptions relating to the external worship of God, or religious rites, whether derived from custom or from positive enactment. Rites either directly appertain to religion or indirectly refer to it. The former embrace the whole exterior of religious worship, both public and private; the latter include every thing, except direct worship, that is accounted religious and proper. This part of religious history is very extensive; partly from the variety and partly from the frequent changes in ceremonies. A concise history can therefore only touch upon the subject without descending into details.

11. As in civil republics wars and insurrections sometimes break out; so in the Christian republic serious commotions have often arisen on account of both doctrines and rites. The leaders and authors of these seditions are called heretics; and the opinions for which they separated from other Christians are called heresies. The history of these commotions, or heresies, should be fully detailed. This labour, if wisely expended and with impartiality, will well repay the toil; but it is arduous and difficult. For the leaders of these parties have been treated with much injustice, and their doctrines are misrepresented; nor is it easy to come at the truth in the midst of so much darkness, since most of the writings of those called heretics are now lost. Those, therefore, who approach this part of Church history should exclude everything invidious from the name heretic, and should consider it as used in its more general sense, to denote those who were the occasion, whether by their own or others' fault, of divisions and contests among Christians.¹

12. In treating of both the external and the internal history of the Church, the writer who would be useful must trace events to their causes; that is, he must tell us not only what happened but likewise how and why. He who narrates the naked facts only enriches our memory and amuses us; but he who at the same time states the operative causes of events profits us, for he both strengthens our judgment and increases our wisdom. Yet it must be confessed that caution is here necessary, lest we fabricate causes and palm our own waking dreams upon men long since dead.

¹ The greater number of the topics enumerated in this section and the preceding ones (6—11) have been treated of in separate works, to which the student of ecclesiastical history should refer for fuller information than can be given in general histories; thus, for the internal government, discipline, and worship of the early Church, he must consult Bingham's Origines Ecclesiasticæ, in his Works. London, 1840, 9 vols. 8vo; abridged by Blackmore, in his Summary of Christ. Antiquities. London, 1722, 2 vols. 8vo; Coleman's Antiquities of the Christian Church, in Ward's Library. London, 1843, taken chiefly from Augusti's Handbuch der Christ. Archæologie. Ebeind. 1836—8, 3 vols. an abridgment by the author from his larger work, entitled, Denkwürdigkeiten aus der Christ. Archæologie. Leip. 1817—31, 12 vols. 8vo; Riddell's Manual of Christian Antiquities. London, 1839; also taken from Augusti, but adapted to the state of opinion in the Church of England. For the history of the ethical and doctrinal principles of Christianity, we must still have recourse to German writers, as we have not as yet any works in Britain on these important branches of Ecclesiastical History. The principal modern writers are, on Ethics, Stäudlin and De Wette; and on doctrines, Münscher, Engelhardt, Ruperti, and Hagenbach. A translation of Hagenbach's valuable Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte. Leip. 1840—1, 3 vols. 8vo, is now in course of publication by Clark of Edinburgh, in his Foreign Theological Library, in the first vol. of which (pages 25—30) the student will find extended references to the best works on these topics. The history of heresies, extending to the 8th century, is most fully given by the younger Walch, in his Vollständige Historie der Ketzereien. Leip. 1762—85, 11 vols. 8vo. There are also numerous works, referred to in subsequent notes on particular heresies, and several on those of certain periods; such as Ittig, De Heresibus primæ et secundæ a Christo nato sæculi, 2d Edition. Leip. 1703, 4to; Burton's Inquiry into the Heresies of the Apostolic Age. Oxford, 1823, 8vo, with the various works mentioned by him in the Introduction.—E

13. In exploring the causes of events, besides access to the testimony of the leading men and the history of the times, a good knowledge of human nature is requisite. The historian who understands the human character, the propensities and powers, the passions and weaknesses of man, will readily discover the causes of many things attempted or done in former times. No less important is it to be acquainted with the education and the opinions of the persons we treat of; for men commonly regard as praiseworthy and correct whatever accords with the views and practices of their ancestors.

14. In the external history, an historian should consider the civil state of the countries in which the Christian religion was either approved or rejected, and also their religious state, that is, the opinions of the people concerning the Deity and divine worship. For it will not be difficult to determine why the Church was now prosperous and now in trouble, if we know what was the form of government, what the character of the rulers, and what the prevailing religion at the time.

15. To dispel obscurities in the internal history, nothing is more conducive than a knowledge of the history of learning, and especially of philosophy. For, most unfortunately, human learning and philosophy have in every age been allowed more influence, in regard to revealed religion, than was proper, considering the natures of the two things. Also a good knowledge of the civil government and of the ancient superstitions of different countries, is useful to the same end; for through the prudence or, shall I say, the indiscretion of the presiding authorities, many parts of the discipline and worship of the church have been shaped after the pattern of the ancient religions; and no little deference has been paid to the pleasure of sovereigns and to human laws, in regulating the church of God.¹

¹ An excellent specimen of what may be accomplished by the ecclesiastical historian, in accordance with the principles laid down in these sections (12—15) is afforded by Milman's History of Christianity to the

16. From what sources all this knowledge must be drawn is quite obvious; namely, from the writers of every age who have treated of Christian affairs, and especially from those contemporary with the events; for on testimonies or authorities is laid the basis of all true history. Yet we ought not to disregard those who from these original sources have compiled histories and annals; for to refuse proffered assistance and despise the labours of those who have attempted, before us, to throw light on obscure subjects, is mere folly.²

17. From all this it will be easy to determine the essential qualifications of a good ecclesiastical historian. He must have no moderate acquaintance with human affairs in general; his learning must be extensive, his mind sagacious and accustomed to reason, his memory faithful, and his judgment sound and matured by long exercise. In his disposition and temperament he must be patient of labour, persevering, inflexible in his love of truth and justice, and free from every prejudice.

18. Persons who attempt this species of writing are liable to prejudice, especially from three sources; namely, times, persons, and opinions. First, the times in which we live often have such ascendancy over us that we judge of past ages by our own; we conclude that because a particular thing neither does nor can take place in our age, therefore it neither did nor could take place in former times. Secondly, the persons with whose testimony we are concerned, especially if for ages they have been highly revered for their holiness or their virtues, acquire such an authority with us as dazzles and deceives us. And, thirdly, our partialities for those opinions and doctrines which we ourselves embrace often so fetter

Abolition of Paganism in the Roman Empire. Lond. 1840, 3 vols. 8vo, which, though in some respects defective and objectionable, is on the whole a most valuable addition to our historical literature.—R.

² To acquaint us with all the writers on ecclesiastical history was the professed object of Slettenius in his Propylaum historia Christiana. Luneb. 1696, 4to; and of Sagittarius, Introductio in historiam ecclesie singulæque ejus partes, especially vol. 1st. [Jena, 1718, 2 vols. 4to. Ed. Schmidt. Since Mosheim wrote, several important works have appeared expressly on this subject; but the fullest and most satisfactory account of writers on ecclesiastical history, both general and special, is to be found in the 3d volume of the elder Walch's Bibliotheca Theologica selecta. Jena, 1762, 4 vols. 8vo, one of the many valuable works for which we are indebted to the singular industry and perseverance of German compilers. What Danz has done for the Bibliotheca Patristica of this author, by continuing it to the present time, is now much needed for an enlarged edition of this 3d volume. In the meantime, the student will find a few references to recent writers in Dowling's Introduction to the Critical Study of Eccles. History. Lond. 1838, 8vo, and a full catalogue in Lowndes's British Librarian, col. 1245, &c. a valuable compilation, though only a small portion has been yet published.—R.

our minds that we unconsciously pervert the truth in regard to facts. Now from this triple bondage the mind must as far as possible be set free.

19. But from this rule and from others equally obvious and important, how widely ecclesiastical historians have departed, in all ages, is too well known. For not to mention the many who think themselves great historians if they have a good memory, and to pass by those also who are governed more by their private interests than by the love of truth, there are very few writers whom neither the sect to which they belong, nor the venerated names of some ancient authors, nor the influence of the age in which they live, can disarm and divert from the truth. In the present age more especially, the spirit of the times and the prejudice of opinions have incredible influence. Hence the following arguments, so often occurring in the writings of learned men: These are true sentiments; therefore we must suppose the ancient Christians embraced them. This is correct practice, according to Christ's precepts; therefore doubtless the earlier Christians so lived. This does not now take place; therefore it did not in ancient times.

20. Ecclesiastical history, if written by persons free from these and other faults, cannot fail to be greatly beneficial to mankind at large, but especially to the teachers and guides of the Church. Whoever shall consider attentively the numerous, the varied, and threatening dangers which the Christian religion has happily surmounted, will doubtless find himself more established in the belief of this religion and better prepared to withstand the assaults, the cavils, and insidious attacks of the profane. The many illustrious examples of virtue with which this history abounds are admirably suited to awaken pious emotions and to instil the love of God into lukewarm minds. Those wonderful revolutions which have occurred in every age of the Church, originating often from small beginnings, proclaim aloud the providence of God and the instability and vanity of all human things. Nor is it of small advantage to know the origin of the numerous and absurd opinions, superstitions, and errors which still prevail in many parts of the Christian world. For such knowledge will enable us to discover the truth more clearly, to prize it more, and to defend it better. Of the entertainment afforded by these and other parts of Church history, I shall say nothing.

21. But especially public instructors and the ministers of religion may from this study derive great assistance in acquiring that practical wisdom which they so much need. Here, the numerous mistakes of even great men warn them what to shun, if they would not embroil the Christian Church; there, many illustrious examples of noble and successful effort are patterns for their imitation. And for combating errors, both those inveterate by age and those of more recent growth, nothing, except the holy Scriptures and sound reason, can be compared with this kind of history. I pass over other advantages which will be found by experience to result from this study; nor will I mention its subserviency to other branches of knowledge, particularly that of jurisprudence.¹

22. The two parts of Church history, the external and the internal, require an arrangement or plan of teaching suited to each. The external history, being a long and continued narrative extending through many centuries, requires a distribution into certain intervals of time, for the benefit of the understanding and memory of the reader, and the preservation of order. Various divisions of time may be adopted. I have preferred the customary one, into centuries, because it is the one most approved of, though it is not free from objections.

23. No small part of these objections, however, will be removed, if we superadd a more general division of time, or one into longer periods, bounded by certain great revolutions and changes in the state of the Church. Accordingly the whole of the following history is divided into four books. The first contains the history of the Church of Christ from its commencement to the time of Constantine the Great; the second extends it from Constantine to Charlemagne; the third continues it to the time when Luther began the Reformation in Germany; the fourth and last brings it down to our own times.²

24. Ecclesiastical history treats, moreover, as we have already seen, of various distinct but kindred subjects which may properly be arranged under separate heads. Historians have adopted different classifications, as their taste or their design in writing pointed out. The distribution which I prefer has been already indicated, and need not here be repeated.

¹ The reader will find an admirable sketch of the advantages resulting from a knowledge of ecclesiastical history and of the preparation requisite for its study, in the Introduction to the Elements of Church History, by the late lamented Dr. Welsh of Edinburgh, whose premature death has unhappily prevented the completion of this excellent work.—K.

² Mosheim closes these INSTITUTES with the seventeenth century, adding a single supplementary chapter on the early part of the eighteenth.—K.

BOOK I.

FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST,

TO CONSTANTINE THE GREAT.

CENTURY FIRST.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE WORLD AT THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOUR.

1. At the time when God became incarnate, a great part of the world was subject to the Romans. Their remoter provinces they either ruled by means of temporary governors and presidents sent from Rome, or suffered to live under their own kings and laws, subject to the sovereign control of the Roman republic. The senate and citizens of Rome, though not deprived of all appearance of liberty, were really under the authority of one man, Augustus, who was clothed with the titles of emperor, pontifex maximus, censor, tribune of the people, pro-consul; in a word, with every office which conferred general power and pre-eminence in the commonwealth.¹

2. The Roman government, if we regard only its form and laws, was sufficiently mild and equitable.² But the injustice and avarice of the nobles and provincial governors, the Roman lust of conquest and dominion, and the rapacity of the publicans who farmed the revenues of the state,³ brought incalculable evils on the people. The magistrates and publicans on the one hand fleeced the people of their property; and on the other this lust of dominion required numerous armies to be raised in the provinces, which was oppressive to them and was the occasion of almost perpetual wars and insurrections.

3. Still, this widely extended dominion of one people, or rather of one man, was attended with several advantages. First, it brought into union a multitude of nations differing in customs and languages. Secondly, it gave freer access to the remotest nations.⁴ Thirdly, it gradually civilized the barbarous nations, by introducing among them the Roman laws and customs. Fourthly, it spread literature, the arts, and philosophy, in countries where they were not before cultivated. All these greatly aided the ambassadors of our Lord in fulfilling their sacred commission.⁵

At the birth of Christ the Roman empire was much freer from commotions than it had been for many years. For though I cannot agree with those who think with Orosius, that the temple of Janus was then shut, and the whole world in profound peace;⁶ yet there can be no doubt that the period when our Saviour descended on earth, if compared with the preceding times, was peculiarly peaceful. And according to St. Paul,⁷ this peace was very necessary for those whom Christ commissioned to preach the gospel.

5. Of the state of those nations which lay without the Roman empire, historic records will not allow us to give so full an account. Nor is it very necessary to our purpose. It is sufficient to know that the oriental nations were pressed down by a stern despotism, which their effeminacy of mind and body, and even their religion, led them to bear with patience, while the more northern nations enjoyed much greater liberty, which was protected by the rigour of their climate and the conse-

¹ See Camplanus De Officio et potestate magistratum Romanorum. et jurisdictione, p. 3, &c. Genova, 1725, 4to. [Memoirs of the court of Augustus, by Blackwell, 2 vols. 4to. Edinb. 1753.—Schl.]

² See Moyle's Essay on the constitution of the Roman government, in his posth. works, vol. 1. pages 1—58. Lond. 1726, 8vo. Scip. Maffei, Verona illustrata, lib. 1. p. 65. [Glannone, Histoire civile du royaume de Naples, vol. 1. p. 3, &c.—Schl.]

³ See Burmann, de Vectigalibus populi Romani, cap. ix. p. 123, &c.—Schl.]

⁴ See Bergler Histoire des grands chemins de l'empire Romain, 2nd Ed. Brussels, 1728, 4to, and Otto, De Tutela viarum publicarum, par. ii. p. 314.

⁵ Origen, among others, acknowledges this, lib. ii. adv. Celsum, p. 79, Ed. Cambr. [See also Heilmann, Comment. de florentie literarum statu et habitu ad relig. Christi initia.—Schl.]

⁶ See Massonus, Templum Jani, Christo nascente, reservatum. Rotterd. 1706, 8vo.

⁷ See 1 Tim. ii. 1, &c.

quent energy of their constitutions, aided by their mode of life and their religion.¹

6. All these nations were plunged in the grossest superstition. For though the idea of one supreme God was not wholly extinct,² yet most nations, or rather all except the Jews, supposed that each country and province was subjected to a set of very powerful beings, whom they called gods, and whom the people, in order to live happily, must propitiate with various rites and ceremonies. These deities were supposed to differ materially from each other in sex, power, nature, and offices. Some nations, indeed, went beyond others in impiety and absurdity of worship, but all stood chargeable with irrationality and gross stupidity in matters of religion.

7. Thus every nation had a class of deities peculiar to itself, among which one was supposed to be pre-eminent over the rest and was their king, though subject himself to the laws of fate, or to an eternal destiny. For the oriental nations had not the same gods as the Gauls, the Germans, and the other northern nations; and the Grecian deities were essentially different from those of the Egyptians, who worshipped brute animals, plants, and various productions of nature and art.³ Each nation likewise had its own method of worshipping and propitiating its gods, differing widely from the rites of other nations. But from their ignorance or other causes, the Greeks and Romans maintained that their gods were universally worshipped; and they therefore gave the names of their own gods to the foreign deities, which has caused immense confusion and obscurity in the history of the ancient religions, and produced numberless errors in the works of very learned men.⁴

8. But this variety of gods and religions in the pagan nations produced no wars or feuds among them, unless, perhaps, the Egyptians are an exception.⁵ Yet the Egyptian wars waged to avenge their gods, cannot properly be called religious wars, not being undertaken either to propagate or to suppress any one form of religion. Each nation, without concern, allowed its neighbours to enjoy their own views of religion, and to worship their own gods in their own way. Nor need this tolerance greatly surprise us.⁶ For they who regard the world as being divided like a great country into numerous provinces, each subject to a distinct order of deities, cannot despise the gods of other nations, nor think of compelling all others to pay worship to their own national gods. The Romans in particular, though they would not allow the public religions to be changed or multiplied, yet gave the citizens full liberty in private, to observe foreign religions, and to hold meetings and feasts, and erect temples and groves to those foreign deities in whose worship there was nothing inconsistent with the public safety and the existing laws.⁷

9. The greater part of the gods of all nations were ancient heroes, famous for their achievements and their worthy deeds; such as kings, generals, and founders of cities, and likewise females who were highly distinguished for their deeds and discoveries, whom a grateful posterity had deified. To these, some added the more splendid and useful objects in the natural world, among which the sun, moon, and stars, being pre-eminent, received worship from nearly all; and some were not ashamed to pay divine honours to mountains, rivers, trees, the earth, the ocean, the winds, and even to diseases, to virtues and vices, and to almost every conceivable object—or at least, to

¹ Seneca, de Ira, lib. ii. cap. xvi. Opp. tom. i. p. 36, Ed. Gronovii: Fero itaque imperia penes eos fuisse populos, qui milifere celo utuntur: in frigora, septentrionemque vergentibus immanis ingenia sunt, ut ait poeta, suoque similitudo celo.

² See Meiners, in his Historia doctrinae de vero Deo, omnium rerum Auctore atque Rectore, Lemgo, 1780, 8vo, where, from a critical investigation, proof is adduced, that the ancient pagan nations were universally ignorant of the Creator and Governor of the world, till Anaxagoras, about 450 years before Christ, and afterwards other philosophers, conceived that the world must have had an intelligent architect.—Mur.

³ This was long since remarked by Athanasius, Oratio contra Gentes, Opp. tom. i. p. 25. [See Le Clerc, Art. critique, par. ii. sec. i, cap. xiii. sec. 11, and Bibliothèque Choisie, tome vii. p. 84; Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses demonstrated, vol. ii. p. 233, &c. And respecting the Egyptian gods, see Jablonski, Pantheon Aegyptiorum, Francf. ad Viadr. 1750, 8vo.; F. S. Von Schmidl, Opuscula, quibus res antiquae, praecipue Aegyptiacae, explanantur, 1765, 8vo.—Schl.

⁴ MacLaine here subjoins a long note, asserting that the gods worshipped in different pagan countries were so similar, that they might properly be called by the same names. He therefore thinks Dr. Mosheim has overrated the mischief done to the history of idolatry by the Greek and Roman writers. But there was, certainly, little resemblance between Woden and Mercury, Thor and Jupiter, Friga and Venus; or between the Roman deities and Brahma, Vishnoo, Siva, and the other gods of Hindostan. And as the classic writers give very imperfect descriptions of foreign deities, and leave us to infer most of their characteristics from the names assigned them, it is evident that Mosheim's remark is perfectly just.—Mur.

⁵ See what Pignorius has collected on this subject, in his Expositio Mensae Iriacae, p. 41, &c.

⁶ Though extolled by Shaftsbury, among others Characteristics, vol. ii. p. 166. and vol. iii. pages 60, 86, 87, 154, &c.—Schl.

⁷ See Corn, à Bynekershoeckh, Dissert. de cultu peregrinae religionis apud Romanos, in his Opuscula, Leyden, 1719, 4to. [Warburton's Divine Legation, vol. i. p. 307. Compare Livy, Hist. Rom. lib. xxv. 1, and xxxi. 18, and Valer. Max. l. 3.—Schl. [See also Lardner, Credib. of Gospel Hist. part i. book i. chap. viii. secs. 3–6.—Mur.

the deities supposed to preside over these objects.¹

10. The worship of these deities consisted in numerous ceremonies, with sacrifices, offerings, and prayers. The ceremonies were for the most part absurd and ridiculous, and throughout debasing, obscene, and cruel. The sacrifices and offerings varied according to the nature and offices of the different gods.² Most nations sacrificed animals; and, what was most horrid, not a few of them likewise immolated human victims.³ Their prayers were truly insipid, and void of piety both in their form and matter.⁴ Over this whole worship presided pontiffs, priests, and servants of the gods, divided into many classes, and whose business it was to see that the rites were duly performed. These were supposed to enjoy the friendship and familiar converse of the gods; and they basely abused their authority to impose upon the people.

11. The religious worship of most nations was confined to certain places or temples,⁵ and to certain times or stated days. In the temples, the statues and images of their gods were placed; and these images were supposed to be animated in an inexplicable manner by the gods themselves. For, senseless as these worshippers of imaginary gods truly were, they did not wish to be accounted worshippers of lifeless substances, brass, stone, and wood, but of a deity which they maintained to be present in the image, provided it was consecrated in due form.⁶

12. Besides this common worship to which all had free access, there were among both orientals and Greeks certain recondite and concealed rites, called mysteries, to which very few were admitted. Candidates for initiation had first to give satisfactory proofs to the hierophants of their good faith and patience, by various most troublesome ceremonies. When initiated, they could not divulge any thing they had seen, without exposing their lives to imminent danger.⁷ Hence it is that the interior of these hidden rites is, at this day, little known. Yet we know that in some of the mysteries many things were done which were repugnant to modesty and decency; and in all of them the discerning might see that the deities there worshipped were mortals more distinguished for their vices than their virtues.⁸

13. The whole pagan system had not the least efficacy to produce and cherish virtuous emotions in the soul. For in the first place, the gods and goddesses to whom the public homage was paid, were patterns rather of pre-eminent wickedness than of virtue.⁹ They were considered, indeed, as superior to mortals in power and as exempt from death, but in all things else as on a level with us. In the next place, the ministers of this religion, neither by precept nor by example, exhorted the people to lead honest and virtuous lives; but gave them to understand that all the homage required of them by the gods, was comprised in the observance of the traditional rites and ceremonies.¹⁰ And lastly, the doctrines inculcated respecting the rewards of the righteous and the

¹ See Meursius, De Mysteriis Eleusyniis; and Clarkson, Discourse on Liturgies, sec. 4.

² Cicero, Disput. Tusculan. lib. i. cap. xlii. [and De Leg. cap. xxiv.; Varro, cited by Augustine, De Civitate Dei, lib. iv. cap. xxxi.; Eusebius, Præparat. Evangel. lib. ii. cap. iii.—Schl. [See Warburton's Divine Legat. vol. i. lib. ii. sec. 4, who was confronted by J. Leland, Advantage and Necessity of the Christ. Rev. vol. i. pages 151—190; Meiners, über die Mysterien der Alten, in his Miscel. Philos. Works, vol. iii. Leipzig, 1776; the Baron de Sainte Croix, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la religion secrète des anciens peuples, &c. Paris, 1784, 8vo, and (Vogel's) Briefe über die Mysterien; which are the 2d collection of Letters on Freemasonry. Nuremb. 1784, 12mo. It has been maintained that the design of at least some of these mysteries was, to inculcate the grand principles of natural religion; such as the unity of God, the immortality of the soul, the importance of virtue, &c. and to explain the vulgar polytheism, as symbolical of these great truths. But this certainly needs better proof. It is more probable that the later pagan philosophers, who lived after the light of Christianity had exposed the abominations of polytheism, resorted to this subterfuge in order to vindicate the character of their predecessors.—Mur. [See also Dr. Pritchard's Analysis of the Egyptian Mythology. Lond. 1819, 8vo.—R.]

³ Ovid, de Tristibus, lib. ii. v. 287, &c. Quis locus est templis augustior? hæc quoque vitæ, In culpas si qua est Ingeniosa suam. Cum steterit Jovis ædæ, Jovis succurret in sæde, Quam multas matres fecerit ille Deus. Proxima odorant Junonia templa subit, Pellicibus multis hanc doluisse suam. Pallade conspecta, natum de crimine virgo Sustulerit quare, quæret, Erichthonium. [Compare Plato, de Leg. lib. i. p. 776, and de Republ. lib. ii. p. 430, &c. ed. Ficin. Isocrates, Encom. Demost. lib. i. p. 462, and Seneca, de Vita beata, cap. xxvi.—Schl.]

⁴ See Barbeyrac, Preface to his French translation of Puffendorf, De Jure Nat. et gentium, sec. 6. [Yet there were some intelligent pagans who had better views, as Socrates and the younger Pliny. The latter,

¹ See the learned work of Vossius, De Idololatria, lib. i. lib. i. lib. i. [and La Mythologie et les Fables expliquées par l'Histoire, par l'Abbé Banier, Paris, 1738—40, 8 vols. 12mo, and Fr. Creutzer's Symbolik u. Mythologie der alten Völker, besonders der Griechen, Leipzig, u. Darmst. 1810—12, 4 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [This standard work of Creutzer has been translated into French by J. D. Guignault, under the title of Religions de l'Antiquité considérées principalement dans leurs formes symboliques et mythologiques, Paris, 1825—41, 4 vols. 8vo.—R.]

² See Saubertus, de Sacrificiis Veterum; Leyd. 1699, 8vo.

³ See Columna, Ad Fragmenta Ennii, p. 23, and Saubertus, De Sacrificiis Vet. cap. xxi. p. 455.

⁴ See Browerius & Nldeck, de Adorationibus veterum Populorum. Utrecht, 1711, 8vo. [and Saubertus, ubi supra, p. 343, &c.—Schl.]

⁵ Some nations were without temples, such as the Persians, Gauls, Germans, and Britons, who performed their religious worship in the open air, or in the shady retreats of consecrated groves.—Macl.

⁶ Arnobius, adv. Gentes, lib. vi. p. 254, ed. Herald. Augustine, de Civitate Dei, lib. vii. cap. xxvi. Opp. tom. vii. p. 161, ed. Benedot. Julian, Misopogon, p. 361, ed. Spanheim.

punishments of the wicked in the future world, were some of them dubious and uncertain, and others more adapted to promote vice than virtue.¹ Wherefore the wiser pagans themselves, about the time of the Saviour's birth, contemned and ridiculed the whole system.

14. Hence a universal corruption of morals prevailed, and crimes which at this day cannot be named with decency, were then practised with entire impunity.² Those who would see proof of this, may read Juvenal and Persius among the Latins, and Lucian among the Greeks; or, if this seems too painful, let them reflect on the gladiatorial shows and unnatural lusts, the facility of divorce, both among Greeks and Romans, the custom of exposing infants and procuring abortions, and the stews consecrated to the gods—all which no law opposed.³

15. Men of but common discernment could see the deformity of these religions; but they were met by the crafty priests with two arguments. First, the miracles and prodigies which were affirmed to have taken place, and still to be daily witnessed in the temples and before the statues of the gods and heroes; and secondly, the divinations and oracles by which they asserted these gods had foretold future events. In regard to both, the common people were miserably imposed upon by the artifices of the priests, and the discerning saw it.⁴ But the latter had to laugh with caution in order to be safe. For the priests stood ready to accuse of treason against the gods, before a raging and superstitious multitude, all such as opposed their frauds.

16. At the time chosen by the Son of God for his birth among men, the Roman religion, as well as arms, pervaded a large part of the world. To be acquainted with this religion, is nearly the same as to be acquainted with the Grecian superstition.⁵ Yet there is some difference between them; for besides the institutions of Numa and others, invented for political ends, the Romans superadded to the Grecian fables some Italic and Etruscan fictions, and also gave the Egyptian gods a place among their own.⁶

17. In the Roman provinces, new forms of paganism were gradually produced, compounded of the ancient religions of the inhabitants and that of their Roman conquerors. For these nations, who before their subjugation had their peculiar gods and religious rites, were persuaded by degrees to adopt many of the Roman usages. This was good policy in the Romans, whose interests were promoted by the extinction of the inhuman rites of the barbarous nations; and the levity of those nations and their desire to please their masters favoured the object.⁷

18. The most prominent religions beyond the bounds of the Roman empire, may be divided into two classes, the civil and the military. To the first class belong the religions of most of the oriental nations, especially of the Persians, the Egyptians, and the Indians. For, whoever carefully inspects those religions will see that they are adapted merely to answer political ob-

In his Panegyric on Trajan, cap. liii. n. 5, says:—*Animadverto,—etiam Deos Ipsos, non tam accuratis adorantium precibus, quam innocentia et sanctitate letari:
gratioremque existimari, qui delubris corum puram castamque mentem, quam qui meditatum carmen in-tulorit.*—Schl.

¹ What the Greeks and Romans said of the Elysian Fields, was not only fabulous in its very aspect, but it held out the prospect of voluptuous pleasures, opposed to true virtue. The more northern nations promised a happy immortality only to those who distinguished themselves by a martial spirit and the slaughter of numerous foes; that is, to the enemies of mankind. And the eternal bliss which they promised to these warriors was only a continued indulgence in vile lusts. How could such hopes excite to virtue? Moreover, the doctrine of even these rewards and punishments, was not an article of faith among the Greeks and Romans; but every one believed what he pleased concerning it: and, at the time of Christ's birth, the followers of Epicurus were numerous, and while many denied, most others doubted, the reality of future retributions. Polybius, Hist. lib. v. 54. Sallust, Bell. Catil.—Schl.

² Cyprian, Epist. 1. p. 2. ed. Baluz, describes at large the debased morals of the pagans. See also Cornel. Adamus, Exercit. de malis Romanorum ante predicationem Evangelii moribus; In his Exercit. Exercit. Gröning, 1712, 4to [and, what is still better authority, St. Paul to the Romans, chap. i. passim.—Mur.]

³ On the subject of this and several preceding sections, the reader may find satisfactory proof in that elaborate and candid work, The advantage and necessity of the Christian Religion, shown from the state of religion in the ancient heathen world; by J. Leland, D.D. 2d ed. Dublin, 1765, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [A still more satisfactory exposition of the origin, character, and influence of heathenism, viewed in the light of Christianity, especially of the Grecian and Roman polytheism, may be found in an admirable essay by Professor Tholuck of Halle, entitled, Ueber das Wesen u. den sittlichen Einfluss des Heidenthums, &c. an English translation of which will be found in the 28th number of the Edin. Biblical Cabinet.—R.]

⁴ Schlegel here introduces a long note, showing that Mosheim, till towards the close of his life, did not utterly reject that common opinion of the ancients, that evil spirits sometimes aided the pagan priests, particularly in regard to their oracles. But Mosheim did, we are told by his pupil, come at last into the opinion now generally admitted; namely, that the pagan oracles were all mere cheats, proceeding from the craft of the priests. See Van Dale de Oraculis ethnorum: among his Diss. Amster. 1696, 4to, and Fontenelle, Histoire des oracles, &c. 1701, 8vo.—Mur.

⁵ See Dionys. Halicar. Antiquitat. Romanorum. lib. vii. cap. lxxii. tom. i. p. 460, ed. Hudson.

⁶ See Petrus ad Leges Atticas, lib. i. p. 71. [Lactantius, Divinarum Institut. lib. i. cap. xx.—Schl.]

⁷ Strabo, Geograph. lib. iv. p. 189 &c.—Schl.

jects; to protect the dignity and authority of kings, to preserve the public tranquillity, and to promote the civil virtues. To the second class must be referred the religions of the northern nations. For all that was inculcated among the Germans, Britons, Celts, Goths, and others, respecting the gods and the worship due to them, was evidently suited to awaken and to cherish fortitude, bravery, and contempt of death. A careful examination of these religions will fully verify these statements.

19. No nation was so rude and barbarous as not to contain some persons who had sagacity to discern the absurdity of the popular religions. But some of these men lacked the power and authority, others the disposition, and all the wisdom necessary to produce a reformation. This could scarcely be better illustrated than by the attempts to reform the vulgar superstitions made by the Greek and Roman philosophers. They advanced many tolerably correct ideas respecting the divine nature and moral duties; and, with some success, they exposed the errors of the prevailing religion; but all was so intermixed with wild and baseless speculations, as clearly to show that it belongs to God only, and not to men, to teach the truth free from corruption and error.

20. Among the more civilized nations, at the time the Son of God appeared, two species of philosophy prevailed; namely, the Grecian, which was also adopted by the Romans, and the oriental, which had many followers in Persia, Syria, Chaldea, Egypt, and even among the Jews themselves. The former was appropriately called philosophy: the latter, by such as spoke Greek, was called γνώσις, that is knowledge, namely Θεοῦ, of God; because its followers pretended to restore the lost knowledge of the supreme God.¹ The advocates of both kinds of philosophy were split into numerous contending sects, yet with this difference, that all the sects of oriental philosophy set out with one fundamental principle, and therefore were agreed in regard to many points of doctrine; but the Greeks disagreed about the very first principles of all wisdom. Of the oriental philosophy, we shall give account hereafter: of the Grecian philosophy and its sects, notice will be taken here.

21. Some of the Grecian sects declared

¹ St. Paul mentions and disapproves both kinds of philosophy; namely, the Grecian, Colos. ii. 8. and the oriental or γνώσις, 1 Tim. vi. 20. Mosheim has been censured for his confident assertions in regard to the existence and prevalence of an oriental philosophy, going under the name of γνώσις, so early as the days of Christ and his apostles. On this subject more will be said hereafter.—Mur.

open war against all religion: others admitted indeed the existence of God and of religion, but obscured the truth rather than threw light upon it. Of the former class were the Epicureans and the Academics. The Epicureans maintained that the world arose from chance; that the gods (whose existence they did not dare to deny) neither did nor could extend their providential care to human affairs; that the soul was mortal; that *pleasure*² was man's ultimate end; and that virtue was to be prized only for its subserviency to this end. The Academics denied the possibility of arriving at truth and certainty, and therefore held it uncertain, whether the gods existed or not; whether the soul is mortal or survives the body; whether virtue is preferable to vice, or the contrary.³ These two sects, when Jesus was born, were very numerous and influential; being favoured by men of rank especially, and by nearly all the opulent.⁴

22. To the second class belong the Aristotelians, Stoics, Platonics; none of whom

² The ambiguity of the word pleasure, has produced many disputes in the explication of the Epicurean system. If by pleasure be understood only sensual gratifications, the tenet here advanced is indisputably monstrous. But if it be taken in a larger sense, and be extended to intellectual and moral objects, in what does the scheme of Epicurus, with respect to virtue, differ from the opinions of those Christian philosophers who maintain that self-love is the only spring of all human affections and actions?—Macl. [Epicurus distinguished between corporeal pleasure and mental. But he accounted both sensitive; because he held the soul to be material. His conceptions of pleasure did not extend beyond natural pleasures, the chief of which he supposed to be a calm and tranquil state of mind, undisturbed by any fear of God or any solicitude about the future, and attended with freedom from bodily pain. His system, therefore, denied the very idea of moral or religious pleasures, and it required atheism as its foundation. See Staudin's Geschich. d. Monophysiten, p. 230, &c. Hanov. 1822, 8vo.—Mur.

³ The Academics, or Platonists, became indeed sceptical; especially those of the Middle Academy. Some real Pyrrhonists, likewise, assumed the name of Academics. Still it is probable, the great body of Academics, like Cicero, who is accounted one of them, merely held that all human knowledge is imperfect; that is, falls short of certainty; that of course we are obliged, in all cases, to act on probabilities, of which there are different degrees.—Mur.

⁴ The Epicureans were the most numerous of the two. See Cicero, de Finibus, lib. i. cap. vii; lib. ii. cap. xiv. and Disput. Tullii, lib. v. cap. x. Hence Juvenal, Satyr. xiii. v. 86, &c. thus complains of the many atheists at Rome:

Sunt in fortune quæ casibus omnia ponant,
Et nullo credant mundum rectore moveri,
Naturæ volvente vices et lucis et anni.

Atque ideo intrepidè quæcunque altaria tangunt.

Mosheim, in these sections, is giving the dark side of pagan philosophy. Like his other translators, therefore, I would aim so to soften his pictures, that the less informed reader may not be misled. This, I am persuaded, Mosheim would himself approve, as may be inferred from the following long note, inserted apparently for such a purpose, in the parallel passage of his Commentarii de Rebus Christianis, page 17, 18. "I cannot agree with those who maintain that every one of the philosophers of those times, even such as disapproved well on religious subjects, were hostile to all religion. I think those learned moderns have gone too far, who spoke of God, religion, and moral duties, in a manner to be of much service to mankind. The god of Aristotle is like the principle of motion in a machine. He is a being regardless of human affairs and happy in his own contemplations. Such a god, differing but little from the god of Epicurus, we have no reason either to love or to fear. Whether this philosopher held the soul to be mortal or immortal is at least doubtful.¹ Now what solid and sound precepts of virtue and piety can that man give, who denies the providence of God, and not obscurely intimates the extinction of the soul?

23. The god of the Stoics has a little more of majesty; nor does he sit musing supinely above the heavens and the stars. Yet he is described as a corporeal being, united to matter by a necessary connexion, and moreover as subject to fate, so that he can neither reward nor punish.² That this sect held the extinction of the soul at death, is allowed by all the learned. Now, such doctrines take away the strongest motives to virtue; and accordingly the moral system of the Stoics is a body that is fair and beautiful, but without sinews and active limbs.³

24. Plato seems to have exceeded all the other philosophers in wisdom, and not without reason. For he held the world to be governed by an independent, powerful, and intelligent God; and he taught men what to fear, and what to hope for after death. Yet his doctrines not only rest on very slender foundations, and are exceedingly obscure, but they represent the supreme Creator as destitute of several perfections,⁴ and as limited to a certain place. His doctrine concerning demons and the human soul, is singularly adapted to produce and encourage superstition.⁵ Nor will his system of morals command very high estimation, if we examine it in all its parts, and inquire into its first principles.⁶

25. As all these sects held many things inconsistent with sound reason, and were addicted to never-ending contentions and debates, some moderate and well-disposed men concluded to follow none of them implicitly, but to glean from all whatever was good and consonant to reason, and reject the rest. Hence originated in Egypt, and particularly at Alexandria, a new mode of

have endeavoured to prove that every sect of the philosophers, either openly or covertly, aimed to rip up the foundations of all religion. Are we to believe that not one of the many great and worthy men of those times, however free from ill intentions, was so fortunate as to make a proper use of his reason? Must all those who professed theism, and spoke sublimely of the divine perfections, be regarded as impostors, who said one thing and meant another? Yet the celebrated and acute Bp. Warburton, to mention no others, lately expended much ingenuity and learning to bring us to such conclusions. See his very elaborate and noted work, entitled The divine legation, &c. vol. i. p. 332, &c. and p. 419, &c. He would have us think that all the philosophers who taught the immortality of the soul, secretly denied it; that they held nature to be the only deity; and human souls to be particles, severed from the souls of the world, to which they return at the death of the body. But not to mention that he cites only Grecian philosophers, while other nations had their philosophers also, differing widely from the Grecian; the renowned author depends not on plain and explicit testimony, which seems requisite to justify so heavy a charge, but merely on conjectures, on single examples, and on inferences from the doctrines held by certain philosophers. If this kind of proof be allowed, if single instances and inferences are sufficient to convict men of duplicity, when no shadow of suspicion appears in their language, who will be found innocent? Though but an ordinary man and far inferior to Warburton, yet I could prove that all the theologians in Christendom disbelieve utterly what they teach in public, and that they covertly aim to instil the poison of impiety into men's minds, if I might be allowed to assail them in the manner this learned writer assails the philosophers."—Mur. [It may be proper to add here, on occasion of this first reference to Mosheim's larger work, his Commentarii de Rebus Christianis ante Constantinum Magnum, that a large portion of it, nearly two-thirds, has been translated into English by the late R. S. Vidal, Esq. in 3 vols. 8vo, Lond. 1813—35.—R.]

¹ See the notes on my Latin translation of Cudworth's Intellectual System, tom. i. p. 66, 500, tom. ii. p. 1171, and Mourgues, Plan théologique du Pythagorisme, tome i. p. 75, &c. [See Note i., p. 29, below.—R.]

² Thus is the Stoical doctrine of fate generally represented, but not more generally than unjustly. Their fateum, when carefully and attentively examined, seems to have signified no more, in the intention of the wisest of that sect, than the plan of government formed originally in the divine mind, a plan all-wise and perfect, and from which, of consequence, the supreme Being, morally speaking, can never depart. So that when Jupiter is said by the Stoics to be subject to immutable fate, this means no more than that he is subject to the wisdom of his own counsels, and acts ever in conformity with his supreme perfections. The following remarkable passage of Seneca, drawn from the 6th chapter of his book de Providentia, is sufficient to confirm the explication we have here given of the Stoical fate: "Ille ipse omnium conditor et rector, scriptis quidem fata, sed sequitur. Semper parcat semel jussit."—Macl. [This fine apology will not bear a strict scrutiny. The Stoics themselves differed in opinion, and they generally had indistinct notions. But most of them held fate to be rather a physical than a moral necessity; though some of them, at times, confounded it with Jove, nature, or a pantheistic god, as Seneca does in the passage quoted.—Mur.]

³ These remarks receive some illustration from my note on Cudworth's Intellect. Syst. tom. i. p. 517.

⁴ He ascribed to God neither omnipotence, nor omniscience, nor omniscience.—Schl. [But MacLaine here enters his dissent. He says: "All the divine perfections are frequently acknowledged by that philosopher." I wish he had given proof of this assertion, if he was able to make it good.—Mur.]

⁵ He believed that God employs good and evil demons, in the government of the world, and that men can have commerce with these demons. A person believing this may easily be led to regard idolatry as not altogether irrational.—Schl.

⁶ The defects of the Platonic philosophy are copiously, but not very accurately depicted by Baltus, in a French work, Défense des prires accusés du Platonisme. Paris, 1711, 4to. [Plato has, moreover been accused of Spinozism. For Bayle (Continuation des pensées diverses sur la Comète, &c. chap. xxv.) and Gundling, (in Otia, fasc. 2, and in Gundlingiana, sec. 43, 45.) tax him with confounding God with matter. But Zimmermann (Opuscula, tom. i. p. 762, &c.) and the elder Schellhorn (Amanitula literar. tom. ix. xii. and xiii.) have defended the character of Plato.—Schl.]

philosophising, called the Eclectic. One Potamon of Alexandria has been represented as its author; but the subject has its difficulties.¹ That this sect flourished at Alexandria in the age of our Saviour, is manifest from the Jewish Philo, who philosophised according to its principles.² These Eclectics held Plato in the highest estimation; but they unscrupulously modified his doctrines by incorporating what they pleased from the other philosophers.³

26. It will be easy to see what inference should be drawn from this account of the lamentable state of the world at the time of Christ's birth. It may serve to teach us that the human race was then wholly corrupt, and stood in need of a Divine teacher to instruct mankind in the true principles of religion and morality, and to recall the wanderers into the paths of virtue and piety. And it may teach those who before were ignorant of it, how great the advantages and supports, in all circumstances of life, the human family have derived from the advent of Christ and from the religion which he taught. Many despise and ridicule the Christian religion, not knowing that to it they are indebted for all the blessings they enjoy.

1 Brucker, Historia crit. philos. tom. II. p. 193, has shown that in regard to the controversies maintained by Heumann, Haseus, and others, respecting this nearly unknown Potamon, the probability is that he lived about the close of the second century; that his speculations had little effect; and that Ammonius is to be regarded as the founder of the Eclectic sect. Yet this will not forbid our believing what Brucker himself admits, that there were some Grecian philosophers, as early as the time of Christ, who speculated very much as the Eclectics afterwards did, though the few followers they had did not merit the title of a sect. — Schl.

2 For he philosophised in the manner of Clemens Alex. Origen, and the other Christian doctors, who were certainly Eclectics. For the most part he follows Plato; and hence many account him a pure Platonist. But he often commends the Stoics, Pythagoreans, and others, and adopts their opinions. — Schl.

3 See Olearius, De Philosophia Eclectica; Brucker and others. [On the philosophy as well as the vulgar polytheism of the ancient pagans, the best works for the mere English reader seem to be those already mentioned (in Note 3 p. 10) Leland's Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation, [and Tholuck's Essay.] The history of philosophy among the ancients has not been critically and ably written in English, nor by Englishmen. Stanley's Lives, &c. 1655, 4to, is full of mistakes; and Enfield's Abridgment of Brucker is quite superficial. The best general works are Brucker's Historia critica philosophiæ. Lips. 1741—67, 6 vols. 4to, and the more recent German works by Tiedemann, 7 vols. 8vo, 1791—96; Buhle, 7 vols. 8vo, 1800; Tenneman, 12 vols. 8vo, 1798—1810; and Rixner, 3 vols. 8vo, 1822. The history of Moral philosophy, or ethics, is well treated by Meiners, krit. Geschichte, 2 vols. 8vo, 1800—1; and Stäudlin, Gesch. der Moralphilosophie, 1822, 8vo. — Mur. [To these works may be added the English translation, by Morrison, of Ritter's celebrated Geschichte der philosophie alter Zeit, in four volumes. Lond. 1844—6, 8vo. The student may also consult with profit Brouwer, Histoire de la civilisation morale et religieuse des Grecs. Gron. 1833—42, 8 vols. 8vo; together with B. Constant, Du polytheisme romain. Paris, 1833, 2 vols. 8vo. — R.

CHAPTER II.

THE CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS STATE OF THE JEWS AT THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

1. The state of the Jewish people, among whom the Saviour chose to be born, was little better than that of other nations. Herod, whose crimes procured him the title of the Great, then governed or rather oppressed the nation, being a tributary king under the Romans. He drew on himself universal hatred by his cruelties, jealousies, and wars, and exhausted the wealth of the unhappy nation by his mad luxury, his excessive magnificence, and his immoderate largesses. Under his administration Roman luxury with great licentiousness spread over Palestine.⁴ In religion he was professedly a Jew; but he copied the manners of those who despise all religion.

2. On the death of this tyrant the Romans allowed Archelaus, his son, with the title of Exarch, to reign over half of Palestine; viz. Judea, Samaria, and Idumea. The other half was divided between two other sons of Herod, Antipas and Philip. Archelaus copied the vices of his father, and was therefore, in the tenth year of his reign, publicly accused by the Jews before Augustus, and deprived of his crown.⁵ The countries he had governed were now reduced to the form of a Roman province, and annexed to Syria. This change in their form of government brought numerous troubles and calamities upon the Jews, to the ruin and final extinction of the nation.

3. The Romans did not indeed wholly prohibit the Jews from retaining their national laws, and the religion established by Moses. Their religious affairs were still conducted by a high priest, with priests and levites under him, and by their national senate or sanhedrim. The exterior of their worship, with a few exceptions, remained unaltered; but the amount of evil resulting to this miserable people, from the presence of Romans among them who were in their view polluted and detestable, from the cruelty and avarice of the governors, and from the frauds and rapacity of the publicans, is almost incalculable. Unquestionably those who were subject to the other two sons of Herod lived more comfortably.

4. But the measure of liberty and com-

4 See Noldius, Historia Idumææ, in Havercamp's edit. of Josephus, tom. II. pag. 338, &c. Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tome I. part I. p. 27, &c. Noris, Comptoph. Pisan. II. 6. Prideaux, Congression, &c. part II. book viii. Cellarius, Historia Herodum, in his Diss. Acad. par. I. p. 207, and especially the Jewish historian, Josephus, in his Wars of the Jews.

5 Josephus, Antiq. Jud. lib. xvii. cap. xiii. and de Bell. Jud. lib. II. cap. vi. — Schl.

fort allowed to the Jews by the Romans, was wholly dissipated by the profligacy and crimes of those who pretended to be the guardians of the nation. Their principal men, their high priests (as we learn from Josephus), were most abandoned; they had purchased their places by bribes or by deeds of iniquity, and maintained their ill-acquired authority by every species of flagitious acts. The other priests, and all those who held any considerable office, were not much better. The multitude, excited by such examples, ran headlong into every sort of iniquity, and by their unceasing robberies and seditious, armed against them both the justice of God and the vengeance of men.¹

5. Two religions then flourished in Palestine, viz. the Jewish and the Samaritan, between the followers of which a deadly hatred prevailed. The nature of the former is set forth in the Old Testament; but in the age of the Saviour it had lost much of its primitive form and character. The people universally were infected with certain prevalent and pernicious errors, and the more learned fiercely contended on points of the greatest moment. All looked for a deliverer; not, however, such a one as God had promised, but a powerful warrior and a vindicator of their national liberties.² All placed the sum of religion in an observance of the Mosaic ritual, and in certain external duties towards their own countrymen. All excluded the rest of mankind from the hope of salvation, and, of course, whenever they dared, treated them with hatred and inhumanity.³ To these fruitful sources of vice must be added various absurd and superstitious opinions concerning the divine nature, genii, magic, &c. partly brought by their ancestors from the Babylonian captivity, and partly imbibed from the neighbouring Egyptians, Syrians, and Arabians.⁴

¹ See Josephus, De Bell. Jud. lib. v. cap. xlii. sec. 6; and Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tome i. chap. xiv. — Schl.

² This is proved by Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tome v. chap. x. That not only Pharisees, but all Jews, of whatever sect, both in and out of Palestine, were expecting a Messiah, is shown by Mosheim, in his Comm. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 40, from the following texts:—John i. 20, 25; x. 24, &c.; xii. 34; Matt. ii. 4—6; xli. 9; xxvi. 68, &c.—Schl. [See also Bertholdi, Erl. Erl. 1811, 8vo. This expectation of a deliverer was prevalent even among the heathen. See Ep. Blomfield's Dissertations on the Traditional Knowledge of a Promised Redeemer, &c. Camb. 1819, 8vo, and a curious work, by Fred. Nolan, entitled, The Expectations of the Assyrians that a great Deliverer would appear, &c. Lond. 1826, 8vo.—R.

³ Hence other nations, not without reason, accounted the Jews as enemies of mankind. See the examples collected by Elsnor, Observat. Sacr. in N. T. tom. ii. p. 274.—Schl.

⁴ See Gale, Observ. ad Jamblichum, de Myster.

6. The learned, who pretended to a superior knowledge of the law and of theology, were divided into various sects and parties,⁵ among which three were most numerous and influential; namely, the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes. The first two are often mentioned in the Scriptures: for a knowledge of the Essenes we are indebted to Josephus and Philo. These principal sects agreed, indeed, respecting the fundamental principles of the Jewish religion, but respecting questions of the highest importance, and such as relate to the salvation of the soul, they were engaged in endless contentions. The pernicious effects on the common people of these dissensions of the learned may be easily conceived.

7. They disagreed first respecting the law itself, or the rule which God had given them. The Pharisees added to the written law an oral or unwritten law, handed down by tradition, which both the Sadducees and the Essenes rejected, adhering only to the written law. They differed also respecting the import of the law. For while the Pharisees sought a double sense in the Scriptures, one the obvious and literal, the other recondite and figurative, the Sadducees held only to the literal sense of the Bible, the greater part of the Essenes dissented from them both, maintaining that the words of the law were of no authority, but that the things expressed by them were representations of sacred and divine things. To these contests concerning the law, others were added on subjects of the highest moment, and particularly respecting the punishments and rewards declared in the law. These, the Pharisees held, referred to both the body and the soul, and extended beyond the present life, while the Sadducees believed in no future retributions. The Essenes took a middle course, admitting future rewards and punishments, but confining them to the soul, holding that the body consists of a malignant substance, and is the temporary prison of the soul.⁶

Ægypt. p. 206; and Sale, Preface to his English transl. of the Koran, page 72. Even Josephus, Antiq. Jud. lib. iii. cap. vi. sec. 2, admits that the Jewish religion was corrupted among the Babylonians.—Schl. [See also Milman's Hist. of Christianity, vol. i. page 60, &c.—R.

⁵ Besides the three more noted sects, there were others unquestionably among the Jews. The Herodians are mentioned in the sacred volume; the Cananites, by Josephus; and other sects by Epiphanius and by Hegesippus, in Eusebius; all of which cannot be supposed to be mere fictions. [For further information on the minor sects among the Jews, particularly the Hemerobaptists, see Mosheim's Comment. de Reb. Christ. pages 33—5. Vidal's translation, l. 77—9.—R.

⁶ For an account of the three Jewish sects, see Trigland, Synagoga Trium Scriptorum illustrium

8. Notwithstanding these sects contended about points of such vast moment, it does not appear that they molested each other with any violence on religious grounds. But this forbearance and moderation, no one acquainted with the history of those times, will ascribe to sound and generous principles. The Sadducees were supported by the leading men of the nation, and the Pharisees by the common people. Neither sect, therefore, could rise up in hostility against the other without the most imminent hazard. Besides, the Romans on the least appearance of tumult or sedition would doubtless have punished the ringleaders with severity. We may add, that the Sadducees were of accommodating manners, and, from the principles of their sect, were averse from all broils and altercations.¹

9 The Essenes could more easily avoid contention with the others, because they lived for the most part in retired places, and remote from intercourse with mankind. This sect, which was dispersed over Syria, Egypt, and the neighbouring countries, held religion to consist in silence and meditation; and they endeavoured, by a strict mode of life, and by various observances borrowed it would seem from the Egyptians,² to raise themselves to higher degrees of virtue. Yet they were not all of the same sentiments. Some lived in celibacy, and made it their care to instruct and educate the children of others. Others married wives, not to gratify their natural propensities, but solely to propagate the human race.³ Those who lived in Syria held that God may be propitiated by sacrifices, yet that they must be offered in a very different manner from what was common among the Jews; whence it appears they did not reject the literal sense of the Mosaic law. But those who inhabited the deserts of Egypt maintained that no sacrifice should be presented to God, except that of a composed mind, absorbed in the contemplation of divine things, which shows that they put an allegorical sense upon the whole Jewish law.⁴

10. The Therapeutæ, of whom Philo wrote a whole book,⁵ are commonly reckoned a branch of the Essene family, whence originated the popular distinction of practical and theoretical Essenes. But whether this classification is correct may be doubted. For nothing is discoverable in the customs or institutions of the Therapeutæ, which evinces absolutely that they were a branch of the Essenes, nor has Philo so represented them. Who can deny that other fanatical Jews besides Essenes, might unite together and form a society? But I agree entirely with those who regard the Therapeutæ as being Jews claiming to be true disciples of Moses, and as being neither Christians nor Egyptians. In reality, they were wild and melancholy enthusiasts, who led a life incongruous alike with the law of Moses and with sober reason.⁶

⁴ See Mosheim's note on Cudworth's Essay, De vera Notione causæ Domini, p. 4, subjoined to his Intellectual System. [Respecting the Essenes and the reasons why they are not mentioned by the Evangelists, see Burton's Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the first three Centuries, vol. i. 21—5. See also an Essay on the Essenes in Blackwood's Magazine, vol. xlvii. the object of which is to show that the Essenes of Josephus were the primitive Christians.—H.]

⁵ Philo, De Vita contemplativa, in his Works, p. 889.

⁶ The principal writers concerning the Therapeutæ, are mentioned by Fabricius, Lux Sularia Ecclæ. toti orbis, cap. iv. p. 55. [A more ample account of the Therapeutæ is given by Mosheim, in his Com. de Reb. Chr. Sc. p. 55, &c. from which the following abstract of writers on the subject has been compiled by Schlegel:—"It is still debated whether these Therapeutæ were Christians, Jews, or heathen philosophers. Eusebius (Hist. Ecclæ. lib. ii. cap. xvii.) regarded them as Christian monks, established in Egypt by St. Mark; and many Romish writers, to support the high antiquity of monkery, defend this opinion. The whole of this controversy may be seen in the Lettres pour et contre la Jansen question, et les solitaires appelés Thérapeutes, dont a parlé Philon le Juif, saint Chrétien. Paris, 1712, 12mo. The chief advocates of this opinion are Montfaucon, in the Notes to his French translation of Philo, and M. le Quien, Christianus Oriens, tom. ii. p. 332. On the other hand, Scaliger, Chamier, Lightfoot, Dailly, the two Basnages, Prideaux, Ittig, Huddeus, Mosheim, Baumgarten, and recently Orsi (Hist. Ecclæ. vol. i. p. 77) and Mangey (Preface to Philo's Works), have maintained that they were Jews, and of the sect of Essenes. Lange, in a Dissertation published in 1721, maintained upon very slender grounds, that they were oriental philosophers, of melancholy temperament, who had imbibed some Jewish notions. And Jablonski, in an Essay on the subject, accounts these solitary Egyptian priests, addicted to astrology and other sacred sciences of the Egyptians." Mosheim pertinently observes (Com. de Reb. Sc. p. 50), "The Christian monks, who evidently originated in Egypt, borrowed their peculiarities from the practical Essenes, for nothing can be more similar than the rules and regulations of the ancient monks and those of the Essenes, as described by Josephus. On the other hand, the Christian solitaires called Eremites copied after the theoretical Essenes, or Therapeutæ."—Mur.]

(viz. J. Scaliger, J. Drusus, and N. Serarius), De Judæorum Sectis, Delft, 1703, 2 vols. 4to. After these, Basnage, Prideaux (in their Jewish histories), the authors of Introductions to the books of the New Testament, and of works on Jewish Antiquities, and many others, have described these sects, some more and some less successfully.—Mur. [The various Biblical Dictionaries, such as Calmet's, Kitto's, Winer's Bibl. Realwörter, &c. and the larger Church Histories, especially Neander's, likewise contain important information respecting them.—H.]

¹ See Comment. de Reb. Chr. p. 48, where Mosheim proves from Josephus (Antiq. Jud. lib. xviii. cap. i. and lib. xiii. cap. x.), that the Sadducees were all men of wealth; and (from his Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. viii.) that they had little sympathy for others. Mosheim thinks he finds the picture of a Pharisee in the rich man described, Luke xvi. 19.—Schl.

² See Holstenius, Notes on Porphyry, de Vita Pythagoræ, p. 11, ed. Kueter.

³ See Josephus, De Bell. Jud. lib. ii. cap. viii. sec. 13.—Schl.

11. It was impossible that any of these sects should inculcate and promote true piety and virtue. The Pharisees, as our Saviour often laid to their charge, disregarded internal purity, and, by a vain ostentation and an austere life, sought for popular applause, and also ascribed more authority to ancient traditions and institutions than to the holy commandments of God. Matt. xxiii. 13, &c. The Sadducees gave a stimulus to iniquity and every lust, by discarding all future rewards and punishments. The Essenes, a fanatic and superstitious tribe, made piety to consist in holy indolence and a dislike of mankind, and thus they severed the ties of society.

12. When those who assumed the name and the prerogatives of the wise were involved in such darkness and such altercations, who can doubt that the religion and piety of the common people were in a low and debased state? They were sunk in deplorable ignorance of divine things; and they supposed that they rendered themselves acceptable to God, by their attention to sacrifices, ablutions, and the other ceremonies prescribed by Moses. From this two-fold source flowed those polluted morals and that profligate life which characterized the greater part of the Jews while Christ lived among them.¹ Hence our Saviour compared the people to wandering sheep who had no shepherd, Matt. x. 6, xv. 24, and their teachers to blind men who attempt to guide others in a way of which they are themselves ignorant. Matt. xv. 14, John ix. 39.

13. To all these stains on the character of the Jews when Christ came among them, must be added the attachment of many of them to the oriental philosophy in regard to the origin of the world, and to the indubitable offspring of that philosophy, the Cabbala.² That many Jews were infected with this system, both the sacred books of the New Testament and the early history of the Christian Church prove undeniably.³ It is certain that the founders of several Gnostic sects were Jews. The followers of this philosophy must necessarily have differed from the other Jews in their views of the God of the Old Testament, and in their views of Moses, of the creation, and of the Messiah; for they held the creator of the world to be a different being from the supreme God, and believed that the Messiah was to destroy the domination of the former over the human race. From such opinions a monstrous system was formed, widely different from the genuine religion of the Jews.

14. The outward forms of worship established by Moses were less corrupted than the other parts of religion. Yet very learned men have observed, that various rites were introduced into the temple itself, which we may in vain search for in the divine ritual. It appears that the Jews, on becoming acquainted with the sacred rites of the neighbouring nations and of the Greeks and Romans, were so captivated with a number of the ceremonies practised in idol worship, that they did not hesitate to adopt them, and to add them as an ornament to the rites of God's appointment.⁴

15. Various causes may be assigned for this great corruption of a nation which God had selected for his peculiar people. In the first place, their fathers had brought back with them from Chaldea and the adjacent countries, and had introduced into Palestine, many foolish and vain opinions, wholly unknown to the founders of the nation.⁵ And from the time of the conquest of Asia by Alexander the Great, the customs and dogmas of the Greeks were disseminated among the Persians, the Syrians, the Arabians, and likewise the Jews, among whom literature and philosophy had not before flourished.⁶ The excursions, also, which many Jews were accustomed to make into the neighbouring countries, especially into Egypt and Phœnicia, in pursuit of wealth, caused various errors and fancies of the pagan nations to spread among the Hebrews. And lastly, Herod the Great and his sons, and likewise the Roman procurators and soldiers, had undoubtedly introduced into the country many foreign institutions and pollutions. Other causes will readily occur to those acquainted with the Jewish history from the time of the Maccabees.

16. But notwithstanding their numerous faults, the people generally manifested the strongest attachment to the law of Moses, and were very careful that it should not be disparaged. Hence they erected throughout the country houses of worship, called in Greek, Synagogues, where the people assembled for prayer and to listen to the

¹ A striking passage, relative to the vicious lives of the Jews in our Saviour's time, occurs in Josephus, Bell. Jud. lib. x. cap. xiii. sec. 6.—Schl.

² See Milman's Hist. of Christianity, l. 64.—R.

³ See J. C. Wolf, Biblioth. Hebraica, tom. ii. lib. vii. cap. l. sec. 9, p. 206.

⁴ See Spencer, De Leg. ritual. veter. Ebraeorum, tom. ii. lib. iv. p. 1089, ed. Cantab. where he treats particularly of Jewish rites borrowed from the Gentiles, and not to be found in the Law of God.

⁵ See Gale, on Jamblicus De mysteriis Egyptiorum, p. 206. Nor does Josephus conceal this fact, Antiq. Jud. lib. iii. cap. vii. sec. 2.

⁶ Le Clerc, Epist. crit. ix. p. 250.—Schl.

public expounders of the law. Schools also were established in the principal towns, where literary men instructed the youth in both divine and human knowledge.¹ No one can doubt that these institutions had considerable influence to preserve the law inviolate, and to check in some degree the progress of wickedness.

17. The Samaritans, who worshipped on Mount Gerizim and lived in virulent hostility with their neighbours, the Jews, were equally oppressed and were in an equal degree the authors of their own calamities. It appears from the history of those times, that the Samaritans suffered as much as the Jews did from the machinations of factious men, though perhaps they had fewer religious sects. That their religion was less pure than the Jewish, Christ himself testifies. John iv. 22. Yet they seem to have had more correct views of the offices of the Messiah than the greater part of the Jews. John iv. 25. Though we are not to believe all that the Jews have said respecting their opinions, yet it is undeniable that the Samaritans adulterated the pure doctrines of the Old Testament with the profane errors of the pagans.²

18. The narrow limits of Palestine could not contain the very numerous nation of the Jews. Hence, when our Saviour was born, there was almost no considerable province which did not contain a large number of Jews, who lived by commerce and other employments. These Jews, in the countries out of Palestine, were protected against the violence and abuse of the inhabitants, by public laws and by the injunctions of the magistrates.³ Yet they were in most places exceedingly odious to the mass of people, on account of the remarkable singularity of their religion and customs. The special providence of the Most High is undoubtedly to be recognised in the dispersion of this people (who were the depositaries of the true religion or that which inculcates the worship of the one God) over nearly the whole world, that they might by their example, put superstition to shame, and might in a manner prepare the way for the Christian religion.

CHAPTER III.

THE LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST.

1. So many and so virulent diseases of the human race demanded the aid of a Divine physician. Therefore the Son of God himself descended from heaven, upon Palestine, in the close of the reign of Herod the Great; and joining himself to human nature, he appeared to mortals a teacher that could not err, and a sponsor at the court of heaven, as well as a king there. In what year this salutary light rose upon the world, the most persevering efforts of the learned have not been able fully to ascertain. Nor will this surprise us, if we consider that the earliest Christians knew not the day of their Saviour's birth, and judged differently on the subject.⁴ But of what consequence is it that we know not the year or day when this light first shone, since we fully know that it has appeared, and that there is no obstacle to our enjoying its splendour and its warmth?

2. An account of the birth, lineage, family, and parents of Christ is left us by the four inspired writers who give the history of his life. But they say very little respecting his childhood and youth. When a young child he was rescued from the cruelty of Herod, by the flight into Egypt. Matt. ii. 13. When twelve years of age, he disputed publicly in the temple, with the most learned Jewish doctors, upon religious subjects. Afterwards, till he was thirty years of age, he lived with his parents, as a dutiful and affectionate son. Luke ii. 51, 52. Divine wisdom has not seen fit to give us more particulars; nor is it certain, though many think it so, that Christ worked at the trade of his foster-father Joseph, who was a carpenter. Yet there were anciently

¹ See Vitrings, De Synagoga Vetere, lib. iii. cap. v. and lib. i. cap. v.—vii. [Frideaux, Connection, &c. part. i. book vi. anno. 445.—Mur.]

² The principal writers concerning the Samaritans are enumerated by Carpozovius, Crítica Sacra Vet. Test. par. ii. cap. vi. p. 693. [The most valuable are Cellarius, Hist. Gentis Samarit. in his Diss. Acad. p. 109, &c.; Morin. Antiq. Eccles. Orient.; Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tome ii. liv. ii. chaps. i.—xiii.; Reiland, de Samaritanis, in his Diss. Miscell. par. ii.; and Baumgarten, Geschichte der Religionspart. p. 274, &c.—Schl. [See the entire section (sec. 18) on the Samaritans, in Gieseler's Lehrbuch der Kircheng. with its important quotations and references. The best translation of this valuable compendium is that by Dr. Davidson in Clarke's Foreign Theological Library.—R.]

³ See Gronovius, Decreta Romana et Asiatica pro Judæis. Leyden, 1712, 8vo. [For a candid and faithful account of the state of the Jews, both in Palestine and out of it, the English reader is referred to Lardner's Credibility of the Gospel History, part i. vol. i. chap. ii.—vi.—Mur. [Much additional and more correct information is to be found in Gieseler, ubi sup. Davids. Trans. vol. i. pages 42—3. Besides Gronovius, the student ought also to consult Krebsius, Decreta Romanorum pro Judæis. Lips. 1768, 8vo.—R.]

⁴ Most of the opinions of the learned concerning the year of Christ's birth are collected by Fabricius, Bibliographia Antiquar. cap. vii. sec. 9, p. 187. [Ample dissertations on both the year and the day of our Lord's nativity may be found in most of the Commentaries and Harmonies of the Gospels, both British and foreign. Perhaps the most satisfactory are the recent disquisitions in Gresswell's Dissertation on a Harmony of the Gospels. Oxford, 1830—4, 4 vols. 8vo; and in Browne's Ordo Sæculorum. Lond. 1844, 8vo. In connexion with this point see also two Dissertations De Origine Festi Nativit. Christi, in Jablonski, Opuscula ed. 1^o Water. Leyden, 1809, vol. iii. p. 317, &c.—R.]

some vain and deceitful persons, who ventured to fill up this obscure part of our Saviour's life with extravagant and ridiculous fables.¹

3. In the thirtieth year of his age, he entered on the offices for which he came into the world. To render his ministry more useful to the Jews, John, the son of a Jewish priest, a man grave and venerable in his whole manner of life, was commissioned of God to proclaim the advent of the Messiah promised to the fathers. He called himself the precursor of the Messiah, and, being full of holy zeal, exhorted the Jews to amend their lives and purify their hearts, and so prepare for the coming, or rather for the actual presence, of the Son of God; and those who professed repentance and reformation he initiated into the approaching kingdom of the Saviour, by immersion in the Jordan. Matt. iii. 2, &c.; John i. 22, &c. Jesus himself, before commencing his public ministry, chose to receive a solemn lustration in the waters of Jordan at the hands of John, that he might not appear to neglect any part of the Jewish law and religion.²

4. It is not necessary to enter here into a particular detail of the life and actions of Jesus Christ. All Christians know, that, for more than three years, amidst great trials and afflictions, and surrounded by snares and perils, he instructed the Jewish people in the counsels and purposes of the Most High; that he omitted nothing which could allure either the ignorant multitude or the well-informed; that he led a life so spotless and holy that no suspicion whatever could attach to him; and finally, that, by stupendous miracles, of a salutary and beneficial character, and such as accorded with the nature of his mission, he placed the truth of the religion he taught beyond all controversy.

5. As this religion was to be propagated throughout the world, it was necessary for him to select some persons to be his constant and confidential companions, who should be able to state and testify to posterity and to the remotest nations, with the greatest confidence and authority, the events of his life, his miracles, and his whole system of doctrine. Therefore, from the Jews about him he chose twelve messengers, whom he distinguished from the rest by the title of Apostles. They were plebeians, poor, and illiterate; for he would not employ the rich, the eloquent, and the learned, lest the success of their mission should be ascribed to natural causes and to human means. 1 Cor. i. 21. These he once sent forth among the Jews, during his lifetime Matt. x. 7; but afterwards he retained them constantly near him, that they might witness all that he said or did.³ But, that the people might not lack religious instruction, he commissioned seventy other disciples to travel at large through Judea. Luke x. i.

6. The learned have inquired why the Saviour appointed just twelve, neither more nor less, to be apostles, and seventy to be his disciples; and various conjectures are offered on the subject. But as it is manifest from the words of Christ himself (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30), that the number of the apostles had reference to the number of the tribes of Israel, there can scarcely be a doubt that he wished to indicate to the Jews that he was the supreme Lord and Pontiff over the whole Hebrew race, which was divided into twelve tribes. The seventy disciples were just equal in number to the senators composing the Sanhedrim or grand council of the nation; and this justifies the conjecture that Christ intended, by the choice of the seventy, to admonish the Jews that the authority of their Sanhedrim was now at an end, and that all power in relation to religious matters was vested in him alone.⁴

¹ Moshelm has a long note in the parallel passage of his Com. de Rebus Chr. p. 49, the substance of which is this: 'The title Apostles was given to those principal men whom the high priests retained as their private counsellors, and whom they occasionally sent as their legates to the foreign Jews, either to collect the yearly tax for the temple or to execute other commissions. We have not, indeed, a direct testimony at hand, proving that the title of Apostles was given to such legates of the high priests in the days of Christ. Yet there is intimation of this in Gal. i. 1, and Jerome so understood the passage. See his Comment. &c. Opp. tom. ix. p. 124. And that after the destruction of Jerusalem, the legates of the Jewish Patriarchs (who stood in the place of high priests) were called apostles, is fully proved. See Jerome, ubi supra, and Eusebius on Isa. cap. xviii. 2. See also Gothofredus, on Cod. Theodor. tom. vi. p. 251, ed. Ritter; Petavius, on Epiphani ad Hæres. xxx.; Wesseling, De Archontibus Jud. p. 91; Walch (of Gotting.) Hist. Patriarch. Jud.; and Suler, Theaur. Eccles. tom. i. p. 477.—Mur.

⁴ There are two fictitious lists of the seventy disciples now extant, which are falsely ascribed to Hippolytus and to Doaltheus. They may be seen in various works; e. g. Fabricius, Lux Evangelii, &c. pag. 115—118; and annexed to the books De Vita et Morie Moisi, ed. Fabricius; and in Ittig, Hist. Eccles. primi sæculi, p. 472. That no sort of credit is due to them, is shown by Ittig, ubi supra; by Blondell, De Episcopis et Presbyt. p. 93, and by others. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. i. 12, expressly declares that no catalogue of the seventy disciples was to be found anywhere in his day. The two lists nearly agree, and are evidently

¹ See a collection of these fables by Fabricius, Codex Apocryphus N. Test. tom. i.

² See, concerning John the Baptist, Cellarius, two Diss. de vita, carcera et supplicio Jo. Bapt. in his Diss. Acad. par. i. p. 169, and par. ii. p. 373. Ittig, Historia eccles. primi sæculi selecta capita, cap. viii. sec. 4; Witsius, Mucell. Sacra. tom. ii. p. 464, &c.—Schl. [and Winer, Biblisches Realwörterbuch, article Johannes.—Mur.

7. Jesus himself gave instruction to none but Jews; nor did he allow his disciples to travel among other nations, as teachers, while he continued on earth. Matt. x. 5, 6; xv. 24. Yet the extraordinary deeds performed by him leave no room to doubt that his fame very early extended to other nations. There are respectable writers who state, that Abgarus, King of Edessa, being dangerously sick, sent a letter to Christ, imploring his assistance; and that he not only wrote an answer to the king, but also sent him his picture.¹ It is the prevailing opinion, that not only the letters of Christ and Abgarus, but likewise the whole story were fabricated.² I would by no means venture to defend the credit of the letters; but I see no very weighty reasons for rejecting altogether the whole story.

8. No small part of the Jewish people were excited by the demonstrations of divine authority in Christ, to revere him as the Son of God; but the leading men, especially the Pharisees and the chief priests, whose vices and crimes he freely reprov'd, plotted against his life, being fearful of losing their honours and privileges if Christ should continue publicly to preach. For a long time the machinations of these ungodly men were ineffectual. But at last, his ungrateful disciple, Judas, disclosing the place of his master's nocturnal retirement, he was seized by soldiers at the command of the Sanhedrim, and ordered to be tried for his life.

9. He was first charged before the Jewish high priest and senate, with having violated the law, and blasphemed the majesty of God. Thence he was dragged to the tribunal of Pilate, the Roman procurator, and there accused of sedition and of treason against Cæsar. Neither of these accusations could have satisfied fair and upright judges. But the clamours of the people, which were instigated by the irreligious priests, compelled Pilate, though reluctantly, to pass sentence of death upon him. He, as he had come into our world to make expiation for the sins of men, and knew that all the objects of his abode among them were accomplished, voluntarily submitted to be nailed to a cross, on which he yielded up his spotless soul to God.

10. On the third day after his burial, he re-assumed the life which he had voluntarily laid down; and showing himself alive, he made it manifest that men no longer owed anything to divine justice. He now continued forty days with his disciples, employing the time very much in giving them instruction. To his enemies he would not appear visibly: among other reasons, one was, that he knew those unprincipled men who had before accused him of sorcery, would impudently affirm that it was merely a spectre, bearing his likeness and produced by the power of the devil, which had appeared. At length, in the presence of his disciples, he ascended up to heaven, after commissioning them to preach the Gospel to all nations.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. WHEN Jesus was seated at the right hand of the eternal Father, the first proof he gave of his majesty and power was by the effusion of the Holy Spirit upon his disciples and friends on earth, on the fiftieth day after his death. Acts ii. 1, &c. On receiving this celestial gift and teacher, they were freed from all their former ignorance and blindness of mind, and endued with astonishing alacrity and power to fulfil the duties of their office. With these mental endowments, was joined the knowledge of various foreign languages, which was indispensable to them in giving instruction to different nations,³ and also a firm reliance on the promise of Christ, that God would aid them, as often as should be necessary, by miracles.¹

³ The nature of this "gift of tongues" has been very variously interpreted by divines and historians. A summary of these views may be seen in Townsend's New Test. chronologically arranged, in loc. taken chiefly from Kuinoel, Comment. in lib. N. Test. iv. 43, &c.; but a fuller list is given in Harles's edition of Fabricius, Biblio. Græcæ, iv. 760, &c. See also Neander, Gesch. d. Pflanzung, u. Leitung, &c. i. 10; translated in Clarke's Biblical Cabinet, Nos. 45 and 46. The English reader may also consult Middleton's Essay on the Gift of Tongues, Misc. Works, 4to, vol. ii. p. 81, but especially Milman's Bampton Lectures. Oxford, 1827—lecture V. which presents an excellent survey of this subject. On the collateral topic of the prevalence of the Greek language in Palestine and the East, see Milman, ubi supra; Gresswell's Dissertations on a Harmony of the Gospels, i. 109—114, and the Supplementary vol. pages 1—13; also, the celebrated work of Diodati, entitled De Christo græce loquente exercitatio. Nap. 1767; a translation of which is given in the American Biblical Repository for 1844—45. In opposition to the extreme views of Diodati, see Hug, Einleitung in die Schriften des N. T. vol. ii. sec. 10, translated by Wait, but more correctly in the Amer. Bib. Rep. for 1831, p. 250, &c.; and Pfannkuche's Essay on the Prevalence of the Aræmean Language in Palestine, &c. also translated from the German, in the same excellent periodical for 1831, p. 317, &c. and republished by Clark in his Philologicæ Tracts, vol. i. Edin. 1833.—R.

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xviii. [Here is the earliest notice of these Letters. For the earliest history of the picture, see Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xxvii. See the Letters themselves, with notes by Fabricius, Codex Apocryphus, tom. i. p. 317.

² See Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tom. i. chap. xvii. p. 500; Bayer, Historia Elestena et Oroana, lib. iii. p. 104; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clem. Vat. tom. i. p. 554. [As to the picture, which is still preserved, and shown at Rome, Heausobro has fully exposed the fable in his Diss. des Images de mine divine, in the Biblioth. Germanique, tom. xviii. p. 10, &c. Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 73.—Mur.

2. Relying on this divine assistance, the disciples, in accordance with the Saviour's injunctions, Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8; xiii. 46, first laboured to convert the Jews to Christ. Nor was this labour without effect, for many thousands of them soon became Christians. Acts ii. 41; iv. 4. Next they proceeded to the Samaritans, which also their commission required. Acts i. 8. And here, too, they gathered a Christian church. Acts viii. 14. Lastly, after spending many years at Jerusalem, and regulating and confirming the churches of Christ in Palestine and the neighbouring regions, they travelled abroad among various nations, their labours being everywhere attended with the greatest success.²

3. The first care of the apostles after the Saviour's ascension was, to complete the number of twelve apostles established by Christ, by electing a more worthy person to the place of Judas, who had laid violent hands on himself. Therefore, the little company of Christ's servants at Jerusalem being assembled, two men, the most noted for their piety and faith in Christ, Barnabas and Matthias, were proposed as the most worthy of that office. One of these, Matthias, being designated by lot, as it is commonly supposed, or elected by the majority of the votes of the persons present, was constituted the twelfth apostle. Acts ii. 15, &c.³

4. As these twelve ambassadors of Christ were all of them plain, illiterate men, and as the Christian community, now in its infancy, needed a man who could attack and vanquish the Jewish doctors and the pagan philosophers, with their own weapons, Jesus Christ himself, a little after the appointment of Matthias, by a voice from heaven, created a thirteenth apostle, namely, Saul, who afterwards assumed the name of Paul; a man who had been a most virulent enemy of the Christians, but who was well skilled in the Jewish learning and not ignorant of the Grecian. Acts ix. 1, &c. To this truly admirable man, whether we consider his courage, his force of mind, or his fortitude and patient perseverance in labours, how much the Christian world is indebted, is manifest from the Acts of the Apostles and his own Epistles.

5. The first of all the Christian churches founded by the apostles, was that of Jerusalem; and after the form and model of this, all the others of that age were constituted. That church, however, was governed immediately by the apostles, to whom the presbyters, and the overseers of the poor, or the deacons, were subject. Though the people had not withdrawn themselves from the Jewish worship, yet they held their own separate meetings, in which they received instruction from the apostles and presbyters, offered up united prayers, celebrated, in the sacred supper, the memorial of Jesus Christ, of his death, and the salvation he procured; and then manifested their mutual love, partly by their liberality to the poor, and partly by those temperate repasts which from their design were called love-feasts. Acts ii. 42.⁴ Among the virtues for which this primitive church of Christ was distinguished, their care of the poor and needy is most conspicuous. For the rich liberally supplied the wants of all the brotherhood, and with such promptitude and tenderness that Luke says, they had all things common. Acts ii. 44; iv. 32. But it is clear from the expressions used by Peter, in Acts v. 4, as well as from other considerations, that the declaration of Luke should not be understood, as it generally has been, of their possessing in common, but only of their using in common.⁵

¹ In his Comment. de Rebus Christ. ante C. M. p. 76, Mosheim states, that he does not account the power of working miracles among the supernatural gifts; because such power neither was nor could be conferred on men, omnipotence alone being able to work miracles: so that faith to pray for them, and to expect them at the hands of God, was all that the Holy Ghost actually imparted to the apostles.—Mur.

² It appears from the book of Acts, that the apostles, or at least most of them, remained in and near Jerusalem, for several years after the ascension; but how long they continued together is uncertain. There was anciently a tradition which Eusebius states (Hist. Eccles. v. 18) on the authority of Apollonius, a writer of the second century, as does Clemens Alex. (Strom. vi. cap. v.) from a spurious work, Prædicatio Petri, that the Saviour enjoined upon his apostles not to leave Jerusalem till twelve years after his ascension. About so long they probably continued there; and their being divinely guided in most of their movements might give rise to the tradition.—Mur.

³ Mosheim has a long note in the parallel place in his Comment. de Rebus Christ. &c. pag. 78—80, in which he aims to prove, that ἑκαστος κληρονομήσας, in Acts i. 26, signifies they gave their votes; and not, as it is commonly understood, they cast their lots. But his interpretation is very generally rejected.—Mur.

⁴ Mosheim understood Acts ii. 42, as descriptive of the several parts of the ordinary public worship of these primitive Christians, rather than of their Christian character and conduct in general. See his Comment. de Rebus Christ. pag. 113—116. If Mosheim's interpretation of that text is erroneous, as most interpreters think it is, this account of the mode of worship in the apostolic church, rests on a slender basis.—Mur.

⁵ "It is an ancient opinion, though not older than the fourth century, that in the church of Jerusalem there was such a community of goods, as existed among the ancient Essenes and now among monks; but this opinion is destitute of any solid foundation, resting solely on the declaration of Luke, that they had all things common. See my Diss. de vera natura communis bonorum in eccl. Hieros. which is the first in the second volume of my Dissert. ad hist. eccl. pertinentes."—Mosheim, de Rebus Christ. &c. p. 118.

6. The ambassadors of Christ, leaving Jerusalem, travelled over a great part of the world, and in a short time collected numerous religious societies in various countries. Of churches founded by them, not a small number is mentioned in the sacred books, especially in the Acts of the Apostles.¹ Besides these, there can be no doubt they collected many others, both by their own efforts and by the efforts of their followers. But how far they travelled, what nations they visited, or when and where they died, is exceedingly dubious and uncertain.² The stories often told respecting their travels among the Gauls, the Britons, the Spaniards, the Germans, the Americans, the Chinese, the Indians, and the Russians, are too recent and fantastic to be received by an inquisitive lover of the truth.³ A great part of these fabulous stories sprang up after the days of Charlemagne, when most Christian churches contended as vehemently about the antiquity of their origin as ever did the Arcadians, Egyptians, Greeks, and other people.

7. Many who were unwilling to adopt entirely the religion of Christ, were induced, nevertheless, by the fame of his deeds and the sublime purity of his doctrines, to rank him among men of the highest excellence, and even among the gods, as numerous documents evince. With great veneration, many preserved pictures of Christ and of his apostles in their houses.⁴ It is said that a Roman emperor, Tiberius, proposed to have Christ enrolled among the gods of the empire, but that the senate rejected the proposal. Though many at

¹ The names of these churches are collected by Hartmann, De Rebus gestis Christianor. sub Apostolis, cap. vii. p. 107; and by Fabricius, Lux Evangelii, cap. v. p. 83, &c.

² It is a very ancient and current report, confirmed by many witnesses, that all the apostles suffered public martyrdom with the exception of John, who died a natural death at Ephesus. That Peter, Paul, and James died violent deaths, I believe on the testimony of the numerous ancient authors; but that the other apostles did so, I cannot feel so certain. As my first ground of doubt, a very ancient writer of the second century, Hieracleon, a Valentinian indeed, but no contemptible man, cited by Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iv. cap. ix. denies that Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi, and others, confessed Christ before magistrates, and were put to death for so doing. He is urging that the public confession of himself required by the Saviour, Matt. x. 32, may be made by a holy and Christian life, as well as by a public avowal before a persecuting magistrate; and he states as proof, ὅτι γὰρ πάντες οἱ σωζόμενοι ὁμολόγησαν τὴν διὰ τῆς φωνῆς ὁμολογίαν, καὶ ἐξήλθον. 'Εξ ὧν Ματθαῖος, Φίλιππος, Θωμᾶς, Λεβί, καὶ ἄλλοι πολλοί, for not all that we saved made that confession in words (before magistrates), and so died. Of this number were Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi, and many others. Clement, though he disapproves several things in the passage he quotes, leaves this statement to stand as it is; which is proof that he had nothing to allege against it. Philip is expressly declared not to have suffered martyrdom, but to have died and been buried at Hierapolis, so says Polycrates, in his Epistle to Victor, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 24. Baronius, indeed (Annales, A. D. 35, sec. 141), and after him many others maintain, that this was not Philip the apostle, but Philip, one of the seven deacons of Jerusalem. But Polycrates says expressly, that he was one of the twelve apostles. A still stronger argument is, that all the writers of the first three centuries, and among them such as contended for the high dignity of the martyrs, in opposition to the Valentinians, viz. Tertullian, Clemens Alex. and Origen, never mention but three of the apostles as being martyrs; namely, Peter, Paul, and James the elder. See Tertullian, Scorpice, cap. xv. I am therefore led to believe that the common reports respecting the sufferings of Christ's ambassadors were fabricated, after the days of Constantine. And two causes might lead to such reports. (1) The extravagant estimation in which martyrdom was held, made it seem necessary to rank the apostles among the martyrs. (2) The ambiguity of the word μάρτυρ martyr, which properly signifies a witness, in which sense Christ himself called his apostles μάρτυρες (Acts i. 8; see also Acts ii. 32), might lead the more ignorant to believe, and to amplify these fables. Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. pag. 81—84, abridges considerably.—Mur.

³ Mosheim, in his Comment. de Reb. Christ. pag. 80, 81, says: "As to what we are told respecting the transactions of the apostles, their travels, miracles, and deaths, if we except what was gathered from the New Test. and a few other ancient monuments, a large part is dubious and uncertain. Some things, however, have more credibility and verisimilitude than others. I would not reject all that is clearly attested by Origen, Eusebius, Gregory Nazianzen, Paulinus, Jerome, Socrates, and some more ancient writers quoted by Eusebius; but what is attested only by authors subsequent to these, or unknown, I would not readily believe, unless facts offer themselves to corroborate the testimony." Following these judicious rules of Mosheim, we may believe that Peter, after preaching long in Judea, and other parts of Syria, probably visited Babylon, Asia Minor, and finally Rome, where he was crucified.—Paul's history is given in the Acts to about A.D. 64. He was probably released from captivity, visited Judea, Asia Minor, and Greece, and returning to Rome, was there beheaded about A.D. 67 or 68. John remained many years in Judea, and afterwards removed to Ephesus, where he lived to a very advanced age, dying about A.D. 100. He was banished to Patmos about A.D. 95, and was greatly revered. James the elder (brother of John) was put to death by Herod Agrippa, about A.D. 44. Acts xii. 1. James the younger, the son of Alphaeus, spent his life in Judea, long presided over the church of Jerusalem, and there suffered martyrdom, a little before the destruction of Jerusalem. Andrew probably laboured on the shores of the Black Sea, near the modern Constantinople, and perhaps in Greece. Philip, either the apostle or the evangelist, is reported to have ended his days at Hierapolis, in Phrygia. Thomas seems to have travelled eastward, to Parthia, Media, Persia, and India. Bartholomew took, perhaps, a more southern course, and preached in Arabia. Matthew is also reported to have travelled east, in the modern Persia. Of Simon the Cananite nothing to be relied on can be said. Thaddeus, Lebbaeus, or Jude the brother of James, the author of an epistle, is reported to have preached at Edessa, in the north of Syria. Of the companions of the apostles, Timothy, after accompanying Paul many years, is said to have been stationed at Ephesus, where he suffered martyrdom under Domitian or Nerva. Titus, another companion of Paul, is reported to have been stationed in Crete, where he died. Mark, or John surnamed Mark, attended Paul and afterwards Peter, and probably preached the gospel in Egypt. Of Luke little can be said, except that he accompanied Paul, and wrote his history, viz. the book of Acts and a Gospel. Of Barnabas nothing can be said worth relating, except what is learned from the New Testament. See Fabricius, Lux Evangelii, &c. &c. cap. v. pag. 95—115. From this account, imperfect as it is, we may conclude that the apostles and their companions scarcely extended their labours beyond the boundaries of the present Turkish empire.—Mur.

⁴ Eusebius, Historia Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxviii. Irenæus, Hæres. lib. i. cap. xxv, p. 250, ed. Massuet.

the present day think this to be improbable, yet there are distinguished men who are led by weighty reasons to a different opinion.¹

8. The causes must have been divine which enabled men, destitute of all human aid, poor, friendless, neither eloquent nor learned, fishermen, publicans, and, moreover, Jews—that is, persons odious to all other nations—in so short a time to persuade a great part of mankind to abandon the religions of their fathers, and to embrace a new religion which is opposed to the natural dispositions of men. In their very words there was an amazing and a divine power of controlling the minds of men; to which may be added miracles, prophecies, the detection of men's secret designs, magnanimity in the midst of perils, contempt for all the objects of ordinary ambition, a patient, cheerful endurance of sufferings worse than death, as well as of death itself, and finally, lives of the most unblemished character. That the ambassadors of Jesus Christ were thus furnished for their work, is a truth perfectly clear and obvious. And if these holy men had not been so furnished, no probable reason could be offered for this rapid propagation of Christianity by so small and feeble a band.

9. To all this must be added the ability which these ambassadors of God possessed, of transferring the power of working miracles to their disciples. Many, as soon as they were baptized according to Christ's directions, and consecrated to God by prayer and the imposition of hands, were able immediately to express their thoughts in foreign languages which they had never learned, to foretell future events, to heal the sick by pronouncing the name of Jesus, to call the dead to life, and to perform other deeds above the power of man.² What must have been thought of the men who had ability to confer such wonderful powers on others!

10. Those who pretend to assign other causes for this surprising revolution in the religious state of the world, recite fictions which will never satisfy an attentive observer of human affairs. Some conjecture that the kindness of Christians to the poor, induced a multitude of idle and vicious persons to embrace Christianity. But they forget that such as embraced this religion exposed their lives to imminent danger; nor do they reflect that vicious, lazy persons, who would not work, were not tolerated among Christians. 2 Thess. iii. 6—

12. Equally groundless is the representation of others, that the profligate and flagitious lives of the pagan priests caused many to turn Christians. But the vile character of these priests, though it might bring the ancient systems of religion into contempt, could not produce attachment to Christianity, which exposed its votaries to the loss of property, character, and life. The man must be beside himself who could reason thus: "The priests of the religion in which I was educated lead profligate lives; I therefore will join myself with those who are universally despised, and by the public laws condemned, and thus put my life and fortune to the most imminent hazard."³

¹ "Of the favourable disposition of the Roman emperors towards Christianity, there is a remarkable testimony in the Apology of Melito Sardicensis, addressed to Mar. Antoninus which is preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iv. 26. Melito here informs the emperor that his predecessors not only tolerated Christianity among the religions, but also honoured it: ἐν καὶ ἀπὸ πρόγονοι σου πρὸς ταῖς ἁλλαῖς θρησκείαις ἐτίμασαν, which sect your progenitors treated with equal respect as the other religions. He adds, that Nero and Domitian were the only emperors who allowed the counsels of certain adversaries to influence them to make Christianity a criminal thing. If what Melito here says of Nero be true, namely, that he was influenced by the counsels of malevolent persons to persecute the Christians, then there may be some foundation for what John of Antioch says, in Excerptis Palesianis, p. 808, &c. that Nero was favourable to the Christians and to Christ in the beginning of his reign. Tertullian, Apologet. cap. v. p. 57, ed. Haevercamp, speaks of Tiberius's desire to have Christ enrolled among the gods, as of a thing universally known. Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. ii. 2), Orosius (Chron. Pascal. vii. 4), and others afterwards repeat the story, relying chiefly on the authority of Tertullian. See Baldwin, Comment. ad Edicta Veterum Principum Rom. de Christ. pages 22, 23; and Fabricius, Luz Evangelii, &c. p. 221. But very learned men in this age have deemed this wholly incredible, and not at all compatible with the character of Tiberius and with the state of the empire at that time. In what manner men equally learned and ingenious have repelled their arguments, may be seen in the Essay of Theod. Haaseus, De Decreto Tiberii, quo Christum referre voluit in numerum deorum. Erfurt, 1715, 4to; and in the French letter of J. C. Iesluis on this subject, in the Bibliothèque Germanique, tome xxxii. p. 147, and tome xxxiii. p. 12; Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 91, &c. See also Altmann, Disquisitio historico-critica de Epistola Pilati ad Tiberium, &c. Berne, 1775, 8vo. In this Essay Professor Altmann maintains: (1) That Pilato was actually informed of the resurrection of Christ by the guard. (2) That he did really send to Tiberius an account of the death and resurrection of Jesus, though not such an account as the one now extant. (3) That Tiberius actually proposed in the senate that Jesus should be honoured as a god. This subject is also examined by Lardner, Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. iii. p. 599, &c. Ed. Lond. 1815, 4to.—Mur.

² See, among others, Pfanner, De Charismatis, sive donis miraculosis antiquæ ecclesiæ. Francf. 1683, 12mo.

³ See also Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. pages 90—92. [Since the appearance of Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Rom. Emp. in the fifteenth chapter of which he endeavoured to account for the rapid spread of the Gospel by referring it solely to secondary causes, many excellent works have appeared on this subject, in support of the argument founded on the early propagation of Christianity, in favour of its divine origin and character. See Milman's Gibbon, vol. ii. p. 259, &c. and the several answers to Gibbon by Bishop Watson, Sir D. Dalrymple, and others. See also Lardner's Heathen Testimonies, Bullet's Hist. of the Estab. of Christianity, translated by Salisbury. London, 1776.—R.

CHAPTER V.

THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. THOUGH the disciples of Christ were distinguished for the excellence of their doctrines and the purity of their lives, yet the Jewish priests and rulers not only treated them with extreme contumely and abuse, but put to death as many of them as they could. This appears from the martyrdom of Stephen, Acts vii. 55; of James the son of Zebedee, Acts xii. 1, 2; and of James the Just, who presided over the church of Jerusalem.¹ The true cause of this hostility was undoubtedly the envy of the Jewish priests and doctors, and their fear of losing their personal advantages if Christianity prevailed.

2. No less cruelty was shown to the innocent disciples of Christ, by those Jews who lived out of Palestine, in the Roman provinces. It appears from the Acts of the Apostles and from other credible records, that they spared no pains to instigate the magistrates and the populace to destroy the Christians. To this madness, they were excited by the high-priest and the elders of the Jews living in Palestine, who, as we are informed, sent messengers to the foreign Jews, exhorting them to avoid all connexion with the Christians and to persecute them as far as was in their power.² To cloak this base procedure under an honourable garb, they gave out that the Christians had treasonable designs against the Roman government; that they acknowledged as their king one Jesus a malefactor, whom Pilate had most justly punished with death. This rage against the Christians was propagated from father to son, through successive generations; so that the church henceforth had no more bitter enemies than the Jews.³

3. But God himself visited this perfidious nation with the sorest judgments, on account of their cruelties to the Saviour and his friends; for he suffered Jerusalem, the capital of Palestine, together with the temple, to be razed to their foundation by the Roman emperor Vespasian and his son Titus, about forty years after Christ's ascension; and an innumerable multitude of the people to perish by the sword, and most of the survivors to be sold into slavery. A more distressing scene than this,—which is described at large by Josephus,⁴ himself a Jew,—is, perhaps, nowhere to be found in the records of history. From this period, the Jews have been, even more than before, objects of hatred and abhorrence to all nations.

4. The Gentiles, who were polytheists, brought upon the Christian church still greater calamities than the Jews could do, whose power was not equal to their malice. The persecutions of the Christians by the Romans, have for many ages been accounted ten in number.⁵ But the ancient history of the church does not support precisely this number: for if we reckon only the general and more severe persecutions, they were fewer than ten; but, if we include the provincial and more limited persecutions, the number will be much greater than ten. Some Christians of the fifth century were led by certain passages of the Scripture, especially by one in the Revelation, cap. xvii. 12—14, to believe that it was decreed the Christian church must pass through ten grievous persecutions; and to this opinion they afterwards endeavoured to accommodate in different ways the reluctant testimony of history.⁶

5. Nero first enacted laws for the extermination of Christians. Domitian next did the same, and afterwards Marcus Antoninus the philosopher, Severus, and the other emperors who were hostile to the Christians. Yet these decrees were not all equally severe, nor all founded on the same causes. A celebrated lawyer of the name of Domitius, anciently collected all the imperial laws against the Christians, in his treatise De Officio Proconsulis;⁷ which, if it were now extant, would doubtless throw much light on the history of the church under the pagan emperors. In the meantime very much is left wholly to conjecture.

6. As the Romans were not accustomed to trouble any people on account of their

⁴ In his History of the Jewish War. [See also Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tome i. chap. xvii.—Schl.]

⁵ The writers on these persecutions are enumerated by Fabrieus, Lux Evang. cap. vii. p. 133, &c.

⁶ See Sulpit. Severus, Hist. Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xxxiii. p. 387, ed. Hörn.; Augustine, De Civit. Dei, lib. xvii. cap. lii. [In the fourth century, the number of the persecutions had not been defined. Lactantius, De Mort. persecut. reckons up only six. Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. does not state their number, yet we might make out nine from this writer. This is the number given by Sulpitius Severus, in the fifth century. But in his times originated the opinion of just ten persecutions; and Sulpitius, to make out that number, includes the persecution of Antichrist in the end of the world. See Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. ante C. M. p. 93, &c.—Schl.]

⁷ See Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. v. cap. xi. What remain of these laws, are illustrated by Baldwin, Comment. ad edicta veter. princip. Romanor. de Christianis; republished by Gundling, with Baldwin's Constantinus Magnus. Halle, 1727, 8vo.

¹ Josephus, Antiq. Jud. lib. xx. cap. viii.; and Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. xxiii.

² See Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryphone, pages 51—53, 109, 138, 318, ed. Jebb.

³ Passages from early Christian writers, who complain of the Jewish persecutions, are collected by Fabrieus, Lux Evang. cap. vi. sec. 1. p. 121. See also the Epist. of the church of Smyrna, De Martyrio Polycarpi, sec. xii. xiii.—Schl.

religion, and as they suffered the Jews in particular to live according to their own laws, it is not improperly asked, what could have induced them to inflict so many evils on the Christians, whose religion was so holy, and so friendly both to public and private happiness? The first cause of this cruelty I conceive to be, that the Christians contemned and abhorred the public religion of the state, which was so closely connected with the form and administration of the Roman government. For though the Romans tolerated all the religions from which the Commonwealth had nothing to fear, they would not suffer the ancient religion of their nation, as established by the laws, to be derided and the people to be withdrawn from it. Yet both these the Christians dared to do. Nor did they assail only the Roman religion, but likewise the religion of every other nation. Hence the Romans concluded, that the Christian sect was not only arrogant beyond all measure, but was also unfriendly to the public peace and tranquillity, and calculated to excite civil wars. This, if I do not mistake, is that hatred of the human race with which Tacitus taxes the Christians, and is the true ground of his denominating Christianity a pernicious superstition, and of Suetonius styling it malignant.¹

7. Another principal cause of the Roman hostility to Christianity was, that the Christian worship had nothing of what was common to other religions. For the Christians had no sacrifices, no temples, no statues, no oracles, no order of priests; and the inconsiderate multitude deemed those who were without these, to be destitute of all religion; and by the Roman laws, those who seemed to deny the Deity or the national gods were regarded as the pests of human society. Besides, the worship of so many deities afforded support to a countless throng of priests, augurs, soothsayers, merchants, and artists—all of whom were in danger of coming to want, if Christianity should prevail; and therefore, with united strength, they rose up against it and wished to exterminate its followers.²

8. They whose interest it was to arrest the progress of Christianity, in order to effect their object the sooner, disseminated among the vulgar the basest calumnies against the Christians and their religion. These slanderous stories, the people, who were fickle and credulous, too easily accredited. What they were may be learned from the writers of apologies for Christianity in the early ages.³ The same persons cunningly persuaded the multitude, that all the calamities, wars, tempests, and diseases, which afflicted mankind, were sent upon them by the angry gods, because the Christians, who contemned their authority, were everywhere tolerated.⁴ Other less weighty causes are here omitted.

9. The various kinds of punishment, both capital and corrective, which were inflicted on those who venerated Christ, are described by learned men, in works professedly on that subject.⁵ The manner of proceeding before the tribunals may be seen in the Acts of the Martyrs, in the letters which passed between Pliny and Trajan, and in other ancient documents.⁶ But it is clear, that the mode of proceeding in the courts was not always the same; for the laws and the rescripts of the emperors, by which the magistrates were to be guided, were very different at different periods. Thus, at one time the Christians were carefully sought after; at another, the judges waited till some one came forward to accuse them. Sometimes the confessing or convicted Christians were hurried forthwith to execution, if they did not renounce their religion; at other times, the magistrates laboured, by various species of torture and cruelty, to induce them to apostatize.

10. Those who fell in these perilous days of the church, being put to death in different ways, were called Martyrs; a term borrowed from the sacred writings, and denoting that they were witnesses for Christ. Those who were bold to profess Christ before the magistrates, and for his sake incurred the loss of health, or goods, or honours, were denominated confessors. Both obtained immense veneration and influence among the Christians; and they enjoyed prerogatives and honours which

xix. 25. Pliny, Epist. lib. x. ep. 97. "The temples, which were almost deserted, begin to be frequented again; and the sacred rites, which had been long neglected, are again performed. The victims which hitherto had found almost no purchasers, begin to come again to the market," &c.

³ This subject is, nearly exhausted by Kortholt, Paganus Obstructor, seu de Calumniis gentil. in Christ. Kell, 1698, 4to; to which add Huldreich, De Calumniis gentil. in Christ. Zur. 1744, 8vo. [See also Turner's Calumnies on the primitive Christians accounted for. London 1727, 8vo.—R.]

⁴ See Arnobius, Adversus Gentes. [and Tertullian, Apologet. cap. xi.—Schl.]

⁵ Gallonius and Sagittarius, De Cruciatibus Martyrum the latter printed at Jena, 1673, 4to; the best edition of the former is, Antw. 1668, 12mo. [Both contain mixtures of the doubtful with the true; for the Acta Martyrum now extant cannot be relied on.—Mosheim, de Reb. Chr. &c.—Mur.]

⁶ See Bechmer, Jus Eccles. Protest. tom. iv. lib. v. Decretal. tit. l. sec. 32.

¹ See Tacitus, Annal. lib. xv. cap. xlii.; Suetonius, Nero, cap. xvi. Because such as could not endure the sacred rites and the religion of the Romans, nor those of all the world, seemed to be the foes of mankind and to indulge hatred towards all nations.

² See the account of Demetrius the silversmith, Acts were altogether peculiar and extraordinary; and such as would furnish matter for a volume which would be useful in various respects. These prerogatives were undoubtedly conferred on the martyrs and confessors, to induce others more readily to encounter evils of every kind for Christ's sake.¹ But as all peculiar privileges, by the fault of men, degenerate into sources of evil, so these were conferred not unfrequently on the undeserving; and they served to encourage superstition and other evils.

11. That a great number of persons of every class and rank, suffered death for the cause of Christ, during the first three or four centuries, no impartial person acquainted with those times can entertain a doubt. But since Dodwell's attempt to invalidate this ancient opinion,² many have agreed with him, and have maintained that only a few actually suffered death on account of the Christian religion; but they have met with strenuous opposers, who regard this opinion as derogatory to divine grace. Those who take the middle path between these two extremes, will probably come nearest to the truth. The martyrs were not so numerous as they were anciently supposed to be, and as some still account them; but they were more numerous than Dodwell and his friends suppose. Into this opinion, I think, they will most readily come, who learn from the ancient writers, that even in the most calamitous times of the Church, not all the Christians, everywhere, were persecuted and arraigned for trial. Persons in the humbler conditions of life were generally more safe, while greater danger impended over the rich, whose wealth had charms for the judges, over the learned, the doctors and heads of churches, the witty and the eloquent.³

12. The words and actions of the martyrs, from the time of their arrest till their last moments, were carefully committed to writing, in order to be read on certain days as examples to posterity. But only a few of these Acta Martyrum have reached us;⁴ much the greater part of them having been committed to the flames, during the ten years' war of Diocletian against the Christians; for that emperor required all the books and papers of Christians at that time to be collected and burned. From the eighth century, both the Greeks and the Latins took great pains to compile lives of the ancient martyrs; but the more discerning even in the Romish Church now admit that the greater part of these accounts are mere fables, dressed up in a style of affected oratory. Nor is more credit due to those catalogues of saints called Martyrologies, which were either compiled by ignorant and incompetent men or have since been much falsified. Hence this part of ecclesiastical history enjoys very little light.

13. Nero was the first emperor who persecuted the Christians, and his cruelty was extreme. He accused those innocent people of a crime which he himself had committed; namely, that of setting fire to the city of Rome.⁵ And to make the punishment correspond with the crime, he caused the streets of the city to be illuminated through the night by the burning bodies of many of them, whom he had sewed up alive in garments covered with pitch. Others were put to death in a different manner. This persecution began in the middle of November, A.D. 64. In it, the ancients tell us, Paul and Peter suffered death at Rome; but many cannot bring themselves to believe this, because of its repugnance to chronology.⁶ This persecution terminated at

¹ This seems quite too philosophical an account of this matter. The early Christians did not thus coldly calculate distant consequences and effects, in order to determine what place in their affections and what rank in the church, they should give to their brethren and pastors who suffered and died for their religion. Nature, religion, and all the ties which united them to Christ, to the church, and to one another, combined to render these holy men and consistent Christians venerable and lovely in their eyes, and of course to procure them a rank and privileges in the church altogether peculiar. Whoever reads the most authentic accounts of the ancient martyrs, of Polycarp, for instance, will see abundant evidence of the operation of these causes; but nothing of that calculating policy of which Mosheim speaks.—Mur.

² In his noted dissertation, De Paucitate martyrum, which is the eleventh among his Dissert. Cyprianicæ. [Gibbon eagerly seized on Dodwell's conclusions in this dissertation; and in the sixteenth chapter of his Decline and Fall, &c. he endeavours to extenuate the cruelties of the Roman authorities against the Christians, and to depreciate their sufferings in the cause of truth. See Milman's excellent notes on this chapter; and some judicious remarks in that most interesting work, Mattland's Church in the Catacombs. Lond. 1846, in the fourth chapter, entitled "The Martyrs of the Catacombs." This work contains numerous pictorial illustrations of the sepulchral remains of the primitive Christians in Rome, many of them now published for the first time; and I can vouch, from personal observation, for the extreme accuracy with which they are executed.—R.

³ See Martyrium Polycarpi, sec. 12; Acta Prætorii, in Ruinart's Acta Martyr. p. 219; Cyprian, Epist. v. and xiv. p. 10 and 23 ed. Benedict. and many others; Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. antæ C. M. p. 106.—Mur.

⁴ Such of them as are not wholly unworthy of credit were collected in a moderate sized folio, by Ruinart, Acta primorum Martyrum sincera et Selecta. Amster. 1713, folio.

⁵ See the two French dissertations of Alph. de Vignoles, on the cause and the commencement of Nero's persecution in Masson's Histoire critique de la République des Lettres, tome viii. pages 74—117, and tome ix. pages 172—186. See also Toinard on Lactantius, De Mortibus persecutorum, p. 398.

⁶ Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, tome i. p. 564, &c.; and Baratier, De Successione Romanor. Pontif. cap. v. p. 60. [All agree that both these apostles, Paul and the death of Nero, who is well known to have been his own executioner, A.D. 68. For about four years, therefore, the Christians suffered every species of cruelty at his hands.

14. How far the persecution under Nero extended is not agreed among the learned. For while the greater number suppose it spread over the whole Roman empire, there are those who think it was confined to the city of Rome. The former opinion, which is the more ancient,¹ appears to us best

Peter, were put to death in the reign of Nero; but in respect to the year and the place, there is controversy. Many question whether both suffered at the same time. They believe, according to the testimony of Prudentius (Peristephan. Hym. xli. De passione beat. Apost. Petri et Pauli, ver. b), that Peter suffered one year earlier than Paul, but on the same day. As to the day on which Paul suffered, some make it the 29th of June, and others the 23d of February. The year is by some determined to A.D. 64; so Von Henchen, Acta Sanctorum. April. tom. i.; Papebroch, Propylæum ad Acta Sanctorum. (May); Fagii, Critica in Annal. Baron. tom. i. pages 51, 52;—by others A.D. 65, and again by others A.D. 67; so Baumgarten;—and lastly by others A.D. 68; so, also, Pearson, Annalæ Paulini, p. 25, which is the most probable opinion. The day when both apostles suffered was probably the 23d of February. That Paul was beheaded during Nero's persecution, is supported by the testimony of Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. ii. cap. xxv., and of Lactantius, De Mort. persecut. cap. ii. p. 1375, ed. Bünemann. As to the place, an obscure writer, Valens, in a book, Quo Petrus Roman non crucis demonstratur, 1660, 4to, p. 40, denies that either apostle suffered at Rome, and endeavours to prove that their martyrdom was at Jerusalem, which also Ilaio maintains in regard to Peter, Centur. Scriptor. Britan. p. 16. This opinion is confuted by various writers, who are mentioned in Walch's Biblioth. theol. selecta, tom. iii. p. 458. On this whole subject, consult Cave, Life of Paul, chap. vii. sec. 9, p. 424, of his Antiq. Apostol. Tillemont, Mém. pour servir à l'histoire de l'église, tom. i. part ii. n. 42, p. 763; and Fabricius, Codex Apocryph. N. T. par. i. p. 450. On the fabulous circumstances related of Paul's martyrdom, see Walch's Hist. Eccles. N. T. p. 277.—Schl. On the chronology of Paul's life and labours, see Witsius, Meteorologica Leidensia, 1703, 4to; Pearson, Annalæ Pauli; the Introductions to the N. T. by Elchhorn, Bertholt, Hornæ, &c. and other works referred to in Winer's Bibliches Realw. art. Paul.—Mur. [See also Burton's Attempt to ascertain the Chronology of the Acts of the Apostles, &c. Oxf. 1830; Gresswell's Dissert. on a Harb. of the Gospels, vol. i. diss. xiii. vol. ii. diss. i.; and the Supp. vol. Brown's Ordo Saeculorum, p. 96, &c.; and the older Works by Lardner, Benson, Macknight, &c.—R.]

The first who rejected the common opinion, so far as I know, was Baldwin [an eminent civilian of Paris, who died A.D. 1573], in his Comment. ad edicta Imperator. in Christianos, pag. 27, 28. After him, Launoi, in Diss. qua Sulpitii Severi locus de prima martyrum Gallia epocha vindicatur, sec. i, pag. 139, 140, Opera, tom. ii. par. i. Still more learned, and on the same side, was Dodwell, diss. xi. in his Dissert. Cyprion. sec. 13, p. 59, whom many others have followed: among whom are Le Clerc, Hist. Eccles. N. T. Saecul. i. p. 428; Lange, Hist. Eccles. p. 360; Gurtler, Syst. theol. prophet. p. 491; Baumgarten, Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. i. p. 376, who supposes the persecution extended only so far as the power of the Prætorian Præfect; Semler, Soloe. Capita Hist. Eccles. tom. i. p. 24. [Also Schmidt, Handbuch der christl. Kirchengesch. vol. i. p. 120; and Neander, Allgem. Gesch. d. christl. Rel. &c. vol. i. part i. p. 137.—Mur. [The arguments for both opinions are stated in Walch, Hist. Eccles. p. 548, who thinks the question to be altogether doubtful. Jablonksi was of the same sentiment, Institut. Historicae Christ. antiq. p. 40.—Schl.

supported. We do not hesitate to join with those who think that public laws were enacted against the whole body of Christians, and were sent abroad into the provinces. To this opinion we are led, among other reasons, by the authority of Tertullian, who clearly intimates that Nero, as well as Domitian, enacted laws against the Christians, which laws Trajan in part repealed or annulled.² The noted Spanish or Portuguese inscription, in which Nero is commended for having purged the province of the new superstition, is suspected by the Spaniards themselves, and I place no reliance on it.³ The Christians, moreover, were condemned, not so much for their religion as on the charge of having set fire to Rome.⁴ But who can suppose that a religious sect which the emperor himself charged with such a crime, would be quietly tolerated by him beyond the limits of Rome?⁵

² Tertullian, Apologet. cap. iv. p. 46, ed. Havercamp. [Considering Tertullian's fervid and rhetorical style, his vague assertions that Nero first "drew the sword" against the Christians, and that the vilest of the emperors enacted persecuting laws are now generally rejected as insufficient evidence, in the absence of well-attested facts, either that Nero enacted public laws against the Christians, or that his persecution of them in the city extended to the provinces. On this subject, and on the causes which implicated the Christians with the burning of Rome, see Milman's Hist. of Christ. chap. ii. pages 36—38, and note in p. 45.—R.]

³ This inscription may be seen in Gruterus, Inscriptiones, vol. i. page 218, note 9. [It is this: Neroni, ob provinciam latronibus et his qui non modo generis humano superstitionem inculcabant, purgatum.] But the best Spanish writers do not venture to defend the authority of this inscription, because it has not been seen by any one; and Cyrine of Ancona, who first produced it, is acknowledged by all to be unworthy of credit. I will subjoin the decision of that excellent and judicious historian of Spain, Ferreras, Histoire générale d'Espagne, tome i. p. 192: "I cannot refrain from remarking, that Cyrine of Ancona was the first who published the inscription and that from him all others had derived it. But as the credibility of this writer is suspected in the judgment of all the learned, and as not a vestige nor any recollection of this inscription remains in the places where it is said to have been found, and no one now knows where to find it; every one may form such opinion of it as he pleases." [Yet this spurious inscription found a zealous defender in the younger Walch, who published a Dissertation, entitled Persecut. Christianorum Neroni, in Hisp. ex antiquis monim. probanda, uberior explanatio. Jena, 1753, 4to.—R.]

⁴ See Ruinart, Pref. ad Acta Martyrum, p. 31, &c.

⁵ Nearly all the facts relating to this persecution, except the martyrdom of Peter and Paul, we owe to Tacitus, the Roman historian, Annal. lib. xv. cap. xlv. After describing the conflagration, which utterly consumed three of the fourteen wards, and spread ruin in seven others, and likewise the efforts of Nero to soothe the indignant and miserable citizens, he says: "But no human aid, no munificence of the prince, nor expiations of the gods, removed from him the infamy of having ordered the conflagration. Therefore, to stop the clamour, Nero falsely accused and subjected to the most exquisite punishments, a people hated for their crimes called Christians. The founder of the sect, Christ, was executed in the reign of Tiberius, by the procurator Pontius Pilate. The pernicious superstition, repressed for a time, burst forth again, not

15. Nero being dead, the fury of this first war against the Christians ceased. But in the year 93 or 94,¹ a new assault was made upon them by Domitian, an emperor little inferior in crime to Nero.² The cause of the persecution, if we give credit to Hegesippus, was the fear of losing his empire; for the emperor had learned in some way that a person would arise from among the relatives of Christ, who would attempt a revolution and would produce commotion in the empire.³ This persecution undoubtedly was severe, but it was of short continuance, as the emperor was soon after murdered.⁴ The principal martyrs named are Flavius Clemens, a consul, and Flavia Domitilla,⁵ his niece or wife. In the midst of this persecution John, the apostle, was banished to the isle of Patmos; but whether he was first cast into a caldron of boiling oil by order of the emperor, and came out alive and unhurt, though asserted by Tertullian and others, has appeared to many to be uncertain.⁶

⁴ The termination of this persecution is stated differently by the ancients. Some say that Domitian himself put an end to it before his death. Hegesippus (in Eusebius, Eccl. Hist. lib. iii. cap. xx.) states that Domitian, having learned that there were Christians of the lineage of David and kinsmen of Christ, still living in Palestine, had them brought to Rome, and interrogated them closely respecting their pedigree, their wealth, and the future kingdom of Christ. And from their answers and their whole appearance, he concluded he had nothing to fear from them, and dismissed them; and thereupon he published a decree terminating the persecution. So likewise Tertullian (Apologet. cap. v. p. 60) says of Domitian, "He receded from his attempt and recalled those he had banished." But Lactantius (De Mort. persecut. cap. iii.) represents his acts and edicts as repealed after his death, when it was that the Church recovered its former stato. And Xiphilin, on Nerva (Dion Cassius, lib. lxxviii. cap. i. abridged by Xiphilin), says that "Nerva recalled those banished for impiety," i.e. the Christians. Perhaps Domitian published an edict favourable to the Christians a little before his death, the benefits of which they began to enjoy first after his decease.—Schl.

only through Judea, the birth-place of the evil, but at Rome also, where everything atrocious and base centres and is in repute. Those first seized confessed; then a vast multitude, detected by their means, were convicted, not so much of the crime of burning the city as of hatred to mankind. And insult was added to their torments; for, being clad in skins of wild beasts, they were torn to pieces by dogs, or affixed to crosses to be burned, were used as lights to dispel the darkness of night when the day way gone. Nero devoted his gardens to the show, and held Circensian games, mixing with the rabble, or mounting a chariot clad like a coachman. Hence, though the guilty and those meriting the severest punishment suffered, yet compassion was excited because they were destroyed, not for the public good, but to satisfy the cruelty of an individual." The commencement of this persecution is determined by the time of the conflagration, which Tacitus says (Annal. cap. xv. pages 33—41) began the 18th of July, A.D. 65 (or xiv. Kalend. Sextiles, C. Lecanio et M. Licinio Coss.), and lasted six days. Some time after, but in the same year, the persecution broke out; but how long it continued is uncertain. If Paul and Peter suffered in the very last year of Nero's reign, as the fathers state (Eusebius, Chronicon; and Jerome, De Viris illustr. cap. i. and v.), the persecution doubtless ceased only on Nero's death. But if they suffered earlier, then we have no proof of the continuance of the persecution so long.—Mur.

⁵ See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xviii. and Chronicon, ann. 95. Some have supposed that the wife and niece of Clemens both had the same name, and that the first was banished to the island of Paraduria near Italy, and the second to another island called Pontia. See Tillemont, Mém. pour servir à l'histoire de l'Église, tom. ii. p. 124, &c. and Flaury, Histoire, &c. livr. ii. sec. 62.—Schl. [See Barton's Lect. on the Ecc. Hist. of the first three centuries, vol. i. pages 367—8, for an account of this interesting case of martyrdom. He observes that Domitian had destined the sons of this Clemens and Domitilla to succeed him in the empire; and therefore if the tyrant had been cut off before they suffered, "a Christian prince might have been seated upon the throne of the Cæsars at the end of the first century."—R.

¹ The precise year in which the persecution by Domitian began is not certain. Tolnard has discussed the point in his notes on Lactantius, De Mort. persecut. cap. iii. That it raged in the year 95, is stated by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. cap. iii. p. 18, but how long before this it commenced is not clear. Pagi (Crit. annal. Baron. tom. i. pages 85—87) supposes it began A.D. 93. Tolnard (ubi supra), A.D. 94, and Dodwell (Diss. Cyprian. cap. xi. p. 71), A.D. 95. Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. says A.D. 94 or 95.—Mur.

⁶ See the amicable discussion between the Rev. Mr. Hennemann and myself, in my Synagoga Diss. ad historiam eccles. pertinentium, tom. i. pages 497—546. [The whole controversy seems to rest on a passage in Tertullian, De Præscript. adv. hæret. cap. xxxvi. as the only original authority for the story, which is in itself improbable. All the more discerning, of late, either doubt or deny the truth of the story.—Mur. [See Jortin's Remarks on Ecc. Hist. vol. i. pages 290—1.—R.

² See Ruinart, Pref. ad Acta Mart. p. 32. [Ittig, Selecta Hist. Eccles. capitula, sæcul. i. cap. vi. sec. 11, p. 531.—Schl.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xix. xx.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LEARNING AND PHILOSOPHY.

1. If it were known what opinions were advanced and maintained by the men of most intelligence among the oriental nations at the time when the Christian religion began to enlighten mankind, many things in the early history of the Church might be more fully and more accurately explained. But only a few fragments of oriental philosophy, as all know, have come down to us; and those which have reached us still need the labours of a learned man to collect them all, arrange them properly, and expound them wisely.¹

2. The prevailing system in Persia was that of the Magi, who, as is well known, placed two principles or deities over the universe—the one good, the other evil. The followers of this system, however, were not agreed in respect to the precise nature of these principles.² Yet this doctrine spread over no small portion of Asia and Africa, particularly among the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Syrians, and Egyptians, though under different modifications; nor did it leave the Jews untinctured with its principles.³ The Arabians of that and the subsequent age were more remarkable for strength and courage than for intellectual culture; for they attained to no celebrity for learning before the times of Mohammed. This their own writers do not deny.⁴

3. The Indians, from the earliest times, were much famed for their love of profound knowledge. Of their philosophical tenets we could perhaps form an opinion, at the present day, if their very ancient sacred book which they denominate Veda or the law were brought to light, and translated into some language better known. The accounts given by travellers among the Indians concerning this book are so contradictory and fluctuating that we must wait for further information.⁵ The Egyptians

⁵ I have recently learned that this most desirable book has been obtained by some French Jesuits residing in India; and that it has been or will be deposited in the King of France's library. See Lettre du P. Culmette à M. de Cartigny, in the Lettres édifiantes et curieuses des Miss. Étrangères, tom. xxi. Recueil, p. 435, &c. and tom. xxiii. Rec. p. 161. [The Hindoo literature and theology were little known when Mosheim wrote. Since that time, and especially since the establishment of the Asiatic Society at Calcutta, by Sir William Jones in 1793, this field of knowledge has been explored with equal industry and success. See the Asiatic Researches, 13 vols. 4to; Sir William Jones's works, 6 vols. 4to; Rev. William Ward's View of the Hist. &c. of the Hindoos, 3 vols. 8vo; and numerous other works. But it is not true that the Vedas have been brought to Europe, as Mosheim had been informed. On the contrary, Mr. Hollbrooke, in the 8th vol. of the Asiatic Res. describes them as not worth translating. He says: "They are too voluminous for a complete translation of the whole; and what they contain would hardly reward the labour of the reader, much less that of the translator." The Vedas are four in number, called Rig Veda, Yajush Veda, Saman Veda, and Atharvan Veda. The first consists of five sections, in 10,000 verses; the second is divided into eighty sections, in 9,000 verses; the third consists of one hundred sections and 3,000 verses; the fourth of nine sections, with subdivisions, and 6,000 verses. Besides the four Vedas, the Hindoos have fourteen other sacred books, of later date and inferior authority; viz. four Upavedas, six Angas, and four Upangas. All these were supposed to be the productions of divine persons, and to contain all true knowledge, secular as well as sacred. The commentaries on these books, the compilations from them, and digests of their principles, are almost innumerable, and constitute the whole encyclopædia of the Hindoos. Several of these have been translated into European languages; namely, L'Esour-Vedam, or ancien commentaire du Vedam, &c. à Yverdon, 1778, 2 vols. 12mo. The Bhagvat-Geeta, or Dialogues of Kreeschna and Arjoun, in eighteen Lectures, with notes by Wilkins. London, 1785, 4to; Bagavadam, ou doctrine divine, ouvrage Indien canonique sur l'Être suprême, les dieux, les génies, les hommes, les diverses parties de l'univers (by Foucher d'Onboville), à Paris, 1788, 8vo. Oupnekhat, h. c. Decretum legendum, opus ipis in India rarissimum, doctrinam, & quatuor sacris Indorum libris excerptum—à Persico idiomate in Latinum versum—studio et opera Anquetii de Perron, 1801-2, 2 vols. 4to. Institutes of Hindoo Law, or the ordinances of Menu, translated by Sir William Jones. Lond. 1796, 8vo. The last is supposed to follow next after the Vedas in age. Sir Wm. Jones thinks it was, most probably, compiled about 800 years before Christ, and the Vedas about 300 years earlier. The other sacred books of the Hindoos are much later, yet all are now ancient. From the similarity of views between the Hindoo philosophers and those of Greece, it has been thought that they must have had some intercourse, or that one borrowed from the other. The ideas of the fathers in the Christian Church, and of some moderns, would make the Greeks indebted to the Orientals; but Meiners (Historia doctrinæ de uno Deo) and others would reverse the stream of philosophic knowledge, by supposing it followed the march of Alexander's army from Greece to India. It is to be hoped this subject will receive more light from

¹ There is extant an English work of Thomas Stanley, on The History of Oriental Philosophy, which Le Clerc translated into Latin. But that learned man has left the field of oriental philosophy not to be gleaned only, but to be reaped by others. He is much inferior both in genius and erudition to Brucker, whose Hist. Crit. Phil. should by all means be consulted.

² See Hyde, Historia religionis veterum Persarum. Oxon. 1700, 4to, a very learned work, but ill-digested and full of improbable conjectures. [For more recent information, see a work by Dr. Tholuck of Halle, entitled, Sufismus sine theosophia Persarum pantheistica, &c. Berl. 1821, 8vo; also, Millman's Hist. of Christ, vol. i. p. 65, &c. with the references in the notes. Matter, in his valuable Histoire critique du Gnosticisme, &c. 2d edit. 1843, throws additional light on the religious and philosophical views of the principal Persian and Indian sects, and on their influence primarily on Judaism and afterwards on the corruptors of Christianity. See vol. i. pages 105-130.—W.

³ See Wolf, Manichæismus ante Manichæos. Hamb. 1707, 8vo; Mosheim, Notes on Cudworth's Intell. Syst. pages 328-423, &c. [See also Burton's Bampton Lectures, pages 45, &c.—R.

⁴ See Abulpharajus, De Moribus Arabum, p. 6, published by Pocock.

were unquestionably divided into various sects, disagreeing in opinion;¹ so that it is a vain attempt of some to reduce the philosophy of this people to one system.

4. But of all the different systems of philosophy which were received in Asia and in a part of Africa in the age of our Saviour, none was so detrimental to the Christian Church as that which was styled γνώσις, or science; i.e. the way to the knowledge of the true God, and which we have above called the oriental philosophy, in order to distinguish it from the Grecian. For, from this school issued the leaders and founders of those sects which, during the three first centuries, disturbed and troubled the Christian Church. They endeavoured to accommodate the simple and pure doctrines of Christianity to the tenets of their philosophy; and in doing so they produced various fantastic and strange notions, and obtruded upon their followers systems of doctrine, partly ludicrous, and partly intricate and obscure, in a very high degree. The ancient Greek and Latin fathers, who contended against these sects, supposed indeed that their sentiments were derived from Plato; but those good men, being acquainted with no philosophy but the Grecian and ignorant of everything oriental, were deceived by the resemblance between some of the doctrines of Plato and those embraced by these sects. Whoever compares the Platonic philosophy carefully with the Gnostic, will readily see that they are widely different.²

the investigations which are going forward with such success in the present age.—Mur. [The result of recent inquiries into the nature of the Indian philosophy may be seen in Ritter's Geschichte d. Philos. alter Zeit, translated by Morrison, vol. iv. p. 330, &c.—H.]

¹ See Moshelm's Notes on Cudworth's Intellectual System, tom. i. p. 415. [It ought to have been stated in a previous note, where this work was first referred to, that all these valuable notes and dissertations in the Latin translation of Cudworth, published in Germany by Moshelm in 1753, have been recently translated into English by Mr. Harrison, in his edition of Cudworth, published in London in 1845, in three volumes.—H.]

² Moshelm, in this and the four following sections, describes an oriental philosophy, the supposed parent of the Gnostic system, as if its existence was universally admitted, and its character well understood. Yet the system here described is of his own formation, being such a system as must have existed, according to his judgment, in order to account for the Gnosticism of early ages. In his Comment. de Rebus Christi, &c. pag. 19–21, and in his Hist. de Causis supportorum librorum inter Christianos sæculi primi et secundi, lib. 3–6, (in his Dissert. ad Hist. Eccles. pertinentes, tom. i. pag. 223–232), he confesses that he has little evidence, except the necessity of the supposition, for the existence of this philosophy. He also admits that the fathers knew nothing of it; and he might have added that they testify that Gnosticism had no existence till the days of Adrian, in the second century. That Gnosticism as such had no existence in the first century, and that it is in vain sought for in the New Testament, appears to be satisfactorily proved by Tittmann, Tractatus

5. The first principles of this philosophy seem to have been the dictates of mere reason. For the author of it undoubtedly thus reasoned: There is much evil in the world, and men are hurried on, as by the instinct of nature, to what reason condemns. Yet that Eternal Mind from whom all other spirits emanated, is doubtless perfectly free from evil, or is infinitely good and beneficent. Hence the source of the evils with which the world abounds, must be something external to the Deity. But there is nothing external to him, except what is material; and therefore matter is to be regarded as the source and origin of all evil and vice. From these principles the conclusion was that matter existed eternally, and independently of God; and that it received its present form, not from the will or fiat of God, but from the operation of some being of a nature inferior to God: in other words, that the world and the human race came from the creating hand, not of the supreme Deity, but of one of inferior capacity and perfections. For who can believe that the supreme God, who is infinitely removed from all evil, would fashion matter which is in its nature evil and corrupt, and would impart to it any portion of his rich gifts? But, attempting to go further and to explain how, or by what accident or contrivance, that rude and malignant substance called matter became so skilfully arranged and organized, and especially how souls of celestial origin became joined with bodies composed of it, both reason and common sense forsook them. They therefore resorted to their imaginative faculty and to mere fables, in order to explain the origin of the world and of mankind.

6. But as those who undertake to explain what is obscure and difficult of solution by means of mere conjecture, can very seldom agree; so those who attempted to solve this difficulty split into various sects. Some conceived there must be two eternal first principles, the one presiding over light, the other over matter; and by the contests between these principles they accounted for the mixture of good and evil in our world. Others assigned to matter, not an eternal lord but an architect merely; and they supposed that some one of those immortal de vestigiis Gnosticorum in N. T. frustra queritis, Lips. 1773. That notwithstanding many points of resemblance can be traced, it is materially different from any system of either Grecian or oriental philosophy, it is the object of Lewald to show, Comment. ad historiam, &c. de doctrina Gnostica, Heidelb. 1818. For very ingenious and profound speculations on the subject generally, see Neander, Allgem. Gesch. der christl. Religion und Kirche, vol. i. part ii. pages 627–670.—Mur.

beings whom God produced from himself, was induced by some unforeseen event to attempt the reduction of matter, which lay remote from the residence of God, into some kind of order, and also to fabricate men. Others again imagined a sort of Triumvirate; for they distinguished the supreme Deity from the prince of matter and the author of all evil on the one hand, and from the architect of the world on the other. When these three systems came to be dilated and explained, new controversies unavoidably arose, and numerous divisions followed, as might be expected from the nature of the case, and as the history of those Christian sects which followed this philosophy expressly declares.

7. Yet, as all these sects set out upon one and the same first principle, their disagreement did not prevent their holding in common certain doctrines and opinions respecting God, the world, mankind, and some other points. They all therefore maintained the existence from eternity of a Being full of goodness, wisdom, and other virtues, of whom no mortal can form an adequate idea—a Being who is the purest light, and is diffused through that boundless space to which they gave the Greek appellation of Pleroma; that this eternal and most perfect Being, after existing alone and in absolute repose during an infinite period, produced out of himself two sprits of different sexes, and both perfect resemblances of their parent; that from the marriage of these two sprits, others of a similar nature originated; that successive generations ensued; and thus, in process of time, a celestial family was formed in the Pleroma. This divine progeny being immortal and unchangeable in their nature, these philosophers were disposed to call Αἰῶνες, Æons, a term which signifies eternal and beyond the influence of time and its vicissitudes.¹ But how numerous these Æons were was a subject of controversy among them.

¹ The word αἰών properly signifies an infinite, or at least indefinite, duration, and is opposed to a finite or a temporary duration. But by metonymy, it was used to designate immutable beings who exist for ever. It was so used even by the Greek philosophers about the commencement of the Christian era, as appears from a passage in Arrian, Diss. Epictet. lib. II. sec. 5, where αἰών is opposed to ἀνθρώπος, or to a frail, changeable being. Ὁὐ γὰρ εἰμι αἰών ἀλλ' ἀνθρώπος μέρος τῶν πάντων, ὡς ὅρα ἡμέρας· ἐνστήναι με δεῖ ὡς ὥραν, καὶ παρελθεῖν ὡς ὥραν. "I am not an Æon (an eternal and unchangeable being), but a man, and a part of the universe, as an hour is a part of the day: like an hour I must exist, and then pass away." It was therefore not a novel application of the term αἰών by the Gnostics, to use it as the designation of a celestial and immortal being. And even the fathers of the ancient church apply the term to angels, both good and bad. That all who were added to the oriental philosophy, whether Greeks or not, used the term in this sense, appears from a pas-

8. Beyond the region of light, where God and his family dwell, exists a rude and unformed mass of matter, heaving itself continually in wild commotion. This mass, one of the celestial family, at a certain time either accidentally wandering beyond the Pleroma or sent out by the Deity, undertook to reduce to order, to decorate with various gifts, and to people with human beings and animals of different species, and finally to endow and enrich with a portion of the celestial light or substance. This builder of the world, who was distinct from the supreme God, they called the Demiurge. He is a being who, though possessed of many shining qualities, is arrogant in his very nature and much inclined to domination. He therefore claims absolute authority over the new world he has built, as being his sovereign right, to the exclusion altogether of the supreme God; and he requires of mankind to pay divine honours exclusively to him and to his associates.

9. Man is composed of a terrestrial, and therefore a vicious body, and of a celestial soul, which is in some sense a particle of the Deity himself. This nobler part, the soul, is miserably oppressed by the body, which is the seat of his base lusts; for it is not only drawn away by it from the knowledge and worship of the true God, to give homage and reverence to the Demiurge and his associates, but it is likewise filled and polluted with the love of terrestrial objects and sensual pleasures. From this wretched bondage, God labours to rescue his daughters in various ways, and especially by the messengers whom he often sends to them. But the Demiurge and his associates, eager to retain their power, resist, in all possible ways, the divine purpose of recalling souls back to himself, and, with great pains, labour to obscure all knowledge of the supreme Deity. In this state of conflict, such souls as renounce the framers and rulers of the world, and aspire after God their parent, and suppress the emotions excited by depraved matter, will, when freed from the body, ascend immediately to the Pleroma; while those which continue in the bondage of superstition and of corrupt matter, must pass into other bodies till they awake from this lethargy. Yet God will ultimately prevail, and having restored to liberty most of the souls now imprisoned in bodies, will dissolve the fabric of the world; and sage in Manes, the Persian, who, as Augustine testifies, called the celestial beings αἰῶνες, or, as Augustine translates it, æcula. Some have supposed it so used even in the New Test. e.g. Ephes. II. 2, and Heb. I. 2.—Moshelm, De Reb. Christ. ante C.M. p. 30.—Mur.

then the primitive tranquillity will return, and God will reign with the happy spirits in undisturbed felicity to all eternity.¹

10. The state of learning, and especially of philosophy among the Jews, is manifest from what has already been said respecting the condition of that nation. It appears from the books of the New Testament, that the recondite science which they called Cabala, was then taught and inculcated by not a few among them. This science was, in many respects, very similar to that philosophy which we have called oriental; or rather, it is this philosophy itself, accommodated to the Jewish religion and tempered with some mixture of truth.² Nor were the Jews, at that time, wholly ignorant of the doctrines of the Greeks; for some of these doctrines had, from the days of Alexander the Great, been incorporated into their own religion. Of the opinions which they had adopted from the Chaldeans, the Egyptians, and the Syrians, I shall say nothing.³

11. The Greeks are regarded by most writers as continuing to hold the first rank in learning and philosophy. There were among them at that time, especially at Athens, acute and eloquent men, who taught the precepts of philosophy, as held by the ancient sects founded by Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, and Epicurus, and who also instructed youth in the principles of eloquence and in the liberal arts. Hence, those who were eager for learning resorted to Greece from all quarters. And at Alexandria in Egypt, Grecian philosophers and rhetoricians were no less numerous; so that thither also, there was a general resort of scholars, as to a literary market.

12. Among the Romans in this age every branch of learning and science was cultivated. The children of good families were from their earliest years instructed especially in Grecian learning and eloquence; they next applied themselves to philosophy and the civil law, and at last repaired to Greece to complete their education.⁴ Among the sects of philosophers, none were more acceptable to the Romans than the Epicureans and Academics, whom the leading men followed in great numbers in order to indulge themselves in a life of pleasure without fear or remorse. While Augustus reigned, the cultivation of the fine arts was held in high honour. But after his death, the succeeding emperors being more intent on the arts of war than those of peace, these studies gradually sank into neglect.

13. The other nations, as the Germans, Celts, and Britons, were certainly not destitute of men distinguished for their genius and acumen. In Gaul, the inhabitants of Marseilles had long been much famed for their attention to learning,⁵ and they had, doubtless, diffused knowledge among the neighbouring tribes. Among the Celts, the Druids, who were priests, philosophers, and legislators, were renowned for their wisdom, but the accounts of them now extant are not sufficient to acquaint us with the nature of their philosophy.⁶ The Romans moreover introduced literature and philosophy into all the countries which they brought under their subjection, for the purpose of softening their savage tempers and promoting their civilization.⁷ dogmas which the Jews had borrowed from the Egyptians and Syrians.—R.

¹ See Gaudentius, Liber de Philosophia apud Romanos initio et progressu, in the 5th vol. of the Novæ Historiarum Scriptorum Collectio, Italie, 1747, 8vo, 2nd edition.

² See the Histoire littéraire de la France, par les Religieux Bénédictins, Diss. prelim. p. 42, &c.

³ Martini's Religion des Gaulois, liv. i. chap. xxi. p. 175, and various others who have written concerning the Druids. [This work of Martin is said to be far inferior to the following, viz. Histoire des Celtes et particulièrement des Gaulois et des Germains, par Sim. Pelloutier, augmentée par M. de Chéneau. Paris, 1771, 8 vols. 12mo, and 2 vols. 4to; also, Fréret, Obs. sur la nature et les dogmes de la relig. Gauloise, in the Histoire de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tome xviii.; and his Obs. sur la relig. des Gaulois, &c. in the Mémoires de Littérature, tirés des registres de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tome xxiv. Paris, 1756; also the introductory part of Alsatia Illustrata, by M. Schoepflin, tom. i. sec. 96 Colmar, 1751, fol.—Mur. [The works here referred to have been superseded by those of more recent inquirers. Among these modern works perhaps the fullest and most valuable is, Thierry, Histoire des Gaulois depuis les temps les plus reculés, jusqu'à l'entière soumission de la Gaule à la domination romaine, 2nd edition, 1835, 3 vols. 8vo. The Ethnography of the Celts is admirably traced by Dr Pritchard, in the 3rd vol. of his Researches into the physical history of mankind London 1841.—R.

⁷ Juvenal, Satyræ xv. 110—112.

¹ The reader will find some excellent observations on these Eastern systems of theosophy, on the supposed malignity of Matter, on the connexion of this central dogma of orientalism with asceticism and celibacy, and on its subsequent combination with the Christian system, in Milman's Hist. of Christ. II. 82, &c. Nearly the same view is given by Isaac Taylor in his Ancient Christianity, vol. i. p. 147, &c. and p. 177, &c.—R.

² Ritter (Hist. of Philos. vol. iv. p. 402) says, "As to the Cabala of the Jews, recent investigations fully justify us in asserting that it belongs to a much later date." Tholuck is also of opinion that the Cabalistical works now in existence are, comparatively speaking, of recent date. In Europe the earliest vestiges of the Cabala date in the twelfth century, but in Asia they go back to the eighth. See his Comment. de vi Græc. Philos. in Theolog. Muham et Judeor. Part ii. De Ortu Cabale. Hamb. 1837. On the other hand, Matter traces it up to a period antecedent to Christianity. See his Hist. du Gnost. i. 135.—R.

³ See Buddeus, Introductio in historiam philos. Hebræorum; and the writers named by Wolfius, Bibliotheca Hebræica, tom. iii. [but, especially Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. period ii. par. i. lib. ii. cap. i. p. 652.—Schl. [See also Matter, Hist. du Gnost. vol. i. pages 76—105 and 164—186, for a view of the

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS, AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. As it was the design of our Saviour to gather a church from among all nations, and one which should continue through all ages, the nature of the case required him first to appoint extraordinary teachers who should be his ambassadors to mankind, and everywhere collect societies of Christians, and then that he should cause to be placed in these societies ordinary teachers and interpreters of his will, who should repeat and enforce the doctrines taught by the extraordinary teachers, and keep the people steadfast in their faith and practice; for any religion will gradually be corrupted and become extinct, unless there are persons continually at hand to explain and inculcate it.

2. The extraordinary teachers whom Christ employed in setting up his kingdom, were those intimate friends of his whom the Scriptures denominate apostles, and those seventy disciples of whom mention was made above. To these, I apprehend, must be added those who are called evangelists, that is, as I suppose, those who were either sent forth to instruct the people by the apostles, or who, of their own accord, forsaking other employments, assumed the office of promulgating the truths which Christ taught.¹ And to these we must further add those to whom, in the infancy of the church, God imparted ability to speak in foreign languages which they had never learned; for he on whom the divine goodness conferred the gift of tongues, ought in my judgment to infer from this gift, that God designed to employ his ministry in propagating the Christian religion.²

3. Many have undertaken to write the history of the apostles, a history full of fables, doubts, and difficulties, if we pursue it farther than the books of the New Testament and the most ancient ecclesiastical writers can guide us.³ An apostle was a man who was divinely instructed, and who was invested with the power of making laws, of punishing the guilty and wicked when there was occasion, and of working

miracles when they were necessary, and who was sent by Christ himself to make known to mankind the divine pleasure and the way of salvation, to separate those who obeyed the divine commands from all others, and to unite them in the bonds of a religious society.⁴

4. Our knowledge of the seventy disciples of Christ is still more imperfect than that of the apostles, for they are but once mentioned in the New Testament. Luke x. 1. Catalogues of them indeed are extant, but these being fabricated by the Greeks have little or no authority or credibility. Their mission was, as appears from the words used by Luke, solely to the Jewish nation. Yet it is very probable that, after the Saviour's ascension to heaven, they performed the duties of evangelists, and taught in various countries the way of salvation which they had learned from Christ.⁵

5. As to the external form of the church and the mode of governing it, neither Christ himself nor his apostles gave any express precepts. We are therefore to understand, that this matter is left chiefly to be regulated by circumstances, and by the discretion of civil and ecclesiastical rulers.⁶ If, however, what no Christian can

¹ See Spanheim, De Apostolis et Apostolatu, tom. II. Opp. p. 289, &c. In ascribing legislative powers to the apostles I have proceeded considerably, and, as I think, on good grounds. I am aware that eminent men at this day deny them this power, but perhaps they differ from me more in words than in reality. [Mosheim founded his opinion on Matt. x. 20; John xiii. 20; Luke x. 16; 1 Tim. iii. 1; 1 Cor. xi. 1—4, 34; and Titus i. 5. See his Instit. hist. Christ. majores, p. 158, &c.—Schl.]

² Catalogues of the seventy disciples are extant, subjoined to the Libri iii. de Vita et Mortu. Musis, elucidated by Gaulmin, and again published by Fabricius, Append. ad Hippol. Op. tom. i. p. 41. [See an account of these catalogues in note 4, p. 18, above.—Mur.]

³ Those who imagine that Christ himself, or the apostles by his direction and authority, appointed a certain fixed form of church government, are not agreed what that form was. The principal opinions which have been adopted upon this head may be reduced to the four following. The first is that of the Roman Catholics, who maintain that Christ's intention and appointment was, that his followers should be collected into one sacred empire, subjected to the government of St. Peter and his successors, and divided, like the kingdoms of this world, into several provinces; that, in consequence thereof, Peter fixed the seat of ecclesiastical dominion at Rome, but afterwards, to alleviate the burthen of his office, divided the church into three greater provinces, according to the division of the world at that time, and appointed a person to preside in each who was dignified with the title of patriarch; that the European patriarch resided at Rome, the Asiatic at Antioch, and the African at Alexandria; that the bishops of each province, among whom there were various ranks, were to reverence the authority of their respective patriarchs; and that both bishops and patriarchs were to be passively subject to the supreme dominion of the Roman Pontiff. See Leo Allatius, De perpetua Consensu eccles. Orient et Occident. lib. I. cap. II.: and Morin, Exercitat. ecclesiast. lib. I. exer. I. This romantic account scarcely deserves a serious refutation. The second opinion concerning the government of the church, makes no mention of a supreme head or of patriarchs constituted by divine authority; but it sup-doubt, the apostles of Jesus Christ acted by divine command and guidance, then that form of the primitive churches, which was derived from the church of Jerusalem erected and organized by the apostles themselves, must be accounted divine; yet it will not follow that this form of the church was to be perpetual and unalterable. In those primitive times, each Christian church was composed of the people, the presiding officers, and the assistants or deacons.¹ These must be the component parts of every society. The highest authority was in the people, or whole body of Christians; for even the apostles themselves inculcated by their example, that nothing of any moment was to be done or determined on, but with the knowledge and consent of the brotherhood. Acts i. 15; vi. 3; xv. 4; xxi. 22. And this mode of proceeding, both prudence and necessity required in those early times.

¹ Ephes. iv. 11. See Eusebius, Hist. eccles. lib. iii. c. xxxvii.

² 1 Cor. xiv. 22, &c.

³ Writers of the lives of the apostles are enumerated by Sagittarius, Introductio ad historiam eccles. cap. 1. p. 2; and by Budeus, De Ecclesia Apostolica, p. 673, &c. [The English reader may consult Cave's Lives of the Apostles and Fathers of the first three centuries, fol. Lond. 1677, a diffuse and uncritical compilation; and Lardner's History of the Apostles and Evangelists, in vols. v. and vi. of his Works, Lond. 1838, marked with all the care and accuracy of that distinguished writer.—R.]

6. The assembled people therefore poses that the apostles divided the Roman empire into as many ecclesiastical provinces as there were secular or civil ones; that the metropolitan bishop, i. e. the prelate who resided in the capital city of each province, presided over the clergy of that province; and that the other bishops were subject to his authority. This opinion has been adopted by some of the most learned of the Romish church (Petrus de Marca, De Concordia sacerdot. et imperii, lib. vi. cap. i.; Morin, Exerc. eccles. lib. i. exerc. xviii.; and Pagi, Critica in Annal. Baronii, ad ann. 37, tom. i. p. 29), and has also been favoured by some of the most eminent British divines (Hammond, Diss. de Episcop.; Beveridge, Cod. Canon. vet. eccles. vindic., lib. ii. cap. v. tom. ii. Patr. Apostol.; and Ussher, De Origine episcop. et metropol. p. 20.) Some Protestant writers of note have endeavoured to prove that it is not supported by sufficient evidence (Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. livr. i. chap. viii.; Bæhmer, Annot. ad Petrum de Marca de Concordia sacerdot. et imperii, p. 143.) The third opinion is that of those who acknowledge that when the Christians began to multiply exceedingly, metropolitans, patriarchs, and archbishops were indeed created, but only by human appointment and authority; though they confess, at the same time, that it is consonant to the orders and intentions of Christ and his apostles, that there should be in every Christian church one person invested with the highest authority, and clothed with certain rights and privileges above the other doctors of that assembly. This opinion has been embraced by many English divines of the first rank in the learned world, and also by many in other countries and communions. The fourth and last opinion is that of the Presbyterians, who affirm that Christ's intention was, that the Christian doctors and ministers should all enjoy the same rank and authority, without any sort of pre-eminence or subordination, or any distinction of rights and privileges. The reader will find an ample account of these four different opinions with respect to church government in Mosheim's larger history of the first century.—Macl. [On the question whether a fixed form of government binding on all churches was instituted by Christ and his apostles, see, on the negative side, Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity, books i. ii. iii. and Stillington's Irenicum, Lond. 1662, p. 170, &c.; and for the affirmative, Rutherford's Divine Right of Church Government, &c. Lond. 1646; and the Jus divinum regiminis ecclesiastici of the London ministers. Lond. 1647.—R.

¹ Eusebius (Demonstratio Evang. lib. vii. cap. ii.) omits the deacons, unless he includes them among the rulers, for he divides a church into ἡγούμενους, πρεσβυτέρους, and κατηχούμενους, the rulers, the faithful, and catechumens.—Schl.

elected their own rulers and teachers, or received without constraint those recommended to them. They also by their suffrages rejected or confirmed the laws which were proposed by their rulers in their assemblies—they excluded profligate and lapsed brethren and restored them—they decided the controversies and disputes which arose—they heard and determined the causes of presbyters and deacons;—in a word, the people did everything which belongs to those in whom the supreme power of the community is vested. All these rights the people paid for, by supplying the funds necessary for the support of the teachers, the deacons, and the poor, the public exigencies and unforeseen emergencies. These funds consisted of voluntary contributions in every species of goods, made by individuals according to their ability, at their public meetings, and usually called oblations.

7. Among all members of the church, of whatever class or condition, there was the most perfect equality, which they manifested by their love-feasts, by their use of the appellatives brethren and sisters, and in other ways. Nor in this first century was there any distinction between the initiated and the candidates for initiation, for whoever professed to regard Jesus Christ as the Saviour of the world, and to depend on him alone for salvation, was immediately baptized and admitted into the church; but in process of time, as the churches became enlarged, it was deemed advisable and necessary to distribute the people into two classes, the faithful and the catechumens. The former were those who had been solemnly admitted into the church by baptism, and who might be present at all the parts of religious worship, and enjoy the right of voting in the meetings of the church. The latter, not having yet received baptism, were not admitted to the common prayers, nor to the sacred supper, nor to the meetings of the church.

8. The rulers of the church were denominated sometimes presbyters or elders, a designation borrowed from the Jews, and indicative rather of the wisdom than the age of the persons, and sometimes, also, bishops; for it is manifest that both terms are promiscuously used in the New Testament for one and the same class of persons. Acts xx. 17—28; Phil. i. 1; Tit. i. 5—7; 1 Tim. iii. 1. These were men of gravity, and distinguished for their reputation, influence, and sanctity. 1 Tim. iii. 1, &c.; Tit. i. 5, &c. From the words of St. Paul (1 Tim. v. 17), it has been inferred that some elders instructed the people, while others served the church in other ways. But this distinction between teaching and ruling elders, if it ever existed (which I will neither affirm nor deny), was certainly not of long continuance; for St. Paul makes it a qualification requisite in all presbyters or bishops, that they be able to teach and instruct others. 1 Tim. iii. 2, &c.¹

² On this subject see the authorities quoted and the extracts given by Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Davids. trans. vol. i. p. 88, note 1.—R.

9. As few among the first professors of Christianity were learned men, and competent to instruct the rude and uninformed on religious subjects, it became necessary that God should raise up in various churches extraordinary teachers, who could discourse to the people on religious subjects in their public assemblies, and address them in the name of God. Such were the persons who in the New Testament are called prophets. Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 28; xiv. 3—39; Ephes. iv. 11. The functions of these men are limited too much by those who make it to have been their sole business to expound the Old Testament Scriptures, and especially the prophetic books.² Whoever professed to be such a herald of God, was allowed publicly to address the people; but there were present among the hearers divinely constituted judges, who could not fail, by infallible criteria, to discriminate between true and false prophets. The order of prophets ceased when the necessity for them was past.

10. That the church had its public servants or deacons, from its first foundation, there can be no doubt, since no association can exist without its servants; and least of all such associations as the first Christian churches. Those young men who carried out the corpses of Ananias and his wife, were undoubtedly the deacons of the church at Jerusalem, who were attending on the apostles and executing their commands. Acts v. 6—10.³ These first deacons of that church were chosen from among the Jewish Christians born in Palestine; and as they appeared to act with partiality in the distribution of alms among the native and foreign Jewish Christians, seven other deacons were chosen by order of the apostles, out of that part of the church at Jerusalem which was composed of strangers or Jews of foreign birth. Acts vi. 1, &c. Six of these new deacons were foreign Jews as appears from their names; the other one was from among the prose-lytes; for there was a number of proselytes among the first Christians of Jerusalem, and it was suitable that they should be attended to as well as the foreign Jews. The example of the church of Jerusalem being followed by all the other churches, in obedience to the injunctions of the apostles, they likewise appointed deacons. 1 Tim. iii. 8, 9. There were also in many churches, and especially in those of Asia, female public servants, or deaconesses, who were respectable matrons or widows, appointed to take care of the poor and to perform other offices.⁴

νεώτεροι and νεανίσκοι young men, are not always indicative of age, but often, both among the Greeks and Latins, indicate a function or office; for the same change is made in these words as in the word presbyter, which, every one knows, is indicative, sometimes of age, and sometimes merely of office. As, therefore, the word presbyter often denotes the rulers or head men of a society or association, without any regard to their age, so also the terms young men and the younger not unfrequently denote the servants, or those that stand in waiting; because, ordinarily, men in the vigour of life perform this office. Nor is this use of the word foreign from the New Testament. The Saviour himself seems to use the word νεώτερος in this sense, Luke xxii. 26, ὁ μεῖζον ἐν ὑμῖν, νεώτερος ὡς ὁ νεώτερος. The word μεῖζον he himself explains by ἡγούμενος, so that it is equivalent to ruler or presbyter; and instead of νεώτερος he in the next clause uses ὁ διακόνος, which places our interpretation beyond all controversy. So that μεῖζον and νεώτερος are not here indicative of certain ages, but of certain offices; and the precept of Christ amounts to this: "Let not him that performs the office of a presbyter or elder among you, think himself superior to the public servants or deacons."—Still more evident is the passage, 1 Peter v. 5, ὡμοῖον νεώτεροι ὑποτάγητε πρεσβυτέροις. It is manifest from what goes before that presbyter here is indicative of rank or office, denoting teacher or ruler in the church; therefore, its counterpart νεώτερος, has the same import, and does not denote persons young in years, but the servants, or deacons of the church. Peter, after solemnly exhorting the presbyters not to abuse the power committed to them, turns to the deacons and says: "And likewise ye younger, i. e. ye deacons, despise not the orders of the presbyters, but perform cheerfully whatever they require of you."—In this same sense the term is used by Luke, Acts v. 6—10, where νεώτεροι or νεανίσκοι are the deacons of the church at Jerusalem, the very persons whom, a little after, the Hellenists accused before the apostles of not distributing properly the contributions for the poor. I might confirm this sense of the term young men, by numerous citations from Greek and Latin writers, both sacred and profane; but this is not the place for such demonstrations.

⁴ For an account of the deacons and deaconesses of the ancient churches, see Ziegler, De Diaconis et diaconissis. Witteb. 1678, 4to; Barnage, Annales Polit. eccles. ad. ann. 35, tom. i. p. 453; Bingham, Origines Ecclesiast. book ii. chap. xx. [and Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. ante C. M. p. 118, &c. where he defends, at great length, his somewhat peculiar views respecting the seven deacons of the church at Jerusalem.—Mur.]

¹ See, concerning the word presbyter, Vitringa, De Synagoga veteri, lib. iii. par. i. cap. i. p. 609; and Carpov, Exercit. in epist. ad Hebræos, ex Philone, p. 499. On the thing itself, or rather the persons designated by this title, see Biddens, Ecclesia Apostol. cap. vi. p. 719, and Pfaff, De Originibus juris eccles. p. 49.

² See Mosheim, Diss. de illis, qui propheta vocantur in N. T. (in the 2nd vol. of his Diss. ad Hist. Eccl. pertinentes, p. 125, &c.; also, Witsius, Miscell. Sacra, tom. i. l. Koppe, Exercit. lib. iii. in Epistolam ad Ephes.; and Schleusner, Lexicon in N. Test. art. προφήτης, No. 10.—Mur.

³ Those who may be surprised that I should consider the young men who interred the bodies of Ananias and Sapphira, to be the deacons of the church at Jerusalem, are desired to consider that the words

11. In this manner Christians managed ecclesiastical affairs so long as their congregations were small or not very numerous. Three or four presbyters, men of gravity and holiness, placed over those little societies, could easily proceed with harmony, and needed no head or president. But when the churches became larger, and the number of presbyters and deacons, as well as the amount of duties to be performed, was increased, it became necessary that the council of presbyters should have a president, a man of distinguished gravity and prudence, who should distribute among his colleagues their several tasks, and be, as it were, the central point of the whole society. He was at first denominated the angel (Rev. ch. ii. and iii.),¹ but afterwards the bishop, a Greek title indicative of his principal business. It would seem that the Church of Jerusalem, when grown very numerous, after the dispersion of the apostles among foreign nations, was the first to elect such a president, and that other churches in process of time followed the example.²

12. But whoever supposes that the bishops of the first and golden age of the church corresponded with the bishops of the following centuries, must blend and confound characters which are very different. For, in this century and the next, a bishop had charge of a single church, which might ordinarily be contained in a private house; nor was he its lord, but was in reality its minister or servant; he instructed the people, conducted all parts of public worship, and attended on the sick and the necessitous in person; and what he was unable thus to perform, he committed to the care of the presbyters, but without power to determine or sanction anything except by the votes of the presbyters and people.³ The emoluments of this singularly laborious and perilous office were very small. For the churches had no revenues except the voluntary contributions of the people or the oblations, which, moderate as they doubtless were, were divided among the bishop, the presbyters, the deacons, and the poor of the church.

13. It was not long, however, before the extent of episcopal jurisdiction and power was enlarged. For the bishops who lived in the cities, either by their own labours or by those of their presbyters, gathered new churches in the neighbouring villages and hamlets; and these churches continuing under the protection and care of the bishops by whose preaching or advice they received Christianity, ecclesiastical provinces were gradually formed, which the Greeks afterwards denominated dioceses. The persons to whom the city bishops committed the government and instruction of these village and rural churches, were called chorepiscopi, τῆς χώρας ἐπίσκοποι, or bishops of the suburbs and rural districts. They were an intermediate class between the bishops and the presbyters, being inferior to the former and superior to the latter.⁴

14. All the Churches in those primitive times were independent bodies, none of them subject to the jurisdiction of any other. For though the Churches which were founded by the apostles themselves frequently had the honour shown them to be consulted in difficult and doubtful cases, yet they had no judicial authority, no control, no power of giving laws. On the contrary, it is clear as the noon-day, that all Christian churches had equal rights, and were in all respects on a footing of equality. Nor does there appear in this first century any vestige of that consociation of the Churches of the same province, which gave rise to councils and to metropolitans. Rather, as is manifest, it was not till the second century that the custom of holding ecclesiastical councils began, first in Greece, and thence extended into other provinces.⁵

¹ The title of angel occurs only in the Revelation, a highly poetic book. It was not probably the common title of the presiding presbyter, and certainly was not an older one than that of bishop, which is so often used by St. Paul in his Epistles, written long before the Apocalypse.—Mur.

² Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 134, has a long note, in which he argues from the traditional accounts of a longer catalogue of bishops in the Church of Jerusalem, than in any other church, during the first ages, that the Church of Jerusalem must be supposed to have had bishops earlier than any other.—Mur.

³ All that is here stated may be clearly proved from the records of the first centuries, and has been proved by Bingham, Origines Ecclesiast.; Beveridge, Codes Canon. primit. ecclesie, and others. Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 136.—Mur.

⁴ Learned men, who have written largely on the subject, have debated whether the chorepiscopi ranked with bishops, or with presbyters. See Morin, De sacris eccles. ordinat. par. i. exerc. iv.; Blondel, De Episc. et Presbyt. sec. iii.; Beveridge, Pandect. Canon. tom. ii. p. 176; Ziegler, De Episcopis. lib. i. cap. 13, p. 105, &c.; Peter de Marca, De Concordia sacerdot. et imperii, lib. ii. cap. 13, 14; Bœhmer, Adnot. ad Petrum de Marca, pages 62, 63; Thomassin, Disciplina eccles. vet. et nova, par. i. lib. ii. cap. i. p. 215. But they did not belong entirely to either of those orders. Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 137.—Mur.

⁵ It is commonly said, that the meeting of the church in Jerusalem, which is described Acts xv. was the first Christian council. But this is a perversion of the import of the term council; for that meeting was a conference of only a single church, called together for deliberation; and if such meetings may be called ecclesiastical councils, a multitude of them were held in those primitive times. An ecclesiastical council is a meeting of delegates from a number of confederate churches [This is the view of Archbishop Whately, in his Kingdom of Christ. Lond. 1842, p. 105. It is also that of the Independents. The Presbyterian view, as embraced

15. Among the Christian teachers and ecclesiastical writers, the first rank is most clearly due to the apostles themselves, and to certain of their disciples whom God had moved to write histories of the transactions of Christ and his apostles. The writings of these men are collected into one volume, and are in the hands of all who profess to be Christians. In regard to the history of these sacred books,¹ and the arguments by which their divine authority and their genuineness are evinced,² those authors are to be consulted who have written professedly on these subjects.

16. As to the time when, and the persons by whom, the books of the New Testament were collected into one volume, there are various opinions, or rather conjectures, of the learned; for the subject is attended with great and almost inexplicable difficulties to us of these latter times.³ It must suffice to know, that before the middle of the second century, most of the books composing the New Testament were in every Christian Church throughout the known world, and were read and regarded as the divine rule of faith and practice. And hence it may be concluded, that it was while some of the apostles were still living, and certainly while their disciples and immediate successors were everywhere to be met with, that these books were separated and distinguished from all human compositions.⁴ That the four Gospels were combined during the life-time of the apostle John, and that the first three Gospels received the approbation of this inspired man, we learn expressly from the testimony of Eusebius.⁵ And why may we not suppose that the other books of the New Testament were collected into one body at the same time?

17. There were various causes requiring this to be done at an early period, and particularly this, that, not long after the Saviour's ascension, various histories of his life and doctrines full of impositions and fables, were composed by persons of no bad intentions perhaps, but who were superstitious, simple, and addicted to pious frauds; and afterwards various spurious writings were palmed upon the world, inscribed with the names of the holy apostles.⁶ These worthless productions would have wrought great confusion, and would have rendered both the history and the religion of Christ uncertain, had not the rulers of churches seasonably interposed, and caused the books which were truly divine and which came from apostolic hands, to be speedily separated from that mass of trash into a volume by themselves.

⁶ Such as remain of these spurious works have been carefully collected by Fabricius, Codex Apocryphus N. T. 2 vols. 12mo. Hamb. second ed. 1719. Many learned remarks on them occur in Beausobre, Histoire critique des dogmes de Manichéisme, livr. ii. p. 337, &c. [No one of all the books contained in the Codex Apocryphus N. T. of Fabricius speaks disrespectfully of Christ, of his religion, his apostles and followers, or of the canonical books of the N. T. They were evidently composed with a design to subvert the cause of Christianity. The following account of the contents of the Codex Apocryphus N. T. may not be unacceptable:—On opening the first volume, we meet with, 1. "The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary," Latin. 2. "The Previous Gospel (Prot-evangelium), ascribed to James the Just, the brother of our Lord," Gr. and Lat. 3. "The Gospel of the Infancy of Christ, ascribed to Thomas the Apostle," Gr. and Lat. 4. "The Gospel of the Infancy, translated from the Arabic, by Henry Sikes," Lat. It is the aim of all these to supply deficiencies in the beginning of the true Gospels, by acquainting us more fully with the history of the Virgin Mary, Joseph, Elizabeth, &c. and with the birth, infancy, and childhood of Christ. Next follow, 5. "The Gospel of Nicodemus," or, as it is sometimes called, "The Acts of Pilate," relating to the crucifixion and resurrection of Christ, Latin. 6. Three "Epistles of Pilate to Tiberius the Emperor," giving an account of the condemnation, death, and resurrection of Christ, Latin. 7. "The Epistle of Lentulus to the Roman senate," describing the person and manners of Christ, Latin. The last three (Nos. 5, 6, 7) were intended to be valuable appendages to the true Gospels, and to contain irrefragable proofs that Jesus was the Messiah, and clothed with divine authority. Then follow the writings ascribed to Christ himself; viz. his correspondence with Abgarus, King of Edessa, which is to be found in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xiii. and in various modern works. Fabricius next gives a catalogue of about forty apocryphal Gospels, or of all the spurious Gospels of which the slightest notice can be found in antiquity. These are all, of course, now lost, except the few which are contained in the previous list. Vol. i. part ii. begins with "The Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, or the history of their conflicts, ascribed to Abdias, the first Bishop of Babylon," Latin. This history summarily recounts what the canonical books relate of each of the twelve apostles, and then traces them severally through their various travels and labours, till their death or martyrdom. Then follows a catalogue of all the ancient biographies of individual apostles and apostolic men, which Fabricius could hear of; in all, thirty-six in number. Most of those which have been published are to be met with in Martyrologies and in the Acta Sanctorum. Fabricius next by many, may be seen most succinctly stated by Rutherford, in his Due right of Presbyteries. Lond. 1614, pages 365—377—R.

¹ See, on this subject, Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca, lib. iv. cap. v. pages 122—227; [and Jones, Method of settling the canonical authority of the N. T. 3 vols. 8vo.; and the modern Introductions to the books of the N. T. in English, by Horne, and Michaëlis, ed. Marsh; and in German, by Haenlin, Krug, Bertholdt, Eichhorn, &c.—Mur.]

² The early writers in defence of the divine authority of the N. T. are enumerated by Fabricius, Delectus argumentorum et syllabus scriptor. pro verit. relig. Christianæ, cap. xxvi. p. 502. [On the subject itself, the modern writers are numerous, and generally known. Lardner and Paley still hold the first rank among the English.—Mur.]

³ See Ens, Biblioth. sacra, seu diatriba de libror. N. T. canon. Amster. 1710, 8vo.; and Mills, Prolegomen. ad N. T. sec. i. p. 23, &c. [On this "inexhaustible question," see the account given by Bishop Thirlwall, in the preface to his translation of Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of Luke, Lond. 1825, of which account Milman says, "It would be difficult to point out a clearer and more satisfactory exposition of any controversy."—Hist. of Christ. chap. i. p. 144.—R.]

⁴ See Frick, De Cura veteris ecclesiæ circa canon. cap. iii. p. 86, &c.

⁵ Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxiv.

18. Next after the apostles, Clement, the Bishop of Rome, obtained very high reputation as one of the writers of this century. The accounts we have at this day of his life, actions, and death, are for the most part uncertain.¹ There are still extant two epistles to the Corinthians, bearing his name and written in Greek: of these, it is generally supposed that the first is genuine, and that the second is falsely palmed upon the holy man by some deceiver.² Yet even the first epistle seems to have been corrupted by some indiscreet person, who was sorry to see so little erudition and genius in a production of so great a man.³

19. The other works which bear the name of Clement, namely, the apostolic Canons, the apostolic Constitutions, the Recognitions of Clement, and the Clementina,⁴ were fraudulently ascribed to this eminent father, by some deceiver, for the purpose of procuring them greater authority. This all now concede. The apostolic Canons are LXXXV ecclesiastical Laws, and exhibit the principles of discipline received in the Greek and oriental churches, in the second and third centuries. The VIII Books of apostolical Constitutions, are the work of some austere and melancholy author, who designed to reform the worship and discipline of the church, which he thought were fallen from their original purity and sanctity, and who did not hesitate to prefix the names of the apostles to his regulations, in order to give them currency.⁵ The Recognitions of Clement, which differ but little from the Clementina, are ingenious fables, composed by gives us apocryphal Epistles, ascribed to the Virgin Mary, to Paul, and to Peter. Mary's letters are but three, and those very short. One is addressed to St. Ignatius, in nine lines; another, to the people of Marcellus, in eleven lines; and the third, to the people of Florence, in four lines. To St. Paul is attributed a short Epistle to the Laodiceans, Gr. and Lat. It is a tolerable compilation from his genuine epistles. Then follows a courteous but rapid correspondence in Latin, said to have passed between St. Paul and Seneca, the Roman philosopher. It comprises fourteen short letters, full of compliments and of very little else. Paul's third Epistle to the Corinthians has not had the honour to be published. There is one Epistle of the apostle Peter, addressed to the apostle James, still extant, in the Clementina, or spurious works of Clemens Romanus. Of spurious Revelations, Fabricius enumerates twelve; most of which are either lost or have not been judged worth publishing. The second volume of the Codex opens with the ancient liturgies, bearing the names of the apostles and evangelists. They are six; namely, those which bear the names of the Apostles James, Peter, John, Matthew, and Luke; together with a short prayer ascribed to John. These liturgies, doubtless, are quite ancient. To these are subjoined nine canons or ecclesiastical laws, said to have been adopted in a council of the apostles held at Antioch; and finally, the Apostles' Creed, which, many of the ancients supposed, was formed by the apostles themselves. The appendix to the Codex gleans up some fragments and additional notices of the pieces before mentioned, and then closes with the Shepherd of Hermas, accompanied with notes.—Mur. [Most of these spurious pieces were translated, and published in studied imitation of the books of the New Testament by the late W. Hone, with the view of discrediting the divine authority of the sacred volume; but he lived to regret this intended injury, and suppressed the book. It is, notwithstanding, an interesting work to the student. See Hone's Apocryphal New Testament. London, 1820, 8vo.—R.

¹ Subsequent to Tillemont [Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise, tome II. part I. p. 279], Cotelier [Patres Apostol.], and Grabe [Spicilg. Patrum, sec. I. p. 264, &c.], Philip Rondininus has collected all that is known of this great man, in the first of his two books, De S. Clemente, papa et martyre, ejusque Basilica in urbe Roma. Rome, 1706, 4to. [See also Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. I. pages 14—20, 2d ed. Clemens was, perhaps, the person mentioned by Paul, Philip, iv. 3. He was one of the most distinguished Roman Christians, became Bishop of Rome towards the close of the century, and is said to have lived till the third year of Trajan's reign, or A.D. 100.—Mur.

² The editions of Clement's epistles to the Corinthians, are mentioned by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, lib. iv. cap. v. p. 175, &c. to which must be added, the edition of Wotton, Cantab. 1718, 8vo, which is preferable to the preceding editions in many respects. [The English reader may find them both, together with some account of this author, in Archbishop Wake's Genuine epistles of the apostolical Fathers, translated, &c. An ample account of them is given by Lardner, Credibility of the Gospel History, part II. vol. I. p. 283, ed. Lond. 1835.—Mur.] A more accurate translation of the first, and indeed only genuine, epistle may be seen in Chevallier's Translation of the Epistles of Clement, Polyarp, and Ignatius, &c. London, 1833.—R.

³ See Cotelier, Patres Apostolici, tom. I. pages 133, 131, and Bernhard, Adnotationum ad Clementem, in the last edition of the Patres Apostol. by Le Clerc. These annotations Wotton has in vain attempted to confute, in his notes on the epistle of Clement. [Besides the two epistles to the Corinthians, there are extant, in Syriac, two other epistles, ascribed to Clement, entitled, De Virginitate, seu ad Virgines. They were first brought to Europe by Sir James Porter, British ambassador at Constantinople; and were published with a Latin translation accompanying the Syriac text, by Wetstein, at the end of the 2d vol. of his very learned Greek N. T. Leyden, 1752. Lardner assailed their genuineness, in a Diss. of sixty pages, 8vo. London, 1753, and Veyema followed, in three printed letters, 1754. Wetstein replied to the former; but, dying in March, 1754, he left the controversy with the latter to Galand, who prosecuted it in his Bibliotheca vet. Patrum, Dissert. II. cap. III.; also, in Spronger's Thesaurus rei Patrist. tom. I. p. 60, &c. These epistles are not mentioned by any writer till near the end of the fourth century. They were, probably, composed in the oriental church at the close of the second, or in the third, century; and for the double purpose of recommending celibacy and reprehending the abuses of such a life. See Neander's Allgem. Geschichte, vol. I. part III. p. 1103, &c.—Mur.

⁴ For the history and various editions of these works, see Ittig, Diss. de Patribus Apostol. prefixed to his Bibliotheca patrum Apostol. and his Diss. de Pseudopygraphis Apostol. annexed to his Appendix ad librum de Haeresiarchis ævi Apostol. also, Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, lib. v. cap. I. p. 31, &c.; and lib. vi. cap. I. p. 4, &c.

⁵ The various opinions of the learned respecting the Apostolic Canons and Constitutions, are collected by Buddeus, Inagoge in Theologiam, par. II. cap. v. p. 746. [See Bishop Beveridge, Notes on these Canons, and his Codex Canonum ecclæ. prim. Lond. 1678, 4to. The Canons themselves make a part of the Corpus Juris Canonici, and are also inserted in Binus's and other large collections of the Councils. They are valuable documents respecting the order and discipline of the church; about the third century. The Apostolic Constitutions seem to have undergone changes since their first formation, and probably by Arian hands in the fourth century. They are voluminous and minute regulations respecting ecclesiastical discipline and worship. They are of considerable use in determining various points of practice in the church, during the third, fourth, and fifth centuries.—Mur. [They may be found in the second volume of Whiston's Primitive Christianity in Greek, with an English translation in parallel columns.—R.

some Alexandrine Jewish Christian and philosopher of the third century, to meet the attacks of the Jews, Gnostics, and philosophers upon the Christian religion, in a new manner. A careful perusal of them will assist a person much in gaining a knowledge of the state of the ancient Christian church.¹

20. The Apostolic Fathers, as they are called, are those Christian writers who were conversant either with the apostles themselves, or with their immediate disciples. Among these the next after Clement was Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, a disciple and companion of the apostles. He suffered martyrdom under Trajan, being exposed to wild beasts in the theatre at Rome². There are extant several epistles bearing his name, and concerning which the learned have had long and sharp contests. The seven, written while he was on his way to Rome, as published A.D. 1646, by Is. Vossius, from a Florentine MS. are, by most writers, accounted genuine; but the others they reject as forged. To this opinion I cheerfully accede; and yet I must acknowledge that the genuineness of the Epistle to Polycarp, on account of its difference of style, appears to me very dubious; and indeed the whole subject of the Ignatian epistles in general, is involved in much obscurity and perplexity.³

¹ See Moshelm's Diss. de turbata per recentiores Platonici ecclesie, in the first vol. of his Disert. ad historiam eccl. pertinentes, sec. 34, p. 174, &c. [The Apostolic Canons and Constitutions were ascribed to Clement as the collector and publisher only. The Recognitions, Clementina, &c. are ascribed to him as the author. The writings belonging to this latter class are three different works on the same subject, and written after the same general plan. They all, doubtless, had one and the same author, who re-wrote his own work, for the sake of giving it a better form. The substance of them all is Clement's history of his own dissatisfaction with paganism; his first and slight knowledge of Christianity, which induced him to journey from Rome to Palestine; there he met with Peter, and for some time resided and travelled with him, heard his public discourses, and witnessed his combats, particularly with Simon Magus; and in private conversations with the apostles, everything pertaining not only to Christianity, but to cosmogony, physics, pneumatology, &c. was fully explained to him. The three works often relate precisely the same things, and in the same words; but they not unfrequently differ in the fulness of the details and in many of the minor points both of doctrine and of fact. The first is entitled Sti Clementis Romani Recognitiones. The original is lost, so that we have only the Latin translation of Rufinus. The second is the Clementina (ἡ Κλημεντῖνα), first published, Greek and Latin, by Cotelier. It commences with an epistle of Peter, and another of Clement, addressed to the apostle James. The body of the work, instead of being divided into books and chapters, like the Recognitions, is thrown into nineteen discourses or homilies (ῥητοὶ), as delivered by Peter, but committed to writing by Clement. The third is the Clementine Epitome, or abridged account of the acts, travels, and discourses of Peter, together with the epistle of Clement to James, Greek and Latin. This is, as its title implies, a mere abridgment of the two preceding works.—Mur.

² See Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise, tome II. part II. pages 42—80.

³ In regard to these epistles, consult Fabricius, Bib-

21. Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, suffered martyrdom at an extreme age, in the middle of the second century. The epistle addressed to the Philippians, which is ascribed to him, is by some accounted genuine, and by others spurious; which of these

lioth. Græca, lib. v. cap. i. pages 38—47. [Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. iii. 36, makes very honourable mention of Ignatius and his epistles; and describes his conduct while on his way to Rome, the place of his martyrdom. The account of his martyrdom, which is printed along with his epistles, gives a still fuller account of this eminent father. It is clear that he suffered death in the reign of Trajan; but whether A.D. 107, or 116, is uncertain. Rome was the place of his martyrdom, and wild beasts his executioners. On his way from Antioch, he was enraptured with his prospect of dying a martyr, and wrote probably all his epistles. Eusebius says: "He confirmed the churches in every city through which he passed, by discourses and exhortations, warning them most especially to take heed of the heresies which then first sprung up and increased." From Smyrna (according to Eusebius), he wrote four of his epistles; namely, to the churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles and Rome. The last of these was to entreat the Roman Christians not to interpose and prevent his martyrdom. From Troas he wrote three other epistles; namely, to the Churches of Philadelphia and of Smyrna, and to his friend Polycarp. Of these seven epistles, there are duplicate copies still extant; that is, copies of a larger and of a smaller size. The latter are those published by Vossius, which many suppose to be genuine. Besides these, there are extant five other Greek epistles, and as many more in Latin, which are now universally rejected; namely, ad Mariam Cassibollitam, ad Tarsenses, ad Antiochenos, ad Hieronem Antiochenum diaconem, ad Philippenses; also, one in Latin, from the Virgin Mary to Ignatius, and his reply; two from Ignatius to St. John; and one of Maria Cassibolla to Ignatius. It is the singular fortune of the seven first epistles of Ignatius, to have become the subject of sectarian controversy among Protestants. In these epistles, the dignity and authority of bishops are exalted higher than in any other writings of this age. Hence, the strenuous advocates for the apostolic origin of episcopacy, prize and defend these epistles with no ordinary interest, while the Reformed divines, and especially those of Holland, Germany, France, and Switzerland, assail them with equal ardour. The most prominent champions are Bishop Pearson, in his Vindicia epistolæ Ignatii, Cambridge, 1672, 4to; and Dailly, De Scriptis quæ sub Dionysii Areop. et Ignatii Antioch. nominibus circumferuntur. Geneva, 1666, 4to. But each of these is supported by a host of able polemics. Moderate men of various sects are disposed to admit the genuineness of the epistles in their shorter form; but to regard them as interpolated and altered. An English translation of them and of the martyrdom of Ignatius, may be seen in Archbishop Wake's Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers.—Mur. [A preferable translation is given by Chevallier, ubi supra; and a translation of both the larger and shorter copies may be found in Whiston's Primitive Christianity. Lond. 1711, vol. I. pages 102—391. Whiston was a strenuous supporter of the genuineness of these larger copies, now almost universally repudiated. Additional interest has been very recently imparted to this long-protracted controversy by the discovery, in a monastery in the Egyptian desert of Nitria, of a Syriac version, of undoubted antiquity, of three of these epistles of Ignatius; namely, those to Polycarp, the Ephesians, and the Romans. These have been translated and very carefully edited by the Rev. W. Cureton of the British Museum, together with extracts in Syriac from these and others of the Ignatian epistles, and a Syriac version of his martyrdom. Lond. 1845, 8vo. The copies thus unexpectedly brought to light are much shorter than the short Greek copies previously extant; and among the many passages of the Greek omitted in the Syriac, it is remarkable that those which magnify the office and authority of the bishop, and those which give additional force to the doctrine of the Deity of Christ, are the most numerous. See Mr. Cureton's Preface, p. 16, &c.—R.

are in the right, it is difficult to determine. The Epistle of Barnabas, as it is called, was, in my judgment, the production of some Jewish Christian who lived in this century, who had no bad intentions, but possessed little genius and was infected with the fabulous opinions of the Jews. He was clearly a different person from Barnabas, the companion of St. Paul.² The book entitled the Shepherd of Hermas (so called because an angel, in the form and habit of a shepherd, is the leading character in the drama) was composed in the second century by Hermas, the brother of Pius, the Roman bishop.³ The writer, if he was indeed sane, deemed it proper to forge dialogues held with God and angels, in order to insinuate what he regarded as salutary truths more effectually into the minds of his readers. But his celestial spirits talk more insipidly than our scavengers and porters.⁴

22. All these writers of this first age of the church possessed little learning, genius, or eloquence; but, in their simple and unpolished manner, they express elevated piety.⁵ And this is honourable, rather than reproachful, to the Christian cause. For, that a large part of the human race should have been converted to Christ by illiterate and untalented men, shows that the propagation of Christianity must be ascribed, not to human abilities and eloquence, but to a Divine power.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINES AND RELIGION.

1. THE whole of the Christian religion is comprehended in two parts: the one of which teaches what we are to believe in regard to religious subjects, and the other how we ought to live. The former is, by the apostles, denominated the mystery or the truth; and the latter, piety or godliness. 1 Tim. iii. 9; vi. 3. Tit. i. 1. The rule and standard of both are, those books which God dictated to certain individuals, either before or after the birth of Christ. These books it has long been the custom to denominate the Old and the New Testaments.

2. Provision, therefore, was early made, both by the apostles and their disciples, that these books should be in the hands of all Christians, that they should be publicly read in their assemblies, and be applied both to enlighten their minds with truth and to advance them in piety. Those who expounded the Scriptures studied simplicity and plainness. Yet it is not to be denied that, even in this century, the perverse Jewish custom of obscuring the plain language of Scripture by forced and frigid allegories, and of diverting words from their natural and proper meaning, in order to extort from them some recondite sense, found some admirers and imitators among Christians. Besides others, Barnabas,

1 Concerning Polyarp and his epistle, see Tillamout, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise, tome ii. part ii. p. 287; and Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. lib. v. cap. i. p. 47. [Also, Cave's Life of Polyarp, in his Apostolici; or, Lives of the Primitive Fathers. Lond. 1677, folio. The epistle of Polyarp (the genuineness of which, if not certain, is highly probable), and the epistle of the Church of Smyrna concerning the martyrdom of Polyarp (which none now call in question), are given in English, in Archbishop Wake's Genuine Epistles, &c.—Mur. [and also by Chevalier ubi supra, and by Clementson, Epistles of Ignatius and Polyarp. Bright. 1827, 8vo.—R.]

2 Concerning Barnabas, see Tillamout, Mémoires, &c. tome i. part iii. p. 1043; Ittig, Select. hist. ecclæ. cap. sec. i. cap. i. sec. 14, p. 20; and Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. lib. iv. cap. v. sec. 14, p. 173; and lib. v. cap. i. sec. iv. and various others. [This ancient monument of the Christian Church, is likewise translated by Archbishop Wake, Genuine Epistles, &c.—Mur.]

3 This is now manifest from the very ancient Fragment of a Treatise on the Canon of the Holy Scriptures, published a few years ago by Muratori (from an ancient MS. found at Milan), in his Antiq. Italicar. medii ævi, tom. iii. diss. xliii. p. 853, &c. [But the genuineness of this treatise itself is now very much questioned by the learned; so that the true author of the Shepherd of Hermas is still unknown.—Mur.]

4 For the best edition of Hermas, we are indebted to Fabricius, who subjoined it to the third vol. of his Codæ Apocryph. N. T. He also treats of this writer, in his Bib. Græcæ, lib. v. cap. ix. sec. 9, p. 7. See also Ittig, De Patribus Apostolicis, sec. 55, p. 184, &c.; [and in his Select. histor. ecclæ. capta, sec. i. pag. 55, 155, 179. The Shepherd of Hermas was translated by Archbishop Wake, Genuine Epistles, &c. and though wild and fanciful, yet, from the pious spirit which it breathes, and the insight it gives us into the speculations of the early Christians, it is not a useless book.—Mur. [Archbishop Wake's translation of the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas is also given in Hone's Apocryphal New Test.—R.]

5 The writers abovenamed are denominated the Apostolic Fathers; and they are often published together. The best editions are by Coteller. Paris, 1672, re-edited by Le Clerc. Antw. 1698; and again, Amsterd. 1724, 2 vols. fol. with numerous notes by both the editors and others. [This last and best edition, Gr. and Lat. contains all that has been ascribed to the Apostolic Fathers, whether truly or falsely. The value of the genuine works of these fathers is, to learned theology, very small; but, as affording us acquaintance with the true spirit, and sentiments, and reasonings of Christians in the very first age after the apostles, they are of inestimable value.—Mur. [Many critics are disposed to place among these remains of the apostolic age, the anonymous Letter to Diognetus, formerly ascribed to Justin Martyr, and contained among his works. Some even consider it as having been written before the destruction of Jerusalem, and therefore as among the very earliest uninspired productions of the first century. See a satisfactory dissertation on this point in Semisch's Justin Martyr, vol. i. p. 193, &c. being Ryland's translation, in vol. xii. of the Edin. Bib. Cab. The Greek epistle itself may be found in the works of Justin Martyr; and in Heftle, Patrum Apostolicorum opera. Tub. 1839, 8vo, a very cheap and convenient collection of these works, which may be had either with or without a Latin translation. An excellent critical edition of the Apostolical Fathers, with Notes, Indices, &c. was published at Oxford, in Greek and Latin, in 2 vols. 8vo, by Dr. Jacobson, of which a second edition appeared in 1840. This collection, however, does not include the Letter to Diognetus.—R.] whose epistle is still extant, is proof of this.

3. The manner of teaching religious truths was perfectly simple, and remote from all the rules of the philosophers, and all the precepts of human art. This is manifest, not only from the epistles of the apostles, but from all the monuments of this century which have come down to us. Nor did any apostle, or any one of their immediate disciples, collect and arrange the principal doctrines of Christianity in a scientific or regular system. The circumstances of the times did not require this; and the followers of Christ were more solicitous to exhibit the religion they had embraced by their tempers and their conduct, than to explain its principles scientifically, and arrange them according to the precepts of art.

4. There is indeed extant a brief summary of Christian doctrines, which is called the Apostles' Creed, and which, from the fourth century onward, was attributed to Christ's ambassadors themselves. But at this day, all who have any knowledge of antiquity, confess unanimously that this opinion is a mistake, and has no foundation.¹ Those judge far more wisely and rationally, who think that this creed arose from small beginnings, and was gradually enlarged, as occasions required, in order to exclude new errors from the church.²

5. At the first promulgation of the gospel, all who professed firmly to believe that Jesus was the only redeemer of mankind, and who promised to lead a holy life conformably to the religion he taught, were received immediately among the disciples of Christ; nor did a more full instruction in the principles of Christianity precede their baptism, but followed it. But afterwards, when churches were everywhere established and organized, for very just reasons this custom was changed; and none were admitted to the sacred font unless previously well instructed in the primary truths of religion, and affording indubitable evidence of a sincere and holy character. Hence arose the distinction between catechumens, or such as were in a course of instruction and discipline under the care of certain persons, and the faithful who were admitted to all the mysteries, having been initiated and consecrated by baptism.³

6. The instruction given to the catechumens was different, according to their genius and capacity. For those of feeble minds were instructed only in the more general and fundamental principles of religion, while those who appeared capable of comprehending all Christian knowledge, were instructed in everything which could perfect and fortify a Christian, according to the views of that age. The business of instructing those of superior capacity and genius was committed to men of gravity and erudition in the larger churches. Hence, the ancient doctors generally divide their flocks into two classes of persons, the one comprising such as received solid and thorough instruction, the other embracing the more ignorant. Nor do they conceal the fact, that different modes of teaching were adopted in reference to these two classes.⁴

7. There is no doubt, that the children of Christians were carefully trained up from their infancy, and were early put to reading the sacred books and learning the principles of religion. For this purpose, schools were erected everywhere, from the beginning. From these schools for children, we must distinguish those seminaries of the early Christians erected extensively in the larger cities, at which adults, and especially such as aspired to be public

¹ See Budeus, Isagoge ad Theologium, lib. ii. cap. ii. sec. 2. p. 441; and Walch, Introduct. in libros symbolicos, lib. i. cap. ii. p. 87, &c.

² This is shown, with no less learning than ingenuity, by Lord Chancellor King, in his History of the Apostles' Creed, which Olesarius translated into Latin, and published. Lips. 1704, 8vo. But those who read this book should be apprised, that the noble author often gives us conjectures instead of arguments, and that his conjectures do not always deserve to be implicitly received. [Although the Apostles' Creed was not composed in a council of apostles, as was supposed in the days of Rufinus (Ruf. De Symbolo, subjoined to Cyprian's Opera), yet it appears to have been the general creed of the Christian church, from, at least, the close of the second century down to the reformation. Nor did it undergo any very great or material change, as appears from comparing the formula of faith given by Irenæus, A.D. 175 (Adv. Hæc. i. 10. and iii. 4.), and by Tertullian, A.D. 192 (De Virgin. veland. cap. i.—contra Præscam, cap. ii.—Præscript. adv. Hæret. cap. xiii.), with the forms of the creed, in all subsequent writers down to the present time. See these forms, collected by Walch, in his Bibliotheca symbolica vetus. Lemgov, 1770, 8vo. Besides those mentioned by Mosheim, the principal writers on this creed are Cyril (Catechesis), Rufinus (De Symbolo), and Augustine, (Sermo I. ad Catech. Opera, v. 6, p. 399, ed. Bened.), Vossius (De Tribus Symbolis, Opp. tom. vi. p. 507, &c.), Abp. Ussher (De Rom. Eccles. antiq. Fidei Symbolis), Bishop Pearson (on the Creed), Suicer, (Theaur. Eccles. voce Σύμβολον), and Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book x.—Mur.

³ See Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book iii. chap. iv. and Pfanner, De Catechuminis veterum, Weimar, 1688. 12mo.—Mur.

⁴ See Origen, Adv. Celsum, lib. iii. p. 143. The apostles themselves seem to have been the authors of this practice, of which we have vestiges, 1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12.—Schl. [See an interesting dissertation, bearing on this subject, in the elder Walch's Miscell. Sacra. Amst. 1774. Exercit. prima, entitled De Apostolorum institutione catechetica. He considers Heb. vi. 1, 2, as embodying the heads of the catechetical instructions given by the apostles and primitive teachers.—R.

teachers, were instructed and educated in all branches of learning, both human and divine. Such seminaries, in which young men devoted to the sacred office, were taught whatever was necessary to qualify them properly for it, the apostles of Christ undoubtedly both set up themselves, and directed others to set up. 2 Tim. ii. 2. St. John at Ephesus, and Polycarp at Smyrna, established such schools.¹ Among these seminaries, in subsequent times, none was more celebrated than that at Alexandria, which is commonly called a catechetical school, and was said to be erected by St. Mark.²

8. What many tell us that the ancient Christians had their popular and their secret doctrines, and did not communicate to all classes the same instructions, may be admitted as true, if it be rightly explained. For those whom they would induce to embrace Christ were not introduced at once to the high mysteries of religion which exceed the grasp of the human mind, but were first instructed in the doctrines which reason can comprehend, till they were able to bear the more sublime and difficult truths. And afterwards, those who ranked among believers were not all instructed in the same manner; but one was directed to study and treasure up in his mind more or fewer things than another. Whoever would understand more than this, by the secret doctrine of the first century, should beware lest he confound the faults of subsequent ages with the excellencies of this.³

9. Most authors represent the lives and morals of Christians in this age as patterns of purity and holiness, worthy of the imitation of all subsequent ages. This representation, if it be understood of the greater part of the professed Christians and not of all, is undoubtedly true. But whoever supposes the primitive churches were perfectly free from vices and sins, and estimates the lives of all the Christians by the conduct of some of them, and by the precepts and exhortations of their teachers, as most of those have done who have written books and tracts concerning the innocence and holiness of the early Christians, may be confuted by the clearest evidence of both testimony and facts.

10. The external purity of the churches was much promoted by that law which deprived of ordinances, and excluded from the community, persons of vile character or who were addicted to gross sin, provided they would not reform on being admonished. Such a law we know was established by the apostles, soon after churches began to be formed.⁴ All classes in the church united in executing this law. The teachers and rulers generally pointed out the persons who seemed unworthy of sacred privileges, and the people sanctioned or rejected the proposal at discretion. Excluded sinners, although they had committed the very highest offences, if they gave satisfactory evidence of repentance and of amendment, were allowed to return to the church, at least in most places, yet but once only; for those who were restored, if they returned to their former sinful practices and were again excluded from the brotherhood, forfeited all hope of forgiveness.⁵

11. As the Christian churches were composed of both Jews and Gentiles, between whom there had been an inveterate aversion, and as these recent converts retained many erroneous impressions received and cherished from their infancy, it

¹ Irenæus, Adv. Hæc. lib. ii. chap. xxii. p. 148, ed. Massuet; Eusebius, Hist. eccles. lib. v. chap. xx. [The proofs referred to here are quite insufficient to evince, that, in the first century, or even in the former part of the second, Christians established regular schools for their children, and academies for young men. Paul's direction to Timothy (2 Tim. ii. 2).—"The things thou hast heard of me, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also"—seems to have no distinct reference to a regular public school either for boys or for young men. And the passages in Irenæus and Eusebius referred to, speak only of the general instruction and advantages which the neighbouring clergy and others derived from the apostle John, and of the interesting conversations of Polycarp. Considering the poverty and embarrassments of the first Christians, we can hardly suppose they could have erected such schools and academies. And from the great penury of writers, and of learned men of any sort, in the early church—Justin Martyr, a converted philosopher in the middle of the second century, being the first learned writer after the apostles—it seems most probable, that till past the middle of the second century, the means of education among Christians were very slender, and by no means so general and so ample as Mosheim supposes.—Mur.

² See Schmidt, Diss. de Schola catechet. Alexandr. prefixed to the tract of Hyperius, De Catechesi; also Aulustius, Delle Scuole sacre, lib. ii. cap. i. ii. pages 5–17, and cap. xxi. p. 92, &c. Concerning the larger schools of Christians in the East, at Edessa, Nisibis, Seleucia, and concerning the ancient Christian schools in general, see Asseman, Biblioth. orient. Clem. Vat. tom. iii. par. ii. pages 914–919. [The ancient tradition preserved by Jerome (De Scriptor. Illust. cap. xxxvi.), that St. Mark was the founder of the catechetical school at Alexandria, deserves but little credit; since all antiquity is silent respecting a Christian school there, or any teacher or student in it, till the days of Pantænus and his pupil, Clemens Alex. near the close of the second century. See Schroeckh, Kirchengeschichte, vol. iii. p. 188, &c.—Mur.

³ Concerning this secret doctrine, much is collected by Pfaff, Diss. posterior de præjudiciis theolog. sec. xiii. p. 149, &c. in his Primitia Tubingensia.

⁴ See 1 Cor. v. For the discussions which have taken place respecting this law, see Pfaff, De Originibus juris ecclesiast. pages 10–13, 71–78.

⁵ See Morin, Comment. de discip. panit. lib. ix. cap. xix. p. 670, and others. [See Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. N. T. sæc. iii. diss. vii.; and Orsi, Diss. qua ostenditur, cathol. ecclesiam tribus prior. sæculis capital. crim. reis pacem et absolut. nequitiam denucere. Milan, 1730, 4to. But all these writers describe rather the practice of the second and third centuries than that of the first.—Mur.

could not but happen that various disagreements and contests would early arise among them. The first of these controversies related to the necessity of observing the law of Moses. It broke out in the Church of Antioch, and its issue is stated by Luke, Acts xv. This contest was followed by many others, partly with Jewish Christians too much attached to their national religion, partly with persons captivated with a species of fanatical philosophy, and partly with some who abused the Christian doctrines, which they ill understood, to the gratification of their appetites and lusts.¹ St. Paul and the other apostles often mention these controversies, but so cursorily and concisely, that we can hardly ascertain the exact points controverted.

12. Of all these controversies, the greatest and most important was, that relating to the way of attaining to justification and salvation, which Jewish teachers excited at Rome and in other Christian churches. For while the apostles everywhere inculcated, that all hopes of justification and salvation should be placed solely on Jesus Christ and his merits, these Jewish teachers ascribed to the law and to the works which Christ enjoined, the chief influence in procuring everlasting happiness. This error not only led to many others, which were prejudicial to the religion of Christ, but was connected with the highest dishonour to the Saviour; for they who maintained that a life regulated according to the law, would give a title to eternal rewards, could not hold Christ to be the true Son of God and the Saviour of mankind, but merely a prophet or a divine messenger among men. It cannot, therefore, appear at all strange that St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Romans and elsewhere, took so much pains to extirpate this capital error.

13. The controversy respecting the necessity of the Mosaic rites in order to salvation, was wisely decided by the apostles. Acts xv. But great as the apostolic influence was, that deep-rooted love of the Mosaic law which was handed down from their fathers, could not be wholly eradicated from the minds of the Jewish Christians, and especially of those living in Palestine. It diminished a little after the destruction of Jerusalem and the overthrow of the temple by the Romans, yet it did not wholly subside. Hence it was, as we shall afterwards see, that a part of the Jewish Christians separated from the other brethren, and formed a distinct sect attached to the law of Moses.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. ALTHOUGH the Christian religion is most simple and requires nothing but faith and love, it could not wholly dispense with external rites and institutions. Jesus himself established but two ordinances, which it is not lawful either to change or to abrogate, namely, baptism and the Lord's supper. Yet these are not to be considered as mere ceremonies, or as having only a symbolical import, but as having also a sanctifying influence on the mind. That he chose to establish no more rites, ought to convince us that ceremonies are not essential to the religion of Christ; and that this whole matter is left by him to the discretion and free choice of Christians.

2. Many considerations leave us no reason to doubt, that the friends and apostles of the Saviour sanctioned, in divers places, the use of various rites, which they either tolerated from necessity or recommended for substantial reasons. Yet we are not to suppose that they have anywhere inculcated an established and permanent system of canon law, nor that they prescribed the same rites and forms in all churches. On the contrary, many things go to show that Christian worship was from the beginning regulated and conducted differently in different places, and this, no doubt, with the approbation of the apostles and their coadjutors and disciples; and that, in this whole matter, much regard was shown to ancient opinions, customs and laws of different nations.²

² It appears that even so late as the third and fourth centuries, there was considerable difference in the mode of conducting religious worship among Christians. See Irenaeus, quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxiv.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xix.; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxii.; Augustine, Epist. lrv. Opp. tom. ii. p. 93. A part of this difference in rites and ceremonies, appears to have come down from the apostolic times; for when a contest arose in the second century, between the eastern and western Christians, respecting the day on which Easter should be observed, we are informed by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxiii. xxiv.), that the former maintained, that John was the author of their custom; and the latter, that Peter and Paul were the authors of theirs. Both churches were probably correct; for it is very likely, that John, for certain reasons, did ordain in Asia, that the feast of Easter should be kept at the time the Jews kept it; and that Peter and Paul ordered otherwise at Rome. Further, the Greek and Latin churches had a contest on the question, whether leavened or unleavened bread should be used in the sacred supper. And both churches claimed to have

¹ Conducive to the illustration of these controversies, are the investigations of Witalus, Miscell. Sacra, tom. ii. exerc. xx. xxi. xxii. p. 668, &c.; Vitringa, Observat. Sacra, lib. iv. cap. ix. x. xi. p. 952. [Buddens, Eccles. Apos. and especially Walch, Vollständige Hist. der Ketzereien, Spaltungen, u. Religionsstreit. &c. Leip. 1762—85, 11 vols. 8vo, vol. i. p. 68, &c.; also, the Commentators on the Scriptures.—Mur.]

3. I am therefore induced to dissent from those who think, that the Jewish rites and forms were everywhere transferred by the apostles and their disciples to the Christian assemblies. In those churches indeed which were composed either wholly or principally of Jews, I can easily believe the Jewish rites were so far retained as the different characters of the two religions would permit. And this may be evinced by a good many examples. But that the same took place in other churches, in which either no Jews or only a few were found, is not only uncertain but incredible; because it was proper that the rituals of those early times should be variously modelled, according to the peculiarities of genius and character in different nations.

4. As there was diversity in the practice of Christians, it will be very difficult to make statements relative to their mode of worship and other customs and regulations, which will be equally applicable to all the countries in which Christianity flourished. Yet there are a few regulations which may be considered as common to all Christians, and of these we shall give a brief account. The Christians of this century assembled for the worship of God and for their advancement in piety, on the first day of the week, the day on which Christ re-assumed his life; for, that this day was set apart for religious worship by the apostles themselves, and that after the example of the church of Jerusalem it was generally observed, we have unexceptionable testimony.¹ Moreover, those congregations whose members either lived intermingled with Jews, or were composed in great measure of Jews, were accustomed also to observe the seventh day of the week as a sacred day,² which the other Christians did not consider wrong. As to annual religious days, they appeared to have observed two; the one in memory of Christ's resurrection, the other in commemoration of the descent of the Holy Spirit on the apostles.³ To these may be added those days on which holy men met death for Christ's sake, which, it is most probable, were sacred and solemn days from the very commencement of the Christian church.⁴

5. The places of assembling were unquestionably the private dwelling-houses of Christians. But as necessity required that when a congregation was formed and duly regulated, some fixed, uniform place should be appointed for its meetings; and as some furniture was requisite for their accommodation, such as books, tables, and benches, which could not conveniently be transported from place to place, especially in those perilous times, it was undoubtedly the case that the place of their assemblies soon became, instead of a private room, a sort of public one.⁵ These few remarks, I conceive, are sufficient to determine that long controversy, whether the early Christians had temples or not?⁶ If the word temple may denote a dwelling-house or even a part of one, devoted to the public exercises of religion, yet without any idea of holiness attached to it, and not set apart from all profane or secular uses, then I can readily admit that the earliest Christians had temples.

one stated day to their public worship; and beyond all controversy, that was what we call the Lord's day, or the first day of the week. [Glaser refers to a recent dissertation on this subject by Franke, entitled De Diei Dominici apud veteres Christ. celebratione. Halle, 1826. See also Neander, Allgem. Gesch. vol. i. p. 198.—R.]

³ Although some have doubted whether the day called Pentecost (Whitsunday) was a sacred day, so early as the first century (see Bingham, Origines Eccles. lib. xx. cap. 6.), yet I am induced by very weighty reasons, to believe that, from the beginning, it was held equally sacred with the Passover [or Easter day]. Perhaps also (Good Friday) the Friday on which our Saviour died was, from the earliest times, regarded with more respect than other days of the week. See Gothofredus, in Codicem Theodos. tom. i. p. 138; Asseman, Biblioth. orient. Vatican. tom. i. pag. 217—237. Martene, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 66.

⁴ These were called Natalitia martyrum (the martyrs' birth-days). See Sagittarius, De Natalitiis martyrum, republished by Crenius, Syntagma i. Diss. philol. 1699. In the second century these natalitia were everywhere observed; and they are often mentioned by Tertullian and Cyprian. Nay, in the epistle of the church of Smyrna to Philomellus in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 15, the observance of the day of Polycarp's martyrdom is spoken of.—Schl.

⁵ See Vitringa, De Synagoga veteri, lib. i. par. iii. cap. i. p. 432. [It may be inferred from Acts xix. 8, 1 Cor. xi. 22—xiv. 35, and James ii. 2, that Christians then had certain determinate places for holding public worship.—Schl.

⁶ See Blondell, De Episcopis et Presbyt. sect. iii. pag. 216, 243, 246; Böhmer, Diss. ii. Juris eccles. antiq. de antequamvis Christianorum cætibz. sect. iv. p. 39; Bingham, Origines Eccles. book viii. chap. i. and others.

their customs handed down to them from the apostles; and for the reasons before mentioned, both were probably in the right. Even the Catholics often admit this diversity of ceremonies in the apostolic church; e.g. Bona, Rever. Liturg. lib. i. cap. vii. sec. 2. Opp. p. 208; and the Jesuit, Harduin, makes no scruple to assert, that Paul enjoined on the Greeks one form for the consecration of priests, and Peter, on the Romans another. His book is entitled, La dissertation du P. le Courayer sur la succession des Evêques Anglois et sur la validité de leur ordination reçue, tom. ii. p. 13. Paris, 1725, 8vo. [Add Krazer, De Apostolica, nec non antiqua eccl. occident. Liturgia, sec. i. cap. i. sec. 2, p. 3, ed. Augsburg, 1786. See Mosheim's Instit. majores hist. Christi, p. 375.—Schl.

¹ Hartmann, De Rebus gestis Christianor. sub Apostolis, cap. xv. p. 387; Böhmer, Diss. I. Juris eccles. antiqui de statu dei Christianor. p. 20, &c. [See also Acts. xx. 7—ii. 1; 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2; Apoc. i. 10; Pliny, Epist. lib. x. ep. 97, n. 7.—Schl.

² Curcellæus, Diatriba de eui sanguinis; Opp. Theol. p. 958. Alaspineus, Observat. Eccles. lib. i. obs. xiii. p. 53. In vain some learned men labour to persuade us that, in all the early churches, both days or the first and last days of the week, were held sacred. The churches of Bithynia mentioned by Pliny, devoted but

6. In these public assemblies of Christians the holy Scriptures were read, which for that purpose were divided into portions; then followed an exhortation to the people, neither eloquent nor long, but full of warmth and love. If any signified that they were moved by a divine influence they were allowed successively to state what the Lord commanded; the other prophets who were present judging how much authority was due to them. 1 Cor. xiv. 16. Next, the prayers, which constituted no inconsiderable part of public worship, were recited after the bishop.¹ To these succeeded hymns, which were sung not by the whole assembly, but by certain persons during the celebration of the sacred supper and the feasts of charity.² The precise order and manner of performing all these parts of religious worship in the various Christian churches, cannot be fully ascertained; yet it is most probable, that none of these exercises was wholly omitted in any church.³

7. The prayers of Christians were followed by oblations of bread, wine, and other things, for the support of the ministers of the church and the poor. For every Christian who had anything to spare, brought his gift and offered it in a sense to the Lord.⁴ From these gifts so much bread and wine as were requisite for the Lord's supper were set apart and consecrated by prayer, offered up by the presiding minister alone, the people responding amen.⁵ The distributors of the sacred supper were the deacons. To this most holy ordinance were annexed those temperate meals, which from their design were denominated agape, or feasts of charity.⁶ The various difficulties which occur in the accounts respecting these feasts will undoubtedly be solved with ease, by admitting that the earliest Christians were governed by different rules, and did not everywhere celebrate either this or any other ordinance in precisely the same manner.

8. In this century baptism was administered in convenient places not in the public assemblies, and by immersing the candidates wholly in water.⁷ At first, all who were engaged in propagating Christianity administered this rite; nor can it be called in question, that whoever persuaded any person to embrace Christianity could baptize his own disciple. But when the churches became better regulated and were provided with rules of order, the bishop alone exercised the right of baptizing the new converts; though in process of time, as the limits of his church were enlarged, he imparted this right to the presbyters and chorepiscopi, reserving however the confirmation of those baptisms which were administered by the presbyters.⁸ As to the ceremonies which in this early period were added to baptism for the sake of order and decency, we are not able to say anything with certainty; nor do we think it safe to gather the rules of this century from the customs of subsequent times.

9. The Grecian Christians when dangerously sick, sent for the elders of the church, agreeably to James v. 14; and after the sick man had confessed his sins, they commended him to God in devout supplication, and anointed him with oil. Many things in regard to this rite may be, and have actually been, subjects of controversy. But the silence of the ancient writers prevents our coming to any certain conclusions; for though there is no reason to doubt that this rite prevailed extensively among Christians, yet it is rarely mentioned in the writings of the ancients.⁹

10. No law was enacted by Christ and his apostles concerning fasts; but the cus-

¹ See Justin Martyr, Apologia secunda, p. 98, &c.

² See Walsh's Miscell. Sacra, Exercit. ii.; De Hymnis Eccl. Apostolicae, for the nature of these psalms and hymns; and Isidor. Hispal. De Eccl. Officiis, lib. i. cap. v. for their manner of singing, which is glanced at in the well-known letter of Pliny, lib. x. ep. 97. The celebrated Augustus has also published a tract on these early hymns, as evidences of the doctrines then professed in the church. Jena, 1810, 4to.—H.

³ This must be understood of the churches which were fully established and regulated; for in the infant churches which had not become duly organized, I can believe one or other of these exercises might be omitted.

⁴ See Pfaff, Dissert. de oblat. et concoc. Eucharistica; in his Syntagma Dissert. Theolog. Stat. 1720, 8vo.

⁵ Justin Martyr, Apologia secunda, p. 98, &c. The writers on the ceremonies of the sacred supper are mentioned by Fabricius, Bib. Ant. cap. xi. p. 395, &c.

⁶ The writers concerning the agape, are mentioned by Ittig, Select. histor. eccl. capit., sæcul. ii. cap. iii. p. 180, &c.; and Pfaff, De Orig. juris eccl., p. 68.

⁷ See Vossius, De Baptismo, disp. i. Thes. vi. p. 31, &c. and the authors recommended by Fabricius, Bib. Antiq. cap. xi. sec. 25, p. 389, &c.

⁸ These remarks, I conceive, go to elucidate and determine the questions so strenuously debated among the learned, concerning the right of administering baptism. See Böhmer, disq. xl. Juris eccl. antiqui, p. 500, &c.; Le Clerc, Biblioth. universelle, tome iv. p. 93, &c. [Mosheim's assertions in this section being applicable only to the first century, need to be somewhat qualified, for they certainly exceed his authorities. The English reader will see a very careful digest of information and references on the question of baptism, but not limited to the first century, in Coleman's Antiquities of the Christian Church, p. 115, &c.—H.]

⁹ Most of the ancient testimonies concerning this custom are collected by Launoi, De Sacramento unctionis infirmorum, cap. i. p. 444. Opp. tom. i. Among these passages very few are to be found in the writers of the first two or three centuries, yet there is here and there one which has escaped the notice of this very learned man. [The principal writers on this subject are mentioned by Wolf, Cursus philol. et crit. tom. iv. on Ja. v. 14.—Mur.]

tom obtained, that most Christians occasionally and privately joined abstinence from food with their prayers, and especially when engaged in undertakings of great importance. 1 Cor. vii. 5. How much time should be spent in this duty, was left to the private judgment of each individual; nor was a person despised who thought it sufficient to observe only the rules of strict temperance.¹ Of any solemn public fasts, except only on the anniversary day of the crucifixion of Christ, there is no mention in the most ancient times. Gradually, however, days of fasting were introduced; first by custom and afterwards by legal sanction. Whether any thing of this nature occurred in the first century, and what days were devoted to fasting, we have not the means of deciding. And yet I would not deny that weighty arguments are adduced by those who think, that while the apostles were still living or soon after their decease, the Christians in most places abstained from food, either wholly or partially, on the fourth and on the sixth days of the week.²

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SEPARATIONS OR HERESIES.

1. CHRISTIAN churches had scarcely been gathered and organized, when here and there men rose up who not being contented with the simplicity and purity of that religion which the apostles taught, attempted innovations, and fashioned religion according to their own notions. This appears from various passages in the epistles left us by the apostles, and particularly from those of Paul. For in these there is frequent mention of persons, who either endeavoured to mould the Christian doctrines into conformity with that philosophy or γνῶσις³ to which they were addicted; or who were disposed to combine with Christianity Jewish opinions, customs, and institutions. Several of these corrupters of religion are likewise expressly named, as Hymenæus and Alexander, Philetus, Hermogenes, Phygellus, Demas, and Diotrophes.⁴ If however from this list, Alexander, Hymenæus, and Philetus be excepted, the others appear to be rather apostates from the practice of religion, than corrupters of its principles.⁵

2. So long as the greater part of the personal disciples of the Saviour were alive, these innovators were not very successful, and seem to have had no great number of followers. But gradually they acquired more influence; and before the decease of all those whom Christ had himself instructed, they laid the foundations of those sects which afterwards exceedingly disturbed the Christian community, and gave rise to so many controversies. The history of these sects is very obscure; indeed, the most obscure part of ecclesiastical history. This obscurity arises, partly from the deficiency of ancient records; partly from the tenets of these sects, which for the most part were singularly obscure and remote from common apprehension; and partly from the ignorance and hostility of those who have written concerning them. This however is perfectly clear, that no one who loves the truths which the Bible inculcates can find anything to commend in the peculiarities of these sects.⁶

⁵ 2 Tim. ii. 18, and elsewhere. See also the elaborate discussions concerning these men, by Vitringa, Observ. Sacra, lib. iv. cap. ix. p. 952; Ittig, De Hæresiarum ævi apostol. sec. i. cap. viii. p. 84; Buddeus, De Eccl. Apost. cap. v. p. 292, &c. [As to Hymenæus and Philetus, we are informed by St. Paul (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, comp. 1 Tim. i. 19, 20), that they had swerved not only in general from sound doctrine, but their particular error is pointed out. They taught that a resurrection of the dead was no longer to be anticipated, it being already past; and they laboured to make proselytes to this opinion. See Exercit. de Hymenæo et Phileto, in his Miscell. Sacra, p. 81, &c. As to Alexander, it is still contested whether the Alexander in 1 Tim. i. 20; and 2 Tim. iv. 14; and Acts ix. 33, be one and the same person. The greater part believe the affirmative. But Heumann (Erklärung d. N. T. vol. vi. p. 363) and Mosheim (De Rebus Christ. ante C. M. p. 178) support the negative; being inclined to believe that there were two persons of this name. The younger Walch (Historie der Ketzer, p. 127) prefers abiding by the common opinion. Hermogenes and Phygellus are accused by Paul (2 Tim. i. 15) of only having forsaken him when he was imprisoned at Rome, which was inconstancy but not heresy. As to Demas, Paul tells us (2 Tim. iv. 10) that from love to the world, he had forsaken him. But this gives no ground for charging him with being a heretic. Diotrophes, mentioned in the 3d Ep. of John, is accused of a twofold fault; viz. refusing to receive those whom the apostle recommended to his kind offices; and setting himself in opposition to the apostle. But neither of these offences is sufficient to constitute him a heretic.—Schl.

⁶ Professed histories of the sects which arose in this and the next century, have been written by Ittig, De Hæresiarum ævi apostolici et apostolico proximi. Lips. 1690, 4to, and an Appendix. Lips. 1696, 4to, by Ronatus Massuet, Dissertat. Inrenæ præmissæ; and by Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise. But all these, and others whom I pass over, have rather collected materials for a history of these sects, than written the history itself. Among the Lutherans, Hinckelmann, Thomasius, Horbius; and among the Reformed, Basnage and Dodwell, have either promised the world such a history or attempted to write it, but have done no more. We must therefore still wait for some per-

¹ Shepherd of Hermas, lib. iii. similit. v. pag. 9—31, 935, ed. Fabriell, at the close of vol. iii. of his Codex Apocryph. N. T. [The best writer on this subject is Dallé, De Jejunis et Quadragesima. Davent. 1654, 8vo.; against whom, however, Beveridge brings some objections, in Codex Canon. vind.—Schl.

² See Beveridge, Codex Canon. vindic. tom. ii. Patr. Apostol. p. 166.

³ 1 Tim. vi. 20; and cap. i. 3, 4; Tit. iii. 9; Colos. ii. 8.

⁴ Concerning Diotrophes, there is a particular tract, by Stemler, 1758.—Schl.

3. At the head of all the sects which disturbed the peace of the church stand the Gnostics; who claimed ability to restore to mankind the lost knowledge (γνῶσις) of the true and supreme God; and who announced the overthrow of that empire, which the Creator of the world and His associates had set up. It is indeed the common opinion, and supported by the testimony of Clemens Alexandrinus (Stromat. 1. vii. cap. xvii. pages 898, 899), that the Gnostic sects first arose, after the decease of the apostles, in the reign of Adrian; and that previously no discords had produced separations from the church. But the sacred Scriptures themselves—to say nothing of other ancient documents—put it beyond controversy, that even in the first century, in various places, men infected with the Gnostic leprosy began to erect societies distinct from the other Christians. 1 John ii. 18; 1 Tim. vi. 20; Col. ii. 8.¹ Yet these stray flocks did not become distinguished for their numbers, or for their fame and notoriety till the times of Adrian. Under the appellation of Gnostics are included all those in the first ages of the church, who modified the religion of Christ by joining with it the oriental philosophy, in regard to the source of evil, and the origin of this material universe. The leading principles of this philosophy have already been stated.

4. All those eastern philosophers, believing that rational souls became connected with matter and inhabitants of bodies, contrary to the will and pleasure of the supreme God, were in expectation of a mighty legate from the Deity, possessed of consummate wisdom and power; who would imbue with a knowledge of the true God, the spirits now oppressed with the load of their bodies, and rescue them from their bondage to the lords of this material world. When, therefore, some of them perceived that Jesus and his friends wrought miracles of a beneficent character, they were ready to believe that Jesus was that mighty legate of God, come to deliver men from the power of the genii who governed this lower world, and to rescue souls from the influence of their material bodies. This supposition being admitted into minds polluted with gross errors, they interpreted or rather perverted, whatever Christ and his disciples taught, so as to make it harmonize with their other opinions.

5. Hence there necessarily arose among them a multitude of opinions which were extremely foreign from the precepts of Christ. Their belief that the world was not created by the supreme God in whom is all perfection, but by one or more inferior deities of a bad or at least of an imperfect character, would not allow them to admit the Divine authority of the Old Testament Scriptures; and it led some of them to venerate and extol the serpent, the prime author of sin among men, and likewise several of the vilest persons mentioned in the Jewish Scriptures. The same belief induced them to condemn Moses and the religion he taught; and to represent him as instigated to impose such hard and unsuitable laws on the Jews, by the world's Creator who had no regard for human happiness, but only for his own glory and authority. Their belief that matter is eternal and the source of all evil, prevented them from putting a due estimate upon the human body, and from favouring marriage whereby bodies are produced; and also from admitting the doctrine of the future resurrection of the body. Their belief that malevolent genii ruled over the world, and that from them originated all the diseases, wars, and calamities of men, led them almost universally to addict themselves to magic, or the art of weakening and paralyzing the power of those genii. I omit many other points incompatible with so summary a history as this.

6. Their principles required that while they admitted Christ to be the Son of the supreme God, and a messenger sent, for the benefit of miserable souls, from the Pleroma or upper world where God and his family dwell, they should hold most unworthy sentiments concerning his person and offices. They could not admit him to be truly God, nor truly man. Not truly God, because they held him, though begotten of God, to be yet much inferior to the Father; nor truly man, because everything concrete and corporeal they believed to be intrinsically and essentially evil: therefore most of them divested Christ of a material body, and denied him to have suffered for our sakes what he is recorded to have endured. The cause of Christ's coming among men, they said, was simply to strip the tyrants of this son of adequate sagacity, fairness, and skill in ancient philosophy and literature, to accomplish this difficult undertaking. [This has been since attempted by Waleh, in the work already referred to under the running title of Hist. der Ketzerr.; Lardner, Hist. of the Heretics. London, 1780, 4to; Lewald, De Doctrina Gnostica. Heidelberg, 1818, 8vo; Neander, Geneitische Entwicklung d. vornehmsten Gnost. Systeme. Berlin, 1818, 8vo; and still better, in his Allgem. Gesch. der Chr. Relig. u. Kirche, vol. 1. part ii. pages 602–859.—Mur.] world, those impotent genii, of their power over the virtuous and heaven-born souls of men; and to teach men how to withdraw their divine minds from these impure bodies, and fit them for a union with God.

¹ The reader will recollect, that Moshelm's opinions, concerning an oriental philosophy in the apostolic age, have been much questioned (see above, Note 2, p. 29); and that these texts which speak only of false teachers who corrupted the truth, afford no certain evidence of the existence of Gnostic churches or congregations existing as distinct religious bodies.—Mur. [See Burton's Heretics of the Apostolic Age, Lecture i.—R.]

7. Their systems of morals, we are informed, were widely different. For most of them recommended abstinence and austerity, and prescribed the most severe bodily mortifications, in order that the soul, whose ill fate it was to be associated with a body, might enjoy greater liberty, and be able the better to contemplate heavenly things. For, the more this depraved and grovelling habitation of the soul is weakened and attenuated, the less will it be able to withdraw the mind from the contemplation of divine objects. But some of them maintained, on the contrary, that we may safely indulge all our libidinous desires; and that there is no moral difference in human actions.¹ This contrariety of opinions needs not surprise us, because the one principle naturally produced both systems. For persons who believed that their bodies were the very essence of evil and calculated only to hold their souls in bondage, might, according as they were of a voluptuous or of a morose and austere disposition, either fall into the conclusion, that the acts of the body have no connexion with the soul when it has attained to communion with God, or, on the contrary, suppose that the body must be strenuously resisted and opposed as being the enemy of the soul.

8. As these extraordinary opinions required proof, which it was not easy to find in the writings of the apostles, recourse was had to falsehoods and impositions. Therefore when asked, where they had learned what they had so confidently taught, some produced fictitious books under the names of Abraham, Zoroaster, and Christ, or his apostles; some pretended to have derived their principles from a concealed and secret doctrine taught by Christ; some affirmed that they had arrived at this high degree of wisdom by an innate energy which existed in their own minds; and some pretended that one Theudas, a disciple of St. Paul, or Matthias, one of Christ's disciples, had been their teacher. Those of them who did not wholly reject the books of the New Testament, either interpreted them most absurdly neglecting the true import of words, or wantonly corrupted them by retrenching what they disliked, and adding what they pleased.

¶ It is easy to see how these persons, after assuming the name of Christians, became divided into numerous sects. In the first place, it appears from what has been already stated, that they held very different opinions before they professed Christianity. Hence, as each one endeavoured to accommodate his own philosophical opinions to the Christian religion, it was the necessary consequence that various systems of religion were produced. Moreover, some of them were born Jews as Cerinthus and others, and did not wish to appear contempters of Moses; while others were wholly estranged from the Jewish religion, and could indulge themselves in liberties which the former could not. And lastly, this whole system of philosophy and religion was destitute of any fixed and solid basis, and was, in a great measure, the creature of their own fancy; and who does not know, that systems and institutions which are the productions of the imagination, never have uniformity?

10. The heads and leaders of the philosophical sects which troubled the church in the first century, next come to be considered. The first place among them is by many given to Dositheus, a Samaritan. And it is sufficiently proved that there was a man of this name among the Samaritans, about the time of our Saviour; and that he left a sect behind him. But all the accounts we have of him clearly show that he is to be ranked, not among those called heretics, but among the enemies of the Christian name; or, if it be thought more correct, among the delirious and insane; for he wished to be accounted the Messiah or that Prophet whom God had promised to the Jews; he could not, therefore, have held Jesus Christ to be a divine ambassador, nor have merely corrupted his doctrines.²

11. What I have said of Dositheus I would likewise say of Simon Magus. This impious man is not to be ranked among those who corrupted Christianity by an intermixture of errors or among the heretics, but is to be classed among those who declared open war against Christianity, although nearly all the ancient and modern writers account him the head, father, and ringleader of the whole heretical crew. For it is manifest from all the records we have of him, that after his defection from the Christians, he ascribed to Christ no honour at all; but set himself in opposition to Christ and claimed to be the supreme power of God.

¹ Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, livr. II. chap. xiii. p. 307. Simon, Critique de la Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, par M. du Pin, tome III. chap. xiii. p. 304. [Moshelm, Inst. hist. Chris. majores, p. 376. Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. I. p. 182. All the accounts make Dositheus to have lived among the Samaritans; one writer represents him as an apostate Jew. According to Origen (Philocal. I.), he was a rigorous observer of the law of Moses; and particularly allowed no one to move from the spot where the Sabbath overtook him. According to Epiphanius (Heretic. lib. I. par. I. her. 13, previous to the Christian heresies), he was an apostate Jew whose ambition being disappointed, he retired among the Samaritans, lived in a cave, and fasted so rigorously as to occasion his death. Other ancient accounts simply mention him among the founders of sects; as Hegesippus, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. IV. cap. xxii. It is said, his followers accounted him the Messiah (Photius, Biblioth. cxxx.); and that at first he claimed to be so; but afterwards retracted in presence of his pupil Simon.

² See Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. III. cap. v. p. 529, ed. Potter.

12. What the ancients relate of the life and opinions of Simon are so different and inconsistent, that some very learned men have concluded they could not all relate to one person; and therefore they suppose two Simons; the one, Simon Magus, who abandoned the Christian religion; and the other, a Gnostic philosopher. On this point men will judge as they see right; but to me it appears neither safe nor necessary to reject the testimony of the ancients that there was only one Simon.¹ He was by birth either a Samaritan or a Jew; and after studying philosophy at Alexandria,² professed to be a magician, as was common in that age; and by his fictitious miracles persuaded the Samaritans among others, that he had received from God the power of controlling those evil spirits which afflict mankind. Acts viii. 9, 10. On seeing the miracles which Philip performed by Divine power, Simon joined himself to him, professed to be a Christian, and hoped to learn from the Christians the art of working miracles. When cut off from this hope by the pointed reproof of St. Peter (Acts viii. 9, 10), he not only returned to his old course of sorcery, but wherever he went he laboured to obstruct the progress of Christianity. The accounts of his tragical death and of a statue decreed him at Rome, are rejected with great unanimity by the learned at the present day. They are at least uncertain and improbable.³

13. Simon undoubtedly belonged to that class of philosophers who admitted, as co-existent with the supreme and all-perfect God, not only eternal matter but an evil deity who presided over it. And if I mistake not, he was one of those in this class who believed matter to have been eternally animated, and at a certain period to have brought forth, by its inherent energies, that depraved being who now rules over it, surrounded by numerous attendants. From this opinion of Simon, the other gross errors ascribed to him by the ancients concerning fate, the indifference of human actions, the impurity of the human body, the power of magic, &c. would very naturally follow.⁴ The most shocking of all his abominations was, his pretence that the greatest and most powerful of the Divine Æons of the male sex resided in himself; and likewise that another Æon of the female sex, the mother of all human souls, resided in his mistress Helena; and his proclaiming that the supreme God had dispatched him down to this world, to break up the empire of the world's fabricators, and to deliver Helena out of their hands.⁵

³ See Beausobre, Histoire de Manichéisme, pages 203—395; Van Dale, Diss. de Statua Simonis, annexed to his book De Oraculis, p. 579; Deyling, Observat. Sacrar. lib. i. Observ. xxxvi. p. 140; Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 340, and numerous others. [What Arnobius, Adv. Gentiles, lib. ii. p. 64, ed. Herald, and after him, many others relate, with some variety, concerning Simon's death; viz. that while practising magic at Rome, in order to ingratiate himself with Nero, he attempted to fly being assisted by evil spirits; but that by the prayers of St. Peter, the evil spirits were compelled to let him fall, which either killed him outright or broke his bones, and so mortified him that he killed himself,—is too improbable and has too much the aspect of fiction to gain credit in this enlightened age. And the mistake of Justin Martyr, Apol. i. cap. xxxiv. who says he saw a public statue inscribed to Simon on an island in the Tiber at Rome, has been satisfactorily accounted for, since the discovery, in the year 1574, of a stone in the Tiber at Rome, bearing this inscription: "Semoni Saneo, Deo Fidio Sacrum." For this inscription, which Justin, being an Asiatic, might easily misunderstand, was undoubtedly intended for an ancient pagan god.—Mur.

⁴ The dissertation of Horbius, De Simone Mago, though a juvenile production and needing correction in style, I prefer to all others on this subject. It will be found republished by Voigtius, in the Biblioth. Hæreticologica, tom. i. par. iii. p. 511. Horbius treads closely in the steps of his preceptor, Thomasius, who very clearly saw the source of those numerous errors by which the Gnostics and especially Simon, were infected. The other writers who have treated of Simon, are enumerated by Voigtius, ubi supra, p. 567. [See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. p. 152, &c. The English reader will find a full, but not a very accurate, account of Simon in Calnet's Dictionary of the Bible.—Mur. [But he ought especially to refer to Burton's Heresies of the Apost. Age, Lec. iv. with the illustrative Notes 38 to 43, inclusive; and to Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 96, &c.—R.

⁵ Some very learned men, I am aware, have supposed that the ancient accounts of Simon's Helena should be interpreted allegorically; and that Simon intended, by Magus (Clemens, Recogn. lib. ii. 8, &c.) Eulogius, Bishop of Alexandria, in the seventh century wrote against the Dositheans (according to Photius, Biblioth. cxxx.), and besides his pretended Messiahship, he attributes to Dositheus various errors, all of which coincided with either Sadducean or Samaritan opinions. See Schmidt, Handb. d. christl. Kirchengeschichte, vol. i. sec. 50, p. 214, &c.—Mur.

¹ See the Dissertation by Voelger, revised and published by Mosheim, Diss. ad Hist. Eccles. pertinentes, vol. ii. p. 55, &c. De uno Simone Mago. [The idea of two Simons, the one a Samaritan mentioned Acts viii. the other a Jewish philosopher in the reign of Domitian, and the father of all the Gnostic sects, was first thrown out as a conjecture by Vitringa, Observ. Sacrar. lib. v. cap. xii. sec. 9, p. 159, and afterwards defended by Heumann, Acta erudit. Lips. for April, A.D. 1717, p. 179; and Beausobre, Diss. sur les Adamites, part ii. subjoined to L'Enfant's Histoire de la guerre des Huxites, sec. i. p. 350, &c. But this hypothesis is now generally given up.—Mur.

² Clementina, Homil. ii. in Patr. Apostol. tom. ii. p. 533.

14. From Simon Magus, it is said, Menander, who was also a Samaritan, learned his doctrine; which is no more true than what the ancients relate, that all the heretical sects derived their origin from this Simon. Menander is to be removed from the list of heretics strictly so called, and classed among the lunatics and madmen, who foolishly arrogated to themselves the character of the Saviour of mankind. For it appears from the testimony of Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and Tertullian,¹ that he wished to be thought one of the Æons, sent from the upper world or the Pleroma, to succour the souls which were here suffering miserably in material bodies; and to afford them aid against the machinations and the violence of the demons who governed our world. As he erected his religious system on the same fundamental principles as Simon did, the ancients supposed that he must have been his disciple.

15. If those now mentioned are excluded from the number of the heretics of the first century, the first place among the Christian sectaries, and also among those denominated Gnostics, seems to belong to the Nicolaitans, of whom Jesus Christ himself expressed his detestation. Rev. ii. 6, 14, 15. It is true the Saviour does not tax them with errors in matters of faith, but only with licentious conduct and a disregard of the injunction of the apostles to abstain from meats offered to idols, and from fornication. Acts xv. 29. But the writers of the second and the following centuries, Irenæus, Tertullian, Clemens Alexandrinus,² and others, declare that they taught the same doctrines with the Gnostics concerning two principles of all things, and concerning the Æons and the origin of the present world. Whether this testimony is to be admitted, or whether we are to suppose that the ancients confounded two different sects which bore the same name; the one, the Apocalyptical Nicolaitans, and the other, a Gnostic sect of the second century founded by a man named Nicolaus; is a question which admits of doubt.³

the name of Helena, to indicate matter or the soul or something I know not what. But for such an allegorical interpretation, it would be easy to show there is little foundation.

¹ Irenæus, lib. i. cap. xxiii.; Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. p. 69; Tertullian, De Anima, cap. 50; and De Reurrect. cap. v.—Mur.

² Irenæus, lib. iii. cap. xi. and lib. ii. cap. xxvii.; Tertull. De Præscript. cap. xvi.; Clem. Alex. Strom. lib. iii. cap. iv.—Mur.

³ See Demonstratio Sectæ Nicolaitarum, adn. doctis. ejus opposuitorum, cum Supplemento; in Moshelm's Dissert. ad Hist. Eccles. pertin. vol. i. pag. 389—495; also, Moshelm's Institut. Hist. Christ. major. p. 46, and Comment. de Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 193, and especially Walch, Hist. des Ketzers. vol. i. p. 167. All

16. With greater propriety we may reckon among the Gnostics, Cerinthus, a Jew by birth,⁴ but was taught literature and philosophy at Alexandria.⁵ Though some of the learned have chosen to assign him rather to the second century than to the first,⁶ yet it appears it was while St. John was still living, that he endeavoured to form a singular system of religion, compounded of the doctrines and principles of Jesus Christ, and those of the Gnostics and Jews. From the Gnostics he borrowed the notions of a Pleroma, Æons, a Demiurge, &c. but these he so modified, that they appeared not wholly inconsistent with the opinions of the Jews. Therefore to the Creator of this world, whom also he acknowledged to be the Sovereign and the Lawgiver of the Jewish nation, he ascribed a nature possessed of the highest virtues, and derived from the true God; but which, he affirmed, had gradually receded from its primitive excellence and become deteriorated. Hence God had determined to subvert his power by means of one of the blessed Æons, whose name was Christ. This Christ had entered into a certain Jew named Jesus (a very righteous and holy the ancients, except John Cassianus (Collatio, xviii. cap. xvi.), supposed that Nicolaus of Antioch, the Deacon (Acts vi. 5), was either the founder or accidental cause of this sect. Irenæus makes him to have been the founder of it. But Clemens Alex. states that an incautious speech or act of his gave occasion only to this sect. For he being one day accused of too much attention to his wife, when he came to defend himself he publicly divorced her, using the expression, ὅτι παρὰ χρίστος ἦν τῇ σαρκὶ δέ, it is proper to abuse the flesh; i. e. to subdue its corrupt propensities. This speech was afterwards perversely applied, by a Gnostic association, to justify their abominations. With this account agree Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxix.; Theodoret. Fab. Heret. lib. iii. cap. i. Opp. tom. iv. p. 226, and Augustine, De Heres. cap. v. Now the question arises, whether there actually was, in the time of St. John, an heretical party holding different fundamental principles from the orthodox, and distinguished by the name of Nicolaitans. Some say there was, others say there was not. Moshelm takes the affirmative on account of the historical credibility of the Fathers, and the literal import of the words used in the Revelation. The next question is, who was the founder of this sect? Here, some follow Irenæus; others follow Clemens Alex.; and some, among whom is Moshelm, think it probable there were two persons of the name of Nicolaus. If this supposition be admitted, it will be easy to account for the fact that the Nicolaitans of the Fathers are accused of Gnosticism, while there is no mention of it in the Revelation. Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchen-Geesch.—Schl.

⁴ For Epiphanius states, Heres. xxviii. sec. 3, that he was circumcised; and Johannes Damascenus, De Heres. cap. viii. that his followers were Jews. His doctrines also show higher respect for the Jewish forms of worship than is common for the Gnostic heretics. Walch's Hist. der Ketzers. vol. i. p. 250.—Schl.

⁵ Theodoret, Fabul. Heret. lib. ii. cap. iii. Opp. tom. iii. p. 219.

⁶ See Hasnage, Annal. Polit. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 6; Faydit, Éclaircissements sur l'histoire ecclési. de deux premiers siècles, chap. v. p. 64, and others. To this is opposed Budeus, De Eccl. Apotol. cap. v. p. 412; [and Tillemont, Mém. pour servir à l'histoire de l'Église, tome ii. p. 486; and Moshelm, Institut. Hist. Eccles. ma man, the son of Joseph and Mary by ordinary generation), by descending upon him in the form of a dove, at the time when he was baptized by John in the river Jordan. After his union with Christ, this Jesus vigorously assailed the God of the Jews, the world's Creator; and by his instigation Jesus was seized by the rulers of the Jewish nation and nailed to the cross. But when Jesus was apprehended Christ flew away to heaven; so that only the man Jesus was put to death. Cerinthus required his followers to worship the supreme God, the father of Christ, together with Christ himself; but to abandon the Jewish Lawgiver, whom he accounted the Creator of this world; and while they retained some parts of the Mosaic law, to regulate their lives chiefly by the precepts of Christ. He promised them a resurrection of their bodies, which would be succeeded by exquisite delights in the millenary reign of Christ; and then would follow a happy and never-ending life in the celestial world. For Cerinthus supposed that Christ would hereafter return, and would unite himself again with the man Jesus in whom he had before dwelt; and would reign with his followers during a thousand years in Palestine.¹

jur. sec. i. p. 439, &c. They who place Cerinthus in the second century rely chiefly on two arguments. The first is, that the ancient writers who treat of the heretics set down Cerinthus after Marcion, (rather after Carpocrates.) The other rests on a spurious letter of Pius, Bishop of Rome (in the middle of the second century), to Justus, Bishop of Vienne; in which Pius laments that Cerinthus was at that time making many proselytes. The epistle may be found in Constant. Epistol. Pontific. Append. tom. i. p. 19; [and in Binius, Concil. Gen. tom. i. p. 124.] But the first argument proves nothing, because the historians of the heresies pay no regard to chronological order; and the second falls, because the epistle is not genuine.—Schl. [But, see on this subject Lampe, Commentar. in Johan. Prolog. lib. ii. cap. iii. sec. 13, &c. p. 181, &c.—Mur.]

¹ The doctrines of Cerinthus are stated in full by Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. page 260, &c.; and by Mosheim, Instit. hist. Christ. major. p. 445; and Comment. de Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 196. It may be remarked that Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. lib. iii. cap. fil. says he had heard from various persons, that Polycarp told them, that the Apostle John once met Cerinthus in a public bath at Ephesus, and instantly fled out saying he was afraid the bath would fall on that enemy of the truth and kill him. This story may be true, notwithstanding Irenæus had it from third-hand testimony; but the addition to it, that Cerinthus was actually killed by the fall of the building as soon as John had gone out, was first annexed in modern times by the Dominican, Bernhard of Luxemburg, in his Catalogus Hæreticorum; and it deserves no credit. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 255.—Schl.

17. Those who maintained the necessity of the Mosaic law and ceremonies in order to eternal salvation, had not proceeded so far in this century as to have no communion with such as thought differently. They were of course accounted brethren, though weaker ones. But after the second destruction of Jerusalem in the reign of Adrian, when they withdrew from the other Christians and set up separate congregations; they were regarded as sectarians who had deviated from the true doctrines of Christ. Hence arose the names, Nazarenes,² and Ebionites;³ by which those Christians, whose errors originated from an undue attachment to the Mosaic law, were discriminated from the other Christians, who held that the Mosaic ceremonial law was abrogated by Christ. These Nazarenes or Ebionites, though commonly set down among the sects of the apostolic age, in reality belong to the second century in which they had their origin.

² This name the Jews first gave by way of reproach to the disciples of Christ, because he was a citizen of Nazareth. Acts xxiv. 5. Afterwards the name was applied especially to a Christian sect which endeavoured to unite the Mosaic law with the religion of Christ. Of these Nazarenes, Mosheim treats largely, Instit. hist. Christ. major p. 465, and Comment. de Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 328; as also Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. p. 101, &c.—Schl.

³ The origin of this name is still a subject of controversy. Some derive it from some founder of this sect who was called Ebion. Others think the name Ebionites to be equivalent to the Hebrew word עֲבִיּוֹנִים poor people. But they are not agreed why this name was given to the sect. Others again regard the whole subject as an historical problem, which can never be solved with absolute certainty. It is treated of largely by Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. p. 100; and by Mosheim, Instit. hist. Christ. major. p. 477; and in his Diss. qua ostenditur, certo hodie et explorato constitui non posse, utrum Ebion quidam novæ Sectæ auctor extiterit olim inter Christianos, necne? in his Dissert. ad hist. ecclæ. pertin. vol. i. p. 547, &c. See Doederlein, Commentar. de Ebionais e numero hostium Christi examinatis. Bützow. 1770, 8vo.—Schl. [See also Burton's Heresies of the Apost. Age, Lect. vi. with notes 73 to 84, inclusive; and particularly Gieseler, Lehrbuch d. Kircheng. sec. 32. with the important references to recent works in notes 8 and 9. Davidson's translation, vol. i. p. 98, &c. Also, Matter, Hist. du Gnost. vol. iii. p. 11, &c. who likewise treats of the Elasites or Ekeasites.—R.

CENTURY SECOND.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. Most of the Roman emperors of this century were of a mild character. Trajan (A.D. 98—117), though too eager for glory and not always sufficiently considerate and provident, was humane and equitable. Adrian (A.D. 117—138) was more severe, yet not absolutely bad and tyrannical; his character was a compound of virtues and vices. The Antonines (Pius, A.D. 138—161, Marcus Aurelius the Philosopher, A.D. 161—180, with Verus, A.D. 161—169, and Commodus, A.D. 169—192) were models of excellence and benignity. Even Severus (A.D. 193—211), who afterwards assumed another character, was at first oppressive to no one, and to the Christians mild and equitable.

2. Through this lenity of the emperors, Christians living in the Roman empire suffered far less than they would have done if they had been under severer rulers. The laws enacted against them were indeed sufficiently hard; and the magistrates, excited by the priests and the populace, often made considerable havoc among them, and went frequently much beyond what the laws required. Yet for these evils some relief was commonly attainable. Trajan would not have the Christians to be sought after; and he forbade any complaints being received against them without the names of the accusers annexed.¹ And Antoninus Pius even decreed that their accusers should be punished.² Some in one way and others in another, protected them against the evil designs of the populace and the priests. Hence the Christian community increased and became vastly numerous in this century. Of this fact we have the clearest testimony of the ancients, which some have in vain attempted to call in question.³

3. On what particular countries, both within the Roman empire and beyond it, the light of heavenly truth first shone in this century, the paucity of ancient records will not allow us to state with precision. There are unexceptionable witnesses who declare that in nearly all the East, and among the Germans, the Spaniards, the Celts, the Britons, and other nations, Christ was now worshipped as God.⁴ But if any inquire, which of these nations received Christianity in this century and which in the preceding, it is not in my power to answer. Pantenus, master of the school in Alexandria, is said to have instructed the logy, to implore the grace of the emperor in favour of the Christians. See Mosheim, De Heb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 240.—Schl.

³ See Moyle, On the Thundering Legion; a Latin translation of which, with notes, I have annexed to my Syntagma Diss. ad sanctiores disciplinas pertinent. pages 652—661. See also an additional passage in Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryphone, p. 341.

⁴ Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. lib. i. cap. x.; Tertullian, Adv. Judæos, cap. vii. [The testimony of the former is this: "Neither do those churches which are established among the Germans, believe or teach otherwise; nor do those among the Heberil, or among the Celts; nor those in the East; nor those in Egypt; nor those in Libya; nor those established in the central parts of the world." The language of Tertullian is rhetorical, and the statement, undoubtedly, somewhat too strong. He says: "In whom, but the Christ now come, have all nations believed? For, in whom do all other nations (but yours, the Jews) confide? Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, Armenia, Phrygia, Cappadocia, and inhabitants of Pontus, and Asia, and Pamphylia; the dwellers in Egypt, and inhabitants of the region beyond Cyrene; Romans and strangers; and in Jerusalem both Jews and proselytes, so that the various tribes of the Getuli and the numerous hordes of the Moors; all the Spanish claus, and the different nations of Gauls, and the regions of the Britons inaccessible to the Romans but subject to Christ, and of the Sarmatians, and the Dacians, and Germans, and Scythians, and many unexplored nations and countries, and islands unknown to us and which we cannot enumerate: in all which places, the name of the Christ who has already come, now reigns."—Mur.

¹ See Pliny's Epistles, lib. x. ep. 98.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xiii. [where the law of Antoninus is given at length from the Apology of Melito. Some indeed have supposed that it was Marcus Antoninus, and not Antoninus Pius, who issued this decree. (So Valesius in loc.) But this is contrary to the express testimony of Eusebius, and to the contents of the edict itself. For we know from history that the earthquakes, mentioned in the edict, happened under Pius. See Capitolinus, Vita Antonini Pii, cap. iii. Besides, if Marcus himself had published this edict, Melito could have had no occasion by this Apo-

Indians in Christianity.¹ But these Indians appear to have been certain Jews, living in Arabia Felix. For Pantænus found among them, according to the testimony of Jerome, the Gospel of St. Matthew which they had received from their first teacher Bartholomew.

4. From Gaul, it would seem, the Christian religion must have spread into Germany on the left of the Rhine, which was subject to the Romans, and also into Britain opposite to Gaul.² Yet certain churches in Germany have been accustomed to deduce their origin from the companions and disciples of St. Peter and other apostles;³ and the Britons, following the account given by Bede would fain believe that their king

Lucius sought and obtained Christian teachers from Eleutherus the Roman pontiff, in this second century and during the reign of Marcus Antoninus.⁴ But these ancient accounts are exposed to much doubt, and are rejected by the best informed persons.

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. x. Jerome, De Scripturis Illustr. cap. xxxvi. [According to Eusebius, the zeal of Pantænus prompted him to undertake a voluntary mission among the Indians. But according to Jerome (De Scripturis Illustr. cap. xxxvi. and ep. lxxxiii. Opp. tom. iv. par. ii. p. 656, ed. Bened.), he was sent out by Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria, 'in consequence of a request made by the Indians for a Christian teacher. As it is well known that the Greek and Latin writers give the name of Indians to the Persians, Parthians, Medes, Arabians, Ethiopians, Libyans, and many other nation little known to them: the learned have inquired who were the Indians visited by Pantænus? Many think they were those we call the East Indians, inhabiting the country about the river Indus. Jerome so thought, for he represents him as sent to instruct the Brahmins. Valesius and Holstenius and others suppose they were the Abyssinians or Ethiopians, who are often called Indians and were near, and always had intercourse with, the Egyptians. See Basnage, Annal. polit. eccles. tome ii. p. 207; Valesius, Annotat. ad Socrat. Hist. Eccles. p. 13. Others incline to believe them Jews, resident in Yemen or Arabia Felix, a country often called India. That they were not strangers to Christianity is evident from their having Matthew's Gospel among them, and from their desiring some one to expound it to them. Their applying to the Bishop of Alexandria shows that Egypt was to them the most accessible Christian country; and their having the Gospel written in Hebrew, as Jerome testifies, is good proof that they were Jews; because no other people understood that language. Besides Bartholomew had formerly been among them, the field of whose labours has been supposed to be Arabia Felix. See Tillemont's life of Bartholomew, in his Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de l'Eglise, tome i. pages 1160, 1161. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 206, 207.—Mur.

² On the origin of those German churches mentioned by Tertullian and Irenæus as existing in this century, Ursinus, Bebelius, and others have written; and still better, Liron, Singularités historiques et littéraires, tome iv. Paris, 1740, 8vo. The common and popular accounts of the first preachers of the Gospel in Germany, are learnedly impugned by Calmet, Histoire de Lorraine, tome i. Diss. sur les Evêques de Treves, pages 3, 4; Bolland, Acta Sanctorum, January, tom. ii. p. 922; Hontheim, Diss. de æra episcop. Treverensis; in Historia Treverensis, tom. i.

³ It is said St. Peter sent Eucherius, Valerius, and Maternus into Belgic Gaul; and that they planted the churches of Cologne, Treves, Tongres, Liege, and some others; and presided over them till their death. See Brower, Annales Treverens. lib. ii. p. 143, &c.; and Acta Sancto. Antuerpior. 29th of January, p. 918. But Calmet, Bolland, and Hontheim (ubi supra), have proved satisfactorily that these pretended founders of the German churches did not live earlier than the third or fourth century, and were first represented as being legates of the apostles in the middle ages. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 212.—Mur.

⁴ See Ussher, Ecl. Britannicar. Primordia, cap. i. p. 7; Godwin, De Conversione Britann. cap. i. p. 7; Rapin, History of England, vol. i.; [Burton, Annotat. ad Clementis Rom. epist. ad Corinth. in Patribus Apost. tom. ii. p. 470; Stillingfleet, Antiquit. of the Eng. Church. cap. i.; Spanheim, Historia Eccles. major. sæcul. ii. pages 603, 604. The first publication of the Gospel in Britain has been attributed to James, the son of Zebedee, whom Herod put to death (Acts xii. 1); to Simon Zelotes, another apostle; to Aristobulus (mentioned Rom. xvi. 10); to St. Peter, &c. by some few legendary writers who are cited by Ussher, Ecl. Britann. Primordia, cap. i. But, rejecting these accounts, William of Malmesbury, and after him many other monks, maintained that Joseph of Arimathea, with twelve others, were sent from Gaul by St. Philip, into Britain, A.D. 63; that they were successful in planting Christianity; spent their lives in England, had twelve hides of land assigned them by the king at Glastonbury, where they first built a church of hurdles, and afterwards established a monastery. By maintaining the truth of this story, the English clergy obtained the precedence of some others, in several councils of the fifteenth century, and particularly that of Basle, A.D. 1434. (Ussher's Primordia, cap. ii. page 12—30.) Since the Reformation, this story has been given up by most of the English clergy. But as Eusebius (Demonstrat. Evang. lib. iii. cap. v.) and Theodoret (Græcar. Curatio Affectionum, lib. ix.) name the Britons among others, to whom the apostles themselves preached the Gospel, some have maintained that St. Paul must have visited that country, and they urge that Clemens Rom. says, that this apostle travelled ἐπὶ τὰ τέμνη τῆς οὐρῆς, to the utmost bounds of the west. They also urge that among the many thousand Romans who passed over into Britain in the reign of Claudius and his successors, there were doubtless some Christians, who would spread the knowledge of Christ there. But the principal reliance has been on the reported application of King Lucius to Pope Eleutherus for Christian teachers, about A.D. 150, or rather 176. (Ussher, Primordia, cap. iv. p. 44, &c.) On all these traditions Mosheim passes the following judgment: Whether any apostle or any companion of an apostle, ever visited Britain, cannot be determined; yet the balance of probability rather inclines towards the affirmative. The story of Joseph of Arimathea might arise from the arrival of some Christian teacher from Gaul, in the second century, whose name was Joseph. As the Gauls, from Dionysius, Bishop of Paris, in the second century, made Dionysius the Arcopagite to be their apostle; and the Germans made Maternus, Eucherius, and Valerius, who lived in the third and fourth centuries, to be preachers of the first century, and attendants on St. Peter; so the British monks, I have no doubt, made a certain Joseph from Gaul in the second century, to be Joseph of Arimathea. As to Lucius, I agree with the best British writers in supposing him to be the restorer and second father of the English churches, and not their original founder. That he was a king, is not probable; because Britain was then a Roman province. He might be a nobleman, and governor of a district. His name is Roman. His application I can never believe was made to the Bishop of Rome. It is much more probable, he sent to Gaul for Christian teachers. The independence of the ancient British churches on the see of Rome, and their observing the same rites with the Gallic churches, which were planted by Asiatics, and particularly in regard to the time of Easter, show that they received the Gospel from Gaul, and not from Rome. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 213, &c.—Mur. [This subject has been extensively investigated, but with no new results—first by Dr. Hales, in his Essay on the Origin and Purity of the Primitive Church in the British Isles. Lond. 1819, 8vo; next by Thackeray, in his Researches into the Eccles. and Polit. State of Anc. Britain under the Rom. Emperors.

5. Transalpine Gaul which is now called France, perhaps received some knowledge of the Gospel before this century, either from the apostles or from their friends and disciples. But unequivocal proofs of the existence of churches in this part of Europe first occur in the present century. For in it Pothinus, a man of distinguished piety and devotedness to Christ, in company with Irenæus and other holy men, proceeded from Asia to Gaul, and there instructed the people with such success, that he gathered churches of Christians at Lyons and Vienne, of which Pothinus himself was the first president or bishop.¹

Lond. 1843, 2 vols. 8vo; and still more recently by Smith, in his Religion of Ancient Britain. Lond. post 8vo, 1844. Of Paul's presumed visit to Britain, see Burton's Lect. on Ecc. Hist. &c. i. 284-G.—R.

¹ Peter de Marca, Epistola de Evangelii in Gallia initio, published among his dissertations, and also by Valesius, subjoined to Eusebii Historia Eccl.; Launoi, Opuscula, in his Opp. tom. ii. Histoire Littéraire de la France, tome i. p. 223.; Liron, Singularités historiques et littéraires, the whole fourth volume. Paris, 1740, 8vo, and others. [The most eminent French writers have disputed about the origin of their churches. Three different opinions have been advanced. The first is that of Launoi (ubi supra), whom many writers of eminence at this day follow. It is, that if we except the Asiatic colonists of Lyons and Vienne among whom there were Christian churches formed about A.D. 150; the first propagation of Christianity among the Transalpine Gauls, was by missionaries from Rome about A.D. 250. This hypothesis is founded chiefly on the testimony of three ancient writers; viz. Sulpicius Severus, Historia Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xxxii. where, speaking of the persecution at Lyons and Vienne under Marcus Antoninus (A.D. 177), he says: These were the first martyrs among the Gauls; for the Divine religion was not received till late beyond the Alps. The next testimony is that of the author of the Acts of Saturninus, Bishop of Toulouse, who suffered under Decius. The author is supposed to have written in the beginning of the fourth century. He says: Scattered churches of a few Christians arose in some cities of Gaul in the third century. See Ruinart, Acta Martyr. sincera, p. 130. The third testimony is that of Gregory of Tours, the father of French history (in the Historia Francor. lib. i. cap. xxvii. and De Gloria Confessorum, cap. xxx ed. Ruinart, p. 399.) He says: Under Decius (A.D. 248—251), seven missionaries were sent from Rome to preach in Gaul. Now these seven missionaries are the very persons who are said to have been sent thither by St. Paul and St. Peter; viz. Trophimus Bishop of Arles, Stremonius Bishop of Clermont, Martial Bishop of Limoges, Paul Bishop of Narbonne, Saturninus Bishop of Toulouse, Gratian Bishop of Tours, and Dionysius Bishop of Paris. The second opinion is that of the strenuous advocates for the apostolic origin of the Gallic churches, Peter de Marca (ubi supra), Natalis Alexander (Hist. Eccl. Secul. i. diss. xvi. vol. iii. pages 356—420, ed. Paris, 1741, 4to), and others. They consider St. Paul and St. Peter as the fathers of their church. Paul, they suppose, travelled over nearly all France in his journey to Spain; and also sent St. Luke and Crescens into that country. For the last they allege, 2 Thim. iv. 10, "Crescens to Galatia;" or rather to Gaul, according to Epiphanius and others, who, for Galatia, would read Galatia. St. Peter, they conceive, sent Trophimus, his disciple, into Gaul. St. Philip, they also suppose, laboured in Gaul. And the seven bishops above-mentioned, they say, were sent by the apostles from Rome. Very few at this day embrace the opinion entire. The third opinion takes a middle course between the first and the second, and is that which is maintained by Liron, Dissertation sur l'établissement de la religion Chrétienne dans les Gaules; in the fourth volume of his Singularités historiques,

6. This rapid propagation of Christianity is ascribed by the writers of the second century almost exclusively to the efficient will of God, to the energy of Divine truth, and to the miracles wrought by Christians. Yet human counsels and pious efforts ought not to be wholly overlooked. Much was undoubtedly effected by the activity of pious men, who recommended and communicated to the people around them the writings of Christ's ambassadors, which were already collected into one volume. All people indeed were not acquainted with the language in which these divine books were composed; but this obstacle was early removed by the labours of translators. As the language of the Romans was extensively used, many Latin translations, as we are informed by Augustine,² were made at an early period. Of these, that which is called the Italic Version³ was preferred to all others. The Latin version was followed by a Syriac, an Egyptian, an Ethiopic, and some others. But the precise dates of these several translations cannot be ascertained.⁴

7. Those who wrote apologies for the Christians, and thus met the calumnies and slanders by which they were unjustly assailed, removed some obstacles to the progress of Christ's religion, and in this way contributed not a little to the enlargement of the church. For very many were prevented from embracing Christianity, solely by those detestable calumnies with which ungodly men aspersed it.⁵ Another support to the Christian cause was furnished by the writers against the heretics. For

&c. It admits what Launoi, Sirmond, and Tillemont have fully proved, that Dionysius, the first Bishop of Paris, was not Dionysius, the Areopagite mentioned Acts xvii. 34, but a man who lived in the third century. It also gives up the story of St. Philip, and of most of the pretended apostolic missionaries to Gaul. But it maintains the probability of Paul's travelling over Gaul on his way to Spain; and of his sending Luke and Crescens to that country; and affirms that in the second century, there were many flourishing churches in Gaul, besides those of Lyons and Vienne. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C.M. p. 208, &c.; Tillemont, Mémoires pour servir à l'hist. de l'Egl. vol. iv. p. 983.—Mur.
² Augustine, De Doct. Christ. lib. ii. cap. xi. xv.
³ See Carpov, Critica Sacra, P. T. p. 663. [and the Introductions to the New Test. by Michaëlis, Horne, and others.—Mur.
⁴ Hasnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, livr. ix. chap. i. tome i. 450.
⁵ Nothing more injurious can be conceived than the terms of contempt, indignation, and reproach, which the heathens employed in expressing their hatred against the Christians, who were called by them atheists, because they derided the heathen polytheism; magicians, because they wrought miracles; self-murderers, because they suffered martyrdom cheerfully for the truth; haters of the light, because, to avoid the fury of the persecutors raised against them, they were forced, at first, to hold their religious assemblies in the night; with a multitude of other ignominious epithets employed by Tacitus, Suetonius, Celsus, &c. See Bingham, Orig. Eccl. book i. chap. ii. p. 5.—Macl. [See on this subject, Turner's Calumnies on the Primitive Christians accounted for.—R.]

the doctrines of these sects were so absurd or so abominable, and the morals of some of them so disgraceful and impious, as to induce many to stand aloof from Christianity. But when they learned from the books against the heretics, that the true followers of Christ held these perverse men in abhorrence, their feelings towards them were changed.

8. It is easier to conceive than to express how much the miraculous powers and the extraordinary Divine gifts which the Christians exercised on various occasions, contributed to extend the limits of the church. The gift of foreign tongues appears to have gradually ceased, as soon as many nations became enlightened with the truth, and numerous churches of Christians were everywhere established; for it became less necessary than it was at first. But the other gifts, with which God favoured the rising church of Christ, were, as we learn from numerous testimonies of the ancients, still everywhere distributed.¹

9. I wish we were fully authorized to place among the miracles what many ancient writers have recorded concerning a certain legion of Christian soldiers in the army of Marcus Antoninus, in his war against the Marcomanni (A.D. 174), which by its supplications procured a shower of rain when the Roman troops were ready to perish with thirst. But the reality of this miracle is a subject of controversy among the learned; and those who think that the Christian soldiers erred, in regarding that sudden and unexpected shower by which the Roman army was saved as a miraculous interposition, are supported not only by very respectable authorities, but by arguments of no little weight.²

10. It is certain that the Roman army, when reduced to the greatest straits, was relieved by a sudden fall of rain; and that this shower was regarded, both by the pagans and the Christians as extraordinary and miraculous: the latter ascribed the unexpected favour to Christ's being moved by the prayers of his disciples; while the former attributed it to Jupiter, or Mercury, or to the power of magic. It is equally certain, I think, that many Christians were then serving in the Roman army. And who can doubt that these, on such an occasion, implored the compassion of their God and Saviour? Further, as the Christians of those times looked upon all extraordinary events as miracles, and ascribed every unusual and peculiar advantage enjoyed by the Romans to the prayers of Christians, it is not strange, that the preservation of the

¹ Collections of these testimonies have been made, by Panner, De Donis miraculosis; and by Spencer, in his Nota ad Origenem contra Celsum, pag. 5, 6; but the most copious is by Mamachius, Orig. et Antiq. Christiana, tom. i. p. 363, &c. [The principal testimonies of the second and third centuries, are Justin Martyr, Apol. ii. cap. vi.; Dial. cum Tryph. cap. xxxix. and lxxxi.; Irenæus, lib. ii. cap. xxxi. and lib. v. cap. vi.; and in Euseb. H. E. lib. v. cap. vii.; Tertullian, Apolo. cap. xxlii. xxvii. xxxli. xxxvii.; Ad Scap. cap. ii.; Origen, contra Cels. lib. i. p. 7; and lib. vii. p. 334, ed. Spencer; Dionys. Alex. in Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. cap. xl.; Minutius Felix, Octav. p. 361, ed. Paris, 1605; Cyprian, De Idol. Vanit. p. 14, Ad Demetrium, p. 191, ed. Brem. See Moshelm, De Reb. Christ. ante C.M. p. 221. Very candid remarks on this subject may also be found in Schroeckh, Kirchenges. vol. iv. p. 380, &c.; and in Jortin's Remarks on Ecc. Hist. vol. i. p. 247.—Mur. [The question regarding the existence and extent of miraculous powers in the early ages of the church was discussed in the last century, with great keenness, in consequence of the publication, in 1749, of Middleton's Free inquiry into the miraculous powers of the Christian Church. He limited their exercise to the apostles, and repudiated the alleged miracles of the second and third centuries, but on grounds which appeared designed to convey a covert attack on the Scripture miracles. Answers appeared, by Church, Brooke, Dodwell, and others, who maintained extreme opinions in favour of the protracted continuance of these powers. Bishop Kaye, a most competent and judicious critic, has recently given this opinion on the question:—"I may be allowed to state the conclusion to which I myself have been led, by a comparison of the statements in the book of Acts with the writings of the fathers of the second century. My conclusion then is, that the power of working miracles was not extended beyond the disciples, upon whom the apostles conferred it by the imposition of their hands."—Kaye's Tertullian, p. 98.—R.]

² The arguments on the two sides of the question may be seen in Witsius, Diss. de Legione fulminatrix, subjoined to his Egyptiaca. He defends the reality of the miracle; and Dan. Laroque, Diss. de Legione fulminat. subjoined to the Adversaria Sacra of his father Matthew Laroque, opposes the idea of a miracle; but best of all in the controversy concerning the miracle of the thundering legion, between Peter King [rather the Rev Richard King of Topham—Mur.] and Walter Moyle, which I have translated into Latin and published with notes, in my Synagma Dissertationum ad disciplinam sanctiores pertinentium. See also Jablonski, Spicilegium de Legione fulminatrix; in the Miscellan. Lipsiens. tom. viii. p. 417, [and in his Opuscula, vol. iv. p. 3, &c.—R.] where, in particular, the reasons are investigated which led the Christians improperly to class this rain among the miracles. [See also Moshelm, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 249, &c. The most important among the ancient accounts of this matter are, on the side of the pagans, Dion Cassius, Historia Romana, lib. lxxi. cap. viii.; Julius Capitolinus, Vita Marc. Antonin. cap. xxiv.; Ælius Lampridius, Helioabali vita, cap. lx.; Claudian, Consulat. vi. Honorii v.; and on the side of the Christians, Tertullian, Apologet. cap. v. Ad Scapulam, cap. iv.; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. v. and Chronicon, pages 82–215; Xiphilius, on Dion Cassius, lib. lxxi. cap. ix. x.—Mur. [Against the existence of any miracle in this case, see Bishop Kaye's Tertullian, &c. p. 106; Burton's Lect. on Ecc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 166; and Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 190, &c. with the Note in p. 175, in which he says: "The miracle of the thundering legion, after having suffered deadly wounds from former assailants, was finally transfixed by the critical spear of Moyle." Little did he think that soon after, a learned Fellow of Oxford would rush into the field to break a lance in defence of this slaughtered miracle. The well-known Mr. Newman, when in his state of transition between the churches of England and Rome, published in 1842, an Essay on the Miracles recorded in Ecclesiastical History, in which he not only defends in general the miracles of the Nicene Church, but specially that of the thundering legion, together with several others which had long been rejected by every critic competent to apply the simplest rules of evidence.—R.]

Roman emperor and his army should be placed among the miracles which God wrought in answer to the prayers of Christians. But as all wise men are now agreed that no event is to be accounted a miracle, if it can be adequately accounted for on natural principles, or in the common and ordinary course of Divine Providence; and as this rain may be easily thus accounted for, it is obvious what judgment ought to be formed respecting it.

11. The Jews, first under Trajan (A.D. 116), and afterwards under Adrian (A.D. 132), led on by Bar-Chochebas who pretended to be the Messiah, made insurrection against the Romans and again suffered the greatest calamities. A vast number were put to death; and a new city, called Ælia Capitolina, was erected on the site of Jerusalem, which not an individual of that miserable race was allowed to enter.¹ This overthrow of the Jews confirmed, in some measure, the external tranquillity of the Christian community. For that turbulent nation had previously been everywhere the accusers of the Christians before the Roman judges; and in Palestine and the neighbouring regions, they had themselves inflicted great injuries upon them, because they refused to aid them in their opposition to the Romans.² But this new calamity rendered it not so easy for the Jews, as formerly, to do either of these things.

12. The philosophers and learned men who joined the Christians in this century, were no inconsiderable protection and ornament to this holy religion, by their discussions, their writings, and their talents. But if any are disposed to question whether the Christian cause received more benefit than injury from these men, I must confess myself unable to decide the point. For the noble simplicity and the majestic dignity of the Christian religion were lost, or at least impaired, when these philosophers presumed to associate their dogmas with it, and to bring faith and piety under the dominion of human reason.

CHAPTER II.

THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. In the beginning of this century there were no laws in force against the Christians, for those of Nero had been repealed by the senate, and those of Domitian by his successor Nerva.³ But it had become a common custom to persecute the Christians, and even to put them to death, as often as the pagan priests, or the populace under the instigation of the priests, demanded their destruction. Hence under the reign of Trajan, otherwise a good prince, popular tumults were frequently raised in the cities against the Christians, which were fatal to many of them.⁴ When therefore such tumults sprang up in Bithynia, under the proprætor Pliny the younger, he thought proper to apply to the emperor for instructions how to treat the Christians. The emperor wrote back that the Christians were not to be sought after; but if they were regularly accused and convicted, and yet refused to return to the religion of their fathers, they were to be put to death as bad citizens.⁵

2. This edict of Trajan being registered among the public laws of the Roman empire, set bounds indeed to the fury of the enemies of the Christians, but still it caused the destruction of many of them, even under the best of the emperors. For whenever any one had courage to assume the odious office of an accuser, and the accused did not deny the charge [of being a Christian], he might be delivered over to the executioner unless he apostatized from Christianity. Thus by Trajan's law, perseverance in the Christian religion was a capital offence. Under this law, Simcon, the son of Cleophas and Bishop of Jerusalem, a venerable old man, being accused by the Jews suffered crucifixion.⁶ According to the same law, Trajan himself ordered the great Ignatius, Bishop of Antioch, to be

³ Bishop Kaye has shown that these conclusions of Mosheim, though corroborated by Gibbon, are erroneous, and that there were laws in force which, though not expressly directed against the Christians by name, both could be and were brought to bear upon them, independently of any new laws by Nero or Domitian. Kaye's Tertullian, &c. p. 114, &c. These general laws were those against the introduction of foreign religions (sacra peregrina), and against illegal associations (collegia, sodalitates), and nocturnal assemblages; to all of which the primitive Christians could be easily made amenable. See the references and authorities in Gieseler, Lehrbuch. Davidson's Translation, vol. i. p. 26.—R.

⁴ Eusebius, Historia Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxxii.

⁵ Pliny, Epistol. lib. x. Epist. 97, 98, which epistles many learned men have illustrated by their comments, and especially Vossius, Böhmer, Baldwin, and Heumann. See Milner's Hist. of the Ch. of Christ, century ii. chap. i.—Mur. [The student should by all means read the excellent remarks of Millman on this celebrated letter of Pliny, on Trajan's rescript, and generally on the state of the law with regard to the punishment of the Christians during this and the subsequent reigns.—Hist. of Christ, vol. ii. p. 140, &c. He should also refer to Welch's judicious commentary on these documents, in his Elements of Church Hist. vol. i. p. 452, &c. and consult Gieseler's references to several important continental works on this subject. See Lehrbuch, &c.—Davidson's Translation vol. i. p. 105.—R.]

⁶ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxxii.

¹ Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph. p. 49—278. [Dion Cassius, Hist. Rom. lib. lxi, cap. xli. xiv.—Mur.]

² Justin Martyr, Apolog. i. p. 72.—Schl.

thrown to wild beasts;¹ for the kind of death was left by the law to the pleasure of the judge.

3. Yet this law of Trajan was a great restraint upon the priests who wished to oppress the Christians, because few persons were willing to assume the dangerous office of accusers. Under the reign of Adrian, therefore, who succeeded Trajan, A.D. 117, they evaded it by an artifice; for they excited the populace at the seasons of the public shows and games, to demand with united voice from the presidents and magistrates the destruction of the Christians; and these public clamours could not be disregarded without danger of an insurrection.² But Serenus Granianus, the proconsul of Asia, made representation to the emperor, that it was inhuman and unjust to immolate men convicted of no crime, at the pleasure of a furious mob. Adrian, therefore, addressed an edict to the presidents of the provinces, forbidding the Christians to be put to death unless accused in due form, and convicted of offence against the laws; i.e. as I apprehend, he reinstated the law of Trajan.³ Perhaps also the Apologies for the Christians presented by Quadratus and Aristides, had an influence on the mind of the emperor.⁴ In this reign Bar-Chochabas, a pretended king of the Jews, before he was vanquished by Adrian, committed great outrages on the Christians, because they would not join his standard.⁵

¹ See the Acta martyrii Ignatiani; published by Ruinart, and in the Patres Apostolici, and elsewhere. See above, p. 38, note³, and Milner's Hist. of the Ch. cent. ii. chap. i. vol. i. p. 153, Lond. 1827.—Mur.

² It was an ancient custom or law of the Romans, of which many examples occur in their history, that the people when assembled at the public games, whether at Rome or in the provinces, might demand what they pleased of the emperor or magistrates; which demands could not be rejected. This right indeed properly belonged only to Roman citizens, but it was gradually assumed and exercised by others, especially in the larger cities. Hence when assembled at the public games, the populace could demand the destruction of all Christians, or of any individuals of them whom they pleased; and the magistrates dared not utterly refuse these demands.—Moreover, the abominable lives and doctrines of certain heretics of this age, brought odium on the whole Christian community; as we are expressly taught by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. vii. See Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 236.—Mur.

³ See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. ix. and Baldwin, Ad Edicta Principum in Christianos, p. 73, &c. This edict is also given by Justin Martyr, Apolog. i. sec. 68, 69. It was addressed not only to Minutius Fundanus, the successor of Serenus, but to the other governors of provinces; as we learn from Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xxvi.—Schl.

⁴ These Apologies are mentioned by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. iii. and Jerome, Epist. ad Magnum Orat. Urbis Romæ, Opp. tom. iv. pars 2, p. 656, ed. Benedict. and De Viris Illustr. cap. xix. xx.—From this indulgence of the emperor towards the Christians, arose the suspicion that he himself inclined to their religion. Lampridius, Vita Alexandri Severi, cap. xliii.—Schl.

⁵ Justin Martyr, Apolog. ii. p. 72, ed. Colon.; Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. xxi.—Schl.

4. In the reign of Antoninus Pius, the enemies of the Christians assailed them in a new manner; for, as the Christians by the laws of Adrian were to be convicted of some crime, and some of the presidents would not admit their religion to be a crime, they were accused of impiety or atheism. This calumny was met by Justin Martyr in an Apology presented to the emperor. And the emperor afterwards decreed that the Christians should be treated according to the law of Adrian.⁶ A little after, Asia Minor was visited with earthquakes; and the people regarding the Christians as the cause of their calamities, rushed upon them with every species of violence and outrage. When informed of this, the emperor addressed an edict to the Common Council of Asia, denouncing capital punishment against accusers of the Christians, if they could not convict them of some crime.⁷

5. Marcus Antoninus, the philosopher, whom most writers extol immoderately for his wisdom and virtue, did not indeed repeal this decree of his father, and the other laws of the preceding emperors; but he listened too much to the enemies of the Christians and especially to the philosophers, who accused them of the most horrid crimes and particularly of impiety, of feasting on the flesh of murdered children, and of incest. Hence no emperor after the reign of Nero, inflicted greater evils and calamities on the Christians than this eminently wise Marcus Antoninus; nor was there any emperor, under whom more Apologies for them were drawn up, of which those by Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, and Tatian, are still extant.⁸

⁶ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xxvi. where Melito tells Marcus Aurelius, that his father (Anton. Pius) wrote to the Larissæans, the Thessalonians, the Athenians, and to all the Greeks, not to molest the Christians.—Schl.

⁷ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xiii. where the edict is given at length. It may also be seen in Milner, Hist. of the Ch. cent. ii. chap. ii. vol. i. p. 182, &c. where several pious reflections are subjoined.—It has been questioned whether this edict was issued by Marcus Aurelius or by his father Antoninus Pius. Valerius (on Euseb. H. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xiii.) decides for the former; and Mosheim (De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 240, &c.) is as decisive for the latter. Others have little doubt that the whole edict is a forgery of some early Christian. For this opinion they urge that its language is not such as the pagan emperors uniformly use, but is plainly that of an eulogist of the Christians. See Neander's Altkern. Kirchengesch. vol. i. part i. p. 151, &c.—Mur. (See also the references to several works in support of its spuriousness, in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c.—Davidson's Trans. vol. i. pages 130, 131.—R.)

Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 244, characterizes Marcus Antoninus as a well-disposed but superstitious man, a great scholar, but an indifferent emperor. His persecutions of the Christians arose from his negligence of business, his ignorance of the character of Christians and of Christianity, and from his easy credulity and acquiescence in the wishes of others.—His character is also given by Milner, Hist. of the Church, cent. ii. chap. iv. and very elaborately by Neander, Kir-

6. In the first place, this emperor issued unjust edicts against the Christians whom he regarded as vain, obstinate, devoid of understanding, and strangers to virtue;¹ yet the precise import of these edicts is not now known. In the next place, he allowed the judges, when Christians were accused of the crimes already specified by slaves and by the vilest of persons, to put their prisoners to torture; and notwithstanding their most steadfast denial of the charges alleged against them, to inflict on them capital punishments; for, as the laws would not allow the Christians to be executed without a crime, the judges who wished to condemn them had to resort to some method of making them appear to be guilty. Hence under this emperor, not only were several very excellent men most unjustly put to death, among whom were Polycarp, the pious Bishop of Smyrna, and the celebrated philosopher Justin, surnamed Martyr²; but also several Christian churches, especially those of Lyons and Vienne in France, (A.D. 177.) were by his order nearly destroyed and annihilated by a variety of tortures.³

7. Under the reign of Commodus, his son (A.D. 180—192), if we except a few instances of suffering for the renunciation of paganism, no great calamity befel the Christians.⁴ But when Severus was placed on the throne near the close of the century, much Christian blood was shed in Africa, Egypt, and other provinces. This is certain from the testimonies of Tertullian,⁵

Clemens Alexandrinus,⁶ and others; and those must mistake the fact who say that the Christians enjoyed peace under Severus, up to the time when he enacted laws exposing them to the loss of life and property, which was in the beginning of the next century; for, as the laws of the emperors were not abrogated, and among these the edicts of Trajan and Marcus Antoninus were most iniquitous; it was in the power of the presidents to persecute the Christians with impunity whenever they pleased. These calamities of the Christians near the end of this century, were what induced Tertullian to compose his Apology and some other works.⁷

8. It will appear less unaccountable that so holy a people as the Christians should suffer so much persecution, if it be considered that the patrons of the ancient superstition continually assailed them with their railings and accusations. These reproaches and calumnies of which we have before spoken, are recounted by the writers of the Apologies. The Christians were attacked in a book written expressly against them by Celsus, the philosopher, whom Origen in his confutation of him represents as an Epicurean, but whom we, for substantial reasons, believe to have been a Platonist of the sect of Ammonius.⁸ This miserable sophist deals in slander, as Origen's answer to him shows. And he does not so much attack the Christians as play off his wit, which is not distinguished for elegance and refinement. Fronto, the rhetorician, also made some attempts against the Christians; but these have perished with the exception of a bare mention of them by Minutius Felix.⁹ To these may chengesch. vol. i. part i. p. 154, &c.—Mur. [Milman devotes an entire chapter to the elucidation of this singular but instructive phenomenon, of the best of the Roman emperors proving the bitterness of the Christians' persecutors. He accounts for it on several grounds different from those assigned by Mosheim in the text. Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 159, &c.—R.

¹ See Melito, as quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. xxv.

² The Acta Martyrii of both Polycarp and Justin Martyr are published by Ruinart, in his Acta martyrii, sincera. The former also in the Patres Apostol. The life and martyrdom of Polycarp are the subject of the 5th chapter of Milner's Hist. of the Ch. century ii. vol. i. p. 209, &c. as those of Justin Martyr are of chap. iii. of the same, p. 187, &c.—Mur.

³ See the letter of the Christians at Lyons giving account of this persecution, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. ii.; also in Fox, Book of Martyrs, and in Milner's Hist. of the Ch. cent. ii. chap. vi. vol. i. p. 223, &c.—Mur. [Most eloquently has Milman epitomised the ancient narratives of the well-attested martyrdoms of Polycarp and of the Viennese Christians. These were scenes which the author of the "Martyr of Antioch" was fully prepared to depict with deep pathos. Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 184, &c. and 193, &c.—R.

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxiv. and xvi. xiii. xix.

⁵ Tertullian, Ad Scapulum, cap. iv. and Apolog. cap. v. which show that Severus himself was, at first, favourable to the Christians. But the same Apolog. cap. xxxv. xlix. vii. xii. xxx. xxxvii. shows that Christians suffered before the enactment of the laws.—Schl.

⁶ Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. ii. p. 494.—Schl. [See also the account of the martyrs of Scillita in Africa, A.D. 200, in Ruinart's Acta Martyrii; Baronius, Ann. A.D. 200; and Milner, Hist. of the Ch. vol. i. p. 302.—Mur.

⁷ I have expressly treated of this subject in my Diss. de vera etate Apologetici Tertulliani et initio persecutionis Severi; which is the first essay in my Syntagma Diss. ad hist. eccles. pertinent. Vol. i. Alton, 1743.

⁸ See Mosheim's preface to the German translation of Origen's work.—Mur. [The learned Dr. Lardner does not think it possible that Celsus could have been of the sect of Ammonius; since the former lived and wrote in the second century, whereas the latter did not flourish before the third. And indeed we have from Origen himself, that he knew of two only of the name of Celsus, one who lived in the time of Nero, and the other in the reign of Adrian, and afterwards. The latter was the philosopher, who wrote against Christianity.—Macl.

⁹ Minutius Felix, Octavius, p. 266, ed. Herald. [Minutius mentions this calumniator in two passages, namely, cap. x. p. 99, and cap. xxii. p. 322; in the former of which, he calls him Cirtenensis noster; implying, that he was of Cirta, in Africa; in the latter passage, he speaks of him as an orator, indicating what profession he followed. It has been supposed by the learned, and not without reason, that this Fronto was Cornelius Fronto, the rhetorician, who instructed Marcus An-be added Crescens, a Cynic philosopher, who though he seems to have written nothing against the Christians, yet was very eager to injure them; and in particular did not cease to persecute Justin Martyr, till he compassed his death.¹

tonius in eloquence (and whose works were first published A.D. 1816, by Ang. Maio, Frankf.-on-Mayn, in 2 parts). So long as the Christian community was made up of unlearned persons, the philosophers despised them; but when, in the second century, some eminent philosophers became Christians, as Justin, Athenagoras, Pantenus, and others, who retained the name, garb, and mode of living of philosophers, and became teachers of youth, and while they gave a philosophical aspect to Christianity, exposed the vanity of the pagan philosophy and the shameless lives of those addicted to it; the pagan philosophers, perceiving their reputations and their interests to be at stake, now joined the populace and the priests in persecuting the Christians in general; and they especially assailed the Christian philosophers with their calumnies and accusations. Their chief motive was, not the love of truth, but their own influence and worldly interest; just the same causes which had before moved the pagan priests. This war of the philosophers commenced in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, who was himself addicted to philosophy. And it is easy to see what induced him to listen to his brother philosophers, and at their instigation, to allow the Christians to be persecuted. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 256, &c.—Mur.

¹ Justin Martyr, Apologia II. p. 21, ed. Oxon.; Tatian, Orat. contrus Græcos, p. 72, ed. Worthill.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LEARNING AND PHILOSOPHY.

1. LITERATURE, although it seemed in some measure to recover its former dignity and lustre during the reign of Trajan,¹ could not long retain its influence under the subsequent emperors, who were indisposed to patronize it. The most learned among those Roman sovereigns, Marcus Antoninus, showed favour only to the philosophers and especially to the Stoics; the other arts and sciences he, like the Stoics, held in contempt.² Hence the literary productions of this century, among the Romans, are far inferior to those of the preceding century in elegance, brilliancy, and good taste.

2. Yet there were men of excellent genius among both Greeks and Romans, who wrote well on almost every branch of learning then cultivated. Among the Greeks, Plutarch was particularly eminent. He was a man of various but ill-digested learning; and besides was tainted with the principles of the academics. Rhetoricians, sophists, and grammarians had schools in all the more considerable towns of the Roman empire, in which they pretended to train up youth for public life, by various exercises and declamations. But those educated in these schools were vain, loquacious, and formed for display, rather than truly eloquent, wise, and competent to transact business. Hence the sober and considerate looked with contempt on the education acquired in the schools of these teachers. There were two public academies; one at

Rome founded by Adrian, in which all the sciences were taught but especially jurisprudence; the other at Berytus in Phœnicia, in which jurists were principally educated.³

3. Many philosophers of all the different sects flourished at this time; but to enumerate them belongs rather to other works than to this.⁴ The Stoic sect had the honour of embracing two great men, Marcus Antoninus, the emperor, and Epictetus.⁵ But each of these men had more admirers than disciples and followers; nor were the Stoics, according to history, held in the highest estimation in this age. There were larger numbers in the schools of the Platonists; among other reasons because they were less austere, and their doctrines were more in accordance with the popular notions respecting the gods. But no sect appears to have numbered more adherents than the Epicureans, whose precepts led to an indulgent, careless, and voluptuous life.⁶

4. Near the close of this century a new philosophical sect suddenly started up,

³ M. Antoninus, Meditationes, or, Ad se ipsum, lib. I. sec. 7, 10, 17, pag. 4, 7, 16, ed. Lip.

⁴ Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Trypho. Opp. p. 218, &c. Many of the philosophers of this age are mentioned by M. Antoninus, Meditat. or, Ad se ipsum, lib. i.

⁵ Concerning M. Antoninus, see Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. II. p. 578; and for Epictetus, ibid. p. 568.—Schl. Stüdtlin, Gesch. der Moralphilos. p. 265, &c. treats of M. Antoninus; and ibid. p. 260, &c. of Epictetus.—Mur. (Ritter has also treated of the state of philosophy among the Romans, and especially Epictetus and Antoninus. See his Hist. of Ancient Philosophy, Morrison's Transl. vol. IV. p. 75 to 227. It is to be regretted that the Geschichte der Christl. Philosophie by the same scholar, four volumes of which have been published at Hamburg, has not yet been rendered accessible to the English reader. The last volume comes down to the middle of the fifteenth century, where he closes his survey of the mediæval systems of philosophy and theology.—R.

⁶ Lucian, Pseudomantis, Opp. tom. I. p. 763.

¹ Pliny, Epistolæ, lib. III. Ep. xviii. pag. 234, 235, ed. Cortell et Longoli.

² M. Antoninus, Meditationes, or, Ad se ipsum, lib. I. sec. 7, pag. 3, 4; sec. 17. p. 17, ed. Lips.

which in a short time prevailed over a large part of the Roman empire, and not only nearly swallowed up the other sects but likewise did immense injury to Christianity.¹ Egypt was its birth-place and particularly Alexandria, which for a long time had been the seat of literature and every science. Its followers chose to be called Platonics. Yet they did not follow Plato implicitly, but collected from all systems whatever seemed to coincide with their own views. And the ground of their preference for the name of Platonics was, that they conceived Plato had treated more correctly than any of the others, that most important branch of philosophy which treats of God and those things which are placed beyond the cognizance of the senses.

5. That controversial spirit in philosophy which obliged every one to swear allegiance to the dogmas of his master, was now disapproved by the more wise. Hence, among lovers of truth and men of moderation, a new class of philosophers had grown up in Egypt, who avoided altercation and a sectarian spirit, and who professed simply to follow truth, gathering up whatever was accordant with it in all the philosophic schools. They assumed therefore the name of Eclectics. But although these philosophers were really the partisans of no sect, it appears from a variety of testimonies, that they much preferred Plato, and embraced most of his dogmas concerning God, the human soul, and the universe.²

6. This philosophy was adopted by such of the learned at Alexandria as wished to be accounted Christians, and yet to retain the name, the garb, and the rank of philosophers. In particular all those who in this century presided in the schools of the Christians at Alexandria—Athenagoras, Pantænus, and Clemens Alexandrinus—are said to have approved of it.³ These men were persued that true philosophy, the great and most salutary gift of God, lay in scattered fragments among all the sects of philosophers; and therefore that it was the duty of every wise man, and especially of a Christian teacher, to collect those fragments from all quarters, and to use them for the defence of religion and the confutation of impiety. Yet this selection of opinions did not prevent their regarding Plato as wiser than all others, and as having advanced sentiments concerning God, the soul, and spiritual things, very accordant with the principles of Christianity.⁴

7. This [Eclectic] mode of philosophising received some modification, when Ammonius Saccas at the close of the century, with great applause opened a school at Alexandria, and laid the foundation of that sect which is called the New Platonic. This man was born and educated a Christian, and perhaps made pretensions to Christianity all his life.⁵ Being possessed of great fertility of genius as well as eloquence, he Hyperit Libellum de Catechesi; Aulsius, Delle Scuole Sacre, lib. ii. cap. i. li. xxi.; Laugemack, Historia Catechismorum, par. i. p. 86. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 273, &c.—Mur. [See Guerike, Comment. de Schola que Alexand. floruit Catechetica Halle, 1824, 1825. M. Matter of Strasburg has published a work on the Alexandrian school; but, although learned and valuable, it refers very briefly to the Christian Catechetical school there. It is entitled, Histoire de l'Ecole d'Alexandrie comparée aux principales écoles contemporaines. Paris, 1840-4, 2d edit. 2 vols. 8vo.—M.

⁴ See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 276, &c.—Mur.

⁵ The history of the philosopher Ammonius is involved in great obscurity. All that could be gathered from antiquity respecting him, is given by Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 205. See also Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, lib. iv. cap. xxvi. Whether Ammonius continued a professed Christian or apostatized, has been much debated. Porphyry, who studied under Plotinus, a disciple of Ammonius (as quoted by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xix.) says, he was born of Christian parents, but when he came to mature years embraced the religion of the laws; i. e. the pagan religion. Eusebius taxes Porphyry with falsehood in this; and says that Ammonius continued a Christian till his death, as appears from his books, one of which was on the accordance of Moses with Jesus Christ. Jerome, De Script. Illustr. cap. iv. says nearly the same. Valerius, Bayle, Basnage, and Mosheim (when he wrote his essay De Ecclesia turbata per recentiores Platonicos), agreed with Eusebius and Jerome. But when he wrote his Commentarii de Reb. Christ. he fell in with the opinion of Fabricius, Brucker, and others (and which is now the general opinion), that Eusebius and Jerome confounded Ammonius the philosopher, with another Ammonius, the reputed author of a harmony of the Gospels and other works; because it can hardly be supposed this enthusiastic admirer of philosophy would have found time or inclination for composing such books. Besides, it is said that Ammonius the philosopher published no books. Still the question remains, what were the religious character and creed of this philosopher in his maturer years? Mosheim thinks it probable that he did not openly renounce Christianity, but endeavoured to accommodate himself to the feelings of all parties; and therefore he was claimed by both pagans and Christians. Hence, if he was a Christian, he was a very inconsistent one and did much injury to its cause. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 281.—Mur.

¹ See Mosheim's Commentat. de turbata per recentiores Platonicos ecclesia in his Synagoga Diss. ad hist. eccles. pertinent. vol. i. p. 88, &c.; and Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 162, &c.—Schl. [And, on the contrary, Keil, Exercit. xviii. De Doctoribus veteris eccles. culpâ corrupte per Platonicas sententias theologia, liberandis, Lips. 1793—1807, 4to.—Mur.

² See Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 189, &c.—Schl.

³ The title and dignity of philosopher so much delighted those good men that when made presbyters, they would not abandon the philosopher's cloak and dress. See Origen's letter to Eusebius, Opp. tom. i. p. 2, ed. De la Rue; [Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Trypho. initium. For proof that Pantænus studied philosophy, see Origen, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xix. Jerome, De Script. Illustr. cap. xx. The proficiency of Athenagoras in philosophy, appears from his Apology, and his Essay on the Resurrection. That Clemens Alex. was much addicted to philosophy, is very evident; see his Stromata, passim.—Concerning the Alexandrian Christian school, see Conringius, Antiquitates academice, p. 29; Schmidt, Diss. prefixed to undertook to bring all systems of philosophy and religion into harmony, or attempted to teach a philosophy by which all philosophers and the men of all religions, the Christian not excepted, might unite and hold fellowship. And here especially lies the difference between this new sect and the Eclectic philosophy which had before flourished in Egypt; for the Eclectics held that there was a mixture of good and bad, true and false, in all the systems; and therefore they selected out of all, what appeared to them consonant with reason and rejected the rest. But Ammonius held that all sects professed one and the same system of truth, with only some difference in the mode of stating it, and some minute difference in their conceptions; so that by means of suitable explanations, they might with little difficulty be brought into one body.¹ Moreover he held this new and singular principle, that the prevailing religions and the Christian also, must be understood and explained according to this common philosophy of all the sects, and that the fables of the vulgar pagans and their priests, as well as the interpretations of the disciples of Christ, ought to be separated from their respective religions.

8. The grand object of Ammonius, to bring all sects and religions into harmony, required him to do much violence to the sentiments and opinions of all parties, philosophers, priests, and Christians, and particularly by allegorical interpretations, to remove very many impediments out of his way. The manner in which he prosecuted his object, appears in the writings of his disciples and adherents which have come down to us in great abundance. To make the arduous work more easy, he assumed that philosophy was first produced and nurtured among the people of the East; that it was inculcated among the Egyptians by Hermes,² and thence passed to the Greeks; that it was a little obscured and deformed by the disputatious Greeks; but still that by Plato, the best interpreter of the principles of Hermes and of the ancient oriental sages, it was preserved for the most part entire and uncorrupted; that the religions received by the various nations of the world were not inconsistent with this most ancient philosophy; yet it had most unfortunately happened, that what the ancients taught by symbols and fictitious stories in the manner of the orientals, had been understood literally by the people and the priests; and thus the agents of divine providence, those demons whom the supreme Lord of all had placed over the various parts of our world, had erroneously been converted into gods and had been worshipped with many vain ceremonies; that therefore the public religions of all nations should be corrected by this ancient philosophy; and that it was the sole object of Christ to set bounds to the reigning superstition, and correct the errors which had crept into religion, but not to abolish altogether the ancient systems.³

9. To these assumptions he added the common doctrines of the Egyptians (among whom he was born and educated), concerning the universe and the Deity as constituting one great whole [Panthéism⁴], concerning the eternity of the world, the nature of the soul, providence, and the government of this world by demons, and other received doctrines, all of which he considered as true and not to be called in question. For it is most evident that the ancient philosophy of the Egyptians, which they pretended to have learned from Hermes, was the basis of the New Platonic or Ammonian; and the book of Jamblichus, De Mysteriis Ægyptiorum, in particular makes this evident. In the next place, with these Egyptian notions he united the Platonic philosophy; which he accomplished with little difficulty, by distorting some of the principles of Plato and putting a false construction on his language.⁵ Finally, the dogmas of the other sects he construed, as far as was possible, by artifice, ingenuity, and the aid of allegories, into apparent coincidence with these Egyptian and Platonic principles.

10. To this Egyptiaco-Platonic philosophy, this ingenious man and fanatic joined

³ Jamblichus, De Mysteriis Ægyptiorum, lib. i. cap. ii. — Schl.

⁴ On this principle the whole philosophy of the ancient Egyptians was founded; and on it Ammonius erected his system. The book which goes under the title of Hermetis Trismegisti Sermo de Natura Deorum, ad Asclepium, which is extant in Latin among the works of Apuleius, the supposed translator, is evidence of this fact. See also Eusebius, Preparatio Evangel. lib. iii. cap. ix, and Mosheim's notes on Cudworth's Intellectual System, vol. i. p. 404, &c. And the same fundamental principle is assumed by Plotinus, Proclus, Simplicius, Jamblichus, and all the New Platonists. See for example, Porphyry, in his Life of Plotinus, cap. ii. p. 94. — Schl.

⁵ The principle of the Ammonian and Egyptian philosophy, that God and the world constitute one indivisible whole, it cost him much labour to reduce to harmony with the system of Plato; who, as we learn from his Timæus, taught the external existence of matter as a substance distinct from God. See Proclus on the Timæus of Plato. — Schl.

¹ The views of this sect are very clearly expressed by Julian, who was a great devotee of this philosophy, Orat. vi. contra Cynicos, Opp. p. 184. — Schl.

² This appears from the writings of all his followers, Plotinus, Proclus, Porphyry, Damascius, and others. And the learned, not without reason, conjecture that all the works of Hermes and Zoroaster, which we now have, originated in the schools of these new Platonists.

a system of moral discipline apparently of high sanctity and austerity. He indeed permitted the common people to live according to the laws of their country and the dictates of nature; but he directed the wise, by means of contemplation, to elevate their souls, the direct offspring of God, above all earthly things; and to weaken and emaciate their bodies, which were hostile to the liberty of their souls, by means of hunger, thirst, labour, and other austeries;¹ so that they might in the present life attain to communion with the Supreme Being, and ascend after death active and unencumbered to the universal Parent, and be for ever united with him. And these precepts Ammonius, who was born and educated among Christians, was accustomed to beautify and ennoble by forms of expression borrowed from the sacred Scriptures; and hence these forms of expression occur abundantly in the writings of his followers.² To this austere discipline he superadded the art of so improving that power of the soul which conceives the images of things, that it was capable of seeing the demons, and of performing many wonderful things by their assistance. His followers called this art Theurgy.³ Yet this art was not cultivated by all the philosophers of Ammonius's school, but only by the more eminent.⁴

11. That the prevailing religions, and particularly the Christian, might not appear irreconcilable with his system, Ammonius first turned the whole history of the pagan gods into allegory,⁵ and maintained that those whom the vulgar and the priests honoured with the title of gods, were only the ministers of God to whom some homage might and should be paid, yet short of the superior homage which was due to the Supreme God;⁶ and then he acknowledged that Christ was an extraordinary man, the friend of God and an admirable Theurge.⁷ But he denied that Christ aimed wholly to suppress the worship of the demons, being ministers of divine providence; that, on the contrary, he only sought to wipe away the stains contracted by the ancient religions,⁸ but his disciples had corrupted and vitiated the system of their master.⁹

12. This new species of philosophy, imprudently adopted by Origen and other Christians, did immenso harm to Christianity. For it led the teachers of it to involve in philosophic obscurity many parts of our religion, which were in themselves plain and easy to be understood; and to add to the precepts of the Saviour not a few things, of which not a word can be found in the holy Scriptures. It also produced that gloomy set of men called mystics; whose system, if divested of its Platonic notions respecting the origin and nature of the soul, will be a lifeless and senseless corpse. It laid a foundation too for that indolent mode of life which was afterwards adopted by many, and particularly by numerous tribes of monks; and it recommended to Christians various foolish and useless rites suited only to nourish superstition, no small

⁶ Orosius, Historia, lib. vi. cap. i. pages 361, 365.

—Schl.

⁷ It cannot be denied that the sect of Ammonius embraced some who were enemies of Christ and the Christians. The emperor Julian and some others, are proof of this. But Ammonius himself honoured Christ. And Augustine contended against some philosophers of his time, who, as followers of Ammonius, honoured Christ yet maintained that the Christians had corrupted his doctrine; De Consensu Evangelistarum, Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. lib. i. cap. vi. sec. 11. p. 5; and cap. viii. sec. 14, p. 6; and cap. xv. p. 8.—Schl.

⁸ Augustine, De Consensu Evangel. lib. i. cap. xvi. p. 8; and cap. xxiv. p. 18. Yet they admitted that Christ abolished the worship of certain demons of an inferior order, and enjoined upon men to pray to the celestial Gods, and especially to the Supreme God. This is evident from a passage of Porphyry quoted by Augustine, De Civit. Dei, lib. xix. cap. xxiii. sec. 4. Opp. tom. vii. p. 430.—Schl.

⁹ What we have stated in these sections respecting the doctrines of Ammonius, we have collected from the books and discussions of his followers, who are called New Platonists. Ammonius himself left no writings; and he forbade his followers to publish his doctrines, but they did not obey him. See Porphyry, Vita Plotini, cap. iii. p. 97, ed. Fabricii, lib. iv. Biblioth. Græca. Yet there can be no doubt, that all we have stated was invented by Ammonius himself, whom the whole family of the New Platonists constantly affirm to have been the author of their philosophy. [Moshelm, in his Comment. de Reb. Christ. ante C. M. sec. 27—32, pages 280—298, has given a more full account of Ammonius and his doctrines, and has carefully cited his chief authorities; but the substance of his statements is contained in the preceding sections, and his most important authorities are referred to in the notes of Schlegel, which are all here preserved.—Mur.

¹ See Porphyry, De Abstinencia, lib. i. cap. xxvii. &c. pages 22—34.—Schl.

² See examples in Hierocles on the Golden Verses of Pythagoras; and in Simplicius and Jamblichus. See also Mosheim's Diss. de studii Ethnicorum Christianorum, imbuti, in vol. i. of his Diss. ad Hist. Eccles. pertinent. p. 321.—Schl.

³ This worthless science is very similar to what has been called alchemical magic, and which is distinguished from necromancy or unlawful magic. It was undoubtedly of Egyptian origin. As the Egyptians imagined the whole world to be full of good and evil spirits, they might easily be led to suppose there must be some way to secure the favour of these demons. See Augustine, De Civit. Dei, lib. x. cap. ix. Opp. tom. i. p. 187.—Schl. [Theurgy is the science of the Gods and the various classes of superior spirits, of their appearing to men, and their operations; and the art, by certain acts, habits, words, and symbols, of moving the Gods to impart to men secrets which surpass the powers of reason, to lay open the future to them, and become visible to them. So it is described in the book which bears the name of Jamblichus, De Mysteriis Ægyptiorum, lib. i. cap. xxvi. xxix.—Stäudlin, Gesch. der Moralphilos. p. 402, &c.—Mur.

⁴ See, concerning the moral system of the new Platonists in all its material parts, Stäudlin, Gesch. der Moralphil. p. 435, &c.—Mur.

⁵ See for example, Porphyry, De Antro Nymphar. apud Homerum, De Styge, &c.—Schl.

part of which we see religiously observed by many even to the present day. And finally, it alienated the minds of many in the following centuries from Christianity itself, and produced a heterogeneous species of religion, consisting of Christian and Platonic principles combined. And who is able to enumerate all the evils and injurious effects which arose from this new philosophy—or, if you please, from this attempt to reconcile true and false religions with each other?

13. The number of learned men among the Christians, which was small in the preceding century, was larger in this. And yet we scarcely find among them rhetoricians, sophists, and orators. Most of those who obtained some reputation among them by their learning, were philosophers; and they, as already stated, followed the principles of the Eclectics, although they preferred Plato to all others. But all Christians were not agreed as to the utility of learning and philosophy. Those who were initiated into the mysteries of philosophy, wished that many, and especially such as aspired to the office of pastors and teachers, might apply themselves to the study of human wisdom, so that they might confute the enemies of truth with more effect, and teach and instruct others with more success. But a great majority thought otherwise; they wished to banish all reasoning and philosophy out of the church, for they feared that learning might injure piety. At this time, therefore, broke out that war between faith and reason, religion and philosophy, devotion and intellect, which has been protracted through all succeeding centuries down to our own times, and which we by all our efforts cannot easily terminate. By degrees, those obtained the ascendancy who thought that philosophy and erudition were profitable, rather than hurtful, to religion and piety; and laws were at length established that no person entirely illiterate and unlearned, should be admitted to the office of teacher in the church. Yet the vices of the philosophers and learned men, among other causes, prevented the opposite party from ever being destitute of patrons and advocates. Ample proof of this will be found in the history of the following centuries.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE form of church government which began to exist in the preceding century, was in this more carefully established and confirmed in all its parts. One president or bishop presided over each church. He was created by the common suffrage of the whole people. With the presbyters for his council, whose number was not fixed, it was his business to watch over the interests of the whole church, and to assign to each presbyter his station. Subject to the bishop and the presbyters, were the servants or deacons who were divided into certain classes, because all the duties which the interests of the church required, could not well be attended to by them all.

2. During a great part of this century all the churches continued to be, as at first, independent of each other, or were connected by no associations or confederations.¹ Each church was a kind of little state governed by its own laws, which were enacted or at least sanctioned by the people. But in process of time, all the Christian churches within the same province united and formed a sort of larger society or state; and in the manner of confederated republics, held their conventions at stated times, and deliberated therein for the common advantage of the whole body. This custom first arose among the Greeks, with whom a [political] confederation of cities and the consequent conventions of their several delegates, had been long known; and afterwards when its utility was seen the custom extended through all Christian churches.² These conventions

¹ Yet by ancient custom peculiar respect was paid to the churches founded and governed by the apostles themselves; and such churches were appealed to in controversies on points of doctrine, as most likely to know what the apostles had taught. See Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. lib. iii. cap. iii. and Tertullian, De Præscript. adv. Hæres. cap. xxxv. Thus Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 258.—Mur.

² Tertullian, De Jegenit. cap. xlii. p. 711. [where we have this very important statement: Aguntur præterea per Græcias, illi cœtis in locis Concilia ex universis ecclesiis, per quas et altiora quæque in commune tractantur, et ipsa representatio totius nominis Christiani magnâ veneratione celebratur. From this passage of Tertullian which was written near the beginning of the third century, Mosheim (De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 266, &c.) infers: 1. That provincial councils had not then been held in Africa, nor anywhere except among the Greeks; 2. That councils were considered as human institutions, and as acting only by human authority. 3. That the provincial councils were held always in the same place—cœtis in locis. 4. That they did not interfere with the private concerns of individual churches, which were left to their own management; but conferred only on greater matters, or such as were of common interest—altiora—tractantur. 5. That the attending bishops acted as representatives of their churches, and not as men clothed with authority from heaven, by virtue of their office—representatio totius nominis Christiani. From Greece, the custom of meeting in councils extended into Syria and Palestine. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. xxlii. We have no certain accounts of any councils till after the second century. The earliest of which we have authentic notice, were those which deliberated concerning the Montanists, about A.D. 170 or 173. (Euseb. H. E. vol. 16) and the next were those assembled to consider the proper time for Easter. (Euseb. H. E. vol. 23). All these councils are placed by Eusebius under the reign of Commodus, or A.D. 180—192. In the third century councils became frequent. Provincial councils were now held, perhaps throughout the of delegates from the several churches assembled for deliberation, were called by the Greeks, Synods, and by the Latins, Councils; and the laws agreed upon in them were called canons or rules.

3. These councils, of which no vestige appears before the middle of this century, changed nearly the whole form of the church. For in the first place, the ancient rights and privileges of the people were very much abridged by them; and on the other hand, the influence and authority of the bishops were not a little augmented. At first, the bishops did not deny that they were merely the representatives of their churches, and that they acted in the name of the people; but by little and little they made higher pretensions, and maintained that power was given them by Christ himself to dictate rules of faith and conduct to the people. In the next place, the perfect equality and parity of all bishops, which existed in the early times, these councils gradually subverted; for it was necessary that one of the confederated bishops of a province should be intrusted with some authority and power in those conventions over the others; and hence originated the prerogatives of Metropolitans. And lastly, when the custom of holding these councils had extended over the Christian world, and the universal church had acquired the form of a vast republic composed of many lesser ones, certain chief men were to be placed over it in different parts of the world, in order to preserve the coherence of the whole body. Hence came Patriarchs, and ultimately a Prince of Patriarchs, the Roman Pontiff.

4. No small honour and profit accrued to the whole order of men who conducted the affairs of the church, from the time they succeeded in persuading the people to regard them as successors of the Jewish priests. This took place not long after the reign of Adrian, when upon the second destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews lost all hope of seeing their commonwealth restored.

Christian world; and special councils were called as occasion required. Originally these councils had no jurisdiction, but were mere conventions of delegates, met to consider and agree upon matters of common concern. But they soon began to claim power, to enact and enforce laws, and to hear and decide controversies. And the bishops, instead of appearing as the representatives of their churches, claimed authority from Christ to bind and control the churches. See Ziegler, on the origin of Synods, in Henkens, Neuen Magazin, vol. I. No. 1; Planck's Geschichte der christl. kirchl. Gesellschafts-Verfassung, period II. chap. 7. vol. I. p. 90, &c.; Walch, Histoire der Kirchenversamml. Introd. sec. 3, 4, and b. I. chap. I. sec. II. p. 82, &c. chap. III. p. 118, &c.; Bingham, Origines Eccles. vol. VII. p. 45, &c.; and King, Constitution, &c. of the Primitive Church, chap. VIII.—Mur.

The bishops now wished to be thought to correspond with the high priests of the Jews; the presbyters were said to come in place of the priests; and the deacons in that of the Levites. Those who first drew this parallel between offices so totally different, probably made the misrepresentation not so much from design as from ignorance. But this idea being once introduced and approved, among other errors resulting from it I shall mention only this, that it established a wider difference between the teachers and the taught, than accords with the nature of the Christian religion.¹

5. Among the doctors of this century whose writings rendered them particularly famous in after ages, was Justin Martyr, a converted philosopher, who had dipped into nearly every sect in philosophy. He was pious and possessed considerable learning, but he was sometimes an incautious disputant, and was ignorant of ancient history. We have among other works of his two Apologies for the Christians, which are justly held in great estimation.² Irenæus,

¹ This comparison of Christian teachers with the Jewish priesthood, among other consequences, led the former to lay claim to tithes and first-fruits; of which we find mention before the times of Constantine. Perhaps a desire to increase their revenues, which were both small and precarious, led some of the bishops to apply Jewish law to the Christian church. That they claimed first-fruits as of divine right in this century, is clear from Irenæus, Contra Hæres. lib. IV. cap. XVII. and XXXIV. That tithes were not yet claimed, at least in the Latin church, appears from the latter of these passages in Irenæus; yet in the Greek and oriental churches, tithes began to be claimed earlier than among the Latins; and probably in this second century, for the Greek writers of the third century and the Apostolic Constitutions (which seem to contain the ecclesiastical laws of the Greek church) mention tithes as a thing then well known. See Mosheim, De Heb. Christ. &c. p. 271.—Mur.

² Justin Martyr was the son of Priscus, and grandson of Bacchius, pagan Grecians settled at Flavia Neapolis (Naples), the ancient Sichem in Samaria. See Apolog. ... cap. I. He had successive masters in philosophy, Stoic, Peripatetic, Pythagorean, and lastly Platonist. He travelled much and was very eager in the pursuit of knowledge, and especially respecting the Divine Being. When about 23 years old, as is conjectured, and about A.D. 137, he was converted to Christianity, in consequence of being directed by an aged Christian to go to the Bible as the source of true philosophy. He afterwards spent most of his time at Rome: where he lived as a Christian philosopher and devoted all his talents to the furtherance of the gospel. At last, A.D. 164 or 167, he suffered martyrdom, one Crescens, a pagan philosopher, being his accuser, and on the simple charge of his being a Christian. His writings are numerous, erudite, all of them theological, and all of a polemic character. His style is harsh and inelegant, his temper is ardent and decisive, his arguments and opinions not always satisfactory. Yet being the first of the learned divines and a very zealous and active Christian, he merits our particular attention. His life and writings are described by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. IV. cap. XI. xli. xvi. xviii.; Jerome, De Scriptor. Illustr. cap. xxli.; Photius, Biblioth. Cccxxli. and others among the ancients; and by Cave, Du Pin, Longuerue, Maran, Milner (Hist. of the Ch. vol. I. 187, &c.), and others among the moderns. About A.D. 140, he composed two learned treatises against the pagans, Cohortatio ad Græcos, and Oratio ad Græcos bishop of Lyons in France, whose only remaining writings are his five Books against Heresies; which though preserved only in a Latin translation from the original Greek, are a splendid monument of antiquity.¹

About A.D. 150, or, as some think ten or twelve years earlier, Justin presented his earliest or long Apology for the Christians to the Emperor Antoninus Pius; and a little before his death or after A.D. 160, his other Apology, an imperfect copy of which is improperly called his first Apology. Besides the four works now mentioned Justin wrote a book, De Monarchia Dei, proving the Divine unity in opposition to polytheism, by testimonies from the Old Testament and likewise from pagan writers. The latter part of the book is preserved. Against the Jews he composed in the latter part of his life, his Dialogus cum Tryphone Judeo. He defends Christianity against the Jews, chiefly by arguments from the ancient prophecies and types of Christ in the Old Testament. He also wrote a book against Marcion and another against all the heresies; both of which are unfortunately lost. So are his book concerning the soul (in which he collected the opinions of the philosophers on that subject), and his book entitled, Psalles. There are several other works now extant under his name, which are either doubted or denied to be his. Justin's works make a considerable folio volume. The best edition is the Benedictine, by Prudent. Maran. Paris, 1742. Thirlby's ed. of the Dialogue, Lond. 1722, folio, is good. The two Apologies, with those of Tertullian and Minutius Felix, are given in English by Reeve. Lond. 1707, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [The best translation is that by Chevallier, ubi supra. Camb. 1833. His Exhortation to the Greeks has been translated into English by Moses. Aberd. 1757, 8vo; and his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, by Brown, Lond. 1755, 2 vols. 8vo, republished in one volume, 8vo. Cambridge, 1846. The student ought also to consult Bishop Kaye's Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr, 2d edit. Lond. 1836; and particularly Semisch's Justin Martyr, &c. translated by Ryland, in Nos. 41 and 42 of the Edin. Bib. Cab. 1843.—R.

¹ Irenæus who was active during the last half of this century, was born and educated in Asia Minor under Polycarp and Papias. About A.D. 150, Pothinus and others went from Asia Minor to Lyons and Vienne in France; and Irenæus, then a young man, is supposed to have been one of those missionaries. He remained a presbyter till the death of Pothinus, A.D. 177, when he succeeded him in the episcopal chair at Lyons, which he filled till about A.D. 202, the time of his martyrdom. While a presbyter he was sent to Rome by his church, concerning the persecution of Montanus. He is supposed to have composed the letter written in the name of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, giving the graphic account of their persecution in A.D. 177. He likewise took an active part in the controversy respecting Easter, A.D. 196; and wrote to Victor, bishop of Rome, on the subject; and also to the presbyter Blastus, who was deposed at Rome during that contest. Eusebius has also preserved part of a letter of his to Florinus, an apostate to Gnosticism, with whom Irenæus had been intimate in his youth. Some other small works of his are mentioned by the ancients. See Eusebius Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. xv. xx. xxiv. xxvi.; Jerome, De Scriptor. illustr. cap. xxxv.; but the great work of Irenæus is his examination and confutation of the misnamed (ypocritæ) knowledge in five books, commonly called Libri contra Hereses. The work is altogether polemic, and is directed particularly against Valentinius; yet so as to be a confutation of all the Gnostics, and a defence of the catholic faith against most of the heretics of that age. The book contains much information respecting the early heretics, their origin, sentiments, and characters; also respecting the state of theological science in that age, the doctrines generally received and taught, and the manner of stating and defending them. But unfortunately the original Greek is lost, except the extracts preserved by Eusebius, Epiphanius, and others; and the Latin translation which is very ancient, is extremely barbarous and sometimes scarcely intelligible. Irenæus was an ardent and sincere Christian, and a discreet and amiable man. He possessed considera-

Athenagoras was no contemptible philosopher, and his Apology for the Christians and his treatise on the Resurrection of the body, display both learning and genius.² Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, has left us three books addressed to one Autolycus in defence of Christianity, which are erudite but not well-digested.³ Clemens Alexan-ble learning and influence; but his mind does not appear to have been one of the highest order. As an interpreter of Scripture, like all the early fathers he was too fond of tracing allegories; and as a theologian, few of the moderns will account him entirely correct in principle or perfectly conclusive in his reasonings. See, concerning his life and writings, Cave, Du Pin, Massuet (the editor of his works), the Acta Sanctorum, tom. v. June, p. 335; Histoire littéraire de la France, tome i. p. 51; and Milner, Hist. of the Ch. century lii. chap. i. vol. i. p. 269. The best editions of his works are by Grabe, Lond. 1702, fol.; and the Benedictine, by Massuet, Paris, 1710, and Venice, 1734, 2 tom. fol.—Mur. [The English reader may consult Beaven's Account of the Life and Writings of Irenæus, Lond. 1811, 8vo, which though a somewhat ambitious imitation of Bishop Kaye's works, is far inferior and causes one to regret that so excellent and interesting a subject had not fallen into the hands of a more learned and impartial inquirer.—R.

² Athenagoras, one of the most elegant and able writers the church has produced, is scarcely mentioned by any of the fathers. Methodius, about A.D. 285, quoted from him; (see Epiphanius Heret. lxx.) Sidesius, about A.D. 400, gives some lame account of him (in Dodwell's Diss. on Irenæus, p. 408); and Photius (Bibliotheca), in the ninth century speaks of him. This is all the fathers tell us. It appears from the title of his Apology that he was a Christian philosopher of Athens, and that he wrote his Apology in the reign of the Emperors Marcus and Commodus. Sidesius, who is a writer of little credit, says he presided in the school at Alexandria before Panteus, which is contradicted by Eusebius, and that he was converted to Christianity by reading the Scriptures with a design to confute them, which may be true. Mosheim, in his Diss. de vera ætate Apologetici Athenag. (Dissert. ad Hist. Eccles. vol. i. p. 269, &c.) has proved that the Apology was written A.D. 177, the very year of the persecutions at Lyons and Vienne. Athenagoras descants on the same topics as Justin Martyr, and employs the same arguments; but his composition is immensely superior as to style and method. His other work, De Resurrectione, is written with equal elegance, and contains the arguments used in that age to support the doctrine of the resurrection of the body against the objections of philosophers. His works, besides being printed separately by Dechair, Oxford, 1706, 8vo, are commonly subjoined to those of Justin Martyr; and the best edition is the Benedictine, by Maran. [Paris, 1742.—Mur.] [See Clarisse, Commentar. de Athenagora vita, scriptis et doctrina, Leyden, 1819, 4to. The English reader will find both his works translated in Humphrey's Apologeticks of Athenagoras. Lond. 1714.—R.

³ Theophilus was made Bishop of Antioch, in Syria, A.D. 168, and died about A.D. 184 or 185. The best accounts of him by the ancients, are those of Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xx. xxiii.; and Jerome, De Scriptor. illustr. cap. xxv. He appears to have been a converted pagan, a man of reading, a decided and active Christian pastor, sound in faith, and zealous for the truth. He is not metaphysical, but still is rather a dry and argumentative writer. He composed a book against Hermogenes, and another against Marcion, and a Commentary on the four Gospels, all of which are lost. His great work, and the only one which has reached us, is his three books addressed to his pagan friend Autolycus, in vindication of Christianity. Here he takes much the same ground with Justin Martyr and the other Apologists; but he descends more into detail in his proofs from Scripture and from history. He is fond of allegorical and fanciful interpretations, and on them rests a large part of his arguments. Yet the work contains much that is instructive and solid; and is written drinus, a presbyter and head of the catechetical school at Alexandria, was a man of extensive reading, especially in the works of ancient authors. This is manifest from the works of his which remain; namely, his Stromata, his Pedagogus, and his Ad Græcos Exhortatio. But he was infected with very great errors, into which he was betrayed by his excessive love of philosophy; nor are his works to be recommended as exhibiting good arrangement and perspicuity of style.¹ In the Latin language,

In a plain, familiar style.—Mur. [This work, entitled Apologetic Discourses, has been translated into English, by Hetty. Oxford, 1722.—R.

1 Titus Flavius Clemens, whether born at Athens or Alexandria, was a pagan in early life and devoted himself to philosophy. He travelled in Greece, in South Italy, in Cælo-Syria, in Palestine, and lastly in Egypt, where he was a pupil of Pantænus, the master of the Christian school at Alexandria. Becoming a Christian he was made a presbyter of the Alexandrian church, and succeeded his preceptor Pantænus, as master of the catechetical or divinity school. He taught with great applause during the reign of Severus (A.D. 193—211), and had Origen and other eminent men of the third century for pupils. About A.D. 202, he retired into Palestine and Syria for a short time, to avoid persecution. He is supposed to have died about A.D. 220. Clement had vast learning, a lively imagination, great fluency, considerable discrimination, and was a bold and independent speculator. That he had true piety and held the essential truths of the Gospel, is admitted by all; but no one of the fathers except Origen, has been more censured in modern times, for an excessive attachment to philosophy or metaphysical theology. He was a true Eclectic, which he also professed to be; that is, he followed no master implicitly, but examined and judged for himself. Yet his education and the atmosphere in which he lived, led him to lean towards Platonism and Stoicism. His great error was, that he overrated the value of philosophy or human reason as a guide in matters of religion. He also indulged his imagination, as all the learned of this age did, to excess; and construed the Bible allegorically and fancifully. His three principal works which have reached us constitute one whole. His Exhortatio ad Græcos was intended to convince and convert pagans. His Pedagogus in three books was intended to instruct a young convert in the practice of Christianity. His Stromata [Patch-work] in eight books (the last of which is not the genuine eighth book), are written without method or in a most discursive manner. In them Clement attempts to give the world his most profound thoughts and speculations on theology and the kindred sciences. He has also left us a practical treatise, entitled Quis dices ille sit, qui salvatur? in which his object is to show to what temptations and dangers the rich are exposed. There are ascribed to him and printed with his works, extracts from the writings of others which are dubious. Eusebius and Jerome mention works of his which are now lost. Of these the principal are, Libri viii. Hypotyposeon, a compendious exposition of the Old and New Testaments. The character and writings of Clement have been elaborately investigated by various persons, among whom are Le Nourry (Apparat, ad Biblioth. Patr.); Walch (Miscellanea Sacra); Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philon.); and Noellner, Kirchen-gesch. vol. i. The best edition of his works is that of Potter. Oxf. 1715, fol.—Mur. [Reprinted with additions at Venice, 1757, 2 vols. folio. See another excellent work by Bishop Kaye, entitled Some account of the writings and opinions of Clement of Alexandria. Lond. 1835. None of his writings has been translated into English, with the single exception of the tract, Who is the rich man that shall be saved? by Jones, Lond. 1711, 12mo; but in a curious series of publications, entitled Small books on great subjects, the English reader will find in No. VII. (Pickering, Lond. 1814), under the title of Christian doctrine in the second Cen- scarcely any one in this century illustrated or defended the Christian religion except Tertullian.² He was, at first a jurisconsult, tury, extracts from the three great works of Clemens, his Exhortation to the Greeks, his Pedagogus, and his Stromata.—R.

² Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus was the son of a pagan centurion of preconsular rank, and born at Carthage about A.D. 160. He was bred to the law; but becoming a Christian was made a presbyter in the church of Carthage, where he appears to have spent his whole life. About A.D. 200 he embraced the sentiments of the Montanists; which he afterwards defended with his usual ardour. He is said to have lived to a great age; and yet he is supposed to have died about A.D. 220. Jerome, De Scripturibus Illustr. cap. liii. Eusebius, Chronicon, ann. 16, and others, give him a high character. Jerome tells us that Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, was accustomed to read some portions of his works daily; and in calling for this author, used to say, Da magistrum, bring my master. He wrote with great force and displayed much both of erudition and acuteness; but his style is concise, harsh, and extremely difficult for modern readers. His diction and his spirit too it has been supposed, were extensively propagated in the Latin church. His works consist of about 30 short treatises and are nearly all of a polemic cast, argumentative, vituperative, and severe. They may be divided into three classes; namely, apologetic or in controversy with pagans and Jews; doctrinal or confutations of heretics; and moral in defence or confutation of certain practices or rules of conduct. Most of his works of the last class were written after he became a Montanist, and are in defence of the rigid principles of that sect, or in opposition to the opinions and practice of Christians in general. The best edition of his works is by Semler, Halle, 1769—73, 5 vols. 8vo, with a 6th vol. by Windorf containing indices and a Glossary, 1776.—Mur. [Reprinted in 1828, in 6 vols 12mo. See Neander, Antiquarische Geiſt des Tertullianus und Einleit. in dessen Schriften. Berlin, 1825. See also the first and perhaps the best of Bishop Kaye's patristic works, entitled The Eccles. History of the second and third centuries, illustrated from the writings of Tertullian. Lond. 1845, 3d edit. Several of Tertullian's writings have been translated into English, his Apology, by Reeves and Chevallier, ubi supra; his Prescription against Heretics, by Hetty, Oxford, 1722; and his Address to Tertullus, with valuable notes by Sir D. Dalrymple (Lord Hailes). Edin. 1790, 18mo. These three pieces with eleven others have been translated by the Rev. Dr. Pusey of Oxford, and they form No. x. of the Library of the Fathers of the holy Catholic Church in course of publication at Oxford. Of this collection twenty-six numbers or volumes have already appeared.—R.

Besides the writers above mentioned whose works are extant, there were many others in this century of whose works we have only extracts preserved by the fathers. Of these a catalogue embracing such as are mentioned by Eusebius in his Eccles. History, and by Jerome, De Scripturibus Illustribus, is here subjoined.

Papias, Bp. of Hierapolis in Phrygia, contemporary with Ignatius. In the beginning of the century. He wrote five books containing traditional accounts of Christ, his apostles, and others of the primitive times. He is said to have advocated the doctrine of the Millenium. Euseb. iii. 39; Jerome, cap. 18.

Quadratus, Bp. of Athens. He wrote an Apology for the Christians presented to the Emperor Adrian, A.D. 123 or 131. Euseb. iv. 3; Jerome, cap. xix.

Aristides, an eloquent Christian philosopher of Athens, at the same time presented an Apology. Euseb. iv. 3; Jerome, cap. xx.

Agrippa Pastor, contemporary with the two last. He was "a very learned man," and wrote a confutation of the 24 books of Basilides the heretic. Euseb. iv. 7; Jerome, cap. xxi.

Hegeippus, a converted Jew, who resided at Corinth and at Rome. He wrote about A.D. 160, five books of Ecclesiastical matters from the death of Christ to his own times. Euseb. iv. 8, 22, and lii. 19, 20, 32; Jerome, cap. xxii.

then a presbyter at Carthage, and at last a follower of Montanus. We have various short works of his intended either to explain and defend the truth or to excite piety.

Melito, Bp. of Sardis. He wrote an Apology besides various short works. Euseb. iv. 26; Jerome, cap. xxiv. Apollinaris, Bp. of Hierapolis in Phrygia, A.D. 170. He wrote an Apology, five books against the pagans, and other works. Euseb. iv. 27; Jerome, cap. xvi.

Dionysius, Bp. of Corinth, from about A.D. 170. He was an active and influential man, and wrote valuable Epistles to several churches and their bishops; namely, to the churches of Sparta, Athens, Nicomedia, Gortyna, and others in Crete; to Amastris, and others in Pontus; to Plinius, a Cretan bp. and Victor, Bp. of Rome. Euseb. iv. 23; Jerome, cap. xxvii.

Tatian, a rhetorician and disciple of Justin Martyr. After the death of Justin he swerved from the common path, and became founder of a rigorous sect called Encratites. He flourished about A.D. 170, and wrote an Apology under the title of Oratio contra Græcos, which is still extant and usually printed with the works of Justin Martyr. He is said to have composed many other works; among which a Diatessaron or Harmony of the four Gospels, and a treatise on Perfection after the pattern of Christ, are particularly mentioned. Euseb. iv. 29; Jerome, cap. xxxix.; Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 12.

Musanus, of the same age wrote against the Encratites. Jerome, cap. xxxi.; Euseb. iv. 28.

Modestus, of the same age wrote a book against Marcion, which Eusebius says exceeded all other confutations of that heretic. Euseb. iv. 25; Jerome, cap. xxxii.

Barthesanes, a Syrian of Edessa, of the same age an eloquent and acute reasoner. He was first a Valentinian; but afterwards wrote against that and other sects. His works were numerous, which his admirers translated from Syriac into Greek. His dialogues against Marcion, and his treatise On Fate, are particularly commended. Euseb. iv. 30; Jerome, cap. xxxiii.

Victor, Bp. of Rome, A.D. 194-203. His zeal respecting the right day for Easter led him to write several Epistles on that subject. Euseb. v. 24; Jerome, cap. xxiv. Nothing of his remains, though two spurious Epistles with his name are still extant.

Pantenus, a Christian philosopher of Alexandria, and head of the catechetical school there before Clement. He was a learned and active Christian, and wrote much particularly in explanation of the Scriptures; but his works are lost. He visited India or Arabia Felix, as a missionary, and had great influence in the church. Euseb. v. 10; Jerome, cap. xxxvi.

Rhodon, an Asiatic Greek, but educated at Rome under Tatian. He wrote much; and in particular on the Hexæmeron (the six days of creation); a treatise against Marcion; and another against the Phrygians or Cataphrygians, the disciples of Montanus. Euseb. v. 13; Jerome, cap. xxxvii.

Miltiades, who flourished in the reign of Commodus, A.D. 180-192. He wrote an Apology and works against the Cataphrygians, the pagans, and the Jews. Euseb. v. 17; Jerome, cap. xxxix.

Apollonius, an eloquent Greek writer, author of a long and much valued confutation of the Cataphrygians. Euseb. iv. 18; Jerome, cap. xl.

Serapion, ordained Bp. of Antioch, A.D. 191. He wrote an Epistle concerning the Montanists or Cataphrygians, and some other tracts. Euseb. vi. 12; Jerome, cap. xli.

Apollonius, a Roman senator and martyr under Commodus. His eloquent defence at his trial was committed to writing. Euseb. v. 21; Jerome, cap. xlii.

Under the reigns of Commodus and Severus, or A.D. 180-211, lived several writers mentioned summarily by Euseb. v. 27, and by Jerome, cap. xlii-l; namely, Heraclitus, author of a Commentary on Paul's Epistles; Maximus, who wrote on the Origin of Evil and the Creation of Matter; Candidus and Apollon, who wrote on the Hexæmeron; Sextus wrote on the Resurrection; and Arabianus composed some doctrinal tracts.

All the preceding wrote in Greek, except Barthesanes, who composed in Syriac, and Victor and Apollonius the martyr who wrote in Latin.—Mur.

Whether his excellences or his defects were the greatest, it is difficult to say. He possessed great genius, but it was wild and unchastened. His piety was active and fervent, but likewise gloomy and austere. He had much learning and knowledge, but was changeable and credulous, and more acute than solid.¹

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. The whole Christian system was still comprised in a few precepts and propositions; nor did the teachers publicly advance any doctrines beside those contained in what is called the Apostles' Creed. In their manner of handling these doctrines there was nothing subtle, profound, or distant from common apprehension. This will not appear strange if we reflect that no controversy had yet been moved respecting those important points of religion about which contests afterwards arose, and that the bishops were generally plain, unlearned men, more distinguished for their piety than for their genius and eloquence.

2. Yet insensibly, from this venerable simplicity there was a considerable departure; many points were more critically investigated and more artificially stated; many principles also were imprudently adopted which were derived from philosophy and that too not of the most solid character. This change arose from two principal causes. The first lay in the disposition of certain teachers who wished to make Christianity appear in harmony with the decisions of philosophy, and who thought it elegant to state Christian precepts in the language of philosophers, civilians, and rabbins. The other cause is found in the discussions with the opposers and corrupters of the truth. To meet these, the Christian doctors were sometimes under the necessity of stating with precision what was before undefined, and exhibiting their views with more discrimination.

¹ Those who wish further information concerning these writers, their defects and their works, are directed—and the direction is given once for all—to consult those authors who treat professedly of the Ecclesiastical Writers; namely, Fabricius, Bibliotheca Græca and Biblioth. Latina; Cave, Historia Literaria Scriptorum Eccles.; Du Pin, Bibliothèque des Aut. Eccles.; Ceillier, Histoire générale des aut. Sacrés et Eccles., and others. [To these may be added Lumper, Hist. Theol. Crit. de Vita Scriptis atque Doctrina, SS. P.P. trium priorum sæculorum, &c. Augsburg, 1783—99, in 13 volumes, 8vo. "Opus est magna diligentia congestum, doctum, utile, at quod dolendum, non absolutum." Danz. Also Schramm, Analysis operum, SS. P.P. Augsburg, 1780-96, in eighteen volumes, 8vo, a very valuable work; and Schönmann, Biblio. Hist. liter. patrum latinorum a Tertuliano ad Gregor. Mag. et Isid. Hisp. Lip. 1792-4, 2 vols. 8vo. In the preface to the second volume the author promises a third to complete the work; but I believe it was never published, and he died in 1802.—R

3. Whoever wishes for an example need only consider, what began to be taught in this age respecting the state of souls when separated from the body. Jesus and his apostles simply taught that the spirits of holy men on leaving the body were received to heaven, and that those of the wicked went to hell. And this satisfied the first disciples of Christ in whom there was more piety than curiosity; but this plain doctrine was materially injured, when Christians were induced to agree with the Platonics and others, that only the souls of heroes and men of distinguished abilities were raised to heaven; while those of others, being weighed down by their sensual propensities, sunk to the infernal regions and could never attain to the world of light till cleansed from their pollutions.¹ From the time when this opinion began to prevail, the martyrs only were represented and believed to be happy immediately after death; others were assigned to some obscure region, in which they were detained till the second coming of Christ, or at least till their impurities which disqualified them for heaven should be removed from them. From this source, how numerous and how vast the errors!—what vain ceremonies!—what debasing superstitions took their rise!

4. But they all revered the Holy Scriptures as the rule of faith and the standard of truth; and therefore they wished them to be in the hands of all. Of the translations of the Scriptures into other languages, we have already spoken. We shall here speak only of the expositors. The first Christian who composed explanations of the sacred volume, was if I mistake not Pantænus, the master of the Alexandrine school. But divine providence has so ordered that none of his writings have reached us. The Hypotyposes also of Clemens Alexandrinus, in which he is said to have expounded detached passages from the sacred books, have been lost; and likewise his Commentaries on the canonical Epistles. Tatian composed a Harmony of the Gospels, which has [not] escaped the ravages of time.² Justin Martyr explained the Revelation; Theophilus of Antioch elucidated the four Gospels; and others expounded the Mosaic account of the creation. All these works are now lost.

5. But this loss is the less to be regretted, since it is certain that no one of these expositors could be pronounced an excellent or renowned interpreter. They all believed the language of Scripture to contain two meanings; the one obvious and corresponding with the direct import of the words; the other recondite and concealed under the words, like a kernel by the shell: the former they neglected as of little value, and bestowed their chief attention on the latter; that is, they were more intent on throwing obscurity over the sacred writings by the fictions of their own imaginations, than of searching out their true meaning. Some also, and this is stated especially of Clement, attempted to make the divine oracles teach and support the precepts of philosophy. The excessive and almost divine authority ascribed to the Alexandrine version of the Old Testament, called the Septuagint, was a great obstacle to any valuable and suitable interpretation of that part of the Bible.

6. A system of Christian theology so far as we can learn, was composed by no one in this age. The tracts of Arabianus, De dogmate Christiano, having been all lost, we cannot tell what they were. The five books of Papias, De Dictis Christi et Apostolorum or Explanatio oraculorum dominicorum, so far as can be learned from Eusebius,³ must be regarded rather as an historical than a doctrinal work. Melito of Sardis is said to have written, De Fide, De Creatione, and De Veritate; but it does not appear from these titles whether they were polemic or doctrinal treatises. Some points in theology were stated and defended by those who engaged in religious controversies. But the doctrines which were not brought into controversy were not so distinctly treated by the writers of that age, that we can fully understand what their views were. It is not strange therefore that all sects of Christians can find in what are called the Fathers something to favour their own opinions and systems.

7. The controversial writers who distinguished themselves in this century encountered either the Jews, or the worshippers of idol gods, or the corrupters of the Christian doctrine and founders of new sects, that is, the heretics. With the Jews contended in particular Justin Martyr, in his

¹ I have treated largely of these sentiments of the ancients and especially of the Platonics, in my notes on Cudworth's Intellectual System, vol. ii. p. 1036.

² I cannot but think there must be a great typographical error in the original of this sentence. For it is not easy to believe that Mosheim maintained the long-explored notion, that either of those Harmonies of the four Gospels which we have in the Bibliotheca Patrum, could be the genuine work of Tatian. See Prudentius Aflaran, Diss. xlii. cap. xii. sec. 5, 6, prefixed to his edition of Justin Martyr, &c. and republished by Sprenger, Thesaurus Rei Patristica, tom. ii.—Mur.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxix. See also Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. lib. v. cap. xxxiii.; Jerome, De Scriptor. Illustr. cap. xviii.—Mur.

Dialogue with Trypho and likewise Tertullian; but neither of them in the best manner, because they were not acquainted with the language and history of the Hebrews, and did not duly consider the subject. The pagans were assailed especially by those who wrote Apologies for the Christians, as Athenagoras, Melito, Quadratus, Miltiades, Aristides, Tatian, and Justin Martyr; or who composed addresses to the pagans, as Justin, Tertullian, Clement, and Theophilus of Antioch. All these vanquished paganism and answered the calumnies cast upon the Christians solidly and dexterously; but they were less able and successful in explaining the nature of the Christian religion, and demonstrating its truth and divine origin. At least we perceive that much is wanting in the explanations they give of Christian doctrines, and in the arguments they use in confirmation of religious truth. Those who chastised the heretics make a numerous body, but we have few of their writings left. The whole host of heretics were attacked by Irenæus in a work expressly against them; by Clement, in his Stromata; and by Tertullian, De Prescriptionibus adversus hæreticos; not to mention Justin Martyr, whose confutation of them has been lost. Those who wrote against particular sects of heretics, it would be tedious to enumerate; besides, the works of most of them are not preserved.

8. In these disputants there was something more of ingenuousness and good faith than in those who undertook the support of truth in the following centuries. For the convenient wiles of sophistry and the dishonourable artifices of debate had not gained admittance among Christians. Yet a man of sound judgment, who has due regard for truth, cannot extol them highly. Most of them lacked discernment, knowledge, application, good arrangement, and force. They often advance very flimsy arguments, and such as were suited rather to embarrass than convince the mind. One, laying aside the Divine Scriptures from which all the weapons of religious controversy should be drawn, bids us consult the bishops of those churches which were founded by apostles. Another, as if contending about the title or boundaries of lands in a court of law, with an ill grace pleads prescription against his adversaries. A third imitates the silly disputants among the Jews, who offered as arguments the mystic powers of numbers and words.¹ Nor are those wholly in error who think that the vicious mode of disputing which afterwards obtained the name of æconomical, was sometimes used even in this century.²

9. The principal parts of practical religion or morality are treated of by Justin Martyr, or whoever it was that composed the Épistle to Zenas and Serenus found among the works of Justin. Others discussed particular duties in set treatises. Thus Clemens Alexandrinus composed tracts on Calumny, Patience, Continence, and other virtues, which have not escaped the ravages of time. But the tracts of Tertullian on practical duties, namely, on Chastity, on Flight from persecution, on Fasting, on Theatrical exhibitions, on the Dress of females, on Prayer, &c. have come safely to our hands; and would be perused with greater profit, were it not for the gloomy and morose spirit which they everywhere breathe, and the excessively artificial and difficult style in which they are written.³

10. In what estimation these and other ancient writers on Christian morals ought to be held, the learned are not agreed. Some hold them to be the very best guides to true piety; others on the contrary think their precepts were the worst possible, and that practical religion could not be committed to worse hands.⁴ Competent judges will decide the question for themselves. To us it appears that their writings contain many things excellent, well considered, and

² Simon, Histoire critique des principaux Commentaires du N. T. cap. ii. p. 21. [To do or to say anything, κατ' οἰκονομίαν, or οἰκονομικῶς, is to use deception or good policy rather than fair honest dealing, yet with good intentions or for a good end. See Suicer, Thesaur. Ecclesiast. tom. ii. p. 459.—Mur.]

³ So perplexed and difficult is the style of Tertullian and so peculiar his use of Latin terms, mostly of the Punic dialect, that it has become necessary to compile a Lexicon for his works, which will be found attached to Semler's edition (vol. vi.) and which is almost indispensable to the student. It has been remarked as unfortunate that the first application of Latin to Christian subjects was made by this "fiery African;" for with him originated that barbarous style, "duram, horridam, Latinsque inauditam," which is the foundation of our theological latinity of the present day. The student will find in Munter's Primordia Eccles. Afric. a selection of Tertullian's phrases still employed in treating of doctrinal and polemical subjects.—H.

⁴ On this subject the learned and ingenious Barbeyrac held a controversy in our day with Ceillier, a Benedictine monk. A history of the controversy with his own opinion of it is given by Budeus, Largoge ad Theologum, lib. ii. cap. iv. sec. 4, p. 553, &c. Afterwards, Barbeyrac published a more full defence of the severe judgment he had passed upon the fathers, under the title of Traité de la Morale des Pères, Amsterd. 1728, 4to, which is well worth reading by those who wish to investigate the subject; yet I think he charges the fathers with some faults which may easily be excused. [Liberatus Fassonius, a Catholic, published an answer to Barbeyrac in a Latin work, De Morali Patrum Doctrina, ad. librum Barbeyraci. Libourne, 1767, 4to.—Mur.] Various other writers took the field against Barbeyrac and a few in his defence; their names and the titles of their works may be seen in Walch's Bibliotheca Patristica, by Danz. p. 692, &c.—R.

¹ Examples may be seen in, Basnage, Histoire des Juifs, tome iii. pages 660—694.

well calculated to cherish piety; but at the same time many things unduly rigorous, and derived from the Stoic and Academic philosophy; many things vague and indeterminate and many things positively false and inconsistent with the precepts of Christ. If one deserves the title of a bad master in morals, who has no just ideas of the proper boundaries and limitations of Christian duties, nor clear and distinct conceptions of the different virtues and vices, nor a perception of those general principles to which recurrence should be had in all discussions respecting Christian virtue, and who therefore very often talks at random, and blunders in expounding the divine laws, though he may say many excellent things and excite in us considerable emotion; then I can readily admit that in strict truth this title belongs to many of the fathers.

11. In this century there was admitted, with good intentions no doubt yet most inconsiderately, a fundamental error in regard to morals and pernicious to Christianity; an error which through all succeeding ages to our times, has produced an infinity of mistakes and evils of various kinds. Jesus our Saviour prescribed one and the same rule of life or duty to all his disciples; but the Christian doctors, either by too great a desire of imitating the nations among whom they lived, or from a natural propensity to austerity and gloom (which is a disease that many labour under in Syria, Egypt, and other provinces of the east), were induced to maintain that Christ had prescribed a twofold rule of holiness and virtue; the one ordinary, the other extraordinary; the one lower, the other higher; the one for men of business, the other for persons of leisure, and such as sought to attain higher glory in the future world. They therefore early divided all that had been taught, whether in books or by tradition respecting a Christian life and morals, into Precepts and Counsels. They applied the name Precepts to those laws which were universally obligatory or were enacted for all men of all descriptions; but the Counsels related only to those who deemed it praiseworthy to aspire after superior holiness and a closer union with God.

12. There soon arose a class of persons who professed to strive after that higher and more eminent holiness which common Christians cannot attain; and who resolved to obey the counsels of Christ in order to enjoy intimate communion with God in this life, and on leaving the body to rise without impediment or difficulty to the celestial world. They supposed many things were forbidden to them, which were allowed to other Christians; such as wine, flesh, matrimony, and worldly business.¹ They supposed they must emaciate their bodies with watching, fasting, toil, and hunger. They considered it a happiness to retire to desert places, and by close meditation to abstract their minds from all external objects and whatever delights the senses. Both men and women imposed these severe restraints on themselves, with good intentions I suppose, but they set a bad example, and greatly injured the cause of Christianity. They were denominated Ascetics, Σπουδαῖοι, Ἐκλεκτοί, and also both male and female philosophers, and were distinguished from other Christians, not only by a different appellation but by peculiarities of dress and demeanour.² Those of this century who embraced this austere mode of life, lived indeed by themselves, but they did not withdraw altogether from the society and converse of men. But in process of time persons of this description retired into deserts, and afterwards formed themselves into associations after the manner of the Essenes and Therapeute.

13. The causes of this institution are plain. First, the Christians did not wish to appear inferior to the Greeks, the Romans, and the other people, among whom there were many philosophers and sages who were distinguished from the vulgar by their dress and their whole mode of life, and who were held in high honour. Now, among these philosophers (as is well known) none were more popular with the Christians than the Platonists and Pythagoreans, who it appears recommended two modes of living; the one for philosophers who wished to excel others in virtue, and the other for people engaged in the common affairs of life.³ The Platonists prescribed the following rule for philosophers:—The mind of a wise man must be withdrawn as far as possible from the contagious influence of the body; and as the oppressive load of the body and intercourse with men are most adverse to this design, therefore all sensual gratifications are to be avoided; the body is to be sustained or rather mortified with coarse and slender fare; solitude is to be sought for; and the mind is to be self-collected and absorbed in contemplation, so as to be detached as much as possible from the body.¹ Whoever lives in this manner shall in the present life have converse with God; and when freed from the load of the body, shall ascend without delay to the celestial mansions, and not need like the souls of other men to undergo a purgation. The grounds of this system lay in the peculiar sentiments entertained by this sect of philosophers and by their friends, respecting the soul, demons, matter, and the universe. And when these sentiments were embraced by the Christian philosophers, the necessary consequences of them must also be adopted.

¹ Athenagoras, Apologia pro Christianis, cap. xxviii. p. 122, ed. Oxon. and others.

² See Salmastius, Comment. in Tertullian. de Pallio, pages 7, 8. [Deyling, Exercit. de Ascetis Vet. in Obsequio. Sacr. lib. iii. and Bingham, Antiq. Eccles. vol. iii. p. 3, &c.—Mur.]

³ They made a distinction between living according to nature, (ὡς κατὰ φύσιν), and living above nature, (ὡς ὑπὲρ φύσιν). See Æneas Gæzæus, in Theophrasto, p. 29, ed. Barthii. The former was the rule for all men; the latter only for philosophers who aimed at perfect virtue.

14. What has been stated will excite less surprise, if it be remembered that Egypt was the land where this mode of life had its origin; for this country, from some law of nature, has always produced a greater number of gloomy and hypochondriac or melancholy persons than any other;² and it still does so. Here it was that long before the Saviour's birth, not only the Essenes and Therapeutæ—those Jewish sects composed of persons affected with a morbid melancholy or rather partially deranged—had their chief residence; but many others also that they might better please the gods, withdrew themselves as by the instinct of nature from commerce with men and from all the pleasures of life.³ From Egypt this mode of life passed into Syria and the neighbouring countries, which in like manner always abounded with unsocial and austere individuals;⁴ and at last it was introduced from the east among the nations of Europe. Hence the numerous maladies which still deform the Christian world; hence the celibacy of the clergy; hence the numerous herds of monks; hence the two species of life, the theoretical and mystical; hence the many other things of a like nature which we shall have occasion to mention in the progress of our work.⁵

15. Another error among the Christians, not indeed of equal extent but a pernicious one and productive of many evils, was the following. The Platonists and Pythagoreans deemed it not only lawful but commendable to deceive and to lie, for the sake of truth and piety.⁶ The Jews living in Egypt learned from them this sentiment before the Christian era, as appears from many proofs. And from both, this vice early spread among the Christians. Of this no one will doubt, who calls to mind the numerous forgeries of books under the names of eminent men, the Sibylline verses,⁷ and other similar trash,⁸ a large mass of which appeared in this and the following centuries. I would not say that the orthodox Christians forged all the books of this character; on the contrary it is probable that the greater part of them originated from the founders of the Gnostic sects; yet that the Christians who were free from heterodox views were not wholly free from this fault, is too clear to be denied.

16. The more the boundaries of the church were enlarged, the greater the number of vicious and bad men who thrust themselves into it; as may be proved by the many complaints and censures of the writers of this of the errors which were but too prevalent even at this early period, may be seen in a very valuable work by a layman of the English Church, which is more comprehensive than its title would intimate, for it embraces corruptions in morals as well as in doctrines. I refer to Osburn's Doctrinal Errors of the Apostolical and Early Fathers, Lond. 1835, 8vo. He draws his materials solely from the fathers of the first and second centuries, his views are evangelical, and he writes in an excellent spirit.—II.

⁶ Mosheim, on this subject, in his Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 231, refers us to his Diss. de turbata per recentiores Platonici ecclesia, sec. 41, &c.—Mur.

⁷ Concerning the Sibylline verses which were composed about A.D. 138, Fabricius has treated largely, Biblioth. Græc. tom. 1. The latest editor of the verses is Servatius. (Gallæus, who has corrected the text and added copious notes. Amsterd. 1689, 4to. He has subjoined the Magic Oracles ascribed to Zoroaster and others, in which are many things of Christian origin. That the sibylline verses were fabricated by some Christian in order to bring idolaters to believe in the truth of Christianity, has been well shown by Blondell among others; and with very few exceptions there is no learned man at the present day who thinks otherwise. Blondell's work was first published under the title, Des Sibylles, célébrées tant par l'Antiquité payenne, que par les saints Pères. Charontou, 1649, 4to. Two years after the title was changed, doubtless to allure purchasers; Traité de la Créance des Pères touchant l'Etat des ames après cette vie, &c. à l'occasion de l'Écrit attribué aux Sibylles. Charontou, 1651, 4to. That the pagans were indignant at this forgery, which they attributed to the Christians, appears from Origen, Contra Celsum, lib. v. p. 272, ed. Spencer; Lactantius, Instit. Divinor. lib. iv. cap. xiv.; and Constantine the Great, Oratio ad Sanctior. in Euseb. Hist. Eccles. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 230.—Mur.

⁸ That the books now circulated under the name of Hermes and particularly the one called Pomander were a Christian forgery, was first shown by Cassaubon, Exercit. 1. in Baronius, sec. 18, p. 54, and afterwards by Conringius, Bousabre, Cudworth, Warburton, and many others. Some however suppose the books were originally composed by Platonists, and afterwards interpolated and corrupted by some Christian. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. p. 230.—Mur

¹ Consult here, by all means, that most distinguished Platonist, Porphyry, regi ἀρογῆς, or, on abstinence from flesh, book 1. secs. 27 and 41, pages 22, 34, where he formally lays down rules for these duties of a philosopher.

² See Maillet, Description de l'Égypte, tom. II. p. 57, &c. Paris, 1735, 4to.

³ Herodotus, Historia, lib. II. p. 104, ed. Gronov.; Epiphanius, Expos. Fidei, sec. 11; Opp. tom. II. p. 1092; Tertullian, De Exhortatione Castitatis, cap. xiii.; Athanasius, Vita Antonii, Opp. tom. II. p. 453.

⁴ Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome IV. p. 197, ed. Amsterd. 1735, 4to.

⁵ The reader who is desirous of tracing minutely the origin and progress of error, both in doctrine and morals in the primitive church, should read what Isaac Taylor has written on this subject, especially in sections 8 and 9 of his Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm, and in the first volume of his Ancient Christianity. A full view

age. The well-known custom of excluding transgressors from the communion was a barrier against the more flagrant and notorious crimes. Of all sins, those accounted the most heinous and the greatest were these three, murder, idolatry, and adultery; which terms, however, must here be understood in the broadest sense. Those guilty of these crimes were in many churches cut off forever from communion; in other churches they were received back after a long, severe, and painful probation.¹

17. It is worthy of particular notice that this custom of excluding improper characters from the society of Christians, and of not receiving them back except upon full proof of reformation, was at first a simple process, or attended with very little formality; but by degrees the regulations for it were greatly amplified, and deformed by many rites borrowed especially from the discipline of the pagan mysteries.² That it was proper for the Christian bishops to increase the restraints upon the licentiousness of transgression, will be readily granted by all who consider the circumstances of those times. But whether it was for the advantage of Christianity to borrow rules for this salutary ordinance from the enemies of the truth, and thus to consecrate, as it were, a part of the pagan superstition, many persons very justly call in question. The more candid will appreciate the good intention of those who introduced this sort of rules and ceremonies; all beyond this they will ascribe to human weakness.³

¹ In this manner I think we may reconcile the different opinions of learned men on this subject. See Morin, De Disciplina Penitentia, lib. ix. cap. xix. p. 670, &c. Sirmond, Historia Penitentia Publica, cap. l. Opp. tom. iv. p. 323, and the recent Dissertation of Orsi, De Criminum Capitalium per Trin Priora Secula Absolutione, Milan, 1730, 4to.

² See Fabricius, Biblog. Antiq. p. 397; Morin, De Peniten. Discip. lib. l. cap. xv. xvi. &c.

³ It is much to be regretted, that in reviewing the history of religion in each century, Mosheim had not given a sketch of the vicissitudes of spiritual Christianity, and of the influence of real piety and godliness on the habits, both of thought and life, of professing adherents of the Gospel. He never leads us into the true interior of the Church of Christ, to exhibit the mode in which evangelical truth was apprehended by Christian minds at different periods, or to depict its operation in remodelling individual character, and improving the domestic or social evils prevalent in each successive generation. The historian indeed surveys the pulpit, but he never descends into the congregation, or visits the family, or inquires among individuals for the evidences of an efficacious faith. He draws no sufficiently distinct line of demarcation between real religion and the more nominal Christianity too prevalent in each age; between spiritual worship and that cumbersome ritual which was generally so popular, and so rigidly enforced and practised. The Christian reader longs to know, not merely whether the technical teaching of the church was sound and scriptural, but whether its value was duly appreciated by the people; whether they "received the truth in the love of it," delighted in the exercises of a spiritual worship, and sought to adorn their faith by lives of true self-denial and beneficence.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF CEREMONIES.

1. It is certain that to religious worship both public and private many rites were added, without necessity, and to the great offence of sober and good men.⁴ The principal cause of this I readily look for in the perverseness of mankind, who are more delighted with the pomp and splendour of external forms than with the true devotion of the heart, and who despise whatever does not gratify their eyes and ears. But other and additional causes may be mentioned; which, though they suppose no bad design, yet clearly betray indiscretion.

2. First, there is good reason to suppose that the Christian bishops multiplied sacred rites for the sake of rendering the Jews and the pagans more friendly to them; for both had been accustomed to numerous and splendid ceremonies from their infancy, and had no doubt that they constituted an essential part of religion. And hence, when they saw the new religion to be destitute of such ceremonies, they thought it too simple and therefore despised it. To obviate this objection, the rulers of the Christian churches deemed it proper for them to be more splendid and attractive in their public worship.⁵

For information on these points we must look beyond the pages of Mosheim; and as yet the only source open to the English reader is the History of Milner, written, it is true, in an excellent spirit, and full of instruction on those very topics omitted by Mosheim, but superficial and uncritical in all that respects the substance of ecclesiastical history prior to the Reformation. I may add that the student will find in Weismann's Introduction in Memorabilia Eccles. Hist. &c. 2 vols. Halle, 1745, 4to, that union of accuracy, research, and erudition, with a just appreciation of spiritual religion, so requisite to constitute a suitable history of the Christian church.—R.

⁴ Tertullian, Liber de Oratone, Opp. p. 129, &c. Paris, 1675.

⁵ It will not be unsuitable to transcribe here a very apposite passage, which I accidentally met with in Gregory Nyssen's life of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Opera, Par. 1638, tom. iii. p. 574.—ἡνὶδὼν γὰρ διὰ τὰς σωματικὰς θυμῶν τῇ περὶ τὰ εἰδωλὰ πλῆθῃ παραμυνῇ τὸν ἡνὶδῶν τὸν πολλὸν καὶ ἀπαίδευτον· ὥς ἐν τῷ προσηγούμενῳ τῶς ἐν αὐτοῖς μάλιστα κατορθωθείη τοὺς θεοῦ ἀντὶ τῶν ματαίων σεβασμάτων βλέπειν, ἐπαφικὴν αὐτοῖς τὰς τῶν ἁγίων μαρτύρων ἐμφανισθῆναι μνήκας καὶ εὐπαθεῖν καὶ ἀγάλλεσθαι ὡς χρόνῳ ποτὶ κατὰ τὸ αὐτόματον πρὸς τὸ σμυρτότερον τε καὶ ἀκριβέστερον μετατεθήσονται τοῦ βίου, καὶ πρὸς ἐκεῖνο καθηγομένης τῆς πίστεως. "When he [Gregory] perceived that the Ignorant and simple multitude persisted in their idolatry, on account of the sensitive pleasures and delights it afforded, he allowed them in celebrating the memory of the holy martyrs to indulge themselves, and give a loose to pleasure, (i. e. as the thing itself, and both what precedes and what follows, place beyond all controversy, he allowed them at the sepulchres of the martyrs on their feast days to dance, to use sports, to indulge conviviality, and to do all the things that the worshippers of idols were accustomed to do in their temples on their festival days), hoping that in process of time they would spontaneously come over to a more becoming and more correct manner of life." [Mosheim had

3. Secondly, the simplicity of the worship which Christians offered to the Deity, had given occasion to certain calumnies spread abroad both by the Jews and the pagan priests. The Christians were pronounced Atheists because they were destitute of temples, altars, victims, priests, and all that pomp in which the vulgar suppose the essence of religion to consist; for unenlightened persons are prone to estimate religion by what meets their eyes. To silence this accusation, the Christian doctors thought they must introduce some external rites which would strike the senses of people; so that they could maintain that they really had all those things of which Christians were charged with being destitute, though under different forms.

4. Thirdly, it is well known that in the books of the New Testament various parts of the Christian religion are expressed in terms borrowed from the Jewish laws, or are in some measure compared with the Mosaic rites. This mode of expression the Christian doctors and writers not only imitated, but extended still further; and in this there was little to censure. But in process of time, either from inconsideration, ignorance, or motives of policy, the majority maintained that such phraseology was not figurative, but accordant with the nature of the things, and to be understood in its proper sense. The bishops were at first innocently called high priests, and the presbyters, priests, and the deacons, Levites. But in a little time, those to whom these titles were given abused them, and maintained that they had the same rank and dignity, and possessed the same rights and privileges, with those who bore these titles under the Mosaic dispensation. Hence the origin of first-fruits, and next of tithes; hence the splendid garments, and many other things. In like manner, the comparison of the Christian oblations with the Jewish victims and sacrifices produced many unnecessary rites, and in time corrupted essentially the doctrine of the Lord's Supper, which, ere they were aware of it, was converted into a sacrifice.

5. Fourthly, among the Greeks and the people of the east, nothing was held more sacred than what were called the Mysteries. This circumstance led the Christians, in order to impart dignity to their religion, to say that they also had similar mysteries, or certain holy rites concealed from the vulgar; and they not only applied the terms used in the pagan mysteries to the Christian institutions, particularly baptism and the Lord's Supper, but they gradually introduced also the rites which were designated by those terms.¹ This practice originated in the eastern provinces; and thence, after the times of Adrian (who first introduced the Grecian mysteries among the Latins),² it spread among the Christians of the west. A large part therefore of the Christian observances and institutions, even in this century, had the aspect of the pagan mysteries.

6. Fifthly, many ceremonies took their rise from the custom of the Egyptians and of almost all the eastern nations, of conveying instruction by images, actions, and sensible signs and emblems. The Christian doctors therefore thought it would be advantageous to the cause of Christianity to place the truths which are necessary to be known in order to salvation, as it were, before the eyes of the unreflecting multitude, who with difficulty contemplate abstract truths. The new converts were to be taught that those are born again who are initiated by baptism into the Christian worship, and that they ought to exhibit in their conduct the innocence of little infants; therefore milk and honey, the common food of infants, were administered to them. Those who obtained admission to the kingdom of Christ, from being the servants of the devil, became the Lord's freed men, and like newly enlisted soldiers swore to obey their commander. And to signify this, certain rites were borrowed from military usages and from the forms of manumission.³

7. Lastly, not to be tedious, whoever considers that the Christians were collected from among the Jews and from the pagan nations, who were accustomed, from their earliest years, to various ceremonies and superstitious rites, and that the habits of quoted only the Latin version by Vossius. I have preferred giving the original; but I have not disturbed the English translation of the passage as previously given by Murdock.—A.

¹ Examples are given by Casaubon, Exercit. xvi. in Annales Baronii, p. 388; Tollius, Insigne Itineris Italici, Notes, 151—163; Spanheim, Notes to his French Translation of Julian's Cæsars, pages 133, 134; Clarkson, Discourse on Liturgies, pages 36, 42, 43, and others.

² Spartianus, Hadrian, cap. xiii. p. 15, ed. Obrechtli. [Spartian speaks only of the Eleusinian Mysteries, into which Adrian was initiated at Athens. These it may be that Adrian first introduced among the Latins; yet he was not the first Roman initiated in them. That some mysteries had before this time been introduced into the Roman worship, appears from the Epistles of Cicero to Atticus, lib. v. 21, end; lib. vi. 1, end; lib. xv. 25. Gronovius, indeed, understands these (mysteria Romana) to be the worship of the goddess Bona Dea. See his Observ. lib. iv. cap. ix. But on this worship no male person might attend; and I see not why Cicero should inquire so particularly of his friend (as he does) about the time of these mysteries, if they were nothing but the worship of a deity in which none but females ever bore any part.—Schl.

³ See Merrill, Observationes, lib. iii. cap. iii. [Schwartz, De Ritibus quibusdam Formulique a Manumissione ad S. Baptismum translatis, Altorf, 1738; and Zentgraf, De Ritibus Baptismalibus Sæculi Secundi, Jena, 1749.—Schl.

early life are very hard to be laid aside, will perceive that it would have been little short of a miracle, if nothing corrupt and debasing had found its way into the Christian church. For example, nearly all the people of the east, before the Christian era, were accustomed to worship with their faces directed towards the sun rising; for they all believed that God, whom they supposed to resemble light, or rather to be light, and whom they limited as to place, had his residence in that part of the heavens where the sun rises. When they became Christians they rejected, indeed, the erroneous belief; but the custom which originated from it, and was very ancient and universally prevalent, they retained. Nor to this hour has it been wholly laid aside. From the same cause many Jewish rites originated, which are still religiously maintained by many Christians, and especially by those who live in eastern countries.¹

8. The rites themselves I shall state only summarily; for this extensive subject deserves to be considered by itself, and cannot be fully discussed in the narrow limits of our work. The Christians assembled for the worship of God in private dwelling-houses, in caves, and in the places where the dead were buried. They met on the first day of the week, and here and there also on the seventh day, which was the Jewish Sabbath. Most of them likewise held sacred the fourth and sixth, the former being the day on which our Saviour was betrayed, and the latter that on which he was crucified. The hours of the day allotted to these meetings varied according to times and circumstances; most of them could assemble only in the evening, or in the morning before the dawn of day. When the Christians were assembled, prayers were recited (the purport of which Tertullian gives us),² the holy Scriptures were read,³ short discourses on Christian duties were addressed to the people, hymns were sung, and at last the Lord's supper and the love-feasts were celebrated, the oblations of the people affording them the materials.⁴

9. The Christians of this century consecrated anniversary festivals in memory of the Saviour's death and resurrection, and of the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the apostles. The day in remembrance of Christ's dying and expiating the sins of men was called the Passover, because they supposed that Christ was crucified on the same day in which the Jews kept their Passover. But in observing this festival, the Christians of Asia Minor differed from other Christians, and especially from those of Rome. Both fasted during what was called the great week, that on which Christ died;⁵ and in remembrance of the last supper of our Saviour, they held a sacred feast or ate the paschal lamb, just as the Jews did; which feast, as well as the time of Christ's death, they denominated the Passover. Now the Asiatic Christians held their paschal feast on the fourteenth day, or full moon, of the first Jewish month, which was the very time on which the Jews ate their Passover; and on the third day after this supper, they kept the memorial of Christ's triumphs over death, or of his resurrection. This custom they said they had received from the apostles John and Philip; and they moreover supported it by the example of Christ himself, who celebrated his paschal feast at the same time with the Jews. But the other Christians put off their Passover, that is, their paschal feast, until the evening preceeding the festal day sacred to Christ's resurrection, and thus connected day, all, whether dwelling in the towns or in the villages, hold meetings; and the Memoirs (ἀπομνημονεύματα) of the apostles, and the writings of the prophets are read as much as the time will permit; then the reader closing, the president in a speech exhorts and excites to an imitation of those excellent examples; then we all rise and pour forth united prayers; and when we close our prayer, as was before said, bread is brought forward, and wine, and water; and the president utters prayers and thanksgivings according to his ability (ὡς ὅσον δύναται αὐτῷ), and the people respond by saying amen; and a distribution and participation of the things blessed takes place to each one present, and to those absent it is sent by the deacons. And those who are prosperous and willing give what they choose, each according to his own pleasure; and what is collected is deposited with the president, and he carefully relieves the orphans and widows, and those who from sickness or other causes are needy, and also those in prison, and the strangers who are residing with us, and in short all that have need of help. We all commonly hold our assemblies on Sunday, because it is the first day on which God converted the darkness and matter and framed the world; and Jesus Christ our Saviour on the same day arose from the dead." Justin makes no mention here of singing as a part of the public worship of Christians; but Pliny in his Epistle assures us—"Quod essent soliti statim die ante lucem convenire; carmenque Christo quasi Deo, dicere secum invicem;" and both the New Testament and all antiquity recognise singing as a part of Christian worship. —Mar. [A similar but, in some respects, a more detailed account of primitive worship is given by Tertullian in his Apology, chap. xxxix.—R.

⁵ On this point there was great diversity. See Irenæus, in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. p. 24.—Mar.

¹ See Spencer, De Legibus Ritualibus Ebræor. Prolegom. p. 9, ed. Cantab. and all those who have explained the rites and usages of the oriental Christians.

² Tertullian, Apologeticum, cap. xxxix.

³ That other religious books besides the canonical Scriptures were read in several churches, appears from Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. 23, and lib. iii. 3; who informs us that the first Epistle of Clement and that of Soter, Bishops of Rome, were publicly read in the Church of Corinth, as was the Shepherd of Hermas, in very many churches.—Mar.

⁴ Pliny (Epistolæ, lib. x. Ep. xevii.) gives some account of the public worship of the Christians in the beginning of this century; and Justin Martyr, near the close of that Apology which he presented to Antoninus Pius, A.D. 150, gives the following more full and authentic account:—"On the day which is called Sun-

the memorial of Christ's death with that of his resurrection; and they cited Peter and Paul as authors of their custom.

10. The Asiatic custom of celebrating the Passover had two great inconveniences which appeared intolerable to the other Christians, and especially to the Romans. First, by holding their sacred feast on the very day on which they supposed Christ ate the paschal lamb with his disciples, they interrupted the fast of the great week, which appeared to the other Christians to fall little short of a crime. Again, as they always kept the memorial of Christ's rising from the dead on the third day after their paschal supper, it unavoidably happened that they more commonly kept on some other day of the week than the first or Sunday, called the Lord's day, the festival of Christ's resurrection, which in after times was called, and is now called, the Passover—[Pascha, or Easter.] Now the greater part of the Christians deemed it wrong to consecrate any other day than the Lord's day in remembrance of Christ's resurrection. Hence great contention frequently arose from this difference between the Asiatic and the other Christians. In the reign of Antoninus Pius about the middle of this century, Anicetus Bishop of Rome, and Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna, discussed this subject with great care at Rome. But the Asiatics could not be induced by any considerations to give up their custom, which they believed to be handed down to them from St. John.¹

11. Near the close of the century, Victor, Bishop of Rome, was of opinion that the Asiatic Christians ought to be compelled by laws and decrees to follow the rule adopted by the greater part of the Christian world. Accordingly after ascertaining the opinions of foreign bishops, he sent an imperious letter to the Asiatic bishops, admonishing them to follow the example of other Christians in observing Easter. They replied with spirit by Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, that they would not depart from the holy institution of their ancestors. Irritated by this decision, Victor excluded them from his communion and from that of his church (not from that of the universal church, which he had not power to do); that is, he pronounced them unworthy to be called his brethren. The progress of this schism was checked by Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons, in letters wisely composed, directed to Victor and others, and by the Asiatic bishops, who wrote a long letter in their own justification. And thus both parties retained their respective customs, until the council of Nice, in the fourth century, abrogated the Asiatic usages.²

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xiv. and lib. v. cap. xxiv.

12. When the Christians celebrated the Lord's supper, which they were accustomed to do chiefly on Sundays, they consecrated a part of the bread and wine of the oblations by certain prayers uttered by the bishop of the congregation. The wine was mixed with water, and the bread was divided into small pieces. Portions of the consecrated bread and wine were commonly sent to the absent and the sick, in testimony of fraternal affection towards them.³ There is much evidence that this most holy rite was regarded as necessary to the attainment of salvation; and I therefore dare not accuse of error those who believe that the sacred supper was in this century given to infants.⁴ Of the love-feasts, the notice before given may be sufficient.

13. Twice a-year, namely, at Easter and Whitsuntide⁵ (Paschatis et Pentecostes diebus), baptism was publicly administered by the bishop, or by the presbyters acting by his command and authority. The candidates for it were immersed wholly in water, with invocation of the sacred Trinity, according to the Saviour's precept, after they had repeated what they called the Creed (Symbolum), and had renounced all their sins and transgressions, and especially the devil and his pomp. The baptized were signed with the cross, anointed, commended to God by prayer and imposition of hands, and finally directed to taste some milk and honey.⁶ The reasons for these ceremonies must be sought in what has already been said respecting the causes of the ceremonies. Adults were to prepare their minds expressly by prayers, fasting, and other devotional exercises. Sponsors or godfathers were, as I apprehend, first employed for adults and afterwards for children.⁷

² What is here stated briefly is more fully explained in my Comment. de Reb. Christ. ante C. M. p. 435, &c. I there said, p. 439, that Faydit saw the mistake in the common accounts of this controversy. But my memory failed me. On consulting the book, I find that he treats of the controversy indeed, but he misunderstood the precise subject of it. The venerable Heumann's tract on this controversy is republished in the Sylloge of his minor works. [Mosheim thinks that many writers have mistaken the points at issue, from not distinguishing between the ancient and the more modern application of the term Passover or Easter. See Neander, Kirchenges. pt. ii. p. 517; Pridcaux, Connection, pt. ii. b. v. ann. 162; Baillet, Hist. des Fêtes, p. 9.—Mur.

³ See Rixner, De Ritibus Veterum Christianor. circa Eucharistiam, p. 155, &c. [and note 4, in the preceding page.—Mur.

⁴ See Mayer, De Eucharistia Infantum; and Zornius, Historia Eucharistia Infantum, Berol. 1736, 8vo.

⁵ See Tertullian, De Baptismo, cap. xix. Opera, p. 232; Wall, History of Infant Baptism, vol. i. pages 277, 279; Vicecomes, De Ritibus Baptismi, Paris, 1618, 8vo.

⁶ See especially Tertullian, De Baptismo [and respecting the honey and milk, Tertullian, De Corona; and Clemens Alex. Pædag. lib. i. cap. vi.—Schl.

⁷ See Van Mästricht, De Susceptoribus Infantum &c.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SEPARATIONS OR HERESIES.

1. AMONG the Christian sects which arose in this century, the first place is due to those Jewish Christians whose zeal for the Mosaic law severed them from the other believers in Christ.¹ The rise of this sect took place in the reign of Adrian. For when this emperor had wholly destroyed Jerusalem a second time, and enacted severe laws against the Jews, the greater part of the Christians living in Palestine, in order not to be confounded as they had been with Jews, laid aside the Mosaic ceremonies, and chose one Mark, who was a foreigner and not a Jew, for their bishop. This procedure was very offensive to those among them whose attachment to the Mosaic rites was too strong to be eradicated. They therefore separated from their brethren, and formed a distinct society in Peræa, a part of Palestine, and in the neighbouring regions; and among them the Mosaic law retained all its dignity unimpaired.²

Baptismo, edit. 2d, Frankf. 1727, 4to. He thinks sponsors were used for children and not for adults, p. 15. See also Wall, Hist. of Infant Baptism, vol. i. pages 69, 474, &c. [The manner of receiving new converts into the churches, about the year 150, is thus minutely described by Justin Martyr, in his (so called) second Apology, towards the conclusion:—"In what manner we dedicate ourselves to God, after being renewed by Christ, we will now explain, lest by omitting this we should seem to dissemble in our statement. Those who believe and are persuaded that the things we teach and inculcate are true, and who profess ability thus to live, are directed to pray, with fasting, and to ask of God the forgiveness of their former sins; we also fasting and praying with them. Then we conduct them to a place where there is water, and they are regenerated [baptized]; for they receive a washing with water, in the name of the Father of all, the Lord God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit. For Christ said, 'Except ye be regenerated, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.' " "This washing is likewise called illumination; because the minds of those who have learned these things are enlightened; and whoever is enlightened is washed in the name of Jesus Christ, who was crucified under Pontius Pilate; and in the name of the Holy Spirit, who, by the prophets, foretold all that relates to Christ." "And after thus washing the convinced and consenting person, we conduct him to where the brethren, as we call them, are assembled; and there offer our united supplications with earnestness, both for ourselves and for the enlightened person, and for all others everywhere; that we may conduct ourselves as becomes those who have received the truth, and by our deeds prove ourselves good citizens, and observers of what is commanded us, so that we may be saved with an eternal salvation; and on ending our prayers we salute each other with a kiss." Justin Martyr then describes the administration of the Lord's Supper.—Mur.

1 The origin, names, and diversity of opinion of this class of sects; are well stated by Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 603—626.—Mur.

2 See Sulpitius Severus, Historia Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xxxi. p. 245, &c. [p. 381, ed. Hornl., 1657. He says, "Adrian stationed a regiment of soldiers as a constant guard to prevent all Jews from entering Jerusalem; which was advantageous to the Christian faith; because at that time nearly all (the Jewish Christians)

2. This body of people, who would unite Moses and Christ, was again divided into two classes, differing widely in their opinions and customs, the Nazarenes and the Ebionites. The former are not reckoned by the ancient Christians among heretics,³ but the latter are placed among those sects which subverted the foundations of religion. Both sects used a history of Christ or a Gospel, which was different from our Gospels.⁴ The word Nazarene was not the name of a sect, but was equivalent to the word Christian. For those who bore the title of Christians among the Greeks were among the Jews called Nazarenes, which they did not esteem as a name of disgrace. Those who, after their separation from their brethren, retained this original name imposed on the disciples of Christ by the Jews, believed Christ to be born of a virgin, and to be in some way united with the divine nature. And although they would not discard the ceremonies prescribed by Moses, yet they would not obtrude them upon the Gentile Christians. They moreover rejected the additions made to the Mosaic ritual by the doctors of the law and the Pharisees.⁵ It is therefore easy to see why the other Christians in general judged more favourably of them.

3. Whether the Ebionites derived their name from a man [called Ebion], or were so denominated on account of their poverty either in regard to property or sentiment, is uncertain.⁶ But they were much worse than the Nazarenes. For though they supposed Christ to be an ambassador of God and endowed with divine power, yet they conceived him to be a man, born in the ordinary course of nature, the son of Joseph and Mary. They maintained that the ceremonial law of Moses must be observed, not by the Jews only, but by all who wished believed in Christ as God, yet with an observance of the law."—Mur.

3 The first that ranked the Nazarenes among the heretics, was Epiphanius, a writer of the fourth century, of no great fidelity or accuracy of judgment. [Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 619, 620, thinks the Nazarenes, described by Epiphanius, were descendants of the Ebionites, who had now imbibed some Gnostic principles. The names Ebionites and Nazarenes are often confounded, both by ancients and moderns.—Mur.

4 See Fabricius, Codes Apocryph. N. T. tom. i. p. 355, &c. and Mosheim, Vindicia, contra Tolandii Nazarenorum, p. 112, &c. [Jones on the Canon of the New Test. vol. i. and the authors of Introductions to the New Test.—Mur. [And Bible Dictionaries.—R.

5 See Le Quen's Annotations ad Damascenum, tom. i. p. 82, 83, and his Diss. de Nazarenis et eorum Fide, which is the seventh of his Dissertations subjoined to his edition of the Opera Damasceni. [Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. p. 101, &c.—Schl.

6 See Fabricius, Ad Philastr. de Hæresibus, p. 81. Ittig, De Hæresibus, Evi Apostolici. [Also note on cent. i. part ii. chap. v. p. 50, and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. p. 612, &c.—Mur.

to obtain salvation; and therefore St. Paul, that strenuous opposer of the law, they viewed with abhorrence. Nor were they satisfied with the mere rites which Moses appointed, but observed with equal veneration the superstitious rites of their ancestors, and the customs of the Pharisees which were added to the law.¹

4. These little and obscure sects were not very detrimental to the Christian cause. Much greater disturbance was produced by those whose founders explained the doctrines of Christianity agreeably to the precepts of the oriental philosophy respecting the origin of evil. These latter sects, concealed and unnoticed previously to this century, came forth from their obscurity during the reign of Adrian,² and gathered churches of considerable magnitude in various countries. A long catalogue of these semi-Christian sects might be gathered out of the writings of the ancients; but of the greater part of them we know no more than their names, and perhaps some of them differed only in name from each other. Those which acquired notoriety beyond others may be divided into two classes. The first class originated in Asia, and maintained the philosophy of the east in regard to the origin of the universe (if I may so say) pure and uncorrupted: the other class, founded among the Egyptians and by the Egyptians, mingled with that philosophy many monstrous opinions and principles current in Egypt. The systems of the former were more simple and intelligible; those of the latter were much more complicated and more difficult of explanation.

5. In the Asiatic class, the first place seems to belong to Elxai, a Jew, who is said to have founded the sect of the Elecsaites in the reign of Trajan. Though he was a Jew, and worshipped one God, and revered Moses, yet he corrupted the religion of his fathers by many false notions derived from the philosophy and superstition of the orientals; and after the example of the Essenes, expounded the Mosaic law according to the dictates of reason, or in other words made it an allegory. But Epiphanius, who had read one of Elxai's books, acknowledges himself in doubt whether the Elecsaites should be reckoned among the Christian sects or among the Jewish. In his book Elxai mentions Christ, and speaks honourably of him; but he does not explain himself so as to make it manifest whether Jesus of Nazareth was the Christ of whom he speaks.³

6. If Elxai be not reckoned, Saturninus of Antioch will justly stand at the head of this class; at least he lived earlier than all the other Gnostic heresiarchs. He supposed two first causes of all things, the good God, and matter; the latter evil in its nature and subject to a Lord. The world and the first men were created by seven angels, that is, by the rulers of the seven planets, without the knowledge of God, and against the will of the Lord of matter. But God approved of the work when it was completed, imparted rational souls to the men who before had only animal life, and divided the entire world into seven parts, which he subjected to the seven creators, of whom the God of the Jews was one, reserving, however, the supreme power to himself. To these good men, that is, men possessed of wise and good souls, the Lord of matter opposed another sort of men, to whom he imparted a malignant soul. And hence the great difference between good and bad men. After the creators of the world had revolted from the supreme God, he sent down Christ from heaven clothed, not with a real body, but with the shadow of one, that in our world he might destroy the kingdom of the Lord of matter, and point out to the good souls the way of returning back to God. But this way is a hard and difficult one. For the souls that would ascend to God after the dissolution of the body must abstain from flesh, wine, marriage, and from all things which either exhilarate the body or delight the senses. Saturninus taught in Syria, which was his native country, and especially at Antioch; and he drew many after him by his great show of virtue.⁴

¹ Ireneus, Contra Hæreses, lib. i. cap. xxvi. Epiphanius treats largely of the Ebionites in his Ananirum, hæres. xxx. But he is worthy of no credit; for he acknowledges (sec. iii. p. 127. and sec. xiv. p. 141.) that he has joined the Sampserans and the Elecsaites with the Ebionites, and that the first Ebionites did not hold the errors which he attributes to the sect.—[The correctness of Epiphanius, as a historian, is often called in question; and perhaps justly. But if the term Ebionites designated a variety of minor sects, all of them Jewish Christians, and if some of these sects had in the fourth century imbibed Gnostic sentiments, unknown to the original Ebionites, then Epiphanius may here be entirely correct, which others suppose to be the fact. See Neander, as cited above, Note 3.—Mur.]

² Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. vii. cap. xvii. p. 898. Cyprian, Epist. lxxv. p. 144. and others.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. 38; Epiphanius Hæres. xix. sec. 3. p. 41; Theodoret, Fabul. Hæret. lib. ii. cap. vii. p. 221. [Of these Elecsaites, who were also called Sampserans, everything afforded by antiquity that is important has been collected by Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. p. 587, &c. He justly accounts them enthusiasts.—Schl.]

⁴ Ireneus, lib. i. cap. xxiv.; Euseb. Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. vii.; Epiphanius, Hæres. xxiii.; Theodoret, Fabul. Hæret. lib. i. cap. ii. and the other writers on the heresies. [Among the modern writers, see Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 336, &c.; Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. p. 274, &c.; Ittig, De Hærenarchia, sæculi ii. cap. 1.; Tillmont, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de l'Eglise, tome ii. p. 215, and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. p. 759, &c.—Mur.]

7. In the same class of Asiatic Gnostics must be placed Cerdo, a Syrian, and Marcion, the son of a bishop of Pontus. The history of these men is obscure and uncertain. It appears, however, that they began to establish their sect at Rome; that Cerdo taught his principles there before the arrival of Marcion; that Marcion, failing to obtain some office in the church at Rome, in consequence of some misconduct, joined the party of Cerdo, and with great success propagated their tenets over the world. In the manner of the orientals, Marcion taught that there are two first causes of all things, the one perfectly good, the other perfectly evil. Intermediate between these two deities, ranks the Architect of this lower world, whom men worship, and who was the God and the Lawgiver of the Jews; he is neither perfectly good nor perfectly evil, but of a mixed nature, or, as Marcion expressed it, he is just; and therefore he can dispense punishments as well as rewards. The evil deity and the Creator of the world are perpetually at war. Each wishes to be worshipped as God, and to subject the inhabitants of the whole world to himself. The Jews are the subjects of the Creator of the world, who is a very powerful spirit; the other nations which worship many gods, are subjects of the evil deity. Each is an oppressor of rational souls and holds them in bondage. In order, therefore, to put an end to this war, and give freedom to the souls which are of divine origin, the supreme God sent among the Jews Jesus Christ, who is of a nature very similar to himself, or his Son, clothed with the appearance or shadow of a body, which would render him visible, with commission to destroy both the kingdom of the world's Creator and that of the evil deity, and to invite souls back to God. He was assailed both by the prince of darkness and by the God of the Jews, or the world's Creator; but they were unable to hurt him, because he had only the appearance of a body. Whoever will abstract their minds, according to his prescriptions, from all sensible objects, and renouncing as well the laws of the God of the Jews as those of the prince of darkness, will turn wholly to the supreme God, and at the same time subdue and mortify their bodies by fasting and other means, shall after death ascend to the celestial mansions. The moral discipline which Marcion prescribed to his followers was, as the nature of the system required, very austere and rigorous. For he condemned marriage, wine, flesh, and whatever is grateful and pleasant to the body. Marcion had numerous followers, among whom Lucan or

Lucian, Severus, Blastus, and others, but especially Apelles, are said to have deviated in some respects from the opinions of their master, and to have established new sects.¹

8. Bardesanes and Tatian are commonly but erroneously supposed to have been of the school of Valentinus the Egyptian; for their systems differ in many respects from that of the Valentinians, and come nearer to the oriental principle of two first causes of all things. Bardesanes was a Syrian of Edessa, a man of great acumen, and distinguished for his many learned productions. Seduced by his attachment to the oriental philosophy, he placed in opposition to the supreme God, who is absolute goodness, a prince of darkness who is the author of all evil. The supreme God created the world free from all evil, and formed men possessed of celestial souls and of subtile ethereal bodies. But when the prince of darkness had induced these first men to sin, God permitted the author of all evil to inclose men in gross bodies formed out of sinful matter, and also to corrupt the world that men might suffer for the iniquity they had committed. Hence the struggle between reason and concupiscence in man. Jesus therefore descended from the celestial regions, clothed not with a real but with a celestial and ethereal body, and taught men to subdue their depraved bodies, and to free themselves from the bondage of vicious matter by abstinence, by meditation, and by fasting; and whoever will do so, on the dissolution of the body, shall ascend to the mansions of the blessed, clothed in their ethereal vehicles or their celestial bodies. Bardesanes afterwards returned to sounder sentiments, but his sect long survived in Syria.²

9. Tatian, by birth an Assyrian, a distinguished and learned man and disciple of Justin Martyr, was more noted among the ancients for his austere moral principles, which were rigid beyond measure, than for the speculative errors or dogmas which he proposed as articles of faith to his followers. Yet it appears from credible witnesses that he held matter to be the source of all evil, and therefore recommended the abhorrence and the mortification of the body; that he supposed the Creator of the world and the true God were not one and the same being; that he denied to our Saviour a real body; and corrupted Christianity with other doctrines of the oriental philosophers. His followers, who were numerous, were sometimes called from him Tatiani or Tatianists, but more frequently were designated by names indicative of their austere morals. For, as they discarded all the external comforts and conveniences of life, and held wine in such abhorrence as to use mere water in the Lord's Supper, fasted rigorously, and lived in celibacy, they were denominated Eneratitæ or abstainers, Hydroparastatæ or water-drinkers, and Apotactatæ or renouncers.¹

¹ Besides the common writers on the heresies, as Irenæus, Epiphanius, Theodoret, &c. see Tertullian's five Books against Marcion; the Poem against Marcion, also in five books, which is ascribed to Tertullian; and the Dialogue against the Marcionites, which is ascribed to Origen. Among the modern writers, see Massuet, the editor of Irenæus, Tillemont, Beausobre, Histoire du Manichéisme, tome ii. p. 69, &c.; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. pages 484—537; Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. pag. 441—410; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 779—807.—Mur.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. xxx. and the writers on the ancient heresies. Origen, Dial. contra Marcionitas, sec. iii. p. 70, ed. Wetstein; Strunzius, Historia Bardesanis et Bardesanitar. Wittemb. 1722, 4to; Beausobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, vol. ii. p. 128, &c. [Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 394, &c.; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. pages 407—424; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. p. 743, &c.—Mur.

10. The Gnostics of the Egyptian class differed from those of the Asiatic, by combining the oriental with Egyptian philosophy, and more especially in the following particulars:—1. Although they supposed matter to be eternal and also animated, yet they did not recognise an eternal prince of darkness and of matter, or the malignant deity of the Persians. 2. They generally considered Christ our Saviour as consisting of two persons the man Jesus, and the Son of God or Christ; and the latter, the divine person, they supposed entered into Jesus the man, when he was baptized in Jordan by John, and parted from him when he was made a prisoner by the Jews. 3. They attributed to Christ a real and not an imaginary body, though they were not all of one sentiment on this point. 4. They prescribed to their followers a much milder system of moral discipline; nay, they seemed to give precepts which favoured the corrupt propensities of men.

11. Among the Egyptian Gnostics, the first place is commonly assigned to Basilides of Alexandria. He maintained that the supreme and all-perfect God produced from himself seven most excellent beings or Æons. Two of the Æons, namely, Dynamis and Sophia (Power and Wisdom), procreated the angels of the highest order. Those angels built for themselves a residence or heaven, and produced other angels of a nature a little inferior. Other generations of angels succeeded and other heavens were built, until there were three hundred and sixty-five heavens, and as many orders of angels; that is, just as many as there are days in a year. Over all these heavens and angelic orders there is a Prince or Lord, whom Basilides called Abraxas; a word which was doubtless in use among the Egyptians before Basilides, and which, when written in Greek, contains letters that together make up the number 365; that is, the number of the heavens.² The inhabitants of the lowest heaven contiguous to eternal matter, which is an animated and malignant substance, formed a design of constructing a world out of that disorderly mass and of fabricating men. God approved the work when it was finished, and gave rational souls to the men whom the angels had formed, whereas before they had only sensitive souls; he also gave to the angels dominion over men. The Prince of these angels chose the Jewish nation for his subjects and gave them a law by Moses. The other angels presided over other nations.

12. The angels who created and governed the world gradually became corrupt; and they not only laboured to obliterate the knowledge of the supreme God, in order that they might themselves be worshipped as gods, but they waged war with each other for the enlargement of their respective territories. The most arrogant and restless of them all was he who governed the Jewish nation. Therefore, the supreme God, in compassion to the souls endowed with reason, sent down from heaven his Son or the prince of the Æons, whose name is Nus [νοῦς, mind] and Christ; that he, joining himself to the man Jesus, might restore the lost knowledge of his Father, and overturn the empire of the angels who governed the world, and especially of the insolent Lord of the Jews. The God of the Jews perceiving this, ordered his subjects to seize the man Jesus and put him to death; but against Christ he had no power.¹ The souls that obey the precepts of the Son of God will ascend to God when their bodies die, the rest will pass into other bodies. All bodies return back to vicious matter whence they originated.

² A great number of gems still exist, and quantities of them are daily brought to us from Egypt, on which, besides other figures of Egyptian device, the word Abraxas is engraved. See Jo. Macarius, Abraxas seu de Gemmis Basilidianis Disquisitio, enlarged by Jo. Chiffet, ed. Antwerp, 1657, 4to, Bern. de Montfaucon, Palæograph. Græca, lib. ii. cap. viii. p. 177, &c. and others. Learned men almost universally think those gems originated from Basilides; and hence they are called gemmæ Basilidianæ. But very many of them exhibit marks of the most degrading superstition, such as cannot be attributed even to a semi-Christian; and likewise manifest insignia of the Egyptian religion. They cannot all therefore be attributed to Basilides, who, though he held many errors, yet worshipped Christ. Those only must refer to him which bear some marks of Christianity. The word Abraxas was unquestionably used by the ancient Egyptians, and appropriated to the Lord of the heavens; which Basilides retained from the philosophy and religion of his country. See Beausobre, Histoire du Manichéisme, tom. ii. p. 51; Passeri, Diss. de Gemmis Basilidianis, in his splendid work, De Gemmis Stelliferis, tom. ii. p. 221, &c. ed. Florent. 1750, fol.; Jablonski, De Nominis Abraxas Significatione, in the Miscell. Lipsiens. Nova, tom. vii. and in his Opuscula, v. 4, p. 80, &c. Passeri contends that none of these gems has reference to Basilides; he makes them all refer to the magicians, or the soothsayers, sorcerers, conjurers, and fortune-tellers. But this learned man, it appears to me, goes too far; for he himself acknowledges (p. 225), that he sometimes found on them some vestiges of the Basilidian errors. These celebrated gems still need an erudite but cautious and judicious interpreter. [A considerable collection of these gems may be seen, with explanatory notices, in the volume of plates to the First Edition of Matter, Hist. Crit. du Gnosticisme, Par. 1828. These plates are not given in the second edition.—R.]

¹ The only work of Tatian which has reached us is his Oratio ad Græcos. His opinions are spoken of by Clemens Alex. Strom. lib. iii. p. 460; Epiphanius, Hæres. xlv. cap. i. p. 391; Origen, De Oratione, cap. xiii. p. 77, ed. Oxon. and by others of the ancients; but no one of them has attempted to delineate his system. [Of the moderns, see Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. pages 445–447, and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 762–766. It should be remembered that the names Eneratites, Apotactites (Ἐκπαρταῖται Ἀποτακταῖται), were applied to all the austere sects; so that though all Tatianists were Eneratites, yet all Eneratites were not Tatianists.—Mur. [See also Ritter, Geschichte der Christ. Philos. Hamb. 1841, vol. i. p. 328, &c.—R.]

13. The moral system of Basilides, if we believe most of the ancients, favoured concupiscence and allowed every species of iniquity. But from much surer testimony it appears that he recommended purity of life and the practice of piety, and condemned even an inclination to sin. Still there were some things in his moral precepts which greatly offended other Christians; for he taught that it is lawful to conceal our religion, to deny Christ when our life is in danger, to participate in the pagan feasts which followed their sacrifices; and he detracted much from the estimation and honour in which the martyrs were held, and maintained that they were greater sinners than other men, and were visited by Divine justice for their iniquities; for it was a principle with him that none but sinners suffer any evil in this life. And hence arose the suspicions entertained respecting his system of morals, which seemed to be confirmed by the flagitious lives of some of his disciples.²

14. But much viler than he, and said to be the worst of all the Gnostics, was Carpo-crates, also of Alexandria [who lived in the reign of Adrian]. His philosophy did not differ in its general principles from that of the other Egyptian Gnostics; for he maintained one supreme God, Æons, the offspring of God, eternal and malignant matter, the creation of the world from evil matter by angels, divine souls unfortunately enclosed in bodies, and the like. But he maintained that Jesus was born of Joseph and Mary in the ordinary course of nature, and that he was superior to other men in nothing but fortitude and greatness of soul. He also not only gave his disciples license to sin, but imposed on them the necessity of sinning, by teaching that the way to eternal salvation was open to those souls only which committed all kinds of enormity and wickedness. But it exceeds all credibility that any man who believes there is a God, that Christ is the Saviour of mankind, and who inculcates any sort of religion, should hold such sentiments. Besides, there are grounds to believe that Carpocrates, like the other Gnostics, held the Saviour to be composed of the man Jesus and a certain Æon called Christ, and that he imposed some laws of conduct on his disciples. Yet undoubtedly there was something in his opinions and precepts that rendered his piety very suspicious; for he held that concupiscence was implanted in the soul by the Deity, and is therefore perfectly innocent; that all actions are in themselves indifferent, and become good or evil only according to the opinions and laws of men; that in the purpose of God all things are common property, even the women, but that such as use their rights are by human laws accounted thieves and adulterers. Now, if he did not add some corrective to the enormity of these principles, it must be acknowledged that he wholly swept away the foundations of all virtue, and gave full license to all iniquity.³

15. Valentinus, also an Egyptian, exceeded all his fellow-heresiarchs, both in fame and in the multitude of his followers. His sect had its birth at Rome, grew to maturity in the island of Cyprus, and with wonderful celerity traversed Asia, Africa, and Europe. Valentinus held the general principles common with his brother Gnostics, and he assumed the title of a Gnostic; yet he held several principles peculiar to himself. In the Pleroma (which is the Gnostic name for the habitation of God), he supposed thirty Æons, fifteen males and as many females. Besides these there were four unmarried; namely, Horus ["Ὅρος], the guardian of the confines of the Pleroma; Christ, the Holy Spirit, and Jesus. The youngest of the Æons, Sophia (Wisdom), fired with vast desire of comprehending the nature of the supreme Deity, in her agitation brought forth a daughter called Achamoth [חַכְמֹת, the sciences or philosophy]; who being excluded from the Pleroma, descended to the rude and shapeless mass of matter, reduced it to some degree of order, and by the aid of Jesus brought forth Demiurgus [Δημιουργός, Artificer], the builder and Lord of all things. This Demiurgus separated the more subtle or animal matter from the grosser or material; and out of the former he framed the world above us or the visible heavens; out of the latter, the lower world or this earth. Men he compounded of both kinds of matter; and his mother, Achamoth, added to them a third substance which was celestial and spiritual. This is a brief outline of the complicated and tedious fable of Valentinus. It appears that he explained the origin of the world and of the human race, in a more subtle manner than the other Gnostics; yet that he did not differ from them in reality. And the same is true of the other parts of his system.

¹ Many of the ancients tell us on the authority of Irenæus, that our Saviour, according to Basilides' opinion, had not a real body; and that Simon the Cyrenian was crucified in place of him; but that this is erroneous, and that Basilides supposed the man Jesus and Christ united to constitute the Saviour, is demonstrated in the Com. de Rebus Christ. &c. p. 354, &c. It may be that here and there a follower of Basilides held otherwise.

² Besides the ancient writers on the heresies, Basilides is particularly treated of by Massuet, Disert. in Irenæum; and Beausobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, vol. ii. p. 8, &c. [Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 281—309; Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. pag. 342—361; and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 679—704.—Mur. [And Ritter, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 123, &c.—R.

³ See Irenæus, Contra Hæres. lib. i. cap. xxv.; Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. iii. p. 511, and the others. [Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. pages 361—371; Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 309—327; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 767—773. Carpocrates left a young son, Epiphaneus, to propagate his system; and this son, though he died at the age of seventeen, wrote a book from which the world have had to learn what they could of the tenets of Carpocrates. It is doubtful whether he ought to be called a Christian. He was an Egyptian philosopher, who had perhaps borrowed some notions from the Christians, but still his philosophy was his cynosure. Two inscriptions in the true spirit of this philosopher, recently discovered in Cyrene in Africa, have given rise to a conjecture that his sect continued till the sixth century. See the inscriptions with comments in the Christmas Programm of Gesenius, A.D. 1825.—Mur.

16. The Architect of the world gradually became so inflated that he either thought himself, or at least wished men to regard him, to be the only God; and by his prophets, sent among the Jews, he arrogated to himself the honours of the supreme God. And the other angels who presided over parts of the created universe imitated his example. To repress this insolence of Demiurgus and imbue souls with a knowledge of the true God, Christ descended, being composed of an animal and spiritual substance, and moreover clothed with an ethereal body. He passed through the body of Mary, just as water through a canal; and to him Jesus, one of the highest Æons, joined himself when he was baptized in Jordan by John. The Architect of the world, who perceived that his dominion would be shaken by this divine man, caused him to be seized and crucified. But before Christ came to execution, not only Jesus the Son of God, but also the rational soul of Christ forsook him, so that only his sentient soul and his ethereal body were suspended on the cross. Those who, according to the precepts of Christ, renounce the worship not only of the pagan deities, but also that of the Jewish God, and submit their sentient and concupiscent soul to be chastised and reformed by reason, shall with both their souls, the rational and the sentient, be admitted to the mansions of the blessed near to the Pleroma. And when all particles of the Divine nature, or all souls, shall be separated from matter and purified, then a raging fire shall spread through this material universe and destroy the whole fabric of nature; for the whole oriental philosophy and the system of the Gnostics may be reduced to this epitome, this world is composed of both good and evil. Whatever of good there is in it was derived from the supreme God, the parent of light, and will return to him again; and when this takes place, this world will be destroyed.¹

17. The ancients represent the school of Valentinus as divided into many branches. Among these were, the Ptolomaitic sect, whose author Ptolomy differed from his master respecting the number and nature of the Æons; the Secundian sect, established by Secundus, one of the principal followers of Valentinus, who seems to have kept more closely to the oriental philosophy, and to have maintained two first causes of all things, light and darkness, or a prince of good and a prince of evil; the sect of Heracleon, from whose books Clement and Origen quote much; the sect of Marcus and Calarbasus, called Marcosians, who according to Irenæus added much that was senseless and absurd to the fictions of Valentinus, though it is certain that they did not maintain all that is attributed to them. I pass by other sects which appear to have originated from the Valentinian system; but whether all the sects which are called Valentinian actually originated from disciples and followers of Valentinus, appears very doubtful to those who consider how great mistakes the ancients have made in stating the origin of the heretics.¹

¹ Of the Valentinian system we have a full account in Irenæus, Contra Hæres. lib. i. cap. i. — vii.; Tertullian, Contra Valentinianos; Clemens Alex. Passim; and in all the ancient writers on the heresies. Among the moderns, see Buddeus, Diss. de Hæresi Valentiniana; subjoined to his Introd. in Hist. Philos. Ebræorum; which has occasioned much discussion respecting the origin of this heresy. Some of the moderns have attempted to give a rational explanation of the intricate and absurd system of Valentinus. See Souverain, Platonisme Dénoué, chap. viii. p. 64; Vitringa, Observat. Sacre, lib. i. cap. ii. p. 131; Beausobre, Hist. du Manich. p. 548, &c.; Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tome iii. p. 729, &c.; Faydit, Eclaircis. sur l'Hist. Eccles. des II. Premiers Siècles, p. 12; who also contemplated writing an Apology for Valentinus. I pass by Arnold, the patron of all the heretics. But how vain all such attempts must be is proved by this, that Valentinus himself professed that his religion differed fundamentally from that of the other Christians. [Besides the authors above referred to, see Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. pages 371—389; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. pages 335—386; and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 704—731.—Mur. [And especially Ritter, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 191, &c. who has a long and valuable chapter on this sect.—R.]

18. Of the smaller and more obscure Gnostic sects, of which the ancients give us little more than the names, and perhaps one or two detached sentiments, it is unnecessary to say anything. Such were the Adamites, who are said to have wished to imitate the state of innocence;² the Cainites, who are represented as paying respect to the memory of Cain, Corah, Dathan, the inhabitants of Sodom, and Judas the traitor;³ the Abelites, whom the ancients represent as marrying wives, but raising up no children;⁴ the Sethites, who regarded Seth as the Messiah;⁵ the Florinians who originated at Rome under Florinus and Blastus,⁶ and many others. Perhaps the ancient Christian fathers divided one sect into several, deceived by the fact of its having several names; they may also have had incorrect information respecting some of them.

19. Among the Gnostics of the Egyptian class, a chief place must be assigned to the Ophites or Serpentians, a senseless sect, of which one Euphrates is said to be the father. The sect originated among the Jews before the Christian era. A part of them became professed Christians, the rest retained their former superstition. Hence there were two sects of Ophites, a Christian sect and an anti-Christian. The Christian Ophites held nearly the same absurd notions with the other Egyptian Gnostics concerning Æons, the eternity of matter, the creation of the world without the knowledge or consent of the Deity, the rulers of the seven planets who presided over the world, the tyranny of Demiurgus, the descent of Christ joined to the man Jesus into our world to overthrow the kingdom of Demiurgus, &c.; but they held this peculiarity, that they supposed the serpent which deceived our first parents was either Christ himself, or Sophia concealed under the form of a serpent; and this opinion is said to have induced them to keep some sacred serpents, and to pay them a species of honour. Into such absurdities men might easily fall, if they believed the Creator of the world to be a different being from the supreme God, and regarded as divine whatever was opposed to the pleasure of Demiurgus.⁷

20. The numerous evils and discords which arose from combining the oriental

1 Besides Irenæus and the other ancient writers, see, concerning these sects, Græbo, Spicilegium Patrum et Hæreticorum, sæcul. ii. pag. 69—82, &c. On the Marcosians, Irenæus is copious, lib. i. cap. xiv. That Marcus was out of his senses is unquestionable; for he must have been deranged, if he could hold even the greater part of the strange fancies which are said to belong to his system. [Among the moderns who have treated of these sects, see Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 387—401; and Neander, Kircheng. vol. i. part ii. pages 731—746. —Mur.]

2 See for an account of them, Clemens Alex. Stromat. lib. i. p. 357; lib. iii. p. 525, lib. vii. p. 854; Tertullian, Scorpiae, in Opp. p. 633; and Contra Prax cap. iii.; Ipphanianus, Hæres. lib. i. p. 459; Theodoret, Hæret. Fabul. lib. i. cap. vi.; Augustine, De Hæres. cap. xxxi.; Jo. Damascenus, Opp. tom. i. p. 88; and among the moderns, Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 327—335; Bayle, Dictionnaire, Art. Adamites and Proletus; Tillemont, Mémoires, &c. tome ii. p. 256; Beausobre, Diss. sur les Adamites, subjoined to Lenfant's Histoire des Hussites. The accounts of the ancients are contradictory, and several of the moderns doubt whether there ever was a sect who performed their worship in a state of nudity. —Mur.

3 All the ancient writers mentioned in the preceding note, except Damascenus, speak of the Cainites, but what they state is very brief and contradictory. The correctness of their accounts is justly doubted by Bayle (Dictionnaire, Art. Cainites), and others. Origen (Contra Celsum, lib. iii. p. 119) did not regard them as Christians. Yet they might be a sect of Gnostics, who, holding the God of the Jews for a revoler from the true God, regarded Cain, Dathan, Corah, and others who resisted him as being very praiseworthy. —Mur.

4 The Abelites are mentioned only by Augustine, De Hæres. cap. lxxvii. and by the author of the book Praedestinatus, cap. lxxvii. It is represented that every man married a female child and every woman a little boy, with whom they lived and whom they made their heirs, hoping in this way to fulfil, literally, what Paul says, 1 Cor. vii. 29, that "they that have wives be as though they had none." The sect is treated of by Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. p. 697, who doubts whether it were not altogether an imaginary sect. —Mur.

5 The Sethites are mentioned by the author of Praedestinatus, cap. xix.; and Philastrius, De Hæresib. cap. lii.; but Rhenfer (Diss. de Sethianis, in his Opp. Philolog. p. 165), and Zorn (Opuscul. Sacra, tom. i. p. 614), consider this to be an imaginary sect. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 609, &c.; and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. p. 758, &c. —Mur.

6 Florinus and Blastus were by the ancients reckoned among the Valentinians. Both were presbyters of Rome, intimate friends, and excommunicated by the Roman bishop Eleutherius. (Euseb. H. E. vol. xv.) As Florinus in early life enjoyed the instruction of Polycarp at Smyrna, and as Irenæus wrote a letter to Blastus concerning the schism at Rome about Easter-day, Walch (ubi supra, p. 404), supposes both of them, and particularly Blastus, were opposed to the views of the Romish Church respecting Easter. He also considers it most probable that Florinus was inclined towards Gnosticism; for Irenæus wrote a book against him concerning the eight Æons; and he actually had some followers. —Schl. [That Florinus was a Gnostic is clear from Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. lib. v. cap. xx.) That Blastus was so is not so certain. —Mur.]

7 The history and doctrines of this sect, so far as they are known, I have stated in a German work printed at Helmstadt, 1746—4 [bearing the title, Erster Versuch einer unpartheyischen und gründlichen Ketzergeschichte. Afterwards, Schumacher published an Explanation of the obscure and difficult Doctrinal Table of the ancient Ophites, Wolfenbüttel, 1756, 4to; Schumacher maintained that the doctrine of the Ophites embraced neither metaphysics nor theology, but merely the history of the Jewish nation couched in hieroglyphics; Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 447—481, has epitomized both works; and we here give his leading thoughts in further illustration of this sect. These people, called in Greek Ophites, in Latin Serpentians, were by the Asiatics and Egyptian philosophy with the Christian religion, began to be increased about the middle of this century, by those who brought the Grecian philosophy with them into the Christian Church. As the doctrines held by the Christians respecting the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and respecting the twofold nature of the Saviour, were least of all at agreement with the precepts of this philosophy, they first endeavoured so to explain these doctrines that they could be comprehended by reason. This was attempted by one Praxeas, a very distinguished man, and a confessor, at Rome. Discarding all real distinction between the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, he taught that the whole Father of all things joined himself to the human nature of Christ. Hence his followers were called Monarchians and Patripassians. Nor was the latter an unsuitable name for them, if Tertullian correctly understood their sentiments; for they denominated the man Christ, the Son of God; and held that to this Son, the Father of the universe, or God, so joined himself, as to be crucified and endure pangs along with his Son. Yet Praxeas does not appear to have erected a distinct church.¹

called Nahassians, or Naasians. Irenæus (lib. ii. cap. xxxiv.) the author of the supplement to Tertullian's book, De Præscript. Hæret. (cap. xlvii.); Epiphanius (Hæres. xxxvii.); Theodoret (Hæret. Fabul. lib. i. cap. xiv.); and Augustine (De Hæres. cap. xvii.), account them Christian heretics; but Origen (Contra Celsum, lib. vii. sec. 28) holds them to be not Christians. Yet he speaks of them as pretended Christians in his Comment on Matth. tom. iii. p. 851, &c. Philastrius makes them more ancient than Christianity. It is most probable they were Jewish Gnostics, and that some of them embraced Christianity, so that the sect became divided into Jewish and Christian Ophites. There are two sources of information on this part of ecclesiastical history. The first is the accounts of Irenæus, Epiphanius, and others. The second is what Origen tells us (Contra Celsum, lib. vi. sec. xxxiii. &c.) concerning the Diagram of the Ophites. This Diagram was a tablet, on which the Ophites depicted their doctrines in all sorts of figures, with words annexed. It probably contained the doctrines of the Jewish Ophites, and is dark and unintelligible, unless we may suppose this symbolical representation contained that system, the principal doctrines of which are stated by the ancients. The theological system both of the Jewish and the Christian Ophites, cannot be epitomized and must be sought for in Walch, p. 461. Their serpent-worship consisted in this, they kept a living serpent which they let out upon the dish when celebrating the Lord's supper, to crawl around and over the bread. The priest to whom the serpent belonged now came near, brake the bread, and distributed to those present. When each had eaten his morsel he kissed the serpent, which was afterwards confined. When this solemn act, which the Ophites called their perfect sacrifice, was ended, the meeting closed with a hymn of praise to the supreme God, whom the serpent in Paradise had made known to men. But all the Ophites did not observe these rites, which were peculiar to the Christian Ophites, and confined to a small number among them. This worship must have been symbolic. The Ophites had also Talismans.—Schl. [See a lucid account of the Ophites, in Neander's Kirchengesch. vol. i. part ii. pages 746–756.—Mur. Matter gives the diagram of the Ophites in the second volume of his Hist. du Gnost.—R.

¹ See Tertullian, Liber contra Praxeas; and com-

21. Nearly allied to this opinion was that which was advanced about the same time at Rome, by Theodotus, a tanner, yet a man of learning and a philosopher; and by one Artemas or Artemon, from whom originated the Artemonites; for, so far as can be gathered from very indistinct accounts of these men left us by the ancients, they supposed that when the man Christ was born, a certain divine energy or some portion of the divine nature (and not the person of the Father as Praxeas imagined), united itself to him. Which of these men preceded the other in time, and whether they both taught the same doctrine or differed from each other, cannot at this day be decided, so few and obscure are the ancient accounts we have of them. But it is unquestionable that the disciples of both applied philosophy and geometry to the explication of the Christian doctrine.²

pare Wesseling, Probabilia, cap. xxvi. p. 223, &c. [Tertullian (to whom we are indebted for all certain knowledge of the views of Praxeas) was not only an obscure writer, but also a prejudiced one in regard to Praxeas. He not only rejected his doctrine, but hated him, because Praxeas had alienated the Roman bishop Victor from Montanus, whose partisan Tertullian was. Hence Tertullian, in his censures on Praxeas, is often extravagant and insulting. The opposition of Praxeas to Montanus doubtless led the former into his error. Montanus had treated of the doctrine of three persons in the Divine essence, and had insisted on a real distinction between the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. (Tertullian, Contra Praxeas, cap. xiii. p. 426.) Praxeas, who was hostile to Montanus, published his own doctrine in opposition to Montanus. From Tertullian, moreover, it appears clearly that Praxeas discarded the distinction of persons in the Divine essence, and, as Tertullian expresses it, contended for the monarchy of God; but how he explained what the Scriptures teach concerning the Son and the Holy Spirit is not so clear. Of the various conceptions we might gather from Tertullian, Mosheim gives a full investigation in his Comment. de Rebus Christ. &c. p. 426. See also Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. pages 527–546.—Schl. [See also Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. p. 994, &c.—Mur.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxviii.; Epiphanius, Hæres. liv. p. 464; Wesseling, Probabilia, cap. xxi. p. 172, &c. Several persons occur in the history of the heretics bearing the name of Theodotus. (1) Theodotus of Byzantium, a tanner, of whom above. (2) Theodotus the younger, disciple of the former, and founder of the sect of Melchisedeckians. This sect derived its name from its holding, agreeably to the doctrine of the elder Theodotus, that Melchisedec was the power of God and superior to Christ; and that he sustained the office of an intercessor for the angels in heaven, as Christ did for us men on earth. (3) Theodotus, the Valentinian. (4) Theodotus, the Montanist. Our Theodotus had saved his life during a persecution at Byzantium, by a denial of Christ, and thus had incurred general contempt. To escape from disgrace he went to Rome. But there his offence became known. To extenuate his fault, he gave out that he regarded Jesus Christ as a mere man, and that it could be no great crime to deny a mere man. He was therefore excluded from the church by Victor the bishop. Thus Theodotus came near to the system of the Socinians, and held Christ for a mere man, though a virtuous and upright one. Whether he held the birth of Christ to have been natural or supernatural, the ancient accounts are not agreed. He rejected the Gospel of John; and held his own doctrine to be apostolical, and that of the eternal divinity of Christ to be a novel doctrine. See Walch, ubi supra, pages 546–557. Artemon has in mo-

22. The same attachment to philosophy induced Hermogenes, a painter, to depart from the sentiments of Christians respecting the origin of the world and the nature of the soul, and to cause disturbance in a part of the Christian community. Regarding matter as the source of all evil, he could not believe that God had brought it into existence by his omnipotent volition. He therefore held that the world and whatever is in the world, and also souls and spirits, were formed by the Deity out of eternal and vicious matter. There is much in this doctrine very difficult to be explained, and not in accordance with the common opinions of Christians. But neither Tertullian, who wrote against him, nor others of the ancients, inform us how he explained those Christian doctrines which are repugnant to his opinions.¹

23. In addition to these sects, which may be called the daughters of philosophy, there arose in the reign of Marcus Antoninus an illiterate sect, opposed to all learning and philosophy. An obscure man of weak judgment, named Montanus, who lived in a poor village of Phrygia called Pepuza, had the folly to suppose himself the Comforter promised by Christ to his disciples, and to pretend to utter prophecies under divine inspiration.² He attempted no change in the doctrines of religion, but professed to be divinely commissioned to perfect and give efficiency to the moral discipline taught by Christ and his apostles; for he supposed Christ and his apostles had conceded too much to the weakness of the people of their age, and thus had given only an incomplete and imperfect rule of life. He therefore would have fasts multiplied and extended, forbade second marriages as illicit, did not allow churches to grant absolution to such as had fallen into the greater sins, condemned all decoration of the body and female ornaments, required polite learning and philosophy to be banished from the church, ordered virgins to be veiled, and maintained that Christians sin most grievously by rescuing their lives by flight, or redeeming them with money in time of persecution. I pass by some other of his austere and rigid precepts.

24. A man who professed to be a holier moralist than Christ himself, and who would obtrude his severe precepts upon Christians for divine commands and oracles, could not be endured in the Christian church. Besides, his dismal predictions of the speedy downfall of the Roman republic, &c. might bring the Christian community into imminent danger. He was therefore first by the decisions of some councils, and afterwards by that of the whole church, excluded from all connexion with that body. But the severity of his discipline itself led many persons of no mean condition to put confidence in him. Pre-eminent among these were two opulent ladies, Priscilla and Maximilla; who themselves, with others, uttered prophecies, after the example of their master, whom they denominated the Paraclete [or dern times become more famous than Theodotus; since Samuel Crell assumed the name of an Artemonite, in order to distinguish himself from the odious Socinians, whose doctrines he did not fully approve. (See his book with the title: L. M. Artemonii, Institutum Evangelii Johannis ex Antiquitate Restitutum, and his other writings). The history of this Artemon is very obscure. The time when he lived cannot be definitely ascertained, and the history of his doctrine is not without difficulties. It is not doubted that he denied the divinity of Jesus Christ, as held by orthodox Christians. But whether he swerved towards the system of the modern Socinians or to that of Praxeas is another question. Mosheim believed the latter; De Reb. Christ. &c. 491. But as this rests on the recent testimony of Gennadius of Marseilles (De Dogm. Eccles. cap. iii.) Walch (p. 564) calls it in question. See also Rappen, Diss. de Hist. Artemonis et Artemonitarum, Lips. 1737.—Schl. [See also Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. pages 996—1000.—Mur. [Of Theodotus and Artemon, see Burton's Lect. on Ecc. Hist. of the First Three Cent. vol. ii. p. 211, &c.—R.

¹ There is extant a tract of Tertullian, Liber contra Hermogenem, in which he assails the doctrine of Hermogenes concerning matter and the origin of the world. But another tract of his, De Censu Animæ, in which he confuted the opinion of Hermogenes concerning the soul, is lost. [Tertullian is exceedingly severe upon Hermogenes, who was probably his contemporary, and fellow-African. Yet he allows that he was an ingenious and eloquent man, and sound in the principal doctrines of Christianity. It seems the morals of Hermogenes gave most offence to Tertullian. He had married repeatedly, and he painted for all customers what they wished. To a Montanist these things were exceedingly criminal. There is no evidence that Hermogenes founded a sect. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 432, &c.; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. p. 476, &c. and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. p. 976, &c.—Mur.

² They doubtless err who tell us that Montanus claimed to be the Holy Spirit. He was not so foolish.

Nor do those correctly understand his views whom I have hitherto followed, and who represent him as asserting, that there was divinely imparted to him that very Holy Spirit, or Comforter, who once inspired and animated the apostles. Montanus distinguished the Paraclete promised by Christ to the apostles, from the Holy Spirit that was poured upon them; and held, that under the name of the Paraclete, Christ indicated a divine teacher, who would supply certain parts of the religious system which were omitted by the Saviour, and explain more clearly certain other parts, which for wise reasons had been less perfectly taught. Nor was Montanus alone in making this distinction. For other Christian doctors supposed the Paraclete whose coming Christ had promised, was a divine messenger to men and different from the Holy Spirit given to the apostles. In the third century, Manes interpreted the promise of Christ concerning the Paraclete in the same manner; and boasted that he himself was that Paraclete. And who does not know that Mahomet had the same views, and applied the words of Christ respecting the Paraclete to himself? Montanus therefore wished to be thought that Paraclete of Christ, and not the Holy Spirit. The more carefully and attentively we read Tertullian, the greatest of all Montanus' disciples and the best acquainted with his system, the more clearly will it appear that such were his views. [See Burton's Lect. on the Ecc. Hist. of First Three Cent. vol. ii. p. 155, &c.—R.

Comforter]. Hence it was easy for Montanus to found a new church which was first established at Pepuza, a little town of Phrygia, but which spread in process of time through Asia, Africa, and a part of Europe. Of all his followers the most learned and distinguished was Tertullian, a man of genius but austere and gloomy by nature; who defended the cause of his preceptor by many energetic and severe publications.¹

¹ See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xvi. and especially Tertullian in his numerous books; and then all writers, both ancient and modern, who have treated professedly of the sects of the early ages. Quite recently and with attention and great erudition, the history of the Montanists has been illustrated by Wernsdorf in his Commentatio de Montanistis Seculi Secundi melgo creditis Hæreticis, Dantzik, 1751, 4to. The Montanists were also called Phrygians or Cataphrygians, from the country where they resided and originated; also Pepusians, from the town where Montanus had his habitation, and which he pretended was the New Jerusalem spoken of in the Revelation of St. John. It appears likewise, that from Priscilla they were called Priscillianists; though this name, on account of its ambiguity, has in modern times been disused. Tertul-

lian denominated those of his faith the Spiritual (Spirituales), and its opposers the Carnal (Psychikoi), because the former admitted Montanus' inspiration of the Holy Spirit, which the latter rejected. The time when Montanus began to disturb the church is much debated. Those who follow Eusebius, who is most to be relied upon, place this movement in the year 171 or 172. Wernsdorf's conjecture that Montanus was the bishop of Pepuza is not improbable. See concerning Tertullian, Hamberger's account of the principal writers, vol. ii. p. 492, and Walch, Hist. Eccles. N. Test. p. 648, &c.; and concerning the Montanists, Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. p. 611, &c.—Schl. [Also Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. pages 870—893.—Mur. [In addition to the various works on these Gnostic sects referred to in the several preceding notes, the student ought also to consult Matter, Hist. Crit. du Gnost. 2d edit. 3 vol. and to read especially the sections from 44 to 48, inclusive, of Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Davidson's Trans. vol. i. p. 134, &c. with the very valuable references and extracts contained in the notes. See also Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. chap. v. entitled, Christianity and Orientalism; Ritter, Geschichte der Christ. Philos. vol. i. books 1 and 2. The modern Roman Catholic view of these sects may be seen in Döllinger, Lehrbuch der Kirchengesch. Cox's Transl. Lond. 1840, vol. i. chap. ii. The English reader may also consult Bp. Kaye's Tertullian, &c. chap. vii.; Waddington's Hist. of the Church, part. i. chap. v.; Vidal's Translation of Mosheim's Commentaries, &c. vol. ii. and Rose's Translation of Neander's History of the Christian Religion, vol. ii.—R.

CENTURY THIRD.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. THAT Christians suffered very great evils in this century, and were in perfect security during no part of it, admits of no controversy. For, not to mention the popular tumults raised against them by the pagan priests, the governors and magistrates could persecute them, without violating the imperial laws, as often as either superstition, or avarice, or cruelty prompted. Yet it is no less certain that the rights and liberties of the Christians were increased more than many have supposed. In the army, in the court, and among all ranks, there were many Christians whom no one molested at all; and under most of the Roman emperors who reigned in this century, Christianity presented no obstacle to the attainment of public honours. In many places also, with the full knowledge of the emperors and magistrates, they possessed houses in which they regularly assembled for the worship of God. Yet it is probable, or rather more than probable, that the Christians commonly purchased this security and these liberties with money; although some of the emperors had very kind feelings towards them, and were not greatly opposed to their religion.

2. Antoninus, surnamed Caracalla, the son of Severus, came to the throne in the year 211; and during the six years of his reign he neither oppressed the Christians himself, nor suffered others to oppress them.¹ Antoninus Heliogabalus [A.D. 218—222], though of a most abandoned moral character, had no hostility towards the Christians.²

¹ From a passage in Tertullian (Ad Scapul. cap. iv.) asserting that Caracalla had a Christian nurse; lacto Christiano educatum fuisse; and from one in Spartianus (life of Caracalla, in Scriptor. Histor. Aug. vol. i. p. 707, cap. i.) asserting that he was much attached to a Jewish playfellow when he was seven years old, it has been inferred that he was half a Christian, and on that account was indulgent to the followers of Christ. But it is much more probable that they purchased his indulgence with their gold. See Moshelm, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 460.—Mur.

² Lampridius, Vita Heliogabali, cap. iii. p. 796. [Di-

His successor, Alexander Severus [A.D. 222—235], an excellent prince, did not, indeed, repeal the laws which had been enacted against the Christians, so that instances occur of their suffering death in his reign, yet from the influence of his mother, Julia Mamaea, to whom he was greatly attached, he showed kind feelings towards them in various ways, and whenever occasion was offered; and even paid some worship and honour to our Saviour;³ for Julia entertained the most favourable sentiments of the Christian religion, and at one time invited to the court, Origen, the celebrated Christian doctor, that she might hear him discourse. But those who conclude that Julia and Alexander actually embraced Christianity, have not testimony to adduce which is unexceptionable. Yet it is certain that Alexander thought the Christian religion deserved toleration beyond others, and regarded its author as worthy to be ranked among the extraordinary men who were divinely moved.⁴

cebat preterea (Imperator), Judaeorum et Samaritanorum religionem et Christianam devotionem illuc (Romam) transferendam, ut omnium cultuum secretum Heliogabali sacerdotium teneret: which Moshelm (De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 460) understands to mean, that Heliogabalus wished the Jewish, Samaritan, and Christian religions to be freely tolerated at Rome, so that the priests of his order might understand all the arcana of them, having them daily before their eyes.—Mur.

³ See Lampridius, De Vita Severi, cap. xxix. p. 930; and Zeibich, Diss. de Christo ab Alexandro in larario culto, which is found in the Miscell. Lips. Novæ, tom. iii. p. 42, &c. [Most of the modern writers make Julia Mamaea to have been a Christian. See Wetstein's preface to Origen's Dial. contra Marcionitas; but the ancient writers, Eusebius (H. E. vi. 21) and Jerome (De Scriptor. Illustr. cap. liv.) express themselves dubiously. The former calls her Θεοσεβέστραν, and the latter religionem (devout); and both state that she invited Origen to her court, then at Antioch, in order to hear him discourse on religion; but neither of them intimates that she obeyed his precepts and adopted the Christian faith. And in the life of Julia, there are clear indications of superstition, and of reverence for the pagan gods. Moshelm, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 461.—Schl.

⁴ See Spanheim, Diss. de Lucii Britonum regis, Juliae Mamaeae, et Philipporum, conversionibus, Opp. tom. ii. p. 400; Jablonski, Diss. de Alexandro Securo sacris Christianis per Gnosticos initiato, in Misc. Lips. Nov. tom. iv. p. 56, &c.; [and in his Opuscula, vol. iv. p. 38, &c.—R.]

3. Under Gordian [A.D. 236—244] the Christians lived in tranquillity. His successors, the Philips, father and son [A.D. 244—249], showed themselves so friendly to the Christians that by many they were supposed to be Christians. And there are arguments which may render it probable that these emperors did, though secretly and covertly, embrace Christianity; but as these arguments are balanced by others equally strong and imposing, the question respecting the religion of Philip the Arabian and his son, which has exercised the sagacity of so many learned men, must be left undecided.¹ At least neither party has adduced any evidence, either from testimony or from facts, which was too strong to be invalidated. Among the subsequent emperors of this century, Gallienus [A.D. 260—268] and some others likewise, if they did not directly favour the Christian cause, at least they did not retard it.

4. This friendship of great men, and especially of emperors, was undoubtedly not the last among the human causes which contributed to enlarge the boundaries of the church. But other causes, and some of them divine, must be added. Among the divine causes, besides the inherent energy of heavenly truth, and the piety and constancy of the Christian teachers, especially noticeable is that extraordinary providence of God, which we are informed, by means of dreams and visions, induced many persons who before were either wholly thoughtless or alienated from Christianity, to come out at once and enrol their names among the followers of Christ.² To this must be added the curing of diseases and other miracles which very many Christians still performed, by invoking the name of the Saviour.³ Yet the number of miracles was less in this age than in the preceding, which may be ascribed not only to the wisdom of God, but also to his justice, which would not suffer men to make gain by the powers divinely given them.⁴

5. Among the human causes which aided the progress of Christianity may doubtless be reckoned the translation of the Scriptures into various languages, the labours of Origen in disseminating copies of them, and various books composed by wise men. No less efficacy is to be ascribed to the beneficence of Christians towards those whose religion they abhorred. The idolaters must have hearts of stone, not to have been softened and brought to have more friendly feelings towards the people, whose great sympathy for the poor, kindness to enemies, care of the sick, readiness to redeem captives, and numerous other kind offices, proved them to be deserving of the love and gratitude of mankind. If, what I would not pertinaciously deny, pious frauds and impositions deserve a place among the causes of the extension of Christianity, they doubtless hold the lowest place, and were employed only by a few.

6. That the boundaries of the church were extended in this century, no one calls in question; but in what manner, by whom, and in what countries, is not equally manifest. Origen taught the religion he professed to a tribe of Arabs; I suppose they were some of the wandering Arabs who live in tents.⁵ The Goths, a ferocious and warlike people, who inhabited Mesia and Thrace, and made perpetual incursions into the neighbouring provinces, received a knowledge of Christ from certain Christian priests whom they carried away from Asia. As those priests, by the sanctity of their lives and their miracles, acquired respectability and authority among these marauders who were entirely illiterate, such a change was produced among them, that a great part of the nation professed Christianity, and in some measure laid aside their savage manners.⁶

7. To the few and small Christian churches in France, erected in the second century by certain Asiatic teachers, more and larger ones were added in this century after the times of Decius [A.D. 250]. In the reign of this emperor those seven devout men, Dionysius, Gratian, Trophimus, Paul, Sa-

¹ See Spanheim, De Christianismo Philipporum, Opp. tom. ii. p. 400 (P. de la Faye), Entretiens historiques sur la Christianisme de l'Empereur Philippe, Utrecht, 1692, 12mo; Mamachius, Origines et Antiq. Christiane, tom. ii. p. 252, &c. See Fabricius, Lux Evangelii toti orbis exoritur, p. 252, &c.; [and Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 471. The most important ancient testimonies are Euseb. H. E. lib. vi. cap. 34, and Chronicon, ann. 246; Jerome, De Script. Illust. cap. liv.—Mur.

² See Origen, Adv. Celsum, lib. i. p. 35; Homil. in Lucæ vii. Opp. tom. ii. p. 216, ed. Basil. Tertullian, De Anima, cap. xiv. p. 348, ed. Rigaltii. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. v. and others. [See also note 1, cent. ii. part 1. chap. i. p. 54, &c. of this work.—Mur.

³ Origen, Adv. Celsum, lib. i. pag. 6—7; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. vii.; Cyprian, Ep. i. Ad Donatum, p. 3, and the note of Baluze there, p. 376.

⁴ Spencer, Notes on Origen. adv. Celsum, pag. 6, 7.

⁵ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xix. [But Semler, Hist. Eccles. Selecta, Cap. t. i. p. 58, supposes they were not wandering Arabs.—Mur.

⁶ Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. vi.; Diaconus, Hist. Miscell. lib. ii. cap. xiv.; Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. v. [Philostorgius says that Ulphilas, who in the fourth century translated the Christian Scriptures into the Gothic language, was a descendant of the captives carried off by the Goths from Cappadocia, in the reign of Gallienus, which is not improbable. By the influence of their Christian captives, the Goths were induced to invite Christian teachers among them; and numerous churches were collected. A Gothic bishop, named Theophilus, subscribed the acts of the council of Nice. (Sozrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xli.) Yet there is indubitable evidence that a large part of the nation remained pagans long after this period. See Mosheim, De Rebus Christ. &c. p. 449.—Mur.

turninus, Martial, and Stremonius migrated to this country, and amidst various perils founded the churches of Paris, Tours, Arles, [Narbonne, Toulouse, Limoges, Clermont], and other places. And their disciples gradually spread the Christian doctrine throughout Gaul.¹ To this century likewise must be referred the origin of the German churches of Cologne, Treves, Metz, [Tongres, Liege,] and others; the fathers of which were Eucharis, Valerius, Maternus, Clement, and others.² The Scots also say that their country was illuminated with the light of Christianity in this century, which does not appear improbable in itself, but cannot be put beyond controversy by any certain testimony.³

CHAPTER II.

THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. IN the commencement of this century the Christians were variously afflicted in many of the Roman provinces; but their calamity was increased in the year 203, when the Emperor Severus, who was otherwise not hostile to them, enacted a law that no person should abandon the religion of his fathers for that of the Christians, or even for that of the Jews.⁴ Although this law did not condemn [existing] Christians, but merely restrained the propagation of their religion, yet it afforded to rapacious and unjust governors and judges great opportunity for troubling the Christians and for putting many of the poor to death, in order to induce the rich to avert their danger by donations. Hence after the passing of this law, very many Christians in Egypt, and in other parts of both Asia and Africa, were cruelly slain; and among them were Leonidas, the father of Origen; the two celebrated African ladies, Perpetua and Felicitas, whose acts [martyrdom] have come down to us;⁵

also Potamiena, a virgin; Marcella and others of both sexes, whose names were held in high honour in the subsequent ages.

2. From the death of [Septimius] Severus till the reign of Maximin, called Thrax from the country which gave him birth [or, from A.D. 211 to A.D. 235], the condition of Christians was everywhere tolerable, and in some places prosperous; but Maximin, who had slain Alexander Severus, an emperor peculiarly friendly to the Christians, fearing lest the latter should avenge the death of their patron, ordered their bishops, and particularly those whom he knew to have been the friends and intimates of Alexander, to be seized and put to death.⁶ During his reign therefore many and atrocious injuries were brought upon the Christians; for although the edict of the tyrant related only to the bishops and the ministers of religion, yet its influence reached farther, and incited the pagan priests, the populace, and the magistrates, to assail Christians of all orders.⁷

3. This storm was followed by many years of peace and tranquillity. [From A.D. 237—249.] But when Decius Trajan came to the imperial throne, A.D. 249, war, in all its horrors, again burst upon the Christians; for this emperor, excited either by fear of the Christians, or by attachment to the ancient superstition, published terrible edicts, by which the governors were commanded, on pain of forfeiting their own lives, either to exterminate all Christians utterly, or bring them back by pains and tortures to the religion of their fathers. During the two succeeding years, a great multitude of Christians in all the Roman provinces were cut off by various kinds of punishment and suffering.⁸ This persecution was more cruel and terrific than any which preceded it; and immense numbers professed to renounce Christ, being dismayed not so much by the

1 Greg. Turon. Hist. Francor. lib. i. cap. xxviii. p. 23; Ruinart, Acta Martyrum Sincera, p. 109. &c. [See note 1, on cent. ii. part i. chap. i. p. 53, &c. of this work, where the origin of the Gallic or French churches is considered at some length.—Mur.]

2 Calmet, Histoire de Lorraine, tome i. Diss. i. p. 7, &c.; Nicol. de Hontheim, Historia Treverensis. [See also notes 3, p. 52, and 1, p. 53, on cent. ii. part i. chap. i. of this work.—Mur.]

3 See Ussher and Stillingfleet on the Origin and Antiquities of the British Churches; and Maekenzie, De Regali Scriptorum Prosapia, cap. viii. p. 119, &c. [with the works referred to in note 4, p. 62, above. See also Chalmers's Caledonia, vol. i. p. 315.—R.]

4 Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. i.; Spartianus, Vita Severi, cap. xvi. xvii.

5 Ruinart, Acta Martyrum Sincera, p. 90, &c. [See an affecting account of the sufferings of these and other martyrs in the reign of Severus, in Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. iii. chap. vol. i. p. 294.—Mur.] [The student should not deny himself the pleasure of perusing the account taken from the acts of the martyrdom of Perpetua and Felicitas, which he will find in the eloquent pages of Milman (Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 216, &c.) who introduces it with this just remark:—"Of all the histories of martyrdom none is so unexaggerated in its tone and language, so entirely unencumbered with miracles; none abounds in such exquisite touches of nature, or, on the whole, from its minuteness and circumstantiality, breathes such an air of truth and reality as this."—R.]

6 Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxviii.; Orosius, Hist. lib. vii. cap. xix. p. 509.

7 Origen, tom. xxviii. in Matth. Opp. tom. i. p. 137; Firmilian, in Opp. Cypriani, Ep. lxxv. p. 140, &c.

8 Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxxix. xli.; Gregory Nyssen, Vita Theodoturgi, Opp. tom. iii. p. 568, &c.; Cyprian, De Lapsis, in Opp. p. 182, &c. [Eusebius attributes the persecution by Decius to his hatred of Philip, his predecessor, whom he had murdered, and who was friendly to the Christians. Gregory attributes it to the emperor's zeal for idolatry. Both causes might have prompted him. The persecuting edict is not now extant; that which was published by Medon, Toulouse, 1664, 4to, is probably unauthentic. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 476, &c.—Mur.]

fear of death as by the dread of the long-continued tortures by which the magistrates endeavoured to overcome the constancy of Christians; and procured for themselves safety either by sacrificing, i. e. offering incense before the idols, or by certificates purchased with money. Hence arose the opprobrious names of Sacrificers, Incensers, and the Certificated, (Sacrificatores, Thurificatores, and Libellatici,) by which the lapsed were designated.¹

4. From the multitude of Christians chargeable with defection in the reign of Decius, great commotions and sharp contests arose in different parts of the church; for the lapsed wished to be restored to Christian fellowship, without submitting to that severe penance which the laws of the church prescribed, and some of the bishops favoured their wishes while others opposed them.² In Egypt and Africa many persons, to obtain more ready pardon of their offences, resorted to the intercession of the martyrs, and obtained from them letters of recommendation (libellos pacis) that is, papers in which the dying martyrs declared that they considered the persons worthy of their communion, and wished them to be received and treated as brethren. Some bishops and presbyters were too ready to admit offenders who produced such letters; but Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, a decided and austere man, though he was not disposed to derogate at all from the honour of the martyrs, was nevertheless opposed to this excessive lenity and wished to limit the effects of these letters of recommendation. Hence there arose a sharp contest between him and the martyrs, confessors, presbyters, the lapsed and the people, which ended in his gaining the victory.³

1 See Prudentius Maran, Life of Cyprian, prefixed to Cyprian's Opp. sec. 6, p. 54, &c. [For an interesting account of the sufferings of Christians in this persecution, the English reader is referred to Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. iii. chap. viii.; and chap. xli. This persecution was more terrible than any preceding one, because it extended over the whole empire, and because its object was to worry the Christians into apostasy by extreme and persevering torture. The Certificated or Libellatici are supposed to be such as purchased certificates from the corrupt magistrates, in which it was declared that they were pagans and had complied with the demands of the law, when neither of these was fact. To purchase such a certificate was not only to be partaker in a fraudulent transaction, but it was to prevaricate before the public in regard to Christianity, and was inconsistent with that open confession of Christ before men which he himself requires. On the purpose of these letters see Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. pages 482—489.—Mur.

2 Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xlv.; Cyprian, Epistolæ, passim.

3 Albaspianus, Observat. Eccles. lib. i. obs. xx. p. 94; De Penit. et Satisfactionibus humanis, lib. vii. cap. xvi. p. 706. The whole history of this controversy must be gathered from the Epistles of Cyprian. [Tertullian, De Pudicitia, cap. xxii.; and Ad Martires, cap. i. makes the earliest mention of these letters; whence it is con-

5. The successors of Decius, namely, Gallus and his son Volusian, (A. D. 251—253) renewed the persecution against the Christians which seemed to be subsiding;¹ and as their edicts were accompanied by public calamities, particularly by a pestilential disease which spread through many provinces, the Christians had again to undergo much suffering in divers countries.² For the pagan priests persuaded the populace that the gods visited the people with so many calamities on account of the Christians. The next emperor, Valerian, stilled the commotion A. D. 254, and restored tranquillity to the church.

6. Till the fifth year of his reign Valerian was very kind to the Christians; but suddenly, in the year 257, by the persuasion of Macrianus, a most bigoted pagan who was his prime minister, he prohibited the Christians from holding meetings, and ordered the bishops and other teachers into exile. The next year he published a far more severe edict; so that no small number of Christians in all the provinces of the Roman empire were put to death, and often exposed to punishment worse than death. Eminent among the martyrs in this tempest were Cyprian bishop of Carthage, Sixtus bishop of Rome, Laurentius a deacon at Rome who was roasted before a slow fire, and others. But Valerian being taken captive in a war against the Persians, his son Gallienus, in the year 260, restored peace to the church.³

7. Under Gallienus therefore, who reigned with his brother eight years [A. D. 260—268] and under his successor Claudius who reigned but a few months, persecution against the Christians began to be used about the middle of the second century. By martyrs here must be understood persons already under sentence of death for their religion, or at least such as had endured some suffering, and were still in prison and uncertain what would befall them. Mosheim (De Rebus Christ. &c. pages 490—497), has collected the following facts respecting their misuse. (1) They were given with little or no discrimination to all applicants. Cyprian, Ep. xlv. p. 24, Ep. x. p. 20.—(2) They often did not express definitely the names of the persons recommended, but said: "Receive A. B. (cum suis) and his friends." Ibid. Ep. x. pag. 20, 21.—(3) Sometimes a martyr, before his death, commissioned some friend to give letters in his name to all applicants. Ibid. Ep. xxi. p. 30; Ep. xxi. p. 31.—(4) Some presbyters obeyed these letters without consulting the bishop, and thus subverted ecclesiastical order. Ibid. Ep. xxvii. p. 38; Ep. x. p. 20; Ep. xl. p. 52; Ep. xxxii. pag. 31, 32. It is easy to see what effects would follow, when the almost deified martyrs, of every age and sex and condition felt themselves to possess authority almost divine, and were beset by host of persons writhing under the rigours of the ancient discipline.—Mur.

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. i.; Cyprian, Ep. lvii. lviii.

² See Cyprian, Liber ad Demetrianum. [Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. iii. chap. xii.—Mur.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. x. xl. Acta Cypriani, in Ruinart's Acta Martyrum Sincera, p. 216; Cyprian, Epist. lxxvii. p. 178, Epist. lxxxii. p. 165, ed. Baluze. [Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. iii. chap. xvi.—Mur.

reigned two years [A.D. 268-270] the condition of the Christians was tolerable, yet not altogether tranquil and happy. Nor did Aurelian, who came to the throne A. D. 270, attempt to disquiet them during four years. But in the fifth year of his reign, prompted either by his own superstition or by that of others, he prepared for war against them. But before his edicts had been published over the whole empire, he was assassinated in Thrace, A.D. 275. Hence few Christians were cut off under him. The remainder of this century—if we except some few instances of the injustice, the avarice, or the superstition of the governors²—passed away, without any great troubles or injuries done to Christians living among Romans.

8. While the emperors and provincial governors were assailing Christians with the sword and with edicts, the Platonic philosophers before described fought them with disputations, books, and stratagems. They were the more to be feared, because they approved and adopted many doctrines and institutions of the Christians, and following the example of Ammonius, their master, attempted to amalgamate the old religion and the new. At the head of this sect in this century was Porphyry, a Syrian or Tyrian, who composed a long work against the Christians, which was afterwards destroyed by the imperial laws.³ He was undoubtedly an acute, ingenious, and learned man, as his extant works evince; but he was not a formidable enemy to the Christians; for he had more imagination and superstition than sound argument and judgment, as his books which remain and the history of his life will show; without recurring to the fragments of his work against the Christians which are preserved, and which are unworthy of a wise and upright man.

9. Among the wiles and stratagems by which this sect endeavoured to subvert the authority of the Christian religion, this deserves to be particularly mentioned, that they drew comparisons between the life, miracles, and transactions of our Saviour, and the history of the ancient philosophers; and endeavoured to persuade the unlearned and women that these philosophers were in no respect inferior to Christ. With such views, Archytas of Tarentum, Pythagoras, and Apollonius Tyanæus, a Pythagorean philosopher, were brought again upon the stage, and exhibited to the public dressed very much like Christ himself. The life of Pythagoras was written by Porphyry.⁴ The life of Apollonius, whose travels and prodigies were talked of by the vulgar, and who was a crafty mountebank and the ape of Pythagoras, was composed by Philostratus, the first rhetorician of the age, in a style which is not inelegant. The reader of the work will readily perceive that the philosopher is compared with our Saviour; and yet he will wonder that any man of sound sense could have been deceived by the base falsehoods and fictions of the writer.⁵

10. But as nothing is so irrational as not to find patrons among the weak and ignorant, who regard words more than arguments, there were not a few who were ensnared by these silly attempts of the philosophers. Some were induced by these stratagems to abandon the Christian religion which they had embraced. Others being told that there was little difference between the ancient religion rightly explained and restored to its purity, and the religion which Christ really taught, and not that corrupted form of it which his disciples professed, concluded it best for them to remain among those who worshipped the gods. Some were led by those comparisons of Christ with the ancient heroes and philosophers, to frame for themselves a kind of mixed or compound religion. Witness, among others [the emperor], Alexander Severus, who esteemed Christ, Orpheus, Apollonius, and the like, all worthy of equal honours.

11. The Jews were reduced so low that

⁴ And in the next century by Jamblicus. That both biographers had the same object is shown by Ktister, Adnot. ad Jamblich. cap. ii. p. 7, and cap. xix. p. 78.—Schl.

⁵ See Olearius, Præfat. ad Philostrati vitam Apollonii, and Mosheim, Notes on Cudworth's Intellectual System, pages 304, 309, 311, 831; also Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 98, &c. and Enfield's Abridgement of Brucker, vol. ii. p. 42, &c.; Lardner's Works, vol. viii. pages 256-292. Apollonius was born about the beginning and died near the close of the first century. He travelled over all the countries from Spain to India; and drew much attention by his sagacious remarks, and by his pretensions to superhuman knowledge and powers. He was a man of genius, but vain-glorious, and a great impostor.—Mur. [The Life of Apollonius, by Philostratus, has been translated into English from the Greek, with notes and illustrations, by Berwick, Lond. 1809, 8vo. The reader may see a brief but judicious account of Apollonius in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. i. p. 242.—R.]

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxx.; Lactantius, De Mortibus Persecutor. cap. vi.

² One example is the inquiry of the Caesar, Galerius Maximian, near the end of the century, who persecuted the soldiers and servants of his palace who professed Christianity. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. i. and iv.

³ See Holstenius, Vita Porphyrii, cap. xi.; Fabricius, Luz. Evang. toti orbi exorientis, p. 164; Buddens, Introgo in Theologian, lib. ii. p. 877, &c. and Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 236, &c. His fifteen Books against the Christians were condemned to be burned by Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. A.D. 449, (see the Codex Justinianus de Summa Trinitate, lib. i. tit. i. cap. iii.) The work was answered by Methodius, Eusebius, Apollinaris, and Philostorgius; but the answers are lost. Of the work of Porphyry extracts are preserved by Eusebius, Jerome, and others.—Mur.

they could not, as formerly, excite in the magistrates any great hatred against the Christians. Yet they were not wholly inactive, as appears from the books written by Tertullian and Cyprian against them. There occur also in the Christian fathers several complaints of the hatred and machinations of the Jews.¹ During the persecutions of Severus, one Dominus abandoned Christianity for Judaism, undoubtedly to avoid the punishments which were decreed against the Christians. Serapion endeavoured to recall him to his duty in a special work.² This example shows that while the Christians were in trouble, the Jews were in safety; and therefore though greatly depressed, they had not lost all power of doing injury to the Christians.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF LEARNING AND SCIENCE.

1. LITERATURE which had suffered much in the preceding century, in this lost nearly all its glory. Among the Greeks, with the exception of Dionysius Longinus, an excellent rhetorician, Dion Cassius, a fine historian, and a few others, scarcely any writers appeared who can be recommended for their genius or their erudition. In the western provinces still smaller was the number of men truly learned and eloquent, though schools continued everywhere devoted to the cultivation of genius; for very few of the emperors favoured learning, civil wars kept the empire almost constantly in commotion, and the perpetual incursions of the barbarous nations into the most cultivated provinces, extinguished with the public tranquillity even the thirst for knowledge.³

2. As for the philosophers, nearly every sect of Grecian philosophy had some adherents who were not contemptible, and who are in part mentioned by Longinus.⁴ But the school of Ammonius, the origin of which has been already stated, gradually cast all others into the background. From Egypt it spread in a short time over nearly the whole Roman empire, and drew after it almost all persons inclined to attend to philosophical studies. The prosperity was owing especially to Plotinus, the most distinguished disciple of Ammonius, a man of intellectual acumen, and formed by nature for abstruse investigation; for he taught, first in Persia, then at Rome and in Campania, vast assemblages of youth; and embodied precepts in various books, the greater part of which has come down to us.⁵

3. It is almost incredible what a number of pupils in a short time issued from the school of this man. But among them no one is more celebrated than Porphyry, a Syrian, who spread over Sicily and many other countries the system of his master, enlarged with new discoveries and carefully perfected.⁶ At Alexandria almost no other philosophy was publicly taught from the time of Ammonius down to the sixth century. It was introduced into Greece by one Plutarch, who was educated at Alexandria, and who re-established the Academy at Athens, which subsequently embraced many very renowned philosophers, who will hereafter be mentioned.⁷

4. The character of this philosophy has already been explained as far as was compatible with the brevity of this work. It is here proper to add, that all who were addicted to it did not hold the same opinions, but differed from each other on several points. This diversity naturally arose from that principle which the whole sect kept in sight; namely, that truth was to be pursued without restraint, and to be gleaned out of all systems. Hence the Alexandrian philosophers sometimes would receive what those of Athens would reject. Yet there were certain leading doctrines which were fundamental to the system, that no one who

¹ Hippolytus, Sermo in Susann. et Daniel, Opp. tom. i. pages 274—276.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xli.

³ See Hist. Littér. de la France, by the Benedictines, tome i. part ii. p. 317, &c.

⁴ In Porphyry's Vita Plotini, cap. xx. p. 128, ed. Fabricii.

⁵ See Porphyry's Vita Plotini, republished by Fabricius in Biblioth. Græca, vol. iv. p. 91; Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. art. Plotinus, p. 2330, and the learned Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 217, &c.

⁶ Iulianus, Vita Porphyrii, republished by Fabricius in Biblioth. Gr. [Porphyry was first the disciple of Longinus, author of the justly celebrated treatise on the Sublime. But having passed from Greece to Rome, where he heard Plotinus, he was so charmed with the genius and penetration of this philosopher that he attached himself entirely to him. See Vita Plotini, p. 3; Eunapius, Vita Philos. cap. ii. p. 17.—Maccl.

⁷ Marinus, Vita Procli, cap. xi. xii. p. 25, &c.

claimed the name of a Platonist dared to call in question. Such were the doctrines of one God the source of all things, of the eternity of the world, of the dependance of matter on God, of the plurality of Gods, of the method of explaining the popular superstitions, and some others.

5. The estimation in which human learning should be held, was a question on which the Christians were about equally divided; for while many thought that the literature and writings of the Greeks ought to receive attention, there were others who contended that true piety and religion were endangered by such studies. But the friends of philosophy and literature gradually acquired the ascendancy. To this issue Origen contributed very much; who having early imbibed the principles of the New Platonism inauspiciously applied them to theology, and earnestly recommended them to the numerous youth who attended on his instructions. And the greater the influence of this man, which quickly spread over the whole Christian world, the more readily was his method of explaining the sacred doctrines propagated. Some of the disciples of Plotinus connected themselves with the Christians, yet retained the leading sentiments of their master,¹ and those undoubtedly laboured to disseminate their principles around them, and to instil them into the minds of the uninformed.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE form of ecclesiastical government which had been introduced was more and more confirmed and strengthened, both in respect to individual churches and the whole society of Christians. He must be ignorant of the history and the monuments of this age, who can deny that a person bearing the title of bishop presided over each church in the larger cities, and managed its public concerns with some degree of authority, yet having the presbyters for his counsel, and taking the voice of the whole people on subjects of any moment.² It is equally certain that one bishop in each province was pre-eminent over the rest in rank and authority. This was necessary for maintaining that consociation of churches which had been introduced in the preceding century, and for holding councils more conveniently and readily. Yet it must be added that the prerogatives of these principal bishops were not everywhere accurately ascertained; nor did the bishop of the chief city in a province always hold the rank of first bishop. It is also beyond controversy that the bishops of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria, as presiding over the primitive and apostolic churches in the greater divisions of the empire, had precedence of all others, and were not only often consulted on weighty affairs, but likewise enjoyed certain prerogatives peculiar to themselves.

2. As to the bishop of Rome in particular, he was regarded by Cyprian,³ and doubtless by others likewise, as holding something of primacy in the church. But the fathers, who with Cyprian attributed this primacy to the Roman bishop, strenuously contended for the equality of all bishops in respect to dignity and authority; and, disregarding the judgment of the bishop of Rome whenever it appeared to them incorrect, had no hesitation in following their own judgment. Of this Cyprian himself gave a striking example in his famous controversy with Stephen, bishop of Rome, concerning the baptism of heretics. Whoever duly considers and compares all their declarations, will readily perceive that this primacy was not one of power and authority, but one of precedence among associated brethren. That is, the primacy of the Romish bishop in regard to the whole church was the same as that of Cyprian in the African church, which did not impair at all the equality of the African bishops, or curtail their liberties and rights, but merely conferred the right of convoking councils, of presiding in them, and admonishing his brethren fraternally, and the like.⁴

the sense of the whole church on subjects of peculiar interest. See Cyprian, Ep. v. p. 11; Ep. xiii. p. 23; Ep. xxviii. p. 39; Ep. xxiv. p. 33; Ep. xxvii. pag. 37, 38. To the objection, that Cyprian did himself ordain some presbyters and lectors without the consent of his council and the laity, it is answered, that the persons so advanced were confessors, who according to usage, were entitled to ordination without any previous election. Cyprian, Ep. xxxiv. pag. 46, 47; Ep. xxxv. pag. 48, 49; Tertullian, De Anima, cap. lv. p. 353, &c. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. pag. 575—579. — Mur.

³ Cyprian, Ep. lxxlii. p. 131; Ep. lv. p. 86, De Unitate Ecclesie, p. 195, ed. Baluze.

⁴ See Baluze, Annot. ad Cypriani Epist. pag. 387, 389, 400, &c. and especially Cyprian himself who contends strenuously for the perfect equality of all bishops. Ep. lxxi. p. 127. Nam nec Petrus—vindicare sibi aliquid insolenter, aut arroganter assumpsit se primum tenere, et obtemperari a novellis et posteris sibi oportere

¹ Augustine, Epistola lvi. Ad Dioscor. Opp. tom. ii. p. 260.

² Authorities are cited by Blondell, Apologia pro Sententia Hieronymi de Episcopis et Presbyteris, p. 136, &c. —[and still more amply by Boileau under the fictitious name of Claudius Fontelus, in his book De Antiquo Jure Presbyterorum in Regimine Ecclesiastico, Turin, 1676, 12mo. The most valuable of these testimonies are from the Epistles of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, who was a warm advocate for episcopal pre-eminence, yet did not presume to determine any question of moment by his own authority, or without the advice and consent of his presbyters, and was accustomed to take

3. Although the ancient mode of church government seemed in general to remain unaltered, yet there was a gradual deflection from its rules and an approximation towards the form of monarchy; for the bishops claimed much higher authority and power than before, and encroached more and more upon the rights not only of the Christian people, but also of the presbyters. And to give plausibility to these usurpations, they advanced new doctrines concerning the church and the episcopal office; which however were for the most part so obscure that it would seem they did not themselves understand them. The principal author of these innovations was Cyprian, the most bold and strenuous defender of episcopal power who had then arisen in the church. Yet he was not uniform and consistent, for in times of difficulty when urged by necessity, he could give up his pretensions and submit everything to the judgment and authority of the church.¹

4. This change in the form of ecclesiastical government was followed by a corrupt state of the clergy; for although examples of primitive piety and virtue were not wanting, yet many were addicted to dissipation, arrogance, voluptuousness, contention, and other vices. This appears indubitable if we listen to the frequent complaints of the most credible persons of those times.² Many bishops now affected the state of princes, and especially those who had charge of the more populous and wealthy congregations; for they sat on thrones surrounded by their ministers and other ensigns of their spiritual power, and perhaps also dazzled the eyes and the minds of the populace with their splendid attire. The presbyters imitated the example of their superiors, and neglecting the duties of their office, lived in indolence and pleasure. And this emboldened the deacons to make encroachments upon the office and the prerogatives of the presbyters.

5. It was owing to this cause especially that, in my opinion, the minor orders of clergy were everywhere in this century added to the bishops, presbyters, and deacons. The words sub-deacons, acolythi, ostiarii or door-keepers, lectors or readers, exorcists, and copiatæ, designate officers, which I think the church would have never had, if the rulers of it had possessed more piety or true religion. But when the honours and privileges of the bishops and presbyters were augmented, the deacons also became more inflated, and refused to perform those meaner offices to which they once cheerfully submitted. The offices designated by these new titles are in great measure explained by the words themselves. The exorcists owed their origin to the doctrine of the New Platonists adopted by the Christians, that evil spirits have a strong desire after the human body, and that vicious men are not so much impelled to sin by their natural depravity and the influence of bad examples, as by the suggestions of some evil spirit lodging within them.³ The copiatæ were employed in the burial of the dead.

—Ep. lxxviii. p. 137. Unusquisque Episcoporum quod putat faciat, habens arbitrium sui liberam potestatem.—*Ep. lv. Ad Cornelium Rom. p. 86. Cum statutum—et æquum sit pariter ac iustum, ut uniuscujusque causa illic audiat ubi est crimen admissum, et singulis pastoribus portio gregis sit adscripta, quam regat unusquisque et gubernet, rationem sui actus Domino redditurus, [and Cyprian's address at the opening of the council of Carthage, A.D. 255, in his Works, p. 329, ed. Baluze. Neque enim quisquam nostrum Episcopum se esse Episcoporum constituit, aut tyrannico terrore ad obsequiendi necessitatem collegas suos adigit, quando habent omnes Episcopus pro licentia libertatis et potestatis sue arbitrium proprium tamque iudicari ab alio non possit, quam nec ipse potest alterum iudicare. Sed expectemus universi iudicium Domini nostri Jesu Christi, qui tantæ et solæ habet potestatem et preponendi nos in ecclesiæ sue gubernatione, et de actu nostro iudicandi. The passages referred to in the preceding note, in which Cyprian not very intelligibly speaks of a unity in the church and of a certain primacy of the Roman pontiff, must be so understood as not to contradict these very explicit assertions of the absolute equality of all bishops. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. pag. 579—587.—*Mur.

1 No man can speak in higher terms of the power of bishops than the arrogant Cyprian—that very Cyprian who, when not fired by any passion, is so condescending towards presbyters, deacons, and the common people. He inculcates, on all occasions, that bishops derive their office, not so much from their election by the clergy and people, as from the attestation and decree of God. See Ep. liii. pag. 68, 69; Ep. xiv. p. 59; Ep. lv. p. 82; Ep. lxx. p. 113; Ep. lxxix. p. 121. He regards bishops as the successors of the apostles. Ep. xlii. p. 57. So that bishops are amenable to none but to God only; while presbyters are amenable to the religious society. Ep. xi. p. 19.—Deacons were created by the bishop; and therefore can be punished by him alone without the voice of the society. Ep. lxx. p. 114.—Bishops have the same rights with apostles, whose successors they are. And hence, none but God can take cognizance of their actions. Ep. lxxix. p. 121.—The whole church is founded on the bishop; and no one is a true member of the church who is not submissive to his bishop. Ep. lxxix. p. 123.—Bishops represent Christ himself, and govern and judge in his name. Ep. lv. Ad Cornel. pages 81, 82.—Hence all bishops, in the following ages, styled themselves Vicars of Christ. See Bingham's Orig. Eccles. vol. i. p. 81, &c. In the ninth century, a bishop of Paris is so styled in a letter of Lupus. Ep. xcix. p. 149, ed. Baluze. After the ninth century the bishops of Rome assumed the exclusive right to this as well as other honorary episcopal titles.—Schl. [See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. p. 588, &c.—Mur.

2 Origen, Comment. in Matthæum, par. i. Opp. pag. 420, 441, 442; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. i. p. 291; Cyprian, in many of his Epistles.—Mur.

3 See Gothofredus, Ad Codicem Theodosianum, tom. vi. p. 48. [Several of the Catholic writers, as, e.g. Baronius, Bellarmine, and Schelstrate, believed these minor orders of the clergy were instituted by the apostles; but the most learned writers of the Romish communion, and all the Protestants, maintain that they were first instituted in the third century. See Cardinal Bona, De Sacram. Liturgicar. lib. i. cap. xxv. sec. 16, 17; Morin, De Ordinatione, p. 3, Exerc. 14, cap. i. and Bingham's Orig. Eccles. vol. i. Not one of these orders

6. Marriage was allowed to all the clergy from the highest rank to the lowest. Yet those were accounted more holy and excellent who lived in celibacy; for it was the general persuasion that those who lived in wedlock were much more exposed to the assaults of evil spirits than others;¹ and it was of immense importance that no impure or malignant spirit should assail the mind or the body of one who was to instruct and govern others. Such persons therefore wished, if possible, to have nothing to do with conjugal life. And this many of the clergy, especially in Africa, endeavoured to accomplish with the least violence to their inclinations; for they received into their houses and even to their beds some of those females who had vowed perpetual chastity, affirming however most solemnly that they had no criminal intercourse with them.² These concubines were by the Greeks called συνεπισκευτοι, and by the Latins mulieres subintroductæ. Many of the bishops indeed sternly opposed this shameful practice; but it was a long time before it was wholly abolished.

7. Of the writers of this century the most distinguished for the celebrity of his name and for the extent of his writings was Origen, a presbyter and catechist of Alexandria, a man truly great and the instructor of the whole Christian world. Had his discernment and the soundness of his judgment been equal to his genius, piety, industry, erudition, and his other accomplishments, he would deserve almost unbounded commendation. As he is, all should revere his virtues and his merits.³ The second was an Alexandrian Greek, born of Christian parents, A.D. 185. His father Leonidas was a man of letters, a devout Christian, and took great pains with the education of his son, especially in the holy Scriptures, some portion of which he required him daily to commit to memory. His education, begun under his father, was completed under Clemens Alexandrinus and the philosopher Saccas. Origen was distinguished for precocity of genius, early piety, and indefatigable industry. When his father suffered martyrdom, A.D. 202, Origen, then seventeen years old, was eager to suffer with him, but was prevented by his mother. The property of the family was confiscated, and Origen with his widowed mother and six younger sons were left in poverty, but Origen found no difficulty in procuring a school for which his talents so well qualified him. The next year, A.D. 203, Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, advanced him to the mastership of the catechetical school, though he was then only eighteen years old. His talents as an instructor, his eminent piety, and his assiduous attention to those who suffered in the persecution, procured him high reputation and numerous friends among the Christians; but his great success in making converts to Christianity and forming his pupils to be intelligent and devoted Christians, rendered him odious to the pagans who watched for opportunities to assassinate him. The austerity of his life was great. He fed on the coarsest fare, went barefoot, and slept on the ground. About this time he sold his large and valuable collection of pagan authors for a perpetual income of four oboli (about fivepence) a-day, which he regarded as a competent support. Construing the passage in Math. xix. 12 literally, he acted upon that interpretation, in order to avoid temptation in his intercourse with his female pupils. About the year 212 he made a short visit to Rome. On his return he took his former pupil Heraclas to be his assistant in the school, so that he might devote more time to the exposition of the Scriptures. Many learned persons, pagans and heretics, were converted by him; and among them Amulose, a Valentinian and a man of wealth, who became a liberal patron of Origen and at last died a martyr. In the year 215, the persecution under Caracalla obliged Origen to flee from Alexandria. He retired to Cæsarea in Palestine, where he was received with high respect; and though not even a deacon at that time, the bishops of Cæsarea and Jerusalem allowed him to expound the Scriptures publicly in their presence. The next year Demetrius called him back to Alexandria and to his mastership of the catechetical school. About this time an Arabian prince invited him to his court, to impart to him Christian instruction. Afterwards Mamma, the mother of the Emperor Alexander Severus, sent for him to Antioch, in order to hear him preach. In the year 228, he was publicly called to Achaia, to withstand the heretics who disturbed the churches there. On his return through Palestine, Theoclitus bishop of Cæsarea, and Alexander bishop of Jerusalem, ordained him a presbyter, to the great offence of Demetrius, who was envious of the growing reputation of his catechist. Demetrius had little to object against Origen, except that he was a eunuch, and that foreign bishops had no right to ordain his laymen. Controversy ensued, and in the year 230 Demetrius assembled two councils against him, the first of which banished Origen from Alexandria, and the second deprived him of his clerical office. Demetrius also wrote letters to Rome and elsewhere, to excite odium against this unoffending man. Heraclas now succeeded him in the school at Alexandria, and Origen retired, A.D. 231, to Cæsarea in Palestine. Here he resumed his office of instructor, and continued to write expositions of the Bible. But in the year 235 a persecution in Palestine obliged him to flee to Cæsarea in Cappadocia, where he lived concealed for two years. After his return to Palestine he visited Athens; and about the year 244 was called to attend a council at Bostra in Arabia against Beryllus, bishop of that place, who was heretical in respect to the personal existence of Christ previous to his incarnation. Origen converted him to the orthodox faith. Demetrius, his persecutor, died A.D. 232, and was succeeded by Heraclas, a disciple of Origen, after whom Dionysius the Great filled the see of Alexandria from A.D. 248 to 265. The persecution of Origen died with his personal enemy Demetrius, and he was greatly beloved and honoured is even named by any writer who lived before Tertullian; nor are all of them named by him. Cyprian, in the middle of the third century mentions hypodidactoi, acolythi, and lectores. See his Ep. xiv. xxiv. xxxvi. xlii. xlix. lxxix. ed. Baluz. And Cornelius, bishop of Rome, contemporary with Cyprian, in an epistle which is preserved by Eusebius, H. E. lib. vi. cap. xliii. represents his church as embracing 46 (πρεσβυτέρους) presbyters, 7 (διακόνους) deacons, 7 (υποδιακόνους) subdeacons 42, (ακολούθους) acolythi, and exorcists (εξορκιστάς), and readers (αναγνώστους), with door-keepers (θυροφύλακες), together 52. The particular functions of these inferior orders are but imperfectly defined by the writers of the third century. Those of the fourth century describe more fully the duties of all these petty officers.—Mur.

Julius Africanus, a very learned man, most

¹ Porphyry's, περί ἀποχής, lib. iv. p. 417.

² See Dodwell, Diss. tertii Cypriani; and Muratori, Diss. de Symonide et Agnathia, in his Anecdota Græca, p. 218; Baluze, Ad Cypriani Epistol. p. 5, 12, and others. [This shameful practice commenced before this century. Slight allusions to it are found in the Shepherd of Hermas and in Tertullian; but the first distinct mention of it is in Cyprian, who inveighs severely against it in some of his Epistles. Such connexions were considered as a marriage of souls without the marriage of bodies. See Moshelm, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 689, &c.—Mur.]

³ See Huët, Origéniana, a learned and valuable work; Doucin, Histoire d'Origène et des Mouvements arrivés dans l'Eglise au sujet de sa Doctrine, Paris, 1700, 8vo; and Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. art. Origène, and many others. [Origen, surnamed Adamantius, was

of whose labours and works are lost.¹ The name of Hippolytus ranks very high among both the writers and the martyrs; but his history is involved in much obscurity.² The

by all around him till the day of his death. His residence was now fixed at Caesarea in Palestine; but he occasionally visited other places. Against the more learned pagans and the heretics of those times, he was a champion who had no equal; he was also considered as a devout and exemplary Christian, and was beyond question the first biblical scholar of the age. He was master of the literature and the science of that age, which he valued only as subservient to the cause of Christ; but he was more skillful in employing them against pagans and heretics, than in the explanation and confirmation of the truths of revelation. In the latter part of his life, during the Decian persecution, A.D. 250, he was imprisoned for a considerable time, and came near to martyrdom which he showed himself willing to meet. He was, however, released; but his sufferings in prison, added to his intense literary labours, had broken down his constitution, and he died, A.D. 254, at Tyre, in the sixty-ninth year of his age. He was in general orthodox according to the standard of that age; but unfettered in his speculations and unguarded in his communications, he threw out some crude opinions which the next age gathered up and blazoned abroad, and for which he was accounted by some a heretic. The principal errors ascribed to him are derived from his four books περί ἀρχῶν (De principiis, on the first principles of human knowledge), and are:—first, the pre-existence of human souls and their incarceration in material bodies for offences committed in a former state of being;—second, the pre-existence of Christ's human soul and its union with the Divine nature anterior to the Incarnation of Christ;—third, the transformation of our material bodies into ethereal ones at the resurrection;—fourth, the final recovery of all men and even devils through the mediation of Christ. Origen could number among his pupils many eminent martyrs and divines, among whom Hieronimus of Capua, Gregory Thaumaturgus, and Dionysius the Great, bishop of Alexandria, are best known at the present day. His life and history are best related by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. passim; and by Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. iv.; and Ep. xii. or lxxv. The united work of Pamphilus and Eusebius, in defence of Origen, in six books, is unfortunately lost, except the first book, of which we have a translation by Rufinus. Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxv. gives a philippic upon Origen and his followers. Photius, Biblioth. cxviii. affords us some knowledge of his lost works. Origen was a most voluminous writer. Eusebius says he collected 100 Epistles of Origen; and that when sixty years old Origen permitted stenographers to write down his extempore discourses. Besides these he composed eight Books against Celsus in defence of Christianity, which are still extant; four books περί ἀρχῶν, extant, in a Latin translation by Rufinus; ten books entitled Stromata, which are lost; his Hexapla and Tetrapla, of which little remains; and tracts on prayer, martyrdom, and the resurrection; but his principal works are expositions of the Scriptures. It is said he wrote on every book in the Bible except the Apocalypse. His allegorical mode of interpreting Scripture is described by Mosheim in the next chapter. Origen's expositions are of three kinds:—first, Homilies, or popular lectures;—second, Commentaries, divided into books, which are full, elaborate, and learned expositions; third, Scholæ, or short notes, intended especially for the learned. A collection of Origen's Scholæ, and scattered remarks on Scripture, compiled by Basil the Great and Gregory Nazianzen, is extant, bearing the title of Φαλαγγία. A large part of his Homilies and Commentaries is wholly lost, and some of the others have come to us only in the Latin translation of Rufinus. The earlier editions of Origen's works are chiefly in Latin, and of little value. Huet, a Benedictine monk, first published, A.D. 1668, in 2 vols. fol. the expository works of Origen, Greek and Latin with notes and a valuable introduction entitled Origeniana. Montfaucon, another Benedictine, collected and published what remains of his Hexapla and Tetrapla, Paris, 1714, 2 vols. fol.; but the best edition of all his works, except the Hexapla, is that of the Benedictines De la Rue, Paris, 1733-59, 4 vols. fol. The principal modern writers concerning Origen, besides Huet and the De la Rues, are Tillemont, Mém.

à l'Hist. de l'Eglise, tome iii. pages 216-264; Bayle, Dict. art. Origène; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 112, &c.; Lardner, Credibility, part ii. vol. li. p. 161, &c.; Haloix, Défence of Origen; Doucin, Histoire d'Origène, Paris, 1700, 8vo; Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. pag. 605-680; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. pages 29-145; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. pages 1172-1214; Milner's account of Origen, Eccles. Hist. cent. iii. chap. v. vi. xv. is not impartial.—Mur. [The most recent work on Origen is Redepening. Origène une Darstellung sein. Lebens und sein. Lehre, Bonn, 1841, &c. The student should here again, in reference to Origen and the Alexandrian theology, consult Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. scs. 62, 63, 64; Davidson's Transl. vol. i. p. 229, &c. The only portion of Origen's works which has been translated into English is his Answer to Celsus, and even of that only the first two books were translated by Bellamy, Lond. 8vo, about 1710.—R.

1 Julius Africanus, for erudition and as an interpreter of Scripture, is ranked with Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen by Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxxv. The best account of this distinguished man is derived from Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxxi.; and Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxiii. He was probably of Nicopolis, once called Emmaus, in Judea, and is supposed to have died, being a man in years, about A.D. 232. Of his life little is known, except that he once visited Alexandria to confer with Heraclas, head of the catechetical school after Origen; and that the city of Nicopolis having been burnt about A.D. 221, Africanus was sent as envoy to the emperor, with a petition that it might be rebuilt. His principal work was Annals of the World from the Creation down to A.D. 221, in five books, of which only fragments now remain. He was author of A Letter to Aristides, reconciling the two genealogies of our Saviour. Of this work we have a long extract in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. 7, and a fragment in Routh's Religione Sacra, vol. ii. p. 115. Another letter of Africanus, addressed to Origen, is still extant in the works of Origen, vol. i. pages 10-12, ed. De la Rue. Eusebius and others ascribe to Africanus another and larger work entitled Kerairi. It is a miscellany and unworthy of a Christian divine. Many fragments of it have been collected by Thevenot, and published in his Collection of the Writings of the ancient Greek Mathematicians, Paris, 1693, fol.—Mur.

2 The Benedictine monks have, with great labour and erudition, endeavoured to dispel this darkness. See Hist. Littér. de la France, tome i. p. 361, &c. Paris, 1733, 4to. [Both Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxii.; and Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxi. make him to have flourished in the reign of Severus, A.D. 222, &c. and to have been a bishop, but of what city they could not learn. Subsequent writers were divided, some representing him as an Arabian bishop, and others as bishop of Ostia, near Rome, whence he is surnamed Portuensis. That he was a martyr is generally conceded: though the poem of Prudentius, on the martyrdom of Hippolytus, refers to another person who was a Roman presbyter. Eusebius, ubi supra, gives an account of his writings:—"Besides many other works, he wrote a treatise concerning Easter, in which he describes the succession of events, and proposes a Paschal Cycle of sixteen years; the work terminates with the first year of the Emperor Alexander." (Severus, A.D. 222.) "His other writings which have reached me are these: on the Hexaëmeron" (Gen. i.); "on what follows the Hexaëmeron; against Marcion; on the Canticles; on parts of Ezekiel; concerning Easter; against all the heresies." Besides these Jerome mentions his Commentaries on Exodus, Zechariah, the Psalms, Isaiah, Daniel, the Apocalypse, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes; and some tracts. Certain other works of Hippolytus are enumerated in an inscription on the base of his statue, dug up near Rome in the year 1551; also by Photius, Biblioth. No. 121 and 122; and Ebedjesus, in Asseman's Biblioth. Orient. tom. iii. par. i. His Paschal Cycle is his only work which has come down to us entire. The dialogue concerning Christ and Antichrist, still extant, if really his, does him little credit as a theologian. The concluding part of his work against all the heresies still remains, and gives us the best account we have, though a lame one, of the heresy of Noëtus writings now extant bearing the name of this great man are, not without reason, regarded by many as being either spurious or at least corrupted. Gregory, bishop of New Cæsarea [in Pontus], was surnamed Thaumaturgus on account of the numerous and distinguished miracles which he is said to have wrought. But few of his writings are now extant; his miracles are questioned by many at the present day.¹ I could wish that many writings of Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, were now extant; for the few fragments which have reached us show that he was a man of distinguished wisdom and mildness of disposition, and prove that the ancients used no flattery when they styled him Dionysius the Great.² Methodius was

All that remains of him, genuine and adulterated, and all that is ascribed to him, are well edited by Fabricius, in two thin volumes, fol. Hamb. 1716-18. For a more full account of him and his writings, besides the Histoire Litt. de la France, and Fabricius, Ad Hippol. Opera, see Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccles. tome iii, pages 104 and 309, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 102, &c.; Lardner, Credib. part ii. vol. ii. p. 69, &c.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 151, &c.; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. p. 1147, &c.—Mur. [An elaborate biography of this father may be seen in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biogr. vol. ii. p. 490, where all the questions respecting his history and writings are carefully considered.—R.

1 See Anton. van Dale, Preface to his book, De Oraculis, p. 6. [Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. iv. p. 351, &c. and pages 380—392, and Lardner, Credibility, part ii. vol. ii. p. 459, &c. Gregory of New Cæsarea in Pontus, whose original name was Theodorus, was born of heathen parents at New Cæsarea near the beginning of this century. His family was wealthy and respectable. After the death of his father, which was when he was fourteen years old, his mother and the children became nominally Christians. But Gregory was a stranger to the Bible, and ambitious to make a figure in the world. About the year 231 he left Pontus, intending to study law in the famous law school at Berytus, but meeting with Origen at Cæsarea he was induced to change his purpose. He applied himself to the study of the Bible, was baptized, assumed the name of Gregory, and continued under the instruction of Origen eight years, except that he fled to Alexandria for a short time to avoid persecution. He was now a devoted Christian and a man of great promise. On leaving Origen, he composed and read in a public assembly a eulogy on his instructor, in which he gives an account of his own past life, and of the manner in which Origen himself allured him to the study of the scriptures, and changed all his views. He returned to Pontus and became bishop of his native city, New Cæsarea, where he spent the remainder of his life. When created bishop he found but seventeen Christians in his very populous diocese. When he died there was only about the same number of pagans in it. He and his flock endured persecution in the year 250. He attended the first council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, in the year 264 or 265, and died soon after. Some account of him is given by Eusebius, H. E. lib. vi. cap. 30, and lib. vii. cap. 14, 28; Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxxv. and Ep. ad Magnum. But his great eulogists among the ancients were the two brothers, Basil the Great, and Gregory Nyssen, whose grandmother sat under the ministry of Gregory Thaum., and furnished her grandchildren with an account of him. Basil speaks of him in his Book on the Holy Spirit and in his Epistles, No. 28, 110, 204, 207, or 62, 63, 64, 75; and Nyssen, in his Life of Gregory Thaum. inter Opp. Gregorii Nyss. tom. iii. p. 536, &c. Among the moderns who give us his history and enumerate his works, see Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccles. tom. iv. p. 131, &c. and Notes sur S. Greg. Thaum. p. 47; Du Pin, Nov. Biblioth. des Aut. Eccles. tome i. p. 184, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. v. p. 247, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i.; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. pages 12—24, &c.; Schroeckh, ubi supra; Lardner, ubi supra, and Milner, Eccles. Hist. cent iii. chap. 18. The only genuine works of Gregory which are extant are his Eulogy on Origen, which has been mentioned; a Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes; a short Confession of Faith (the last part of which some have questioned), and a Letter containing counsel for the treatment of the lapsed. The spurious works attributed to him are, Capita xli. De Fide, with anathomas; In Annuntiationem Sanctissimæ Mariæ Sermones tres; in Sancta Theophrastia sive de apparitione Dei et Christi Baptismo; De anima, disputatio ad Tatianum; Expositio Fidei ἡ κατὰ μέγας πικρίας, (relating only to the Trinity.) All these were collected and published with learned notes by Gerard Vossius, Mentz, 1604, 4to, and Paris, 1622, fol. with the works of Macarius, bishop of Seleucia, and a tract of Zonaras, subjoined.—Mur.

2 The history of Dionysius is carefully written by Basnage, Histoire de l'Église, tome i. livr. ii. chap. v. p. 68. [He was probably born of heathen parents but early converted to the Christian faith by Origen, under whom he had his education at Alexandria. He became a presbyter there; and succeeded Heraclas, as head of the catechetical school, about the year 232; and on the death of Heraclas, A.D. 248, he again succeeded him in the episcopal chair, which he filled till his death in the year 265. We know little of his history, while a catechet, except that he now read carefully all the works of heretics and pagans, and made himself master of the controversies of the day (Euseb. H. E. lib. vii. cap. vii). As a bishop he was uncommonly laborious and faithful, and had little rest from persecution, in which he and his flock suffered exceedingly. These sufferings are described in the copious extracts from his writings, preserved by Eusebius, in his Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. and vii. In the general persecution under Decius, Dionysius was under arrest, and suffered much with his flock for a year and a half. Soon after his release, the pestilence began to lay waste the church and the city, and did not entirely cease till the end of twelve years. The warm contest respecting the rebaptism of converted heretics, about the year 256, was submitted by both parties to him, and drew forth several able productions from his pen. Not long after he had to withstand the Sabellians in a long and arduous controversy. In the year 257 the persecution under Valerian commenced; and for about two years Dionysius was in banishment, transported from place to place, and subjected to great sufferings. After his return in the year 260, insurrection among the pagans and civil war and famine raged at Alexandria. Scarcely was quiet restored, when this aged and faithful servant of God was solicited to aid in the controversy against Paul of Samosata. His infirmities prevented his attending the council of Antioch in 265, where Paul was condemned; but he wrote his judgment of the controversy, sent it to the council, and died soon after in the close of that year. In his controversy with the Sabellians he was, to say the least, unfortunate; for in his zeal to maintain a personal distinction between the Father and the Son, he let drop expressions which seemed to imply, that the latter was of another and an inferior nature to the former. This led the Sabellians to accuse him of heresy; and a council assembled at Rome called on him to explain his views. He replied in several books or letters, addressed to Dionysius, bishop of Rome, which pretty well satisfied his contemporaries. Afterwards, when the Arians claimed him, Athanasius came forth in vindication of his orthodoxy. Moshelm, (De Rebus Christ. p. 696, &c.) supposed that Dionysius differed from the orthodox on the one hand, and from Sabellius on the other, in the following manner:—They all agreed, that in Jesus Christ two natures, the human and the divine, were united. The orthodox maintained, that both natures constituted but one person, and denied personality to the human nature. Sabellius admitted the union of two natures in Christ, but denied personality to his divine nature. Dionysius distinguished two persons, as well as two natures, in Christ; and affirmed that the actions and sufferings of the human nature could not be predicated of the divine nature. Natalis Alexander has a Dissertation (Hist. Eccles. sæcul. iii. diss. xix.) in vindication of the orthodoxy, though not of all the phraseology of Dionysius; for a knowledge of a man of piety and had some weight of character; but the few works of his remaining prove him not to be a man of an accurate and discriminating mind.¹

8. Of the Latin writers of this century Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, deservedly stands first. The epistles and tracts of this distinguished and eloquent man breathe such a spirit of ardent piety, that almost no one can read them without feeling his soul stirred within him. Yet Cyprian would doubtless have been a better writer if he had been less studious of rhetorical ornaments, and a better bishop if he had been more capable of controlling his temper and of discriminating between truth and error.²

the life and writings of Dionysius, the chief original sources are, Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxix. xxv. xl.—xlii. xlii.—xlii.; lib. vii. cap. i. iv.—xi. xx.—xxviii.; Præpar. Evang. lib. xiv. cap. xxiii.—xxvii.; Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxi. and Prolatio ad Lib. xviii.; Comment. in Eusebium; Athanasius, De Sententiis Dionysii, and De Synodi Nicenæ Decretis; Basil, De Spiritu Sancto, cap. xxix.; Epist. ad Amphilocho. and Epist. ad Maximum. Of his works only two short compositions have come to us entire; namely, his very sensible letter to Novatian (in Euseb. Hist. Eccles. vi. 45), and his Epistola Canonica ad Basilidem. But we have valuable extracts from many of his letters and books preserved by Eusebius. Athanasius also gives extracts from various works of his; and Eusebius mentions several from which he gives no extracts, and which are not now extant.—Mur. [All that has been preserved of Dionysius may be found in Gallandius, Biblioth. Patrum, v. 3, p. 481, &c. and in a separate edition published by S. de Magistris, Rome, 1796, folio, Greek and Latin, with a Dissertation on his life and writings.—It.

¹ Methodius Patrensis Eubulius was bp. of Olympus or of Patara in Lycia, and afterwards of Tyre. He lived during the last half of the third century; and died a martyr at Chalcis in Greece, probably A. D. 311, during the Diocletian persecution. Jerome (De Viris Illust. cap. lxxxi.) ranks him among the popular writers, and commends him especially for the neatness of his style; but Socrates (in his Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xli.) represents him as one of those low and contemptible scribblers, who endeavoured to bring themselves into notice by assailing the characters of their superiors. His works, as enumerated by Jerome, are two books against Porphyry (a large work now lost); Feast of the Ten Virgins (a dialogue of pious females, in praise of ecelicity; it is still extant, though perhaps corrupted; but does its author little credit); On the resurrection of the body, against Origen. Much of it is preserved by Epiphanius, Hæres. lxi.; Photius, Biblioth. cexxlv. &c.; On the witch of Endor, against Origen (not extant); On free-will (and the origin of evil; not from matter, but from abuse of human liberty. Extracts from it remain); Commentaries on Genesis and Canticles (almost wholly lost); many other popular works (not described by Jerome). The works of Methodius, so far as they remain, were edited with those of Amphilochois and Andreas Cretensis, by Combefis, Paris, 1644, fol. Several discourses of the younger Methodius, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, have been ascribed to the older Methodius.—Mur.

² Thascius Caecilius Cyprianus was born of heathen parents and probably about the year 200, at Carthage in Africa. He was rather dissipated, but was a man of genius and a teacher of rhetoric. In the year 244 or 245 he was converted to Christianity by Caecilius, a presbyter of Carthage, whose name he assumed. An account of his conversion we have in his tract, De Gratia Dei, ad Donatum. As soon as he became a Christian he distributed all his property in charity to the poor, devoted himself much to the study of the bible and of his favourite author Tertullian, and showed a zeal and earnestness in religion seldom equalled. He was made a presbyter a few months after his conversion, and was advanced to the episcopal chair in the year 248. As a bishop he was indefatigable and efficient. Few men ever accomplished so much in a long life, as Cyprian did in the ten years of his episcopacy. In the year 250 the Decian persecution obliged him to leave Carthage, and live in concealment for more than a year. During his exile he wrote 39 epistles which are extant, addressed to his church, to its officers collectively or individually, to other bishops, and to various individuals. On his return to Carthage, A. D. 251, he had much to do to collect and regulate his flock; a controversy arose respecting the reception of the lapsed to Christian fellowship, and Cyprian had personal contests with some of his presbyters who were opposed to him. He was also drawn into the Novatian controversy. The persecution was soon after renewed by the emperor Gallus; and pestilence and famine spread wide, and incursions of barbarians from the desert laid waste the back country. Cyprian wrote and preached incessantly; and in the year 253 called a council and roused up the African churches to great efforts for redeeming Christian captives. In the year 257 the persecution under Valerian broke out, and Cyprian was banished to Curubis. The next year, A. D. 258, he was recalled from banishment, summoned before the new governor, Maximus, and condemned to be beheaded. Cyprian lived about twelve years after he embraced Christianity; and during ten of these he was incessantly engaged in active duties. It was impossible, therefore, that he should become a very learned theologian. Though a man of genius, he was not a metaphysician or philosopher, and seems not formed for abstruse speculations. He was an orator and a man of business rather than a profound scholar. The practical part of Christianity and the order and discipline of the church, most engaged his attention. Naturally ardent and poring daily over the writings of Tertullian, he imbibed very much the spirit and the principles of that gloomy Montanist; and having high ideas of episcopal power and great intrepidity of character, he was an energetic prelate and a severe disciplinarian. The best original sources for the history of this distinguished man are his own numerous letters and tracts, and the Passio S. Cypriani or account of his martyrdom, written by Pontius one of his deacons. He is very honourably mentioned by many of the fathers; and Gregory Naz. wrote a professed eulogy of him. The moderns also, especially the Roman Catholics and the English Episcopalians, have written elaborately concerning his history, his works, and his opinions. See Bp. Pearson's Annals Cyprianici, and Dodwell's Dissertationes Cyprianicæ, in the Oxford edition of Cyprian's works, 1682; Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Histoire Eccles. tome iv. p. 19, &c. and Notes sur S. Cyprien, p. 10, &c.; Prud. Maran, Vita S. Cypriani, prefixed to Opp. Cypri. ed. Paris, 1726, pages 38—134, and Milner's Church Hist. cent. iii. chap. vii.—xv.—His works consist of 81 Epistles, and 14 Treatises which are accounted genuine. His style is neither puerile nor chaste, but ardent and animated. The earlier editions of his works by Erasmus and others arranged his letters in books, without regard to their dates or subjects; the edition of Pamelius, 1556, re-published by Rigaltius, 1664, attempted to arrange them in chronological order; the Oxford edition by Bp. Fell, 1682, fol. perfected this arrangement; the edition prepared by Baluze and published by Prudentius Maran, Paris, 1726, fol. [the Benedictine edition] retains the order of Pamelius. The last two are the best editions.—Mur. [Cyprian's works were translated into English ostensibly from Fell's edition, but I suspect merely from the French translation of Lambert, by N. Marshall, Lond. 1717, folio. They have been recently translated anew and published in two volumes of the Oxford Library of the Fathers, volume iii. containing his thirteen treatises and volume xvii. his letters, with a very useful table prefixed, giving a scheme of the numbering of these epistles, which is different in the four principal editions of his works, and therefore very embarrassing; this volume also contains the extant works of Pacian. There is a separate biography of this eminent father entitled The life and times of St. Cyprian, by G. A. Poole.

The dialogue of Minutius Felix, which he entitled Octavius, answers the arguments

by which the Christians were commonly attacked by their adversaries, in a manner so spirited and eloquent, that it cannot be disregarded except by those who are willing to be ignorant of the state of the church in this century.¹ The seven books of Arnobius, the African, against the Gentiles, are more full and copious, and though obscure in several places, will not be read without both pleasure and profit. Yet this rhetorician, who was superficial in his knowledge of Christian doctrines, has mingled great errors with important truths, and has set forth a strange philosophical kind of religion, very different from that ordinarily received.² The writers of less eminence I leave to be learned from those who have

Lond. 1810, 8vo.; but it is not worthy of the subject, though it has been translated into French, being well adapted to the taste of the continental Romanists. I have not seen Rottberg's work mentioned by Danz, entitled Cyprian dargestellt nach seinem Leben u. Wirken, Gött. 1831. The life of Cyprian, which is given in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. is from the pen of one of my colleagues, Professor Ramsay of the university of Glasgow, and, like all his works, is most carefully and accurately compiled.—R.

¹ Minutius Felix was a Christian advocate at Rome, and is supposed to have been contemporary with Tertullian, and to have flourished about the year 220. He is mentioned by Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lviii. and by Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. l. cap. xl. and lib. v. cap. l. Little is known of his history. His elegant dialogue between Cecilius a pagan and Octavius a Christian, recounts the principal arguments urged for and against Christianity at that time, in a clear, concise, and forcible manner. The Latinity is pure and elegant. Jerome informs us that another tract now lost, De Fato vel contra Mathonisticos, was ascribed to him, but from its style it was probably not his. In the middle ages the Octavius of Minutius was mistaken for the 8th book (Liber Octavius) of Arnobius; and it was so published in the earlier editions. It has been often republished. The best editions, cum notis variorum, are those of Gronovius, Leyden, 1709, 8vo.; and of Davis, Cambridge, 1707 and 1711, 8vo. The Germans are fond of the edition of Cellarius, 1698, 8vo, republished by Linder, 1764, and by Ernesti, 1773, 8vo. It has been translated into French, Dutch, [German,] and English; the last, by Reeves, among his Apologies in defence of the Christian religion, vol. ii. Lond. 1709, 8vo.—Mur.; [but much more accurately by Sir D. Dalrymple, with notes and illustrations, Edin. 1781. There is also a short but excellent account of this father and of the best editions of the Octavius, by Professor Ramsay, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. ii. p. 144.—R.]

² Arnobius, senior, was a teacher of rhetoric at Silecia in Africa, during the reign of Diocletian. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxxix. He was at first an open adversary of the Christian religion, but at length being fully convinced of its truth, he undertook to defend it in a learned and elaborate work. But either his knowledge of Christianity was then very limited, or he had studied the scriptures only in private and without seeking instruction from Christian teachers, for he entertained many singular opinions. Jerome reports (Chron. ad. ann. xx. Constantini), that when Arnobius applied to the bishop for Baptism, the latter refused him from doubts of the sincerity of his conversion; and that Arnobius wrote his book to satisfy the mind of the bishop. This account is called in question by some. See Lardner, Credibility, &c. part ii. vol. iv. p. 7, and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. p. 1161, &c. He probably wrote in the beginning of the fourth century, and died perhaps about A.D. 326. The best early editions of his work are those printed at Leyden, 1651 and 1657, 4to. The latest edition is that of Orel, Lips. 1816, 8vo, in 2 parts, with an Appendix, 1817, 8vo.—Mur.

professedly enumerated the learned men among Christians.³

³ The following notices of other leading men in this century may be interesting to the literary reader.

Caius, a learned ecclesiastic of Rome, in the beginning of this century, is mentioned by Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lix. and is quoted repeatedly by Eusebius. In his work against Proculus the Montanist he assailed the Chliasts, and ascribed but 13 epistles to St. Paul. Euseb. H. E. ii. 25; iii. 28, and vi. 20. He has been supposed by some to be the author of the book against Artemon, quoted by Eusebius, H. E. v. 28.

Just before A.D. 200, Theophilus bp. of Antioch, Baechylus bp. of Caesarea in Palestine, and Polyocrates bp. of Ephesus, called councils on the controversy respecting Easter day, and composed synodical epistles. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. xliii.—xiv. and Euseb. H. E. v. 23 and 25. From the epistle of Polyocrates valuable extracts are made by Jerome, ubi supra, and Euseb. H. E. iii. 31, and v. 24.

At the commencement of this century lived Heraclitus, Maximus, Candidus, Apollon, Sextus, and Arabinus, who were distinguished as writers, according to Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. xlv.—li. and Euseb. H. E. v. 27. Heraclitus commented on Paul's Epistles; Maximus wrote concerning the origin of evil (περί τῆς ἀγίας, from which we have a considerable extract in Euseb. Præpar. Evang. vi. 82); Candidus and Apollon explained the Hexameron or six days' work, in Genesis; Sextus wrote on the resurrection; and Arabinus composed some doctrinal tracts.

Judas, of the same age, undertook a computation of the seventy weeks of Daniel; and brought down his history of events to A.D. 203. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lii. and Euseb. H. E. vi. 7.

Ammonius was probably an Egyptian Christian, nearly contemporary with Origen; and not the apostate philosopher Ammonius Saccas, under whom Origen studied, though confounded with him by Euseb. H. E. vi. 19, and by Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lv. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. iv. p. 161, and Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. p. 281, &c. He wrote a book on the agreement of Moses with Jesus, which is lost, and a Harmony of the four Gospels, which is supposed to be one of those still extant in the Biblioth. Mar. Patrum. But whether the larger Harmony, in tom. ii. part ii. or the smaller, in tom. iii. is the genuine work, has been doubted. See Lardner, Credibility, &c. part ii. vol. ii. p. 106, &c.

Tryphon, a disciple of Origen, is said by Jerome (De Viris Illust. cap. lviii.) to have been very learned in the scriptures, and to have written many epistles and tracts, and particularly a treatise concerning the red heifer in the book of Numbers, c. xix.; and another on the dividing of the birds in Abraham's sacrifice, Gen. xv. 10. Nothing of his is extant.

Symmachus, originally a Samaritan, then a Jew, and at last an Ebionite Christian, gave a free translation of the O.T. into Greek; and also defended the principles of the Ebionites, in a Commentary on Matthew's Gospel. See Euseb. H. E. vi. 17.

Narcissus was made bp. of Jerusalem, A.D. 196. After four years of faithful service he was falsely accused of immoral conduct; and though generally accounted innocent, he voluntarily abdicated his office and lived in retirement till A.D. 216, when he resumed his office and continued in it till his martyrdom, A.D. 237. He was then 116 years old. See Euseb. H. E. vi. 9, 10, 11.

Alexander succeeded Narcissus A.D. 327, and held the chair fourteen years. This eminent man was bishop of a church in Cappadocia when called to the see of Jerusalem. He was a great patron of Origen, and wrote several epistles, from which extracts are preserved. After important services to the church he died a martyr, A.D. 251. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. xlii. and Eusebius, H. E. vi. 11, 14, 19, 26, 39, and 46.

Firmilian, bp. of Caesarea in Cappadocia, was a great admirer and a disciple of Origen. He was a man of high eminence in the church, and died at Tarsus, on his way to the second council of Antioch against Paul of Samosata, about A.D. 266. A long and able epistle of his to Cyprian on the rebaptism of heretics, is preserved in a Latin translation among the works of Cyprian, Ep. 75. See Euseb. H. E. vi. 26, 27, 46, and vii. 5, 29.

Pontius, a deacon of Carthage, attended Cyprian at his death, and wrote an account of his martyrdom, which has reached us, though perhaps interpolated. It is prefixed to Cyprian's works, and is found in Ruinart, Acta Selecta Martyrum. See Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxviii. Pontius himself, it is said, suffered martyrdom shortly after; of which an account is extant, professedly written by his fellow-deacon Valerius; in Baluze's Miscellanea, tom. ii. p. 124.

Cornelius, bp. of Rome, was elected June 2, A.D. 251, in opposition to Novatian; and, after fifteen months, died in banishment at Centuncellæ (Civita-Vecchia); Sept. 14, A.D. 252. In the works of Cyprian there are extant two epistles of Cornelius to Cyprian, and ten epistles of Cyprian to Cornelius. Cyprian describes him (Ep. 52, ed. Baluz.) as an unimpeachable character—a pious, sensible, modest man—well qualified to be a bishop. Jerome (De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxvi.) mentions four epistles of Cornelius to Fabius bp. of Antioch, and Eusebius gives us a long and valuable extract from one of them, H.E. vi. 43. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. i.

Novatian, first a presbyter, and then the schismatical bishop of Rome, wrote (according to Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxx.) De Pascha; De Sabbato; De Circumcisione; De Sacerdotio; De Oratone; De Cribis Judæicis (extant, inter Opp. Tertullian); De Instantia; De Atollo; De Trinitate (a large book, being an abridgment of a work of Tertullian extant, inter Opp. Tertul.) and many other works. An epistle written by him to Cyprian, in the name of the Roman clergy, A.D. 250, is likewise extant (See Opp. Cyprian, Ep. 31, ed. Baluz.) and shows that he was a man of talents and a good writer. His rival, Cornelius, describes him as a very bad man. See Euseb. H.E. vi. 43.

Stephen, bp. of Rome, A.D. 253—257, is chiefly famous for his presumptuous attempt to excommunicate Cyprian and many other bishops of Africa and the East, for relapsing converted heretics. See Euseb. H.E. vii. 2—5, 7; Cyprian, Ep. 70—75; Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. i.

Sixtus II. bp. of Rome, A.D. 257, 258, and a martyr, was more conciliatory than his predecessor. Euseb. H.E. vii. 5, 9. Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. i. Various supposititious writings are extant under his name. The most noted is a series of 460 moral Apophthegms, translated by Rufinus. Jerome (on Ezek. cap. xviii. and elsewhere), and Augustine, (Retract. lib. ii. cap. 42), pronounce them the work of Sixtus, a pagan philosopher; which they probably are, notwithstanding Sieber, their editor (Lips. 1725, 4to), has laboured hard to fix them on this Roman bishop.

Dionysius, bp. of Rome, A.D. 259—269, was a learned man and a good bishop. See Basil, Ep. 220, and De Sp. Sancto, cap. xxix; Euseb. H.E. vi. 7. He wrote an epistle against the Sabellians, of which Athanasius (De Synodi Nicænæ Decretis) has preserved an extract; also an epistle to Dionysius of Alexandria, acquainting him with the dissatisfaction of a council of bishops at Rome, with some expressions concerning the Trinity used by that patriarch, and requesting of him an explanation which was given in four Letters or Books. Athanasius, Pro Sententiâ Dionys. Alex. and Euseb. H.E. vii. 26; See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. i.

Malchion, a presbyter and a teacher of philosophy at Antioch. He greatly distinguished himself in the third council against Paul of Samosata, A.D. 269. Two previous councils had been unable to convict the crafty heretic; but in this, Malchion encountered him in presence of the council while stenographers took down their dialogue. Paul was now convicted; and the Dialogue was published. Euseb. H.E. vii. 29; Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxi.

Commodianus, a Christian poet, was probably an African, and contemporary, or nearly so, with Cyprian. See Dodwell's Dias. de Ætate Commodiani. He had a smattering of Greek and Latin learning; but was a weak though well meaning man. His book comprises eighty paragraphs, called Instructions. It is written acrostically, and in a loose kind of hexameter. The style is rude and the matter trite. The first half of the book is directed against the pagans, next he assails the unbelieving Jews, and then attempts to instruct all classes of Christians and all ranks of ecclesiastical functionaries. It was first published by Rigaltius, subjoined to Cyprian's works, A.D. 1650; and again in 1666. The editions with notes by Schurtzfeldsch, 1710, and of Davis, subjoined to his Minutius Felix, Camb. 1711, 8vo, are the best.

Anatolius, a very scientific ecclesiastic of Alexandria, who by his address once delivered his townsman from a siege. He was made Bishop of Laodicea in Syria about A.D. 270, and published canons for ascertaining Easter, from which Eusebius (H.E. vii. 32), has preserved an extract; and Institutes of Arithmetic, of which some fragments still remain. Eusebius (ubi supra) gives a long account of him. See also Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxviii. What remains of his works has been published, Greek and Latin, by Bucherius in his Doctrina Temporum, Antw. 1634, fol.

Archelaus, bishop of Carra in Mesopotamia, flourished about A.D. 278. He wrote in Syriac his denunciation with Manes the heretic, which was early translated into Greek and thence into Latin. See Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxxi. A large part of the Latin copy was first published by Valesius, subjoined to Socrates, Historia Eccles.; afterwards, together with what remains of the Greek, by Zaccagnius in his Collection of rare Works of the Greek and Latin Church, Rome, 1698, 4to, pages 1—102; and, lastly, by Fabricius, ad finem Opp. S. Hippolyti, 2 vols. fol.

Pierius, a presbyter, and perhaps catechist of Alexandria. He was of Origen's school, very learned in the Scriptures, and wrote many discourses and expositions in a neat and simple style. He was called Origen Junior. His long discourse on the prophet Hosea is particularly noticed by Jerome. Photius (Biblioth. cxi.) mentions twelve books of his expositions. He was of an ascetic turn, lived considerably into the fourth century, and spent his latter years at Rome. Nothing of his remains. See Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxvi.; and Eusebius, H.E. vi. 32.

Theognostus of Alexandria, a friend of Origen and perhaps successor to Pierius in the catechetical school. He wrote seven books of Hypotyposes, of which Photius (Biblioth. cvi.) has preserved an abstract. Photius deemed him heretical in regard to the Trinity; but Athanasius makes quotations from him in confutation of the Arians. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. xix. p. 108.

Lucian, a learned presbyter of Antioch. He adhered for some time to Paul of Samosata. To him most of the churches from Syria to Constantinople were indebted for corrected copies of the Septuagint. Jerome mentions him as the author of several theological tracts and letters; and a confession of faith drawn up by him is still extant in Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. x.; and in Walch's Biblioth. Symbol. Fetus, p. 29, &c. He was a very pious man, and suffered martyrdom at Nicomedia, A.D. 311. See Euseb. H.E. viii. 13, and ix. 6; and Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxvii.

Hesychius, an Egyptian bishop and martyr, was famous at the same period for setting forth correct copies of the Septuagint in Egypt. Whether he was that Hesychius who compiled a useful Greek Lexicon, still extant, is uncertain. He died a martyr, A.D. 311. See Euseb. H.E. viii. 13; and Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. iv. p. 554, &c. [The student will see the question respecting the identity of the Christian martyr and the Greek grammarian discussed in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. pages 446 and 448.—R.]

Pamphilus the martyr was a native of Berytus, but a presbyter of Caesarea in Palestine, where he established a school, and collected a theological library which has been of immense service to the Christian world. This library afforded to Eusebius, Jerome, and many others, the means of becoming learned divines, and of benefiting the world by their writings. To this establishment ecclesiastical history and biblical learning are peculiarly indebted. Pamphilus was a pupil of Pierius, an admirer of Origen, and the great friend and patron of Eusebius. He transcribed most of the works of Origen with his own hand; and he composed a biography and vindication of Origen, in five books, to which Eusebius added a sixth book. Only the first book is now extant; and that in a Latin translation of Rufinus, printed inter Opp. Origenis. Pamphilus took great pains to multiply and spread abroad correct copies of the holy Scriptures. His life was written by Eusebius, in three books, which are lost. He suffered martyrdom, A.D. 309, at Caesarea in Palestine. See Euseb. De Martyribus Palestinæ, cap. x. and vii.; and H.E. vi. 32, vii. 32, and viii. 13; Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxv.

Victorinus, bishop of Petavio in Upper Pannonia (Po-

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THEOLOGY.

1. To the common people the principal truths of Christianity were explained in their purity and simplicity, and all subtleties were avoided; nor were weak and tender minds overloaded with a multitude of precepts.¹ But in their schools and in their books the doctors who cultivated literature and philosophy, and especially those of Egypt, deemed it proper and becoming to subject Divine wisdom to the scrutiny of reason, or rather to the precepts of their philosophy; and to find out a hidden meaning in the doctrines taught by Christ. At the head of this class was Origen, who being fascinated with the Platonic philosophy, ventured to apply its laws to every part of religion, and persuaded himself that the philosophy which he admired could assign the causes and grounds of every doctrine, and determine its precise form.² He must tau in Steyermark), wrote Commentaries on Gen. Exod. Levit. Isa. Ezek. Habak. Eccles. Cant. and the Revelation: also a book against all the heresies. He died a martyr, A.D. 303. Jerome says he understood Greek better than Latin; and therefore his thoughts are good, but his style bad. Cave (Hist. Liter. vol. I.) published a fragment of his Commentary on Genesis. Whether the Commentary on the Revelation, now extant under his name, be his, has been much doubted; because this comment is opposed to Chiliasm, whereas Jerome (De Viris Illustr. cap. xviii.) says that Victorinus favoured the sentiment of Nepos and the Chiliasm. See Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxiv.—Mur.

¹ See Origen, in De Principiis, Opp. tom. I. p. 49, and lib. I. De Princip. cap. vii. p. 63, ed. De la Rue; also Gregory Neocesar. Expositio Fidei, p. 11, Opp. ed. Vossii.

² In his Stromata, which are lost, and in his work De Principiis, which is preserved in the Latin translation of Rufinus. (See a long note of Mosheim on the philosophy and theology of Origen, in his Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 604, &c.) It does not appear that Origen regarded reason or philosophy as of higher authority than revelation. He believed indeed that there is a true philosophy as well as a false, and that the dictates of the former are to be received and confided in; but he also believed that the Scriptures contain a divine revelation which is to be received and followed with implicit confidence; and that no philosophy is true which contradicts the plain declarations of the Scriptures. At the same time he believed that the Scriptures for the most part only state the simple truths and facts of religion, without explaining the grounds and reasons of them; and that they state these truths and facts in a plain and popular manner without acquainting us with the metaphysical nature of the subjects. In his opinion it was the proper business of reason or philosophy to investigate more fully the causes and grounds of these religious truths and facts, and to examine and determine their metaphysical nature. Such it appears were Origen's fundamental principles. And how few are they who in this or in any age have adopted more consistent views? Yet he erred; and erred just as theologians have ever been prone to do, by relying too confidently on the correctness and certainty of what he regarded as the conclusions of true philosophy. His errors accordingly were nearly all in relation to religious philosophy, or ontology and metaphysics. He reasoned according to the reigning philosophy of the age and country in which he lived. He therefore believed in the pre-existence of human souls, and their incarceration in bodies for offences previously committed; that the senses are indeed be acknowledged to have proceeded in this matter for the most part with timidity and modesty; but his example sanctioned this faulty mode of treating theology, and led his disciples to burst the barriers he prescribed, and to become very unguarded in explaining divine truths according to the dictates of philosophy. To these divines as the parents, that species of theology which is called philosophic or scholastic owes its birth, but it afterwards assumed various forms according to the capacity and erudition of the men who delighted in it.³

2. It is a singular circumstance that another species of theology which has been denominated mystic, and which has a natural tendency to destroy the former, originated from the same sources and nearly at the same time. Its authors are unknown; but its causes and the process of its formation are manifest. Its originators assumed that well-known doctrine of the Platonic school, which was approved also by Origen and his followers, that a portion of the Divine nature was diffused through all human souls; or to express the same thing in other words, that reason in us is an emanation from God himself, and comprehends the elements or first principles of all truths human and divine. Yet they denied that men, by their own efforts and care, can excite this divine spark within them; and therefore they disapproved of the endeavours of men to gain clear perceptions of latent truths by means of definitions, discrimination, and reflection. On the contrary they maintained that silence, inaction, solitude, repose, the avoidance of all active scenes, and the mortification and subjugation of the body, tended to excite this internal word [λόγος, or reason] to put forth its hidden energies, and thus to instruct men in divine things; for the men who neglect all human affairs, and withdraw their senses and their eyes from the contagious influence of material objects, do spiritually, or with the mind, return to God again; and being united with God they not only enjoy vast pleasure, but they see in its native purity and undisguised that truth which appears to others only in a vitiated and deformed state.

3. Such reasoning induced many in this polluting to the soul and must be all mortified; that all rational beings are left of God to follow their own choice, and are restrained only by motives the most powerful of which is punishment; and that ultimately God will thus bring all his creatures to be wise and holy and happy.—Mur.

³ In his Comment. de Reb. Christ. pages 658—667, Mosheim endeavours to show that Origen, by his religious philosophy, laid the foundations of mystic theology in the Christian church; but the evidence he adduces is by no means conclusive.—Mur.

century to retire into deserts, and to emaciate their bodies by fasting and hardships; and by such motives rather than by fear of the Decian persecution, I suppose Paul the hermit was led to roam in the deserts of Thebais, and to lead a life more becoming an irrational animal than a human being.¹ This Paul is said to be the author of the institution of Eremites. But this mode of life prevailed among Christians long before Paul the hermit; in fact it was practised long before the Christian era, in Egypt, Syria, India, and Mesopotamia, and it still exists among the Mahometans as well as the Christians in those arid and burning climates;² for the heated atmosphere which overspreads those countries naturally disposes the inhabitants to repose and indolence, and to court solitude and melancholy.³

4. Among those who laudably employed themselves on the sacred volume, the first place is due to those who took earnest care that copies of the Bible might everywhere be found accurately written, and at a moderate price; that it might be translated into other languages, and that amended and faultless editions might become common. Many opulent Christians of those times are known to have expended no small portion of their estates in furtherance of these objects. In correcting the copies of the Septuagint version, Pierius and Hesychius in Egypt, and Lucian at Antioch, employed themselves with laudable industry. Nor should the nearly similar efforts of Pamphilus the martyr be passed without notice. But Origen passed all others in diligence and patient labour in this way. His Hexapla, though [nearly] destroyed by the ravages of time, will remain an eternal monument of the incredible application with which that great man laboured to subserve the interests of the Christian religion.⁴

¹ His life was written by Jerome. [See also the Acta Sauricorum, Antwerp, tom. I. January 10, p. 662.—Schl.]

² See the Travels of Paul Lucas, A.D. 1714, vol. II. p. 363. [The reader will recollect the Dervises and Fakirs who roam over the whole country from the shores of the Mediterranean to the Ganges. Jerome reports in the preface to his life of Paul of Thebais, on the questionable authority of Amathas and Macarius, two disciples of St. Anthony, that Paul the hermit of Thebais was the first who practised this mode of life. But high ideas of the sanctity of renouncing social and civilized life and dwelling in deserts among beasts, were prevalent before Paul in the middle of this century turned hermit. Thus Narcissus, bishop of Jerusalem, obtained great reputation in the close of the second century, by secreting himself many years in the desert. Eusebius, H. E. lib. vi. cap. ix. x. The origin of religious criminalism may perhaps be traced back to the early pagan philosophers; for Porphyry (περί ἀσκήσεως, sec. 35) assures us that the ancient Pythagoreans were distinguished for their attachment to this mode of life.—Mur.]

³ The peculiar predispositions of eastern habits to an anchorite life are very eloquently unfolded by Taylor, in his Nat. Hist. of Enthusiasm, 4th edit. p. 205, &c.—R.

⁴ The fragments of this Herculean work which are

5. The same Origen stands unquestionably at the head of the interpreters of the Bible in this century. But with pain it must be added, he was first among those who have found in the Scriptures a secure retreat for all errors and idle fancies. As this most ingenious man could see no feasible method of vindicating all that is said in the Scriptures, against the cavils of the heretics and the enemies of Christianity, provided he interpreted the language of the Bible literally, he concluded that he must expound the sacred volume in the way in which the Platonists were accustomed to explain the history of their gods. He therefore taught that the words in many parts of the Bible convey no meaning at all; and in some places where he acknowledged there was some meaning in the words, he maintained that under them there was contained a hidden and concealed sense, which was much to be preferred to their literal meaning.⁵ And this hidden sense it is that he preserved have been collected and published by that ornament of the once learned Benedictines, Bernh. de Montfaucon, Paris, 1713, 2 vols. fol. See also Biddess, Language in Theologiam, tom. II. p. 1376, &c.; and Carpzov, Critica Sacra Vet. Test. p. 574. [Origen published both a Tetrapla and a Hexapla; that is, a fourfold and a sixfold Bible. The former contained in parallel columns, 1, Aquila's Greek version; 2, that of Symmachus; 3, the Septuagint version; 4, the Greek version of Theodotion. The Hexapla contained throughout six columns, generally eight, and occasionally nine, thus arranged:—1, The Hebrew text in the Hebrew character; 2, the Hebrew text in Greek characters; 3, Aquila's version; 4, that of Symmachus; 5, the Septuagint; 6, that of Theodotion; 7, and 8, two other Greek versions whose authors were unknown; 9, another Greek version. The three last being anonymous versions, are denominated the Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Greek versions. The most useful parts of Montfaucon's Hexapla with additions, corrections, and notes, have been published in two vols. 8vo, by Bahrdt, Lips. 1769-70.—Mur.]

⁵ Here may be consulted the Preface of De la Rue to the second volume of Origen's works, ed. Paris, 1733, fol. With greater fullness and precision I have stated and explained Origen's system of biblical interpretation in my Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 619, where also his philosophy, his theology, and his contest with bishop Demetrius, are formally taken up and discussed. [With this may be compared the observations of that distinguished philologist, Professor Ernesti, in his Dissertatio de Origene, interpretationis librorum S.S. grammatica auctore, written A.D. 1756. Ernesti shows that the merits of this Christian father, in regard to the criticism and exposition of the Old and New Testaments, were by no means small. The leading thoughts of Mosheim, as stated in his Comment de Reb. Christ. &c. are the following:—Origen was not the inventor of the allegorical mode of expounding the Scriptures. It was in use among the Jews before the Christian era. (Ernesti goes farther, and seeks its origin in the schools of the prophets.) Philo was a great allegorist; and Pantenus and Clemens Alex. were the first Christian allegorists. Origen took greater liberties in this mode of interpretation; and it was not simply his resorting to allegories, but his excesses in them, which drew upon him enemies. Before his day all interpreters explained the narrations and the laws contained in the Bible, according to their literal meaning; but Origen perversely turned a large part of biblical history into moral fables, and many of the laws into allegories. Probably he learned this in the school of Ammonius, which expounded Hesiod, Homer, and the whole fabulous history searches after in his commentaries, ingeniously indeed, but perversely, and gene-

of the Greeks allegorically. The predecessors of Origen, who searched after a mystical sense of Scripture, still set a high value on the grammatical or literal sense; but he often expresses himself as if he attached no value to it. Before him allegories were resorted to only to discover predictions of future events, and rules for moral conduct; but he betook himself to allegories, in order to establish the principles of his philosophy on a scriptural basis. All this must have been offensive to many Christians. His propensity to allegories must be ascribed to the fertility of his invention, the prevailing custom of the Egyptians, his education, the instructions he received from his teachers, and the example both of the philosophers, of whom he was an admirer, and of the Jews, especially Philo. To these may be added other causes. He hoped, by means of his allegories, more easily to convince the Jews, to confute the Gnostics, and to silence the objections of both. This he himself tells us, De Principiis, lib. viii. cap. viii. p. 164, &c.; but we must not forget his attachment to that system of philosophy which he embraced. This philosophy could not be reconciled with the Scriptures, except by a resort to allegories; and, therefore, the Scriptures must be interpreted allegorically, that they might not contradict his philosophy. He also believed that it was doing honour to the holy Scriptures, to consider them as diverse from all human compositions, and as containing hidden mysteries. See Homily xv. on Genesis, Opp. tom. ii. p. 99; and Homily on Exod., Opp. tom. ii. p. 129; and finally, he thought many of the objections of the enemies of religion could not be fully answered without recurrence to allegories. His general principles for the interpretation of the sacred volume resolve themselves into the following positions:—1. The Scriptures resemble man. As a man consists of three parts, a rational mind, a sensitive soul, and a visible body, so the Scriptures have a threefold sense, a literal sense, corresponding with the body; a moral sense, analogous to the soul; and a mystical or spiritual sense, analogous to the rational mind. Homily v. on Levit. sec. 5. Opp. tom. ii. p. 203. 2. As the body is the baser part of man, so the literal is the less worthy sense of Scripture. And as the body often betrays good men into sin, so the literal sense often leads us into error. Stromata, lib. x. quoted by Jerome, b. iii. Comment on Galat. cap. iii. Opp. tom. i. p. 41. 3. Yet the literal sense is not wholly useless. De Principiis, lib. iv. sec. 12, p. 169; and sec. 14, p. 173. 4. They who would see further into the Scriptures than the common people must search out the moral sense. 5. And the perfect, or those who have attained to the highest degree of blessedness, must also investigate the spiritual sense. De Principiis, lib. iv. sec. ii. p. 168. 6. The moral sense of Scripture instructs us relative to the changes in the mind of man, and gives rules for regulating the heart and life. 7. The spiritual sense acquaints us with the nature and state and history of the spiritual world, composed of two parts, the heavenly and the earthly. The earthly, mystical or spiritual world, is the Christian church on earth. The heavenly, mystical world is above, and corresponds in all its parts with the lower world, which was formed after its model. 8. As the Scripture contains the history of this twofold mystic world, so there is a twofold mystic sense of Scripture, an allegorical and an analogical. 9. The mystic sense is diffused throughout the holy Scriptures. 10. Yet we do not always meet with both the allegorical sense and the analogical in every passage. 11. The moral sense likewise pervades the whole Bible. 12. But the literal sense does not occur everywhere; for many passages have no literal meaning. 13. Some passages have only two senses; namely, a moral and a mystical [the mystical being either allegorical or analogical, rarely both.] other passages have three senses [the moral, the mystical, and the literal.] 14. The literal sense is perceived by every attentive reader. The moral sense is somewhat more difficult to be discovered. 15. But the mystic sense none can discover with certainty, unless they are wise men, and also taught of God. 16. Neither can even such men hope to fathom all the mysteries of the sacred volume. 17. In searching for the analogical sense, especially, a person must proceed with peculiar care and caution.—Schl. [Mosheim states the following as Origen's general rule for determining when a rally to the entire neglect and contempt of the literal meaning.¹ This recondit sense he moreover divides into the moral and the mystical or spiritual; the former containing instruction relative to the internal state of the soul and our external actions, and the latter acquainting us with the nature, the history, and laws of the spiritual or mystical world. He fancied that this mystical world was also twofold, partly superior or celestial, and partly inferior and terrestrial, that is the Church: and hence he divided the mystical sense of Scripture into the terrene or allegorical, and the celestial or analogical. This mode of interpreting Scripture, which was sanctioned by Jewish practice, was current among Christians before the times of Origen; but as he gave determinate rules for it, and brought it into a systematic form, he is commonly regarded as its originator.

6. Innumerable expositors in this and the following centuries pursued the method of Origen, though with some diversity; nor could the few who pursued a better method make much head against them. The commentaries of Hippolytus which have reached us show that this holy man went wholly into Origen's method. And no better, probably, were the expositions of some books of the Old and New Testaments, composed by Victorinus, which are lost; but the Paraphrase on the book of Ecclesiastes, by Gregory Thaumaturgus, still extant, is not liable to the same objection, although its author was a great admirer of Origen. Methodius explained the book of Genesis, and passage of Scripture may be taken literally, and when not; viz. Whenever the words, if understood literally, will afford a valuable meaning, one that is worthy of God, useful to men, and accordant with truth and correct reason, then the literal meaning is to be retained; but whenever the words, if understood literally, will express what is absurd, or false, or contrary to correct reason, or useless, or unworthy of God, then the literal sense is to be discarded, and the moral and mystical alone to be regarded. This rule he applies to every part both of the Old Test. and the New; and he assigns two reasons why fables and literal absurdities are admitted into the sacred volume. The first is, that if the literal meaning were always rational and good, the reader would be apt to rest in it, and not look after the moral and mystical sense. The second is, that fabulous and incongruous representations often afford moral and mystical instruction which could not so well be conveyed by sober facts and representations. De Principiis, lib. iv. sec. 16, 18, tom. x. Comment in Joh.—Mur. [For further views of Origen as a biblical expositor, the student should turn to Rosenmüller, Hist. Interpret. Libr. Sacr. tom. iii. p. 17—156; Simoni, Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test. livr. iii. ch. ix. p. 439—442; Conybeare's Bampton Lectures, on the Secondary and Spiritual Interpretation of Scripture, Lond. 1824, p. 130—143; and Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, Edin. 1843, p. 96—105.—R.

¹ Origen, in his Stromata, lib. x. cited by De la Rue, Opp. tom. i. p. 41, says: Multorum malorum occultus est, si quis in carne Scripturæ maneat. Quæ qui fecerint, regnum Dei non consequentur. Quamobrem spiritum Scripturæ fructusque quaramus qui non dicuntur ma-

the Canticles; but his labours have not reached us. Ammonius composed a Harmony of the Gospels.

7. Origen, in his lost work entitled Stromata, and in his four books De Principiis, explained most of the doctrines of Christianity, or, to speak more correctly, deformed them with philosophical speculations. And these books of his De Principiis were the first compendium of scholastic, or, if you please, philosophic theology. Something similar was attempted by Theognostus, in his seven books of Hypotyposes, for a knowledge of which we are indebted to Photius,¹ who says they were the work of a man infected with the opinions of Origen. Gregory Thaumaturgus, in his Expositio Fidei, gave a brief summary of Christian doctrines. Certain points of the Christian faith were taken up by various individuals, in reply to the enemies or the corrupters of Christianity. Tracts on the Deity, the resurrection, antichrist, and the end of the world, were composed by Hippolytus. Methodius wrote on free-will, and Lucian on the creed; but as most of these treatises are no longer extant, their character is little known.

8. Among the writers on moral subjects (or practical theology), passing by Tertullian, who was mentioned under the preceding century, the first place belongs perhaps to Cyprian. From the pen of this extraordinary man we have treatises on the advantages of patience, on mortality, on alms and good works, and an exhortation to martyrdom. In these works there are many excellent thoughts, but they are not arranged neatly and happily, nor sustained by solid arguments.² Origen wrote, among other works of a practical nature, an Exhortation to Martyrdom; a topic discussed by many in that age, with different degrees of eloquence and perspicacity. Methodius treated of chastity, but in a confused manner, in his Feast of Virgins. Dionysius of Alexandria wrote on penance and on temptations. To mention other writers in this department would be needless.

9. Of polemic writers, a host might be mentioned. The idolaters were assailed by Minutius Felix, in his dialogue entitled Octavius; by Origen, in his eight books against Celsus; by Arnobius, in his eight books against the Gentiles; and by Cyprian, in his tract on the vanity of idols. The Chronicon of Hippolytus, written against the Gentiles; and the work of Methodius in opposition to Porphyry, who attacked Christianity, are lost. We may also place among polemic writers, both those who opposed the philosophers, as Hippolytus, who wrote against Plato, and those who treated of fate, of free-will, and of the origin of evil, as Hippolytus, Methodius, and others. Against the Jews, Hippolytus attempted something which has not reached us; but the Testimonia [from Scripture] against the Jews, by Cyprian, are still extant. Against all the sectarians and heretics, assaults were made by Origen, Victorinus, and Hippolytus, but nothing of these works has come down to us. It would be superfluous here to enumerate those who wrote against individual heretics.

10. But it must by no means pass unnoticed, that the discussions instituted against the opposers of Christianity in this age departed far from the primitive simplicity, and the correct method of controversy; for the Christian doctors, who were in part educated in the schools of rhetoricians and sophists, inconsiderately transferred the arts of these teachers to the cause of Christianity; and therefore considered it of no importance whether an antagonist were confounded by base artifices or by solid arguments. Thus that mode of disputing which the ancients called economical,³ and which had victory rather than truth for its object, was almost universally approved. And the Platonists contributed to the currency of the practice by asserting that it was no sin for a person to employ falsehood and fallacies for the support of truth, when it was in danger of being borne down. A person ignorant of these facts will be but a poor judge of the arguments of Origen in his book against Celsus, and of the others who wrote against the worshippers of idols. Tertullian's nifesti. He had said a little before:—Non valde conveniunt Scriptura, qui cum intelligent, ut scriptum est. Who would suppose such declarations could fall from the lips of a wise and considerate man? But this excellent man suffered himself to be misled by the causes mentioned, and by his love of philosophy. He could not discover in the sacred books all that he considered true, so long as he adhered to the literal sense; but allow him to abandon the literal sense, and to search for recondite meanings, and those books would contain Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, and the whole tribe of philosophers. And thus nearly all those who would model Christianity according to their own fancy or their favourite system of philosophy, have run into this mode of interpreting Scripture.

¹ Photius, Biblioth. cod. cvi. p. 279. Photius represents him as erring, with Origen, in regard to the character of the Son of God; but Bull defends him against this charge, in his Defensio Fidei Nicenae, sec. II. cap. x. sec. 7, p. 135. See concerning him Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. lib. v. cap. i. vol. v. p. 276; and lib. v. cap. lxxxviii. vol. ix. p. 408.—Schl.

² See Barlemyrac, De la Morale des Pères, chap. viii. p. 104, &c.

³ Souverain, Platonisme dévoilé, p. 244, Daillé, De vera usq. Patrum, lib. i. p. 160; Wolfii, Cassiodoriana, p. 100. On the phrase, to do a thing οικονομικῶς, Gataker has treated largely in his notes on Antoninus, lib. xi. p. 330, &c. (It signifies to do a thing artfully and dexterously, or with cunning and sagacity, as a shrewd manager of a household (οικονομῶς) controls those under him.—Mur. [See Note 2, page 68, above.—R.

method of confuting heretics; namely, by prescription, was not perhaps altogether unsuitable in that age. But they who think it always proper to reason in this manner must have little knowledge of the difference which time and change of circumstances produce.¹

11. This culpable disposition to circumvent and confound an adversary, rather than confute him with sound argument, produced also a multitude of books falsely bearing on their front the names of certain distinguished men. For the greater part of mankind, being influenced more by the authority of names than by arguments and scripture testimony, the writers conceived they should prefix names of the greatest weight to their books, in order to oppose successfully their adversaries. Hence those Canons which were falsely ascribed to the apostles; hence those Apostolic Constitutions which Clemens Romanus was reputed to have collected; hence too the Recognitions of Clement, as they are called, and the Clementina,² and other works of the like character, which a too credulous world long held in high estimation. By the same artifice the mystics, as they are called, sought to advance their cause. Having no answer to give to those who demanded who was the first author of this new sort of wisdom, they alleged that they received it from Dionysius, the Areopagite of Athens, a contemporary with the apostles; and to give plausibility to the falsehood, they palmed upon this great man books void of sense and rationality.³ Thus they who wished to surpass all others in piety deemed it a pious act to employ deception and fraud in support of piety.

12. Among the controversies which divided Christians in this century, the most considerable were concerning the millennium, the baptism of heretics, and Origen. That the Saviour is to reign a thousand years among men before the end of the world, had been believed by many in the preceding century without offence to any; all, however, had not explained the doctrine in the same manner, nor indulged hopes of the same kind of pleasures during that reign.⁴ In this century the millenarian doctrine fell into disrepute, through the influence especially of Origen, who opposed it because it contravened some of his opinions.⁵ But Nepos, an Egyptian bishop, attempted to revive its authority in a work written against the allegorists, as he contemptuously styled the opposers of the millennium. The book and its arguments were approved by many in the province of Arsinoë, and particularly by Coracion, a presmystic theology, and breathe a devout spirit, but are exceedingly obscure and difficult of comprehension. It is supposed they were written in the fourth or fifth century, as they bear marks of that period, and are not mentioned by any writer prior to the sixth century. The best edition of these works, Gr. and Lat. with copious notes, is that of Balthazar Corderius, Antwerp, 1634, 2 vols. fol. embracing the Gr. scholia of St. Maximus the martyr (A.D. 659), and the paraphrase of G. Pachymeras (A.D. 1240).—Mur.

⁴ See the learned Treatise concerning the True Millennium, which Dr. Whitby has subjoined to the second volume of his Commentary upon the New Testament. See also, for an account of the doctrine of the ancient Millenarians, the fourth, fifth, seventh and ninth volumes of Lardner's Credibility, &c.—Mael. [Also II. Corod's Kirchliche Geschichte des Chiliasmus, 2d ed. 1794, 3 vols. 8vo.—Mur.

⁵ See Origen, De Principiis, lib. ii. cap. xi. Opp. tom. i. p. 104, and Prodig. Comment. in Cantic. Canticorum, tom. iii. p. 28. The Cerinthians, Marcionites, Montanists, and Melitians, among the heretical sects, and among the orthodox fathers Papias, Justin Martyr, and Irenæus, held to a millennial reign of Christ, and Irenæus understood it in a very gross sense. Mosheim, in his Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 721, believed the doctrine had a Jewish origin; and he supposed the Christian doctors received, or at least tolerated it, because they hoped by it to make the Jews more willing to embrace Christianity. But Walch, in his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. ii. p. 143, is more discriminating, and maintains that the question, whether a millennial reign of Christ is to be expected, had a biblical origin, the earlier Chilists relying on the testimony of the R-v-lation; but the explanation of the doctrine was derived from the Jewish opinions. According to the account of Gennadius of Marseilles, De Dogmat. Ecclesiasticis, cap. iv. p. 32, the Chilists may be divided into four classes. The first open opposer of Chiliasm that we meet with, was Caius, a teacher in the Church of Rome, towards the end of the second century. He denied that the Revelation was written by John, and ascribed it rather to Cerinthus. But he effected very little. Origen was a more powerful opposer of the doctrine. He did not, like Caius, deny the canonical authority of the Apocalypse, but explained the passages in it which describe the millennial reign of Christ, allegorically, as referring to spiritual delights, suited to the nature of spirits raised to perfection, and these to be enjoyed, not on the earth, but in the world to come. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 720, &c. and Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. ii. p. 136—151.—Schl.

¹ See Spanheim, Diss. de Prescriptions in Rebus Fidei, Opp. tom. iii. p. 1079. [Tertullian's book was entitled De Prescriptione Hæreticorum, or Prescriptionibus adversus Hæreticos, which might be translated, On the Presumption in regard to Heretics, or Presumptions against them. The author attempts to confute all the heretics at once, and by means of an historical argument. He maintains that the orthodox churches were founded by the apostles and their approved assistants, who ordained the first pastors of these churches, and established in them all one and the same faith, which must of course be genuine Christianity; and that this faith, having been handed down pure and uncorrupted, is now contained in the creeds and inculcated in the assemblies of these churches. But he alleges that not one of these things can be said of the heretical churches, which had not such an origin, and embrace various differing creeds, and creeds derived from other sources. Being bred an advocate and familiar with the proceedings of courts, he gives a forensic form to his argument, not only by using the law term Prescriptio, but by maintaining that the orthodox were, and had always been, in right and lawful possession of that invaluable treasure, true Christianity; and that of course the heretics, who were never in possession of it, in vain attempt now to oust them of what they thus hold by legal prescription.—Mur.

² Respecting these supposititious works, see the notes to sec. 19. chap. II. part. ii. cent. 1.—R.

³ The spurious works ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite (who is mentioned Acts xvii. 34), are the following:—De Cælesti Hierarchia, De Ecclesiastica Hierarchia, De Divinis Nominibus, De Mystica Theologia, together with twelve epistles. They all relate to the byter of some respectability and influence. But Dionysius of Alexandria, a disciple of Origen, allayed the rising storm by his oral discussions and his two books on the divine promises.¹

13. As no law had determined in what manner those who came over from heretical churches to the catholic Christians were to be received, different customs prevailed in different churches. Many of the Oriental and African Christians classed reclaimed heretics among the catechumens, and admitted them to the Christian ordinances by baptism. But most of the European Christians regarded the baptism administered by erring Christians as valid; and therefore received reclaimed heretics simply with imposition of hands and prayer. This diversity long prevailed without giving rise to contention. But in this century the Asiatic Christians determined in several councils, what before had been left at discretion, that all heretics coming over to the true church must be re-baptized.² This coming to the knowledge of Stephen, bishop of Rome, he with little humanity or prudence excluded those Asiatics from his fellowship and from that of his church. Notwithstanding this rashness of Stephen, Cyprian with other Africans, in a council called on the subject, embraced the opinion of the Asiatics, and gave notice of it to Stephen. Upon this Stephen was very indignant; but Cyprian replied with energy, and in a new council held at Carthage, again pronounced the baptism administered by heretics to be wholly invalid. The rage of Stephen now waxed hotter, and he most unjustly excluded the Africans from the rights of brotherhood. But the discord was healed partly by the moderation of the Africans and partly by the death of Stephen.³

¹ See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii. 24, and Gennadius Massiliensis, De Dogmatibus Ecclesiasticis, cap. iv. p. 32, ed. Elmenhorst. [Nepos held the Revelation to be an inspired book; and he maintained in opposition to the allegorists that the passages which speak of a millennial reign of Christ must be understood literally, and as promising corporeal pleasures. But he does not appear to have defined clearly what these pleasures were to be, though he excluded eating, drinking, and marriage, as Mosheim supposes, ubi supra, p. 726. The very obscure and defective history of Nepos is explained, as far as it can be, by Walch, ubi supra, pages 152—167.—Schl. (See also Münscher, Handbuch der Dogmenes, vol. ii. pages 408—431, and Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. pages 1088—96.—Mur.]

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii. cap. v. and vii. Firmilian, Epist. ad Cyprianum, in Cyprian's Epist. 75. The councils which decided this point, before Stephen's rash procedure, were (1) the council of Carthage, about A.D. 215. See Cyprian, Ep. 71 and 73—(2) that of Iconium in Phrygia, A.D. 235. Cyprian, Ep. 75. Euseb. H. E. vii. 4—(3) that of Synada, and (4) some others, which are barely mentioned in Cyprian, Ep. 75, and Euseb. ubi supra. See Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversammlung, pages 91, 94, and 96.—Mur.]

³ Cyprian, Ep. 70 and 73, and several others, ed. Baluze, Augustine, De Baptismo contra Donatistas

14. The contests concerning Origen were moved by Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, who is reported by the friends of Origen to have been influenced by envy and hatred; which, however, is very doubtful. In the proceedings of Demetrius against Origen, one may discover marks of a mind exasperated, impassioned, arrogant, and unreasonable, but none scarcely of envy.⁴ In the year 228 Origen took a journey to Achaia, and on his way suffered himself to be ordained a presbyter by the bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem. At this, Demetrius was greatly offended, because he deemed Origen unfit for such an office, on account of his having mutilated himself, and because being master of a school under him, he had been ordained without his knowledge and consent. The matter, however, was compromised, and Origen returned to Alexandria. But not long after, from some unknown cause, new dissension arose between him and Demetrius, which became so great that Origen left Alexandria and the school in the year 231, and removed to Caesarea [in Palestine]. Demetrius accused him in his absence before an assembled council, and deprived him of his office without a hearing; and afterwards, in a second council divested him of his ministerial character. It is probable that Demetrius accused Origen before the council, particularly the last one, of erroneous sentiments in matters of religion; which it was easy for him to do, as Origen's book, De Principiis, which was full of dangerous sentiments, had been published not long before. The decision of the council at Alexandria was approved by the majority of the Christian bishops, though rejected by those of Achaia, Palestine, Phœnicia, and Arabia.⁵

lib. vi. and vii. Opp. tom. ix. where he gives the acts of the council of Carthage, A.D. 256. Prudent, Maran, Vita Cypriani, p. 107, and all the writers of the life of Cyprian. [The whole history of this controversy is discussed at large by Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Eccl. pages 540—547, and still more fully by Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 328—384.—Schl.]

⁴ Mosheim is singular in this opinion; which he defends at great length, in his Comment. de Reb. Eccl. p. 671, &c. In opposition to the express testimony of Eusebius, l. c. vi. 8, and Jerome, Epist. 29, Opp. tom. ix. part i. p. 68. If Demetrius was not envious of the growing reputation of Origen, or otherwise affected by personal antipathy, it seems impossible to account for the rancour he manifested.—Mur.]

⁵ This account is derived from the original sources, especially from Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vi. 23. Photius, Biblioth. cod. cxviii. Jerome, De Veris Illustr. and Origen himself.—It differs, in some respects, from that given by the common writers, Doucin, Huët, and others. [That Demetrius accused Origen of erroneous sentiments, is a mere conjecture of Mosheim and others, which however is expressly denied by Jerome. Epist. ad Paulam, No. 29, Opera, tom. iv. par. ii. col. 68 and 480, ed. Martianay. Neither is it certain that Demetrius assembled two councils. See Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversammlung, p. 82, &c.—Mur.]

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS RITES.

1. ALL the monuments of this century which have come down to us show that there was a great increase of ceremonies. To the causes of this which have already been mentioned, may be added the passion for Platonic philosophy, or rather the popular superstition of the oriental nations respecting demons, which was adopted by the Platonists and received from them by the Christian doctors. For, from these opinions concerning the nature and the propensities of evil spirits, many of these rites evidently took their rise. Hence arose the public exorcisms, the multiplication of fasts, and the aversion to matrimony. Hence the caution not to have intercourse with those who were either not yet baptized, or had been excluded from the communion of the church, because such were considered as under the power of some evil spirit; and to pass over other things, hence the painful austerities and penances which were enjoined upon offenders.¹

2. That the Christians now had in most provinces certain edifices in which they assembled for religious worship will be denied by no candid and impartial person. Nor would I contend strenuously against those who think these edifices were frequently adorned with images and other ornaments.² As to the forms of public worship and the times³ set apart for it, it is unnecessary here to be particular, as little alteration was made in this century. Yet two things deserve notice. First, the public discourses to the people underwent a change. For, not to mention Origen, who was the first, so far as we know, that made long discourses in public, and in his discourses expounded the sacred volume, there were certain bishops, who being educated in the schools of the rhetoricians, framed their addresses and exhortations according to the rules of Grecian eloquence, and their example met the most ready approbation. Secondly, the use of incense was now introduced, at least into many churches. Very learned men have denied this fact; but they do it in the face of testimony which is altogether unexceptionable.⁴

3. Those who conducted religious worship annexed longer prayers and more of ceremony to the celebration of the Lord's Supper; and this I suppose with no bad intentions. Neither those doing penance nor those not yet baptized were allowed to be present at the celebration of this ordinance; which practice it is well known was derived from the pagan mysteries.⁵ That golden and silver vessels were used in it, is testified among others by Prudentius,⁶ and I see no reason to doubt the fact in respect to the more opulent Christian churches. The time of its administration was different, according to the state and circumstances of the churches. Some deemed the morning, some the afternoon, and some the evening, to be the most suitable time for its celebration.⁷ Neither were all agreed how often this most sacred ordinance should be repeated.⁸ But all believed it absolutely necessary to the attainment of

⁴ Beveridge, Ad Canon. iii. Apostol. p. 461, and his Codex Canon. Fuldensis, p. 78. [The Christians originally abhorred the use of incense in public worship as being a part of the worship of idols. See Tertullian, Apolog. cap. xlii.; and De Corona Militis, cap. x. Yet they permitted its use at funerals against offensive smells. Afterwards it was used at the induction of magistrates and bishops and also in public worship, to temper the bad air of crowded assemblies in hot countries, and at last degenerated into a superstitious rite. — Schl.

⁵ See Pfaff, Diss. ii. De Prejudic. Theologic. sec. 13, p. 149, &c.; and Bingham, Antiquit. Eccles. book x. chap. v. — Schl.

⁶ Π. π. στ. γ. ε. υ. Hymn. ii. p. 60. ed. Heinsil (and Oplatus Milevit. De Schismate Donatist. cap. xlii. p. 17. — Schl. [In a very interesting document entitled Gesta apud Zenophimum, to be found in Routh's Reliquiæ Sacræ. vol. iv. p. 100, &c.; and in Oplatus, Opera, p. 265, there is a circumstantial account of the plate and other property belonging to the Church of Circa, now Constantin, in North Africa, in the year 303-4, during the Diocletian persecution, when the Roman authorities seized the effects belonging to the Christian communities. They found in this provincial church two golden and six silver cups, six silver pitchers, a small silver kettle (cucumellum), seven silver lamps, two wax taper-stands (cerefolia), a few brazen candelabra of seven lights each, eleven brazen lamps with their chains, eight hundred and twelve female dresses (tunica muliebres), thirty-eight caps or veils (maforta), sixteen male tunics, thirteen pair of men's stockings, forty-seven pair of women's ditto, and nineteen copes (rusticana), probably some kind of coarse dresses. In the triclinium of the church, perhaps the room for the love-feasts, or for the administration of baptism, there were four dolia or large tubs, and six earthen jars for wine. The Roman officials had great trouble in collecting the books (codices) of this church, in order to burn them. When they entered the library they found the shelves or presses all empty, but behind a chest they discovered capitulata (?) and a lamp, both of silver. From the readers, whom they traced out with some difficulty, and from the schoolmaster or grammaticus, they obtained in all thirty-seven codices, most of them apparently portions of the sacred Scriptures. — R.

⁷ See Cyprian, Ep. lxiii. p. 104. — Schl.

⁸ It was commonly administered every Sunday, as well as on other festival days; and in times of persecution, daily. See Cyprian, De Oratione Domin. p. 209. Ep. lvi. p. 90, Ep. liv. p. 78, ed. Baluze. — Schl.

¹ Whoever desires to look farther into this subject may consult Porphyry, On Abstinence from Flesh, and various passages in Eusebius, Præparat. Evang. and Theodoret, comparing them with the Christian institutions.

² Yet there is most ground for the negative. — Von Ein.

³ The regular seasons for public worship were all Sundays, Good Friday, Easter, and Whitsunday. See Origen, against Celsus, book viii. p. 833. The anniversaries of the local martyrdoms were also observed. — Von Ein.

salvation; and therefore they universally required infants to become partakers of it.¹ In some places the sacred feast preceded and in others followed the Lord's Supper.²

4. Baptism was publicly administered twice a-year to candidates who had gone through a long preparation and trial,³ none being present as spectators but such as had been themselves baptized. The effect of baptism was supposed to be the remission of sins; and it was believed that the bishop, by the imposition of hands and by prayer, conferred those gifts of the Holy Spirit which were necessary for leading a holy life.⁴ Of the principal ceremonies attending baptism we have before spoken. [Cent. ii. part ii. cap. iv. sec. 13.] A few things, however, must here be added. None were admitted to the sacred font until the exorcist, by a solemn and menacing formula, had declared them free from bondage to the prince of darkness and now servants of God. For after the opinion had become prevalent among Christians, that rational souls originated from God himself, and therefore were in themselves holy, pure, and morally free, the evil propensities of man must be considered as arising from the body and from matter, or some evil spirit must be supposed to possess the souls of men and impel them to sin. The Gnostics all embraced the first supposition; but the Catholics could in no wise embrace it, because they held that matter was created by God and was not eternal. They had therefore to embrace the second supposition, and to imagine some evil demon, the author of sin and of all evil, to be resident in all vicious persons.⁵ The persons baptized returned home decorated with a crown and a white robe; the first being indicative of their victory over the world and their lusts, the latter of their acquired innocence.⁶

5. Greater sanctity and necessity were now attributed to fasting than was done before; because it was the general belief that demons laid fewer snares for the temperate and abstemious than for the full fed or luxurious.⁷ The Latins were singular in keeping every seventh day of the week as a fast;⁸ and as the Greek and Oriental Christians would not imitate them in this, it afforded abundant matter for altercation between them. Ordinarily Christians prayed three times a day, at the third, sixth, and ninth hours [9 A.M. 12 noon, and 3 P.M.], as was the custom of the Jews. Besides these regular hours of prayer, they prayed much and often; for they considered it the highest duty of a holy man to hold converse with God.⁹ On joyful and festive occasions while giving thanks to God, they thought it suitable to pray standing, thus expressing their joy and confidence by the posture of their bodies; but on sorrowful occasions and seasons of fasting and humiliation, they were accustomed to make their supplications on their bended knees or prostrate, to indicate self-abasement.¹⁰ That certain forms of prayer were everywhere used both in public and in private, I have no doubt;¹¹ but I am likewise confident that many persons poured out the feelings of rona Militis; but neither makes any mention of exorcism. This is a cogent argument to prove that it was admitted by Christians after the times of these fathers, and of course in the third century. Egypt perhaps first received it.

⁶ Perhaps also of their freedom. Schwarz, Diss. de Cereoniis et Formulis a Veterum Manumissione ad Baptismum translatis. Cyprian refers to the white garments, De Lapsis, p. 181.—Schl.

⁷ Clementina, Homil. ix. sec. 9, p. 688, &c.; Porphyry, De Abstinencia, lib. iv, p. 417, &c. and others.

⁸ See Concilium Eliberitanum, Canon 26.—Schl.

⁹ See Cyprian, De Oratione, p. 214.—Schl.

¹⁰ See Cyprian, De Oratione, p. 214; and Constitut. Apostol. lib. ii. cap. lix.—Schl.

¹¹ In the earliest times, exclusive of the short introductory salutation, Pax vobiscum, &c. no established forms of prayer were used in public worship, but the bishop or presbyter poured forth extempore prayers. See Justin Martyr, Apology ii. The Lord's prayer was used not only as a pattern, but also as a formula of prayer. Yet only the baptized and not the catechumens, might utter it. Tertullian, De Oratione, cap. i. ix.; Cyprian, De Oratione Domin. and Constitut. Apostol. lib. vii. cap. xliiv. Afterwards various forms were gradually introduced, and particularly short prayers derived from passages of Scripture. When greater uniformity in the churches as to ceremonies was introduced, the smaller churches had to regulate their forms of prayer conformably to those of the larger churches, and of course to adopt the formulas of the metropolitan churches. Origen, Contra Celum, lib. vi.; and Homilia in Jerem.; Eusebius, De Vita Constantini Mag. lib. iv. cap. xix. xx. xvii.; Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xvii.; Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xli. xlvii. See Baumgarten's Erklärung der Christlichen Alterthümer, p. 432.—Schl.

¹ They believed that this ordinance rendered persons immortal, and that such as never partook of it had no hopes of a resurrection. Hence Dionysius Alex. (cited by Euseb. H. E. vii. 11), calls it, αἰσθητὴν μετὰ τοῦ Κυρίου συνεισφοράν. That children also partook of it is testified by Cyprian, De Lapsis, pages 184 and 189, ed. Baluze. See Horn's Hist. Eucharist. Infantum, cap. iv. sec. 1, &c.; and cap. vi. sec. 3; also Bingham, Antiquit. Eccles. book xv. chap. iv. sec. 7.—Schl.

² Chrysostom, Homil. xxii. Oportet Hæreses esse, Opp. tom. v.—Schl.

³ In the Apostolic Constitutions, book viii. chap. xxxii. a three years' preparation was enjoined, yet with allowance of some exceptions.—Schl.

⁴ This may be placed beyond all controversy by many passages from the fathers of this century. And as it will conduce much to an understanding of the theology of the ancients, which differed in many respects from ours, I will adduce a single passage from Cyprian. It is in his Epist. lxxiii. p. 131. Manifestum est autem, ubi et per quos remissa peccatorum dari possit, quæ in baptismo scilicet datur. — Qui vero præpositis ecclesiæ offeruntur, per nostram orationem et munus impositionem Spiritum Sanctum consequuntur. See also a passage from Dionysius Alex. in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. viii.

⁵ That exorcism was not annexed to baptism till some time in the third century, and after the admission of the Platonic philosophy into the church, may almost be demonstrated. The ceremonies used at baptism in the second century are described by Justin Martyr, in his second Apology, and by Tertullian in his book De Co- their hearts before God in free and unpremeditated effusions. They supposed there was great efficacy in the sign of the cross against all sorts of evils, and particularly against the machinations of evil spirits; and therefore no one undertook anything of much moment without first crossing himself.¹ Other ceremonies I pass without notice.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF DIVISIONS OR HERESIES IN THE CHURCH.

1. Most of the sects which disquieted the church in the preceding centuries, caused it various troubles also in this; for the energies of the Montanists, Valentinians, Marcionites, and other Gnostics, were not wholly subdued by the numerous discussions of their tenets. Adelphius and Aquilinus of the Gnostic tribe, but very little known, endeavoured to insinuate themselves and their doctrines into the esteem of the public at Rome and in Italy.² But these and others of the same class were resisted by Plotinus himself, the coryphaeus of the Platonists of this age, and by his disciples, with no less boldness and energy than the orthodox Christians were accustomed to manifest; for the philosophical opinions of this faction concerning God, the origin of the world, the nature of evil, and other subjects, could not possibly meet the approbation of the Platonists. These united forces of the Christians and the philosophers were doubtless competent to bring the Gnostics gradually to lose all credit and influence among the well-informed.³

2. While the Christians were struggling with these corrupters of the truth, and upon the point of gaining the victory [a little past the middle of this century], a new enemy, more fierce and dangerous than those, suddenly appeared in the field. Manes,⁴ whom his disciples called Manichæus,⁵ a Persian,⁶ educated among the Magi, and himself one of the Magi before he became a Christian, was instructed in all the sciences and arts which were in repute among the Persians and the adjacent nations, and was an astronomer (though a rude one), a physician, a painter, and a philosopher; but he had an exuberant imagination, and, as appears very probable, was delirious and fanatical. This man adventured to combine the principles of the Magi with Christianity, or rather to explain the latter by the former. To facilitate the accomplishment of this object, he gave out that Christ had left the way of salvation imperfectly explained, and that he himself was the Paraclete whom the Saviour promised to send to his disciples when he left the world. Many were seduced by his eloquence, his grave aspect, and the simplicity and innocence of his life, and in a short time he established a sect; but at last he was put to death by Varanes I. King of the Persians. The cause, time, and manner of his execution, are variously stated by the ancients.⁷

much to diminish the Gnostic party, as they carried investigation farther and more lucidly confuted the Jewish notions, and at the same time approximated a little towards the Gnostic doctrines concerning the Son of God. Hence it is we hear no more about the Gnostics in this century; and the few who still remained united themselves with the Manichæans.—Schl.

⁴ The oriental writers call him Mani; (Hyde, De Relig. Vet. Persarum, cap. 21; and D'Herbelot, Biblioth. Orientale, art. Mani); but the Greeks and Latins call him Μάνης, Μάνεις, and Manes. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. p. 691.—Schl.

⁵ See the Acta Archelai, cap. v. 49; Augustine, De Heresib. cap. xvi.; and Contra Faustum, lib. xix. cap. xxii.—Schl. [See the Acta Disputationis Archelai Episc. et Monetis Heresiar. in Routh's Reliquiæ Sacre, vol. iv. p. 111, Oxfr. 1818.—R.

⁶ Notwithstanding the Greek and oriental writers represent Manes as being a Persian, Walch (Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. p. 709), and Beausobre (Hist. Crit. de Manichéisme, tome i. p. 266), think it more probable that he was a Chaldean; because Ephrem Syrus expressly so states, Opp. Syro-Latin. tom. ii. p. 468; and because Archelaus, in his Acta, ubi supra, cap. xxxv. charges Manes with understanding no language but that of the Chaldees.—Schl.

⁷ All that is extant concerning the life, actions, and doctrines of this very singular genius, has been very carefully collected and reviewed ingeniously, though often with more ingenuity and copiousness, than were necessary by Beausobre, in his Hist. Crit. de Manichéisme et du Manichéisme, Amsterdam, 1734—39, 2 vols. 4to. [Whoever would gain the best acquaintance with the history of Manes and the Manichæans, may consult, besides Beausobre, ubi supra, the long essay of Mosheim, in his Comment. de Rebus, &c. pages 728—908; Wolf, Manichæismus ante Manichæos, &c. Hamb. 1707, 8vo; Lardner's Cred. of the Gor. Hist. part ii. vol. iii. pages 364—753; and Walch's Hist. der Ketzer, vol. i. pages 685—814. These principal writers being consulted, all the rest may be neglected. The last of these works has the great advantage that it concentrates

¹ The Christians at first used the sign of the cross, to bring to remembrance the atoning death of Christ, on all occasions. Hence Tertullian, De Corona Militis, cap. iii. p. 121, says:—Ad omnem progressum atque promotum, ad omnem aditum et exitum, ad vestitum, ad calcitum, ad lavacra, ad mensas, ad lumina, ad cubilia, ad sedilia, quæcumque nos conversatio exercet, frontem crucis signaculo terimus. Compare also his work, Ad Uxorem, lib. ii. So late as the second century the Christians attached no particular virtue to the sign of the cross, and they paid it no adoration. See Tertullian, Apologet. cap. xvi.; and Ad Nationes, cap. xii.; but afterwards powerful efficacy began to be ascribed to it. See Cyprian, Testimonia vdo. Judeos, lib. ii. cap. xxi. xxii. p. 294; and Lactantius, Institut. lib. iv. cap. xxvii. xxviii.—Schl.

² Porphyry, Vita Plotini, cap. xvi. p. 118, &c.

³ The book of Plotinus against the Gnostics is still extant among his works. Ennead ii. lib. ix. p. 213, &c. [Semler, in his Historiæ Eccles. Selecta Capitula, vol. i. p. 81, conjectures, and not without reason, that the Gnostics and all the assailants of the Old Testament, lost their power after Origen introduced the allegorical and tropological mode of expounding Scripture, and extended it in some measure to the history of Christ. And as he further supposes, the labours of Dionysius Alex. and other learned fathers, e.g. Dorotheus, a presbyter of Antioch (who understood the Hebrew; Eusebius, H.E. vii. 32), may have contributed

3. The religious system of Manes is a compound of Christianity and the ancient philosophy of the Persians, which he had imbibed in early life. What the Persians relate concerning their Mithras. Manes applied to Christ. According to his views and those of the Persians, there are two first principles of all things, a subtle and very pure substance or light, and a gross and corrupt substance or darkness. Over each of these a Lord has reigned from all eternity. The Lord of light is denominated God; the regent of the world of darkness is called Hyle (ύλη, matter), or dæmon (the devil). These two Lords are of opposite natures and dispositions. The Lord of light, as he is himself happy, so he is beneficent; the Lord of darkness, being himself miserable, is malignant, and wishes others also to be miserable. Each has produced a numerous progeny of his own peculiar character, and distributed them over his empire.

4. For a very long period of time the prince of darkness was ignorant of the existence of light, and of the world of light; but on occasion of a war which arose in his kingdom, he gained some knowledge of the light; and on discovering it, he was eager to possess it. The Lord of light opposed him with an army; but the general of the celestial army, whose name was The First Man, was rather unsuccessful; and the troops of darkness succeeded in getting possession of a considerable portion of the celestial elements, and of light itself, which is an animate substance, and these they mixed with depraved matter. The next general on the side of the world of light, called The Living Spirit, conducted the war more successfully; yet he was unable to liberate the celestial substance now in combination with the vicious elements. The vanquished prince of darkness produced the parents of the human race. The men who are born of this stock consist of a body formed from the depraved matter of the world of darkness, and of two souls, the one sensitive and concupiscent which they derived from the prince of darkness, the other rational and immortal, being a particle of that divine light which was plundered by the army of darkness and immersed in matter.

5. Men being thus formed by the prince of darkness, and minds which were the daughters of eternal light being inclosed in their bodies, God now, by the living Spirit who had before vanquished the prince of darkness, formed this our earth out of vicious matter, that it might become the residence of the human race, and afford God advantages for gradually delivering souls from their bodies, and separating the good matter from the bad. Afterwards God produced from himself two majestic beings, who should afford succour to the souls immured in bodies, namely, Christ and the Holy Spirit. Christ is the being whom the Persians call Mithras. He is a most splendid substance, consisting of the purest light of God, self-existent, animate, excelling in wisdom, and having his residence in the sun. The Holy Spirit likewise is an animate and lucid substance, which is diffused through the whole atmosphere that encompasses our earth, warms and enlightens the souls of arranges properly, criticises acutely and solidly, and expresses in a lucid and agreeable style all that has been said on the subject by the useful Wolf, the agreeable and learned but prolix Beausobre, the acute Mohehn, and the solid and critical Lardner. — Von Ein. [In regard to the History of Manes, there is much disagreement between the oriental and the Grecian writers. Yet in the particulars stated in the text there is no disagreement. We will extract from Mosheim's Comm. de Reb. Christ. p. 734, &c. so much as is necessary to give a history of this extraordinary man. Manes, on meeting with the books of the Christians, found that the religion they contained coincided with his philosophy in some respects, and contradicted it in others. He determined to unite the two together, to enlarge and improve the one by the other, and thus to give the world a new religion. He began by giving out that he was the Paraclete (ἡ Παράκλητος, John xvi. 7, 13, &c.) and perhaps he really supposed he was so. He rejected or altered such books of the Christians as contravened his opinions, and substituted others in their place, particularly those which he pretended were written by himself under a divine impulse. The King of Persia threw him into prison, but for what cause is unknown. The Greek writers (especially Archelaus, in his Acta Disputationis, &c. who furnished the other Greek and Latin writers with nearly all the historical facts they state), represent that he was imprisoned, because having promised to cure the king's son, he failed and caused the death of the young prince. A different account is given by the oriental writers, Persian, Syrian, and Arabian, cited by D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orient. art. Mani; Hyle, Historia Relig. Veter. Persarum, cap. xxi.; Renaudot, Historia Patriarch. Alexandrinor. p. 42; Pocock, Spermin Hist. Arabum, p. 119, &c. They state that Manes, coming to the court of King Sapor, was received kindly; and that his doctrines were embraced by the monarch. Hereupon Manes became so bold as publicly to attack the Persian religion. This drew on him persecution, and so endangered his life that he was obliged to flee into Turkistan. Here he collected many followers, and spent a whole year in a cave, where he composed his book entitled Erteng, or Arzeug, i.e. the Gospel, and which is adorned with splendid paintings. This book he represented to be a gift of God. In the mean time Sapor died, and was succeeded by his son Hormisdas, who was so favourable to Manes as to embrace his religion. After the death of Hormisdas, Varanes I. succeeded to the throne. He was at first well disposed towards Manes, but soon turned against him and determined on his destruction. For this purpose he allured him from his safe retreat, under pretence of a disputation with the Magi, and caused him to be put to death as a perverter of the true religion. This took place in the year 278; or, according to Walch, (Hist. der Ketz. vol. i. p. 724) in the year 277. The shocking fate of Manes rather animated than terrified his followers. The most able and eloquent of them roamed through Syria, Persia, Egypt, Africa, and over most parts of the world; and by the severity of their morals and the simplicity of their religion, they everywhere made proselytes. And notwithstanding all the persecutions which have befallen them, their descendants exist to this day, in the mountains between Persia and India. — Schl. (More recent writers may be consulted, viz. Neander Kirchenges. vol. i. part ii. pages 613–56, and Von Reckhlinr. Meiberg, Die Theologie des Manes u. ihr Ursprung. 1825, 8vo., — Mur.

men, fecundates the earth, elicits gradually from it the latent particles of divine fire, and wafts them upward that they may return to their native world.

6. After God had for a long time admonished the captive souls immured in bodies, by angels and by men instructed by himself, he, at length, in order to accelerate their return to the heavenly country, directed Christ, his son, to descend from the sun to this our world. He being clad in the form and shadow of a human body, but not joined to a real body, appeared among the Jews, pointed out the way in which souls may extricate themselves from the body, and proved his divinity¹ by his miracles. But the prince of darkness instigated the Jews to crucify him. This punishment, however, he did not actually endure, because he had not a body; but the people supposed he was crucified. Having accomplished his embassy, Christ returned to the sun, his former residence, and charged his apostles to propagate the religion he had taught them throughout the world. Moreover, when about to depart he promised to send at some time a greater and more perfect apostle, whom he called the Paraclete, who should add many things to the precepts he had delivered, and dispel all errors in regard to religious subjects. This Paraclete promised by Christ was Manes the Persian, who by command of God explained the whole doctrine of salvation perfectly, and without any ambiguity or concealment.

7. The souls which believe Jesus Christ to be the Son of God cease from worshipping the God of the Jews (who is no other than the prince of darkness), obey the laws which were given by Christ and enlarged and explained by Manes, the Paraclete, and perseveringly resist the lusts of the evil soul, these shall progressively become purified from the contaminations of base matter. Yet the entire purgation of the soul cannot be effected in the present life. Therefore souls when freed from the body must undergo a twofold purification after death, before they are admitted into the world of light; the first purification is by sacred water, and the second by sacred fire. They first go to the moon, which consists of sacred water, and are there purified during fifteen days; thence they proceed to the sun, the holy fire of which removes entirely all their remaining pollution. The bodies which they left behind, being formed of base matter, revert back to their original mass.

8. But the souls which have neglected the means for their purgation will, after death, pass into other bodies, either of animals or of other beings, until they become cleansed. Some also, being peculiarly depraved, will be delivered over to the evil demons inhabiting our atmosphere, to be tormented for a season. When the greater part of the souls shall be liberated and restored to the world of light, then, at the command of God, infernal fire will burst from the caverns in which it is contained, and will burn up and destroy the fabric of this world. After these events, the prince and powers of darkness will be compelled to retire to their wretched country, where they must remain for ever. For, to prevent their renewing war against the world of light, God will encompass the world of darkness with an invincible guard. That is to say, the souls whose salvation has become desperate will keep watch like soldiers about the world of darkness, so that its miserable inhabitants can no more go out.

9. To give these monstrous opinions some plausibility, Manes rejected nearly all the sacred books in which the Christians believed their religion was contained. The Old Testament especially he pronounced to be the work, not of God but of the prince of darkness, whom he represented the Jews as worshipping in place of the true God. The four histories of Christ which we call Gospels, he either denied to have been composed by the apostles, or he maintained that if they were so, they had been corrupted, interpolated, and stuffed with Jewish fables by crafty and deceitful men. In place of them he substituted another gospel which he denominated Erteng, and which he affirmed had been dictated to him by God himself. The Acts of the Apostles he wholly rejected. The Epistles which are ascribed to St. Paul he admitted to have been written by him, but maintained that they were adulterated. What he thought of the other books of the New Testament we are not informed.

10. The rules of life which Manes prescribed for his followers were peculiarly rigorous and severe. He directed them to mortify and macerate the body, which he regarded as the very essence of evil and the work of the prince of darkness, to deprive it of every convenience and gratification, to extirpate every sensual appetite, and to divest themselves of all the propensities and instincts of nature. But as he foresaw that he could expect few to embrace his system, if he imposed upon all without discrimination such severe rules of life, he divided his followers into two classes, the elect and the hearers; that is, the perfect Christians and the imperfect. The former, or the elect, were to abstain from flesh, eggs, milk, fish, wine, and every inebriating drink, from marriage and from every indulgence of sexual passions, to live in the most abject poverty, to sustain their emaciated bodies with bread, herbs, pulse, and melons, to abstain from all active life, and to be devoid both of love and hatred. A milder rule was prescribed for the hearers. They might possess houses, lands, and goods, eat flesh though sparingly, and marry wives: yet even these indulgences had their limitations. The whole body of Manichæans were subjected to one president, who represented Jesus Christ; with him were connected twelve masters or rulers, who represented the twelve apostles; next to these there were seventy-two bishops, corresponding with the seventy-two disciples of Christ; and under each bishop there were presbyters and deacons. All these officers were from the class of the elect.¹

¹ Not his Divinity; for this, in the true and proper sense of the word, the Manichæans could not predicate of Christ nor of the Holy Ghost. They held neither of them to be more ancient than the world. See Fortunatus in his dispute with Augustine, i. p. 69. They believed that the light of the Son might be obscured by intervening matter, but that the light of the Father could not. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 775, &c.—Schl.

11. The sect of the Hieracites was formed in Egypt near the close of this century, by Hierax of Leontopolis, who was a book-copier by trade, a man of learning and venerable for the visible sanctity of his deportment. Many have supposed that this sect was a branch of the Manichæan family, but erroneously; for although Hierax held some notions in common with Manes, yet he differed from him in many respects. He believed it was the great business of Christ to promulgate a new law, more perfect and more strict than that of Moses. Hence he concluded that Christ had prohibited to his followers, marriage, flesh, wine, and whatever was grateful to the senses or the body; which things had been allowed by Moses, but were abrogated by Christ. Yet if we duly consider all accounts, we shall conclude that Hierax, as well as Manes, did not suppose these severe injunctions were imposed by Christ on all his followers, but only on those who aspired after the highest attainments in virtue. To this radical error he added others, either growing out of it or originating from other sources: for example, he excluded infants, who died before they came to the use of reason, from the kingdom of heaven; because divine rewards could be due to none but such as had actually passed through regular conflicts with the body and its lusts. He also maintained that Melchisedec, the king of Salem who blessed Abraham, was the Holy Spirit. The resurrection of the body he denied, and the whole sacred volume, especially its historical parts, he obscured with allegorical interpretations.²

12. The controversies respecting the Trinity which commenced in the preceding century, from the time when Grecian philosophy got into the church, had a wider spread in this century and produced various methods of explaining that doctrine. First [in the early part of the century] Noëtus, a man of whom little is known, a native of Smyrna, maintained that God himself whom he denominated the Father, and held to be absolutely one and indivisible, united himself with the man Christ, whom he called the Son, and in him was born and suffered. From this dogma of Noëtus his adherents were called Patripassians; i.e. persons who held that the great Parent of the universe himself, and not merely some one person of the Godhead, had made expiation for the sins of men. Nor were they unfitly denominated so, if the ancients correctly understood their views.³

1 All these particulars are more fully stated and supported by citations from antiquity, in my Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. [pages 728—903; with which the reader should compare Walch's Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. pages 685—814. From both we extract the following notices respecting the worship of this sect. They revered the sun and the moon, though they did not account them deities. Their worship was so simple, that they claimed to be farther removed from paganism than all other Christians. They had no temples, no altars, no images, no oblations, and no burning of incense. They observed Sundays which they kept as fasts. But they observed none of the Christian festivals which relate to the incarnation and baptism of Christ. They celebrated the memorial of Christ's death but with little of devotion. Whether they observed Easter is uncertain, but they observed the anniversary of Manes' death, which they called Bama (βήμα), with great devotion. Fasting was one of their most important religious exercises. They kept sacred Sundays and Mondays. They made use of baptism, but did not baptize either children or grown persons who were only hearers; and even to the elect, it was left optional whether they would be baptized or not. The elect observed likewise the Lord's Supper, though it is not known what they used in place of wine, which was with them altogether prohibited.—Schl. [The student may also consult, on Manes or Mani and his system, Matter, Hist. du Gnost. vol. iii. p. 70, &c.; Gieseler, Lehrbuch. sec. 61, Davidson's Transl. vol. i. p. 223; Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 322, &c. where he will find much authentic information from the best sources; and Rose's translation of Neander's Kirchenges. vol. ii. p. 140, &c.—R.

2 Epiphanius, Hæres. lxvii [and Augustine, Hæresib. cap. xlvii.] from whom nearly all others have borrowed, with little exception, all they state. [See Moshæim, De Reb. Christ. &c. pages 903—910; Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. pages 815—823; Tillemont, Mém. pour servir à l'Hist. Eccles. tome iv. p. 411, and Lardner's Credib. of the Gos. Hist. part ii. vol. vi. p. 76, &c.—Schl.

3 See Hippolytus, Sermo contra Hæresin Noëti, in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 5, ed. Fabricii; Epiphanius, Hæres. lviii. Opp. tom. i. p. 479; Theodoret, Hæret. Fabul. lib. iii. cap. iii.; Opp. tom. iv. p. 227. [Noëtus so held the unity of God as to discard the orthodox opinion of a plurality of persons in the Godhead. In fact he acknowledged but one person, who is designated in the Scriptures by the title of the Father. Noëtus therefore was

13. After the middle of the century appeared Sabellius, an African presbyter or bishop, at Ptolemais, the principal city in Pentapolis, a province of Libya Cyrenaica. He explained what the scriptures teach concerning the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in a manner somewhat different from Noëtus, and gathered a number of followers, although he was confuted by Dionysius of Alexandria. Noëtus had supposed that God the Father, personally, assumed the human nature of Christ; but Sabellius held that only a certain energy put forth by the supreme Parent, or a certain portion of the divine nature being separated from it, became united with the Son or the man Christ. And the Holy Spirit he considered as being a similar portion or part of the eternal Father.¹ Hence it appears that the Sabellians must have been denominated by the ancients Patripassians, in a different sense of the word from that in which the Noëtians were so called. Yet the appellation was not wholly improper.

14. Nearly at the same time [about A.D. 244], Beryllus, bishop of Bostra in Arabia, a pious and learned man, taught that Christ before his birth of the Virgin had no distinct divinity, but only that of the Father. This proposition, if we duly consider what is reported concerning him by the ancients, contained the following sentiment: that Christ had no existence before he was born of Mary; that at his birth, a soul, originating from God himself, and therefore superior to the souls of all men, being a particle of the divine nature, entered into and was united with the man. Beryllus was so lucidly and energetically confuted by Origen in a council assembled at Bostra [A.D. 244], that he gave up the cause, and returned into the bosom of the church.²

15. Very different from him, both in a Unitarian, as respects the doctrine of three persons; but in regard to the character of Christ, he held better views than the Socinians. So far as relates to two natures united in one person in Christ, he agreed with the orthodox; but the divine person which was united with the human nature, according to Noëtus' views, was no other than the person of the Father, because there was no other person in the Godhead. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. pages 681—687; and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 1—13.—Schl.

1 Most of the ancients who wrote against the heretics, speak of Sabellius [especially Epiphanius, Hæres. lixii. and Theodoret, Hæret. Fabul. lib. ii. cap. ix.] To these add Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. vi.; Athanasius, De Sententiâ Dionysii [and Basil the Great, Ep. 210 and 235.] Nearly all that is written by the ancients has been collected by Wormius in his Historia Sabelliana, Franc. and Lips. 1696, 8vo, a learned work, only a small part of which relates to Sabellius. [See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. pages 688—699; Beausobre, Histoire de Manichéisme, &c. tome i. p. 533, &c.; Lardner, Credibility of the Gos. Hist. part ii. vol. iv. p. 558, &c. and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 14—49. The last of these differs somewhat from Mosheim in his description of the Sabellian doctrine. He states it thus:—the ancients one and all say that the Sabellian system marred the true doctrine concerning God, and concerning all the three persons. It was one of two directly opposite errors of which Arianism was the other; and the true doctrine occupied the middle ground between them. Indeed Arius, by pushing his opposition to Sabellius too far, was led into his error. It hence follows that Sabellius, who did not deny the existence of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, made too little distinction between them, while Arius made the distinction too wide. It is clear that Sabellius acknowledged but one person, and considered the Son of God as not being a distinct person; so that he could not have taught a personal distinction in the Trinity. By the Word (Λόγος) Sabellius understood an energy, by which the man Christ performed his works. So long as Christ remained on earth, this divine energy was in him, but afterwards it ceased. It was therefore like a sunbeam, which operates on bodies and produces the effects of the sun, without being itself a person. So also is it with the Holy Ghost, by which we are to understand the operations of God in men, tending to further their knowledge of the truth and their advancement in virtue. The manner of God's putting forth his energy, by which the Son was produced, and by which the Holy Ghost is still produced and continued, the ancients expressed by the words, to spread out or extend (ἐκταίνεσθαι, protendere, extendere), to send forth (ἐμπεμπέσθαι), and to transform, or change one's form and appearance (μεταμορφοῦσθαι, μετασχηματίζεσθαι). From what has now been stated, it may be perceived how Sabellius could have taught the existence of three forms or aspects (ῥεῖα πρὸς ὁμοῖα) in the divine essence, without admitting the reality of three different persons; and how his opposers could infer that he admitted but one distinction under three different names. The greatest difficulty is in this, that according to some representations, Sabellius taught there was a difference or separation (διαφορά) between the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but according to other accounts, he maintained such a unity as was inconsistent with it. This difficulty is the most easily surmounted, by supposing the former to refer to an imagined or conceived distinction, and not any real one. Such are Walch's views of the Sabellian system [and very similar are those of Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. pages 1018—1025.] Walch thinks that Sabellius ought not to be called a Patripassian, for these held Christ to be one person, in whom two natures were personally united; and believed that, not the divine nature of the Son, as a person, but the divine nature of the Father, who was the only person, was united with the human nature in Christ. Now as Sabellius held the Son to be no real part of the Father, and still less held to a personal union of two natures in Christ, he cannot truly be called a Patripassian. According to Sabellius' opinion, Christ was a mere man, in whom resided a divine power that produced those effects which we regard as the acts of the divine nature united to the human. Among the opposers of Sabellius, Dionysius of Alexandria attracted the most notice. Yet the opposition made by this bishop was not satisfactory to all. Offensive passages were found in his epistles against the Sabellians. As he there brought forward the doctrine of Christ's incarnation, and from that deduced his proof of the real distinction between the Father and the Son, he was understood as holding that the Son, in so far as he was a divine being, was a created one, or as denying that the Father and the Son were of the same essence. Dionysius defended himself, and showed that he had been misunderstood. Notwithstanding this the Arians after his death claimed him as on their side, which obliged Athanasius to vindicate the reputation of Dionysius against them. Still there continued to be some to whom this defence appeared insufficient—Basil the Great is an example. There can be no doubt that Dionysius thought with Athanasius in regard to the Trinity, but he used the language of Arius. In regard to the person of Christ, he expressed himself in the manner of Nestorius, for he carried the distinction between the divine and the human natures of Christ so far as wholly to exclude the former from a participation in those changes in the latter which were the result of the personal union of the two natures. See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 50—63.—Schl.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xx. and xxxiii.

morals and in sentiment, was Paul of Samosata, a bishop of Antioch [in Syria], and at the same time clothed with the civil office of a duценarius.¹ He was an ostentatious man, opulent and arrogant;² and greatly disquieted the eastern church soon after the middle of this century, by his novel explanations of the doctrine concerning the divine nature and concerning Christ. The sect which embraced his opinions were called Paulians or Paulianists. So far as can be judged from the accounts which have reached us, he supposed the Son and the Holy Spirit to exist in God, just as reason and the active power do in man; that Christ was born a mere man; but that the wisdom or reason (λόγος) of the Father descended into him and enabled him to teach and work miracles; that on account of this union of the divine Word (Λόγος) with the man Christ, we might say Christ was God, though not in the proper sense of the word. He so concealed his real sentiments under ambiguous forms of speech, that repeated ecclesiastical councils were wholly unable to convict him; but at last in the council assembled A.D. 269, Malchion, a rhetorician, drew him from his concealment, and he was convicted and divested of his episcopal office.³

16. In a very different way some obscure philosophers in Arabia, the disciples of a man unknown, marred a part of the Christian system. They denied the soul to be immortal, maintaining that it died with the body, and that it would be resuscitated with it by the power of God.⁴ The believers in this doctrine were called Arabians, from the country in which they lived. Origen being sent for from Egypt, disputed against them with such success in a full council, that they renounced their error.

17. Among the sects which arose in this century, that of the Novatians is placed last. They did not indeed corrupt the doctrines of Christianity, but by the severity of the discipline to which they adhered,

Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. ix.; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. vii. Among the moderns, see Le Clerc, Art. Critica, tom. i. par. ii. sec. i. cap. xiv.; Chauffepié, Nouveau Dictionnaire Hist. Crit. tome i. p. 268, &c. [See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 699, &c. and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 126–136. Walch does not place Beryllus among the heretics, because he is not chargeable with obstinacy in his errors, nor with establishing a sect or party; both of which are necessary to constitute a heretic. Mosheim's assertion that Beryllus represented Christ as possessing a soul derived from the divine essence, is a mere conjecture that cannot be supported by proof.—Sh. [Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. p. 1014, &c. places Beryllus among that class of Patripassians who considered the personality of the Son of God as originating from a radiation or emanation from the essence of God into a human body. He therefore places Beryllus and Sabellius in the same class.—Mur.]

¹ The duценarii were a species of procurators for the emperors in the provinces, whose salary was two hundred sesteria [ducenta sesteria, equal to above £1600 Ster.] from which sum these officers derived their title. See Dion Cassius, lib. liii.; Suetonius, Claudian, cap. xxiv. and Salustius, Notes on Capitolinus, Pertinax, p. 125. From Saller's Antiquities of Palmyra, Lond. 1694, 8vo, p. 166, &c. it appears that this office was much used in the province of Syria, and Mosheim conjectures (Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 705) that Paul obtained it by means of Zenobia, who had a high esteem for him.—Sch.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxx. [Eusebius here gives copious extracts from the circular letter of the council, which condemned Paul and ordained Dominus his successor. The council characterize Paul as having risen from poverty to opulence, by extortion and bribery; as proud, and insolent, and ostentatious; as choosing to be addressed by his civil title, and appearing in public attended by guards and all the splendour of worldly rank; as abusing authority as an officer in the church; as intolerably vain, and coveting the adulation of the multitude; as decrying the fathers of the church, exalting himself, and abolishing the hymns in common use, and appointing women to sing psalms in praise of himself; as sending out bishops and presbyters to sound his praise, and to extol him as an angel from heaven; as keeping several young and handsome women near his person, whom he enriched with presents, and as living in luxury with them. How much of colouring there may be in this picture we have not the means of determining. But there can be little doubt the character of Paul was such as did not become a bishop.—Mur.]

³ See Epistola Concilii Antiocheni ad Paulum, in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. xi. p. 302, ed. Paris, 1644, fol. and Dionysius Alexandrinus, Ep. ad Paulum, ibid. p. 273, and Decem Pauli Samosatani Questiones, ibid. p. 278. See also Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. pages 701–718, and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. pages 64–125. From the last writer we extract the following to give a more full and correct view of the Samosatene doctrines:—1. Paul of Samosata taught that there is but one God, who in the Scriptures is denominated the Father. 2. He did not deny that the Scriptures speak of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. 3. What he understood by the Holy Ghost we do not know; and Mosheim has attempted to supply this defect by a mere conjecture. 4. Concerning the Word and the Wisdom of God, he is as spoken largely; but whether he distinguished between the Word in God (Λόγος ἐνθεός) and the Word produced from God (Λόγος προφορετός), is doubtful. 5. This Word or Wisdom in God is not a substance or a person. 6. But it is in the divine mind, as reason is in men. 7. Christ was a mere man. 8. He first began to exist when he was born of Mary. 9. Yet in this man dwelt the divine Word or Wisdom, and it was operative in him. 10. The union commenced when Christ was conceived in the womb of Mary. 11. By means of this Wisdom of God in him, Christ gradually acquired his knowledge and his practical virtues. By it he became at once God and the Son of God, yet both in an improper sense of the terms. From this account it appears that Plotinus in the next age came very near to Paul of Samosata, not indeed in his statements and expressions, but rather in his grand error, that Christ was a mere man, and superior to other men only on account of his pre-eminent gifts.—Sch. [See Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. part iii. page 1007–14.—Mur.]

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxxvii. [See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 718, and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. pages 167–171. As Eusebius, who is the only witness we have in regard to this sect, gives a very brief account of them, the learned in modern times have entertained two opinions concerning their system. Some suppose they held that the soul, though immaterial, sleeps while the body is in the grave; which however the words of Eusebius seem to contradict, for they describe the soul as dying, and being dissolved, with the body, συναποθνήσκειν τοῖς σωματι καὶ συνδιαβιβέσθαι. Others suppose, more correctly, that they were Christian materialists, who regarded the soul as being a part of the body. And Mosheim conjectures that their error originated from their combining the Epicurean philosophy with Christianity.—Sch.]

they produced a lamentable schism. Novatian,¹ a presbyter in the church of Rome, a man of learning and eloquence, but of a stern and austere character,² maintained that such as had fallen into the more heinous sins, and especially such as had denied Christ during the Decian persecution, ought never to be admitted again to the church. Most of the other presbyters as well as Cornelius, whose influence was very great, were of a different opinion. Hence in the year 250, when a new bishop was to be chosen at Rome in place of Fabian, Novatian strenuously opposed the election of Cornelius. Cornelius however was chosen, and Novatian withdrew from communion with him. On the other hand Cornelius, in a council held at Rome A.D. 251, excommunicated Novatian and his adherents. Novatian, therefore, founded a new sect, in which he was the first bishop. This sect had many adherents who were pleased with the severity of its discipline; and it continued to flourish in many parts of Christendom until the fifth century. The principal coadjutor of Novatian in this schism was Novatus, a presbyter of Carthage, who fled to Rome during the heat of this controversy, in order to escape the wrath and the condemnation of Cyprian his bishop, with whom he had a violent quarrel.³

¹ The Greeks always write his name Novatus or Navatus; but the Latins generally write it Novatianus, perhaps to distinguish him from Novatus of Carthage, the names being really the same.—Mar. [Eusebius writes it Noovatos.—R.]

² These traits of character he perhaps owed to the Stoic philosophy, to which some have supposed him addicted. See Walch, ubi supra p. 125.—Schl.

³ The student will find an account of this sect, and

18. Respecting the fundamental articles of the Christian faith, there was no disagreement between the Novatians and other Christians. Their peculiarity was, that they would not receive into the church persons who, after being baptized, fell into the greater sins. They did not, however, exclude them from all hopes of eternal salvation. They considered the Christian church as a society of innocent persons, who from their entrance into it had defiled themselves with no sin of any considerable magnitude; and hence it followed that all associations of Christians which opened the door for the return of gross offenders were in their view unworthy of the name of true churches of Christ. And hence they assumed the appellation of Cathari, that is, the pure; and what was still more, they re-baptized such as came over to them from the Catholics; for, such influence had the error they embraced upon their own minds, that they believed the baptism of those churches which re-admitted the lapsed could not impart to the subjects of it remission of sins.⁴

of the disturbances excited both in Carthage and Rome, in Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. iii. chap. ix. and x.; and in Burton's Lect. on the Eccl. Hist. &c. vol. ii. p. 327, &c. But a more full and accurate detail is given by Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. pages 497 and 503, and Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. ii. p. 220, &c.—R.

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xlili; Cyprian, in various of his epistles, as Ep 49, 52, &c.; Albaspinæus, Observat. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xx. xxi.; Orsi, De Criminum Capital. inter Veteres Christ. Absolutione, p. 254, &c.; Kenckel, De Hæresi Novatiana, Strasburg, 1651, 4to [also Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. pages 512–537, and Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. ii. pages 185–288.—Schl. [And Neander, Kirchenges. vol. i. part I. pages 387–407.—Mar.]

BOOK II.

FROM CONSTANTINE THE GREAT

TO

CHARLEMAGNE.

CENTURY FOURTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS AND THE ADVERSE EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. THAT I might not separate too far those facts which are intimately connected with each other, I have determined to exhibit the prosperous and the adverse events, not in distinct chapters, as heretofore, but combined in one series, following as much as possible the order of time. In the beginning of this century the Roman empire had four sovereigns, of whom two were superior to the others, and bore the title of Augustus; namely, Diocletian and Maximianus Herculeus; the two inferior sovereigns, who bore the title of Cæsars, were Constantius Chlorus and Galerius Maximianus. Under these four [associated] emperors, the state of the church was tolerably prosperous.¹ Diocletian, though superstitious, indulged no hatred towards the Christians.² Constantius Chlorus, following only the dictates of reason in matters of religion, was averse from the popular idolatry, and friendly to the Christians.³ The pagan priests, therefore, from well-grounded fears lest Christianity, to their great and lasting injury, should spread far and wide its triumphs, endeavoured to excite Diocletian, whom they knew to be both timid and credulous, by means of feigned oracles and other impositions, to engage in persecuting the Christians.⁴

2. These artifices not succeeding very well, they made use of the other emperor, Galerius Maximianus, who was son-in-law to Diocletian in order to effect their purpose. This emperor, who was of a ferocious character and ill-informed in every thing except the military art, continued to work upon his father-in-law, being urged on partly by his own inclination, partly by the instigation of his mother, a most superstitious woman, and partly by that of the pagan priests, till at last, when Diocletian was at Nicomedia in the year 303, he obtained from him an edict, by which the temples of the Christians were to be demolished, their sacred books committed to the flames, and themselves deprived of all their civil rights and honours.⁵ This first edict spared the lives of the Christians; for Diocletian was averse from slaughter and blood-

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. i. [Eusebius here describes the prosperous state of the Christians, and their consequent security and vices. The imperial palaces were full of Christians, and no one hindered them from openly professing Christianity. From among them men were chosen to the offices of imperial councillors, provincial governors, magistrates, and generals. The bishops and other clergy were held in honour, even by those who adhered to the old religion of the state, and the number of Christians was seen to be increasing daily. Hence in all the cities spacious buildings were erected for public worship, in which the people assembled without fear; and they had nothing to wish for, unless it were that one or more of the emperors might embrace their religion.—Schl.]

² He had Christians in his court who understood how to lead him, and who would probably have brought him to renounce idolatry, had not the suggestions of their enemies prevailed with him. His wife Prisca was in reality a concealed Christian; and also his daughter Valeria, the wife of Galerius Maximianus. See Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xv.—Schl.

³ Some go still farther, and make him to have been actually a Christian. But from the representations of Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xiii. no more can be inferred than that he was disposed to look favourably upon the Christian religion.—Schl.

⁴ Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. ii. cap. i.; Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. iv. cap. xxvii. and De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. x. [According to Eusebius, ubi supra, it was reported to the emperor that the oracle of Apollo had declared he was prevented from giving true responses by the righteous men on the earth, and this the pagan priests interpreted, when questioned by the emperor, with reference to the Christians. According to Lactantius, ubi supra, while Diocletian was at Antioch in the year 302, the priests who inspected the entrails of the consecrated victims declared that they were interrupted in their prognostications by the sign of the cross made by several of the emperor's servants.—Schl.] shed. Yet it caused many Christians to be put to death, particularly those who refused to deliver up their sacred books to the magistrates.¹ Seeing this operation of the law, many Christians and several even of the bishops and clergy, in order to save their lives, voluntarily surrendered the books and sacred utensils in their possession. But they were regarded by their more resolute brethren as guilty of sacrilege, and were branded with the name of Traditors.²

⁵ Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xi.; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. ii. [This persecution should properly be named that of Galerius and not that of Diocletian. For Diocletian had much the least hand in it, and he resigned his authority before the persecution had continued quite two years; moreover, Galerius in his edict for putting an end to the persecution, a little before his death, acknowledges that he himself was the author of it. See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. cap. viii. p. 17, and Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxxiv. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. pages 916—922.—Schl. [And Milman, Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 272, &c.—R.]

3. Not long after the publication of this first edict, there were two conflagrations in the palace of Nicomedia; and the enemies of the Christians persuaded Diocletian to believe that Christian hands had kindled them. He therefore ordered many Christians of Nicomedia to be put to the torture, and to undergo the penalties due to incendiaries.³ Nearly at the same time, there were insurrections in Armenia and in Syria; and as their enemies charged the blame of these also upon the Christians, the emperor by a new edict ordered all bishops and ministers of Christ to be thrown into prison; and by a third edict soon after, he ordered that all these prisoners should be compelled by tortures and punishments to offer sacrifice to the gods;⁴ for he hoped, if the bishops and teachers were once brought to submission, the Christian churches would follow their example. A great multitude, therefore, of excellent men, in every part of the Roman empire, Gaul only excepted, which was subject to Constantius Chlorus,⁵ were either punished capitally or condemned to the mines.

4. In the second year of the persecution A.D. 304, Diocletian published a fourth edict, at the instigation of his son-in-law and the other enemies of the Christians. By this edict the magistrates were directed to compel all Christians to offer sacrifices to the gods, and to use tortures for that purpose.⁶ And as the governors yielded strict obedience to these orders, the Christian church was reduced to the last extremity.⁷ Galerius Maximianus therefore no longer hesitated to disclose the secret designs he had long entertained [A.D. 305]. He required his father-in-law [Diocletian], together with his colleague [Valerius] Maximianus Herculus, to divest themselves of their power, and constituted himself Emperor of the East, leaving the West to Constantius Chlorus, whose health he knew to be very infirm. He also associated with him in the government two assistants of his own choosing; namely, Maximinus his sister's son, and Severus, excluding altogether Constantine, afterwards styled the Great, the son of Constantius Chlorus.⁸ This revolution in the Roman government restored peace to Christians in the western provinces which were under Constantius;⁹ but in the eastern provinces, the persecution raged with greater severity than before.¹⁰

when the last edict of Galerius against the Christians was promulgated, he deprived of their offices all those of his servants who resolved to adhere to Christianity, and retained the others in his service.—Schl.

⁶ Eusebius, De Martyr. Palestinae, cap. lii. [Diocletian was not yet willing the Christians should be put to death outright; his orders to the governors were couched in general terms that they should compel the Christians, by all kinds of corporeal sufferings, to give honour to the heathen gods. See Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. ii. cap. li.; compare Lactantius, Instit. Divinar. lib. v. cap. xi.; Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ix. cap. ix. and lib. viii. cap. xli. Hence, according to the disposition of the several governors was their execution of the imperial edict. Some only sent the Christians into banishment, when the attempt to make them offer sacrifices failed. Others deprived them of an eye, or lamed one of their feet by burning it; and others exposed them to wild beasts, or lacerated their bodies with iron hooks or with the scourge, and afterwards sprinkled vinegar and salt on the wounds, or dropped melted lead into them. In Phrygia a whole city with all its inhabitants was burned to ashes, because not an individual in it would offer sacrifice. Lactantius, Instit. Divinar. lib. v. cap. xi. Some Christians also brought death upon themselves by holding religious meetings contrary to the emperor's prohibition, or by voluntarily presenting themselves before the governors and requesting to be martyred. Sulpitius Severus, Hist. Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xxxii.; and Eusebius, De Martyr. Palestinae, cap. lii.—Schl.

⁷ Lactantius, Instit. Divinar. lib. v. cap. xi.

⁸ Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xviii. xx. [Galerius Maximianus was in more fear of the young prince Constantine than of his father Constantius. Yet Galerius had this prince in his power; for he detained him at his court in Nicomedia, and if he found occasion might have put him out of his way by assassination or some other means. Indeed, he attempted this in the year 306. Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxiv. But Constantine saved himself by flight, and repaid to his father in Britain. This sagacity of the prince overset the whole plan of the emperor, and was the means of rescuing the Christian religion from its jeopardy. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. &c. p. 942, &c.—Schl.

⁹ Eusebius, De Martyr. Palestinae, cap. xlii.

¹⁰ Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxi. [Maxi-

¹ Augustine, Breviculus Collat. cum Donatistis, cap. xv. xvii. in his Opp. tom. ix. pag. 387, 390, and Baluze, Miscellan. tom. ii. pag. 77, 92.

² Optatus, Milevit. De Schismate Donatist. lib. i. sec. 13 p. 13, ed. Du Pin.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. vi.; Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xiv.; Constantine the Great, Oratio ad Sanctorem Ceterum, cap. xxv. [After the second conflagration Galerius left Nicomedia, pretending to be afraid of being burned by the Christians. Diocletian also compelled his wife and daughter to sacrifice to the gods in proof that they were not Christians, and caused many Christians of his household and court to be cut off; and Lonthinus the bishop of Nicomedia, with many of the clergy and common Christians, to undergo cruel deaths, because they refused to offer sacrifices to the gods.—Schl.

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. vi. and De Martyriis Palestinae.

⁵ Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xv. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xlii. xviii. [Constantius Chlorus presided over Spain and Britain, as well as Gaul. In Spain there were some martyrs; because Constantius not being present there in person, he could not prevent the rigorous execution of the decree of the senior emperor. But in Gaul, where he was personally present, he favoured the Christians as much as sound policy would permit. He suffered some of the churches to be demolished, and most of them to be shut up. And

5. But Divine Providence frustrated the whole plan of Galerius Maximianus; for Constantius Chlorus dying in Britain in the year 306, the soldiery by acclamation proclaimed his son Constantine Augustus or emperor, the same who by his achievements afterwards obtained the title of the Great; and the tyrant Galerius was obliged to submit and even to approve this adverse event. Soon after, a civil war broke out; for Maxentius [the son of the ex-emperor, Herclius, and] the son-in-law of Galerius Maximianus, being indignant that Galerius should prefer Severus before him and invest him with imperial power, himself assumed the purple, and took his father, Maximianus Herclius, for his colleague in the empire. In the midst of these commotions, Constantine beyond all expectation made his way to the imperial throne. The western Christians, those of Italy and Africa excepted, enjoyed a considerable degree of tranquillity and liberty during these civil wars.¹ But the oriental churches experienced various vicissitudes, adverse or tolerable, according to the political changes from year to year.² At length Galerius Maximianus, who had been the author of their heaviest calamities, being brought low by a terrific and protracted disease, and finding himself ready to die, in the year 311 issued a decree which restored peace to them, after they had endured almost unbounded sufferings.³

6. After the death of Galerius Maximianus [A.D. 311], Maximianus and Licinius [who was created Augustus by Galerius Maximianus after the death of Flavius Severus, A.D. 307], divided between themselves the provinces which had been governed by Galerius. At the same time Maxentius, who held Africa and Italy, determined to make war upon Constantine, who governed in Spain and Gaul, in order to bring all the west under his authority. Constantine anticipated his designs, marched his army into Italy in the year 312, and in a battle fought at the Milvian bridge near Rome, routed the army of Maxentius. In the flight the bridge broke down, and Maxentius fell into the Tiber and was drowned. After this victory, Constantine with his colleague Licinius immediately gave full liberty to the Christians of living according to their own institutions and laws; and this liberty was more clearly defined the following year A.D. 313, in a new edict drawn up at Milan.⁴ Maximin, indeed, who reigned in the East, was projecting new calamities for the Christians,⁵ and menacing the Emperors of the West with war; but being vanquished by Licinius, he put an end to his own life by swallowing poison at Tarsus in the year 313.

7. About this time Constantine the Great, who was previously a man of no religion, is said to have embraced Christianity, being induced thereto principally by the miracle of a cross appearing to him in the heavens. But this story is liable to much doubt; for his first edict in favour of the Christians, and many other things, sufficiently evince min, who governed Syria and Egypt, at first showed himself quite mild towards the Christians. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ix. cap. ix. But afterwards he seemed to wish to surpass all other enemies of the Christians in cruelty towards them. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. &c. p. 945, &c.—Schl.

¹ Constantine, as soon as he came into power, gave the Christians full liberty to profess and to practise their religion. Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxiv. and Institut. Divinar. lib. i. cap. 1. This he did, not from a sense of justice or from magnanimity, and still less from any attachment to the Christian religion, but from principles of worldly prudence. He wished to attach the Christians to his party, that they might protect him against the power and the machinations of Galerius Maximian. His brother-in-law, Maxentius, imitated his example, and with similar views; and therefore the Christians under him in Africa and Italy enjoyed entire religious liberty. See Optatus Milevitanus, De Schismate Donatist. lib. i. cap. xvi.; and Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xiv. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 952, &c.—Schl.

² The cause of these vicissitudes is to be sought in the political state of things. In this year Maximian assumed the title of Cæsar in Syria against the will of Galerius; and the latter appeared about to declare war against the former, who was therefore indulgent towards the Christians in order to secure their friendship. But as Galerius was appeased, Maximin became more severe against the Christians, to ingratiate himself more effectually with the emperor. After a while, however, he abated his severity; and towards the end of the year 309, and in the beginning of 310, the Christians enjoyed great freedom (Eusebius, De Martyr. Palestina, cap. xiii.); for Galerius was now in declining health, and in such circumstances Maximin wished not to alienate the Christians from himself. But when the governor of the province informed him, in the year 310, that the Christians abused their freedom, Maximin renewed the persecution. Soon after Galerius was seized with his last and fatal sickness, and Maximin being apprehensive that the imperial power could be secured only by a successful appeal to arms, policy required him again to desist from persecuting the Christians. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xvi. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 955, &c.—Schl.

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xvi. Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxxiii. [The decree is given us in Greek by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xvii. and in Latin, by Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxxiv.—Schl.

⁴ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. x. cap. v.; Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xlviii. [It is the second edict, or that of Milan, which is found in the passages here referred to. Eusebius gives it in Greek, Lactantius in Latin. The first edict is wholly lost; yet from the second we may learn what was obscure or indefinite in the first. The first edict gave religious freedom, not only to the Christians, but to all other sects; yet it forbade any person abandoning the religion in which he had been born and brought up. This prohibition operated disadvantageously to the Christian cause, and occasioned many who had recently embraced Christianity to return to their former religion in obedience to the imperial edict. This prohibition, therefore, with all other restraints, was removed in the second edict. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 959.—Schl.

⁵ See Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. x. cap. ii.; Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecutor. cap. xxxvi.; and Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. &c. p. 961, &c.—Schl.

that he was at that time well disposed towards the Christians and their worship, but by no means that he regarded Christianity as the only true and saving religion. On the contrary it appears that he regarded other religions, and among them the old Roman religion, as likewise true and useful to mankind; and he therefore wished all religions to be freely practised throughout the Roman empire.¹ But as he advanced in life Constantine made progress in religious knowledge, and gradually came to regard Christianity as the only true and saving religion, and to consider all others as false and impious. Having adopted this view he now began to exhort his subjects to embrace Christianity, and at length he proclaimed war against the ancient superstitions. At what time this change in the views of the emperor took place, when he began to look upon all religions but the Christian as false, cannot be determined. This however is certain, that the change in his views was first made manifest by his laws and edicts in the year 324, after the death of Licinius when he became sole emperor.² His purpose however of abolishing the ancient religion of the Romans, and of tolerating only the Christian religion, he did not disclose till a little before his death, when he published his edicts for pulling down the pagan temples and abolishing the sacrifices.³

¹ This is evident from Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. i. cap. xxvii. In the commencement of the war with Maxentius, he was still at a loss to what god he should trust himself and his affairs. He at length determined to honour that one God only whom his father had worshipped, and to show no reverence to the ancient Roman deities. The grounds on which he came to this decision were feeble; namely, the good fortune of his father who adhered to this worship, and the ill fortune and lamentable end of Diocletian, Galerius Maximian, and other emperors, who had worshipped the pagan deities. And according to Eusebius (De Vita Constant. lib. i. cap. xxviii.) he knew so little of the God of his father, that he prayed he might be able to know him. He was a deist of the lowest class, who considered the God of his father as a limited being, though more benevolent and powerful than any of the Greek and Roman deities. This is manifest from his regulations in favour of the Christians, and from his laws tolerating the pagan sacrifices. Codex Theodos. lib. ix. tit. xvi. leg. 1, 2; and lib. xvi. tit. x. leg. 1. Compare Zosimus, lib. ii. p. 10, ed. Oxford, 1679, 8vo. See Mosheim, Comment. de Rob. Christ. p. 971, &c.—Schl.

² Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. ii. cap. xx. and xiv. [In this year, 324, all those who, for their adherence to Christianity during the preceding persecution, had become exiles, or been sent to the mines, or been robbed of their property, were restored to their country, their liberty, and their possessions; and the Christian temples were ordered to be rebuilt and enlarged.—Schl.

³ See Gothofredus, Ad Codicem Theodos. tom. vi. part. 1. p. 290, &c. [The statement of Zosimus (lib. ii. p. 104) is not to be wholly rejected. He says that after the death of Licinius a certain Egyptian came to Rome from Spain, and convinced the emperor of the truth of the Christian religion. No reason can be assigned why Zosimus should have fabricated such a story. This Egyptian was probably Hosius, the Bishop of Corduba, who was a native Egyptian and was then at the court

8. That the emperor was sincere and not a dissembler in regard to his conversion to Christianity, no person can doubt who believes that men's actions are an index of their real feelings. It is indeed true that Constantine's life was not such as the precepts of Christianity required;⁴ and it is also true that he remained a catechumen all his life, and was received to full membership in the church by baptism at Nicomedia, only a few days before his death.⁴ But of Constantine, very probably soliciting the restoration of the church goods which had been confiscated. At least it is expressly stated that the money destined for Africa was paid in consequence of his efforts. This conjecture is favoured by Baumgarten, Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. ii. p. 691. The later Greeks ascribe the emperor's conversion to a courtier named Euphrates; of whom, however, the ancients make no mention. Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xvii.) ascribes it to the influence of Helena, his mother; but she was brought to embrace Christianity by her son, according to Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. iii. cap. xlvii. Zosimus relates further that Constantine asked the pagan priests to absolve him from the guilt of destroying Licinius, Fausta, and Crispus; and when they told him this was impossible, the Egyptian before mentioned undertook to show that the Christian religion offered the means of cleansing away his guilt; and this it was which induced the emperor to embrace Christianity. There is perhaps some degree of truth in this story; perhaps Constantine did in fact, after the death of Licinius, first learn either from this Egyptian or from some others, that the blood of Christ was expiatory for believers therein. It is at least certain that in the first years after his victory over Maxentius, he had very incorrect ideas of Christ and of the Christian religion, as is manifest from his Rescript to Anulinus in Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. x. cap. vii. See Mosheim, Comment. de Rob. Christ. p. 976, &c.—Schl. [On the conversion of Constantine, see Beugnot, Hist. de la Destruct. du Paganisme en Occident, Paris, 1835, tome i. p. 54, &c.; Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 308, &c.; Waddington's Hist. of the Church, vol. i. p. 172, 3; Welsh's Elements of Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 380, &c.; and the first excursus or dissertation appended to the excellent edition of Eusebius, De Vita Constant. by Heinichen, Lips. 1830, 8vo. See also a tract by Hesse, entitled De Constantini Mag. Christianismo Politico, Jena, 1713, 4to. It is much doubted whether Constantine issued an edict for abolishing the heathen sacrifices generally. He no doubt early forbade the celebration of such as were of an immoral tendency, and forbore himself to take a part in the state sacrifices; but no such edict as that referred to by Mosheim in the text is on record, and history shows that sacrifices continued to be offered up as formerly. See the whole subject of Constantine's conduct towards his heathen subjects, and the question of this alleged edict in particular, fully discussed by Rüdiger in his valuable tract, De Statu et Conditione Paganorum sub Imperatoribus Christ. post Constantinum, Bres. 1825; and by Milman, in his Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 460, &c.—R.

³ He put to death his own son Crispus and his wife Fausta on a groundless suspicion; and cut off his brother-in-law Licinius and his unoffending son, contrary to his pledged word; and was much addicted to pride and voluptuousness.—Schl.

⁴ Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. iv. cap. lxi. lxii. Those who in reliance on more recent and dubious authorities, maintain that Constantine received Christian baptism at Rome in the year 324, and from the hands of Sylvester then the bishop of Rome, do not at this day gain the assent of intelligent men, even in the Roman Catholic Church. See Noris, Historia Donatist. in his Opp. tom. iv. p. 650; Mamachus, Origines et Antiq. Christ. tom. ii. p. 232, &c. [Valerius in his Notes on Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. iv. cap. lxi. where Eusebius relates that Constantine first received imposition of hands previous to his baptism a little before his death, infers that the emperor then first be-

neither of these is adequate proof that the emperor had not a general conviction of the truth of the Christian religion, or that he only feigned himself a Christian; for in that age many persons deferred baptism till near the close of life, that they might pass into the other world altogether pure and undefiled with sin;¹ and it is but too notorious that many persons who look upon the Christian religion as indubitably true and divine, yet in their lives violate its holy precepts. It is another question whether worldly motives might not have contributed in some degree to induce Constantine to prefer the Christian religion to the ancient Roman, and to all other religions, and to recommend the observance of it to his subjects. Indeed, it is no improbable conjecture that the emperor had discernment to see that Christianity possessed great efficacy, and idolatry none at all, to strengthen public authority and to bind citizens to their duty.²

9. The sign of the cross which Constantine most solemnly affirmed he saw in the heavens near mid-day, is a subject involved in the greatest obscurities and difficulties. It is however an easy thing to refute those who regard this prodigy as a cunning fiction of the emperor, or who rank it among fables;³ and also those who refer the phenomenon to natural causes, ingeniously conjecturing that the form of a cross appeared in a solar halo, or in the moon;⁴ and likewise those who ascribe the transaction to the power of God, who intended by a miracle to confirm the wavering faith of the emperor.⁵ Now, these suppositions tian, and did not use the event for the advancement of Christianity, but for the animation of his troops. The other supposition has more probability; indeed, Lactantius once resorted to something like this, according to Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecut. cap. xlv. But Constantine solemnly averred the reality of this prodigy, and if he had been inclined to use artifice in order to enkindle courage in his soldiers, he would far more probably, as his army was made up chiefly of barbarians and such as were not Christians (see Zosimus, lib. ii. p. 86), have represented Mars or some other of the vulgar deities as appearing to him. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 978, &c.—Schl.

⁴ See Schmidt, Diss. de Luna in Cruce visa, Jena, 1681, 4to; and Fabricius, Diss. de Cruce a Constantino visa, in his Biblioth. Gr. vol. vi. cap. i. p. 8, &c. [This opinion also has its difficulties. Fabricius himself admits that on his hypothesis the appearance of visible words in the air cannot be explained. And he resorts to a new exposition of the language of Eusebius for relief; and believes that the words, "by this conquer," (τοῦτο νικά, ἡδε νικά), were not actually seen, but that the sense of them was emblematically depicted in a crown of victory which appeared in the heavens. But (1) if the emperor intended to say this, he expressed himself very obscurely. (2) It is certain that Constantine did not intend to be so understood, for he caused the very words mentioned to be affixed to the standards (Labara) of the legions, and to the medals and other monuments of the event; which he would not have done, had he not designed it should be understood that these words were actually seen in the heavens. (3) All the ancient writers so understood the account given by Eusebius. (4) Such a halo about the sun as that described by the emperor has never been seen by man. For he did not see the sign or form of a real cross, but the Greek letter X intersected perpendicularly by the letter P, thus  See [Euseb. De Vita Constant. lib. i. sec. xxxi.] See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. p. 985.—Schl. The general belief is that the emperor invented this monogram, and that it was only now seen or used for the first time. But an eminent Italian antiquarian, Buonarroti, in his Osservazioni sopra alcuni Frammenti di Vasi Antichi, Flor. 1716, 4to, has given good reasons for believing that this Eastern or Grecian monogram had been in frequent use among the Christians prior to the time of Constantine; and that he only borrowed it from them and adopted it as the imperial ensign. See also Arelinghi, Roma subterranea, vol. ii. p. 566.—R.

⁵ Eusebius alone (De Vita Constant. lib. i. cap. xxviii.—xxx.) among the writers of that age gives us any account of the vision of the cross; though Lactantius (De Mort. Persec. cap. xlv.) and others speak of the dream in which Constantine was directed to use the sign of the cross. But if Eusebius' account be true, how happens it that no writer of that age, except Eusebius, says one word about the luminous cross in the heavens?—How came it that Eusebius himself said nothing about it in his Eccles. Hist. which was written twelve years after the event, and about the same length of time before his Life of Constantine? Why does he rely solely on the testimony of the emperor, and not even intimate that he ever heard of it from others; whereas, if true, many thousands must have been eyewitnesses of the fact?—What mean his suggestions that some may question the truth of the story, and his caution not to state anything as a matter of public notoriety, but to confine himself simply to the emperor's private representation to himself?—Again, if God intended to enlighten Constantine's dark mind and show him the truth of Christianity, would he probably use for the purpose the enigma of a luminous cross, in preference to his inspired word or a direct and special revelation?—Was there no tendency to encourage a superstitious veneration for the sign of the cross in such a miracle?—And can it be believed that Jesus Christ came a catechumen, because he then first received imposition of hands. But that Constantine, long before this time declared himself a Christian, and was acknowledged as such by the churches, is certain. It is also true that he had, for a long time, performed the religious acts of an unbaptized Christian, that is, of a catechumen; for he attended public worship, fasted, prayed, observed the Christian sabbath, and the anniversaries of the martyrs, and watched on the vigils of Easter, &c. &c. See Mosheim, Comment. de Reb. Christ. p. 965, &c.—Mur.

¹ See Busching's Disput. de Procrastinatione Baptismi apud Veteres, ejusque Causis.—Schl.

² See Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. i. cap. xxvii.

³ Hornbeck, Comment. ad Bullam Urbani VIII. de Imaginum Cultu, p. 182, &c.; Oisellus, Thesaurus Numism. Antiq. p. 463; Tollius, Preface to his French translation of Lactantius, and in his Notes on Lactantius, De Mortib. Persecut. cap. xlv.; Thomasius, Observat. Hallens. tom. i. p. 380; and others. [There is difference of opinion as to the time when and the place where the emperor saw this cross. Some follow Eusebius (De Vita Constant. lib. i. cap. xxviii.) and believe that he saw it while in Gaul, and when making preparations for the war with Maxentius. Others rely on the testimony of Lactantius (De Mortib. Persecut. cap. xlv.) and believe that he saw the cross on the 26th day of October A. D. 312 [the day before the battle in which Maxentius was vanquished, near Rome]. So thought Baluze (see his Notes on this passage in Lactantius), whom Pagi, Fabricius, and others have followed. The point is a difficult one to decide, and the brothers Balzerin (Observ. ad Norisii Hist. Donatist. Opp. tom. iv. p. 662) would compromise it by supposing there were two appearances of the cross, both in dreams, the first in Gaul and the last in Italy; which is a miserable shift. Among those who regard the whole story as a fabrication, some suppose it was a pious fraud, and others that it was a trick of state. The first supposition is most improbable; for at the time the cross is said to have appeared to him, Constantine thought nothing about spreading the Christian religion, but only about vanquishing Maxentius. Besides, he was not then a Chris-being rejected, the only conclusion which remains is, that Constantine saw in a dream while asleep the appearance of a cross, with the inscription "By this conquer."¹ Nor is this opinion unsupported by competent authorities of good credit.²

10. The happiness anticipated by the Christians from the edicts of Constantine and Licinius was a little afterwards interrupted by Licinius, who waged war against his kinsman Constantine. Being vanquished in the year 314, he was quiet for about nine years. But in the year 324 this restless man again attacked Constantine, being urged on both by his own inclination and by the instigation of the pagan priests. That he might secure to himself a victory, he attacked the pagans to his cause, by severely oppressing the Christians and putting actually appeared to the emperor in a vision, directing him to make an artificial cross and to rely upon that as his defence in the day of battle?—But how came the whole story of the luminous cross to be unknown to the Christian world for more than twenty-five years, and then to transpire only through a private conversation between Eusebius and Constantine?—Is it not supposable that Eusebius may have misunderstood the account the emperor gave him of a singular halo about the sun which he saw, and of an affecting dream which he had the night after and which induced him to make the Labarum and use it as his standard?—Such are the arguments against this hypothesis.—Mur.

¹ Lactantius mentions only the dream : and the same is true of Sozomen, lib. i. cap. iii. ; and Rufinus, in his translation of the Eccles. Hist. of Eusebius ; and likewise of the author of the Chronicon Orientale, p. 57. Indeed the appeal of Eusebius to the solemn attestation of the emperor (De Vita Constanti, lib. i. cap. xxviii.), and the statement of Gelasius Cyzicenus (Acta Concilii Niceni, lib. i. cap. iv. in Harduin's Conciliorum, tom. i. p. 351) that the whole story was accounted fabulous by the pagans, confirm the supposition that it was a mere dream. For the appeal of Eusebius would have been unnecessary, and the denial of its reality by the pagans would have been impossible. If the whole army of Constantine had been eye-witnesses of the event.—Schl. [On the whole of this much litigated question of the miracle of the luminous cross, see in favour of its reality Newman's Essay on the Eccles. Miracles prefixed to his translation of Fleury, Oxf. 1842, p. 133, &c. and against the miraculous part, Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. i. p. 351, and Welsh's Elements of Ch. Hist. vol. i. p. 387.—R.

² The writers who treat of Constantine the Great are carefully enumerated by Fabricius, Lux Salutaris Evangelii Toti Orbis Exortens, cap. xli. p. 260, &c. [The latest and by far the best (says Heeren, Antient Hist. p. 475, ed. Bancroft, 1828) is, Leben Constantin des Grossen, by Manso, Bresl. 1817.] Fabricius moreover (ibid. cap. xlii. p. 273, &c.) describes the laws of Constantine relating to religious matters under four heads. The same laws are treated of by Gothofredus, Adnot. ad Codicem Theodosianum; and in a particular treatise by Fr. Baldwin, in his Constantinus Magnus seu de Legibus Constantinianis Ecclesiasticis et Civilibus, lib. ii. ed. 2d, by Gundling, Halle, 1727, 8vo. [The student will find a full discussion of the extent of Constantine's laws in favour of Christianity in Kist, De Commutatione quem Constantino Magno auctore, societas subit Christiana, Utrecht, 1818. See these several laws enumerated by Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. sect. 56, and those against paganism, in sec. 75, Davidson's Transl. vol. i. pages 201, 2, and pages 305, 6. See also on Constantine's establishment of Christianity, its extent and results, the valuable observations of Milman, Hist. of Christ. vol. ii. p. 356; and especially pages 464—76; the 20th chap. of Gibbon's Decl. and Fall of the Rom. Emp.; and Jortin's Remarks on Eccles. Hist. vol. ii. pages 122—138.—R.

not a few of their bishops to death.³ But his plans again failed. After several unsuccessful battles, he was obliged to throw himself upon the mercy of the victor, who nevertheless ordered him to be strangled in the year 325. After his victory over Licinius, Constantine reigned sole emperor till his death; and by his plans, his enactments, his regulations, and his munificence, he endeavoured as much as possible to obliterate gradually the ancient superstitions, and to establish Christian worship throughout the Roman empire. He had undoubtedly learned from the wars and the machinations of Licinius, that neither himself nor the Roman empire could remain secure while the ancient superstition continued prevalent; and therefore from this time onward he openly opposed the pagan deities and their worship, as being prejudicial to the interests of the state.

11. After the death of Constantine, which happened in the year 337, his three surviving sons, Constantine II. Constantius, and Constans, in accordance with his will, assumed the empire, and were all proclaimed Augusti and emperors by the Roman senate. There were still living two brothers of Constantine the Great, namely Constantius Dalmatius and Julius Constans, and they had several sons. But nearly all these were slain by the soldiers at the command of Constantine's sons, who feared lest their thirst for power might lead them to make insurrections and disturb the commonwealth.⁴ Only Gallus and Julian, sons of Julius Constans, escaped the massacre;⁵ and the latter of these afterwards became emperor. Constantine II. held Britain, Gaul, and Spain; but lost his life A.D. 340 in a war with his brother Constantius. Constans at first governed only Illyricum, Italy, and Africa; but after the fall of his brother Constantine II. he annexed his provinces to his empire, and thus became emperor of all the West, until he lost his life A.D. 350 in the war with Magnentius, a usurper. After the death of Constans, Magnentius being subdued, the third brother, Constantius, who had before governed Asia, Syria, and Egypt, in the year 353 became sole emperor, and governed the whole empire till the year 361, when he died. Neither of these brothers possessed the disposition or the discernment of their father; yet they all pursued their father's purpose of abolishing the ancient superstitions of the Romans and other pagans, and of propagating the Christian religion throughout the Roman empire. The thing itself was commendable and excellent, but in the means employed there was much that was censurable.¹

³ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. x. cap. viii. and De Vita Constanti, lib. i. cap. xlix. Even Julian, than whom no one was more prejudiced against Constantine, could not but pronounce Licinius an infamous tyrant who was sunk in vices and crimes. See Julian's Cæsars, p. 222, ed. Spanheim. I would here observe, what appears to have been overlooked hitherto, that Aurelius Victor mentions this persecution of Licinius in his book De Cæsaribus, cap. xli. p. 445, ed. Arntzenii, where he says: Licinio ne innotuit quidem ac nobilium philosophorum senili more cruciatus adhibiti modum fecere. The philosophers whom Licinius is here said to have tortured were doubtless Christians, whom many from their slight acquaintance with our religion have mistaken for a sect of philosophers. The commentators on Aurelius have left this passage untouched, which is apt to be the case with those who are intent only on the enlargement of grammatical knowledge derived from ancient writers.

⁴ Mosheim attributes this massacre equally to the three sons of Constantine, whereas almost all authors agree that neither young Constantine nor Constans had any hand in it at all.—Macl.

⁵ Because they were despised; Gallus, being sickly, it was supposed would not live long; and Julian, being but eight years old, created no fear. Some years after they were sent to a remote place in Cappadocia, where they were instructed in languages, the sciences, and gymnastics, being in a sense kept prisoners; and were at last designed for the clerical office, having been made lecturers or readers. Ammianus Marcell. lib. xxii. cap. ix.—Schl.

12. The cause of Christianity, which had been thus flourishing and prosperous, received immense injury and seemed on the brink of ruin, when Julian, the son of Julius Constans, brother of Constantine the Great, now the only surviving branch of the Constantinian family, after a successful campaign in Gaul, A.D. 360, was hailed emperor by his soldiers, and on the death of Constantius A.D. 361 obtained possession of the whole empire. For Julian, though educated in the Christian religion, yet influenced partly by hatred of the Constantinian family, which had murdered his father, brother, and all his relatives, and partly by the artifices of the Platonic philosophers, who deceived this credulous and vainglorious prince with fictitious miracles and prophecies, apostatized from Christianity to paganism, and laboured to restore idolatry, now ready to become extinct, to its former splendour. Julian seemed to abhor all violent measures, and to give full liberty to his subjects of choosing their religion, and of worshipping God in the manner they pleased; but at the same time he artfully and dexterously cut the sinews of the Christian cause, by abrogating the privileges granted to this religion and to its ministers, by shutting up the Christian schools in which philosophy and the liberal arts were taught, by not only tolerating but even encouraging and animating all sectarians, by writing books against the Christians, and in other ways. He likewise had many projects in contemplation; and would doubtless have done immense harm to Christianity, if he had returned victorious from the Persian war which he undertook directly after he came to the throne. But in this war, which was both undertaken and carried on with little discretion, he fell by a wound received in battle A.D. 363, when he had just entered the thirty-second year of his age, and after reigning sole emperor only twenty months from the death of Constantius.²

13. Those who rank Julian among the greatest heroes the world has produced, nay, place him the first of all who ever filled a throne, which many, and even persons of learning and discernment,³ at this

² See, besides Tillamont [the Universal History; Le Beau, Histoire du Bas Empire, tome iii. liv. xlii.—xiv.] and other common writers, the accurately written work of Bletterie, Vie de Julien, Paris, 1734, 8vo.; the Life and Character of Julian the Apostate, illustrated in Seven Dissertations, by Des Vœux, Dublin, 1746, 8vo.; Spanheim, Preface and Notes to the Works of Julian, Lips. 1699, fol.; and Fabricius, Lux Salutaris Evangelii, cap. xiv. p. 294, &c. [See Neander, Ueber Kayser Julianus und sein Zeitalter, Hamb. 1812, 8vo.—Mur. [To these works should by all means be added Milman's Hist. of Christ. who devotes chapter vi. in vol. iii. to Julian and his reign. See also his edition of Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. iv. chaps. xxii. xxiii. and xxiv. and Beugnot, Hist. de la Destruct. du Pagan. en Occident, vol. i. livr. iii. where three chapters are occupied with Julian, p. 177—220.—R.]

³ Montesquieu, Esprit des Loix, livr. xxiv. chap. x. says: Il n'y a point eu après lui de prince plus digne de gouverner des hommes. [To form a correct judgment of Julian, it is necessary cursorily to survey the history of his life. He was born A.D. 331, and lost his mother Basilina the same year, and his father, Julius Constantius, a few years after. Mardonius, a eunuch, and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, were his first instructors. When Gallus was made a Cæsar, Julian obtained permission to come to Constantinople, where he attended the public schools; then he went to Bithynia, everywhere attaching himself to the most noted teachers. At Pergamus he became acquainted with Ædesius, an aged Platonic philosopher, and heard his scholars, Eusebius and Chrysanthus, as also Maximus of Ephesus, who initiated him in theurgy, brought him to apostatize from Christianity, and presaged his elevation to the throne. This change in his religion he was obliged to conceal from Constantius and Gallus. Julian therefore devoted himself to a monastic life, assumed the tonsure, and became a public reader in the church at Nicomedia. In the year 354, after the death of Gallus, he was deprived of his liberty and carried to Milan. After being in custody there seven months, he obtained by the intercession of the empress Eusebia a release, and liberty to travel into Greece, where he applied himself, at Athens, to the sciences and to eloquence, and became acquainted with Basil and Gregory of Nazianzen. In the year 355 he was proclaimed Cæsar, and had Gaul, Spain, and Britain entrusted to him. But Constantius greatly limited his power, and nominated not only the military commanders there, but also the officers of Julian's court, who were to keep strict watch

¹ Coercive measures were adopted which only made nominal Christians. A law was enacted in the year 342, that all the heathen temples should be shut up, and that no person should be allowed to go near them. All sacrifices and all consultations of the oracles and soothsayers were prohibited, on pain of death and confiscation of property; and the provincial magistrates were threatened with the same penalties if they were dilatory in punishing transgressors of the law. This was to compel the conscience and not to convince it. The history of these emperors may be found in the Universal History, and in Le Beau, Histoire du Bas Empire.—Schl. [See also Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. in the new and best edition, by Milman, Lond. 1838, and 2d edition, 1845. The best edition of Le Beau is by Saint-Martin, Paris, 1824—36, in 21 vols. 8vo.—R.]

day do, must either be so blinded by prejudice as not to see the truth, or they must have never read attentively Julian's writings which still remain, or lastly they do not know what constitutes true greatness and over him. Julian performed some successful campaigns in Gaul, which procured him the affections not only of the soldiery, but of all the Gallic subjects. This awakened the jealousy of Constantius, who, under pretext of the Persian war, recalled a great part of the troops from Gaul. In the spring of 360, the soldiers proclaimed Julian Augustus, and compelled him to assume that dignity. A reconciliation was attempted in vain. Constantius insisted that Julian should resign. Julian prosecuted the German war successfully, and after vanquishing the Germans, whom Constantius had excited against him, and subduing Illyria and Italy, he marched unencumbered against Constantius, who came forward to meet him, but was taken sick on the way, and died in Cilicia. Julian now took quiet possession of the whole Roman empire, and caused Constantius to be honourably buried. During the Illyrian campaign, in the year 361, he publicly sacrificed to the gods; and after the death of Constantius, he let it be distinctly known that it was his purpose to reinstate idolatrous worship. But as he was aware of the ill consequences which formerly resulted from direct persecution, and coveted the reputation of being magnanimous and benevolent; and as in prospect of his Persian campaign he stood in fear of the numerous body of Christians, he endeavoured to assail and to undermine them by artifice. For this purpose he adopted the following measures:—First, he endeavoured to reform the pagan idolatry, and to introduce improvements in it derived from the Christian worship. With this view he attended to his official duties as Pontifex Maximus, offered sacrifices daily in his palace and garden, attended the public sacrifices on all the pagan festivals, and officiated personally even in the meanest service. He re-established the public sacrifices of the cities and provinces. Where there were no temples, or where the destroyers of the ancient temples could not be found, he erected temples at his own cost, and gave to the idolatrous priests high rank and large revenues. As he had been converted to paganism by philosophers of the new Platonic school, and who were willing to borrow from Christianity, hence originated many burdensome ceremonies of worship, together with a considerable apeing of Christian institutions. He was strenuous for the virtuous behaviour of the priests; and he forbade their going to theatres, or having much intercourse with those in civil authority. He wished to place the reading of useful books, giving public exhortations, and taking care of the poor, the sick, and funerals, on the same footing as they were among the Christians; and he required that the priests in many places should annually be supplied with corn, and wine, and money, which they were to distribute to the poor. Secondly, he encouraged and extended the internal divisions among the Christians; for he restored all silenced and ejected teachers, and required that such parties as had been laid under ecclesiastical censures should be reinstated in their privileges. He wrote letters to the most noted and most restless heretics, and encouraged them to disseminate their doctrines. He allowed the leading members of the different parties to come to him, and under colour of attempting to reconcile their differences, he inflamed them more against each other. Thirdly, he deprived the clergy of the franchises and permanent incomes which they had enjoyed under the former emperors, especially of their exemption from burdensome civil duties, and of the distribution of corn to the churches from the emperor's storehouses; and he compelled the monks and the ministers of religion, by force, to perform military duty. Fourthly, he excluded the Christians from all promotions, and in terms of bitter sarcasm forbade their access to the public schools, their studying the Greek authors and sciences, and their practising physic. Fifthly, he commanded the idolatrous temples, images, and altars, to be rebuilt at the cost of those who had pulled them down. Sixthly, acts of violence done by pagans to Christians, he either did not punish at all, or punished very slightly; but on the contrary, every excellence. If we set aside genius,—which, however, as his writings show, in him was not above mediocrity,—military courage, love of learning, acquaintance with that fanatical and vain philosophy called modern Platonism, and lastly patience of labour, all that remains in Julian was certainly little and unworthy of commendation. His excellences were counterbalanced by very great defects; first, a monstrous and almost anile superstition, the surest indication of a little mind; then a puerile pursuit of applause and vulgar popularity, extreme credulity and instability, a disposition to use dissimulation and artifice; and finally, ignorance of solid and sound philosophy. I will grant that in some respects he was superior to the sons of Constantine the Great, but in many respects he was inferior to Constantine himself, whom he censures so immoderately.

14. As Julian affected to appear unwilling to trouble any of his subjects on account of their religion and opposed to no sect whatever, he showed so much indulgence to the Jews as to give them liberty to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem. The Jews commenced the work, but were obliged to desist before even the foundations were laid. For balls of fire issued from the ground, accompanied with a great explosion and a tremendous earthquake, which dispersed both the materials which were collected and the workmen. The fact itself is abundantly attested,¹ though the Christians, as often tumult among Christians was punished most severely. Severently, he connected idolatry with all solemn transactions, and with the manifestations of respect due to himself. The soldiers, for instance, when extraordinary gratuities were presented them, must strew incense upon an altar; and to all the publicly exhibited pictures of the emperor, idolatrous deities were attached. Eighthly, he ridiculed the Christians and their worship scornfully, and wrote books in confutation of their doctrines. His work against Christianity, which was composed in the year 363, and in part during his Persian campaign, is lost. Indeed the Marquis d'Argens, in his Défense du Paganisme par l'Empereur Julien, en Grec et François, avec des Dissertations et Notes, Berlin, 1764, 8vo, has endeavoured to recover this work by means of the confutation of it by Cyril; but the recovery is very incomplete. Yet these remains of it show that the book was more likely to injure Christianity by the style in which it was written, and by the perversion of scripture, than by either the strength or the originality of its arguments and objections. Ninth and lastly, the emperor showed much partiality to the Jews, and allowed them to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, in order to confute by facts the prediction of Christ. Immediately after there were banishments, tortures, and executions of Christians, under pretence that they had showed themselves refractory against the commands of the emperor; and there were many, especially in the eastern provinces, who became apostates. Yet there were not wanting resolute confessors of the Christian religion. See Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchengesch. vol. II. pages 763, 780, 792, &c.—Schil.

¹ See Fabricius, Lux Salutaris Evangelii, p. 124, where the testimonies are collected. See also the acute Moyle, Posthumous Works, p. 101, &c. [The principal authorities cited by Fabricius are, Chrysostom, Homil. v. adv. Judæos, and elsewhere; Ammianus Marcell. lib.

happens in such cases, appear to have inconsiderately amplified it with some additional miracles. As to the causes which produced the event, there is room for debate, and there is debate. All, however, who weigh the subject with an impartial mind will easily perceive that they must join with those who ascribe the phenomenon to the omnipotent will of God; and that they who choose to ascribe it to natural causes or to artifice and fraud, offer no objections which are insurmountable.¹

15. The soldiers elected Jovian to succeed Julian. He died in the year 364, after reigning seven months, and therefore accomplished but little.² The other emperors

xxiii. cap. i.; Gregory Naz. Orat. iv.; Ambrose, Ep. 40. (al. 29, written A.D. 388.) Socrates, H. E. lib. iii. cap. xx.; Sozomen, H. E. lib. v. cap. xxi.; Theodoret, H. E. lib. iii. cap. xx.; Rufinus, H. E. lib. i. cap. xxxvii.; Philostorgius, H. E. lib. vii. cap. ix.—xiv.; Hist. Eccles. Tripartita, lib. vi. cap. xliii.; Nicephorus, lib. x. cap. xxxii.; Zonaras, lib. xiii. cap. xii.; Rabbi David Gantz, Zemach David, pt. ii. p. 36; Rabbi Gedaliah, Schalschelet Hakkalala, p. 109; Lardner (Collection of Jewish and Heathen Testimonies, vol. iv. pages 57—71, ed. London, 1767), maintains the whole story to be false. His chief arguments are, that Julian only purposed to rebuild the temple after his Persian expedition; that he needed all his resources for that expedition; the silence of some of the fathers, living near the time; and the decorations of the story by others of them. But these arguments seem wholly insufficient against the explicit testimony of so many credible witnesses, Christians and pagans, and several of them contemporary with the event.—Mur.

¹ Basnage, in his Hist. des Juifs, tome iv. p. 1257, &c. contests the reality of this miracle. Against him appeared Cuperus, in his Epistole, p. 400, edited by Bayer. Recently, Bp. Warburton has maintained the reality of the miracle, with an excess of ingenuity, in an appropriate treatise, entitled: Julian, or a Discourse concerning the earthquake and fiery eruption which defeated that emperor's attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem; London, 1750, 8vo. [See notes of Guizot and Milman to the latter's edition of Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. iv. pages 100, 1, referring this phenomenon to natural causes; and Waddington's Hist. of the Church, vol. i. pages 226—9, on the other side.—R.]

² See Bletterle, Vie de Jovien, 2 vols. 8vo, Paris, 1748, in which work he completes the history of Julian, and gives a French translation of some of Julian's writings. [The following notices are worth inserting:—Both during the lifetime of Julian, and after his death, when the soldiers made him emperor, Jovian openly declared himself on the side of Christianity; for when Julian gave orders to all the military officers who were Christians either to quit the army or renounce their religion, Jovian chose to relinquish his office. Yet Julian would not release him, but gave him promotion during the Persian war. When chosen emperor, Jovian would not accept the office until the army had declared themselves in favour of Christianity. When he arrived at Antioch he repealed all the laws of Julian adverse to Christianity (Rufinus, lib. xi. cap. i. and Sozomen, lib. vi. cap. iii.), and wrote to all the provincial governors, commanding them to take diligent care that the Christians should not be disturbed in their public assemblies. He restored to the churches, the clergy, and to widows, all the franchises and privileges which had been granted them by Constantine and his sons, but which Julian had taken from them. He likewise restored the use of the Labarum, or the standard with a cross, and he compelled one Magnus to rebuild the church of Berytus at his own cost, he having commanded it to be demolished. Theodoret, lib. iv. cap. xix. In regard to the religious controversies of that day, he joined with the orthodox against the Arians, and he treated Athanasius with peculiar respect. See Baumgarten's Auszug der Kirchenhistorie, vol. ii. p. 805, and the Universal Hist.—Schl.]

of this century, who reigned after Jovian, were Valentinian I. [in the West, from A.D. 364—375, with] Valens [in the East, from A.D. 364—378], then Gratian [in the West, A.D. 375—383, with] Valentinian II. [also in the West, A.D. 375—392, and] Theodosius the Great [in the East, A.D. 379—395], Honorius [in the West, A.D. 395—423], with Arcadius [in the East, A.D. 395—408]. All these were Christians, and did much to advance the religion they professed. They all endeavoured, though not with equal zeal, to extirpate wholly the pagan religion. In this particular, Theodosius the Great, the last emperor of this century [in the East, except Arcadius,] exceeded all the rest. He came to the throne A.D. 389, and died A.D. 395; and during his whole life he did all he could to extirpate idolatry throughout the provinces of the empire, and enacted severe laws against its adherents. The same design was prosecuted by his sons Arcadius and Honorius; so that, in the close of this century, the ancient superstitions were ready to expire, and had lost all their credit.³

16. Yet this severity of the government could not prevent the existence of some pagan temples and ceremonies, especially in the remoter provinces. Indeed, these rigorous laws against the worshippers of the pagan deities seemed to have been aimed rather against the common people than against persons of rank and distinction; for it appears, that during the reign of Theodosius, as well as after his death, individuals filled the highest offices, and continued in them till old age, who are known to have been averse from Christianity and attached to paganism. Of this Libanius is an example, who was very hostile to the Christians, and yet was made præfect of the prætorian guards by Theodosius himself. Perhaps greater indulgence was shown to philosophers, rhetoricians, and military commanders, than to other people, on account of their supposed usefulness to the commonwealth.

17. Yet these very rhetoricians and philosophers, whose schools were supposed to be so profitable to the community, exhausted all their ingenuity, both before the days of Constantine the Great and afterwards, to arrest the progress of Christianity. In the beginning of this century, Hierocles, the great ornament of the Platonic school, composed two books against the Christians, in which he had the audacity to compare our Saviour with Apollonius Tyanæus, and for which he was chastised by Eusebius [of Cæsarea], in a tract written expressly against him.¹ Lactantius speaks of another philosopher who endeavoured to convince the Christians they were in error, but his name is not mentioned.² After the reign of Constantine the Great, Julian wrote a large volume against the Christians; and Himerius³ and Libanius,⁴ in their public declamations, and Eunapius, in his lives of the philosophers,⁵ zealously decried the Christian religion; yet not one of these persons was punished for the licentiousness of his tongue or of his pen.

³ See the laws of these emperors in favour of the Christian religion, and against the professors and friends of the ancient religion, in the Codes Theodosianus, tom. vi. and Peter and Jerome Ballerini, Diss. i. in Zenonem Veronensem, p. 45, &c. Verona, 1739, fol.

18. How much these sophists or philosophers, who were full of the pride of imaginary knowledge and of hatred to the Christian name, injured the cause of Christianity in this century, appears from many examples, and especially from the apostasy of Julian, who was seduced by such men. Among those who wished to appear wise, and to take moderate ground, many were induced by their arguments and explanations to devise a kind of religion, intermediate between the old superstition and Christianity, and to imagine that Christ had enjoined the very same things which had long been represented by the pagan priests under the envelope of their ceremonies and fables. Of these views were Ammianus Marcellinus, a very prudent and discreet man,⁶ Chalcidius, a philosopher,⁷ Themistius, a very celebrated orator,⁸ and ¹ Hierocles, who flourished about A.D. 303, was governor of Bithynia, and afterwards prefect of Egypt. He was a zealous persecutor of the Christians, and wielded both the sword and the pen against them. His character and his two books addressed to the Christians, are thus described by Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. v. cap. ii. iii.: "He was one of the judges, and was the principal author of the persecution [under Diocletian]. But not content with this crime, he also attacked with his pen the people he persecuted, for he composed two books—not against the Christians, lest he should seem to address them as an enemy—but to the Christians, that he might appear friendly to them, and anxious for their good. In these books he endeavours to prove the falsehood of the scriptures, by making them appear full of contradictions."—"He affirms that Christ was outlawed by the Jews, and that he afterwards collected a company of nine hundred banditti, and became a robber."—"Also, wishing to overthrow his miracles (which he does not pretend to deny), he attempts to show that Apollonius had performed as great, and even greater."—"Having poured out such crudities, and having laboured utterly to extirpate the truth, he has the temerity to entitle his nefarious books, which are hostile to God (φυλάττεις), devoted to the truth."—Eusebius, Liber contra Hieroclem, Gr. and Lat. subjoined to his Demonstratio Evangelica, ed. Paris, 1628.—See Lardner's Works, vol. viii. and Bayle, Diction. Hist. et Crit. art. Hierocles (2d.).—Mur.

² Lactantius, Institut. Divinar. lib. v. cap. ii.

³ See Photius, Biblioth. cod. clxv. p. 355. [The works of Himerius are lost.—Mur.

⁴ Libanius, the sophist, was born at Antioch about A.D. 314, and lived probably till about the end of the century. He taught rhetoric and declamation at Nice, Nicomedia, Constantinople, Athens, and Antioch. The emperor Julian, when young, was forbidden to attend the school of Libanius; but he obtained and read his writings, and made them his model as to style. When Julian came to the throne he offered Libanius a public office, which the sophist proudly refused. Libanius was an inflated, pedantic man, full of himself, yet independent in his feelings, and free in the expression of his opinions. He was an avowed pagan, yet a strenuous advocate for religious toleration. His numerous writings still remain, consisting of a prolix Life of himself, a large number of eulogies and declamations, and more than a thousand letters. They seldom contain either profound or original thought, or display research, but they are of some use to throw light on the times in which he lived. They were published, Gr. and Lat. vol. i. Paris, 1666, and vol. ii. by Morell, 1627, fol. The most complete edition of his epistles is by Wolf, Amsterdam, 1738, fol. A volume, containing seventeen of his declamations, was published at Venice, 1755.—See his Life written by himself in his Works, vol. ii. pages 1—84; Eunapius, Vite Philos. et Sophistarum, p. 130, &c.; Tillemont, Hist. des Emper. tome iv. p. 571, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. tom. vii. pages 376—414; Lardner, Heathen Testimonies, vol. iv. pages 127—163; and Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, chap. xxv.—Mur. [See his life, in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 774.—R.

⁵ See Eunapius, Lives of Aedesius, Mazimus, &c. Eunapius also wrote a chronicle, to which he frequently refers in his Lives of the Sophists, the first edition of which is full of reproaches against the Christians and Constantine the Great; the second edition is more temperate. Both editions were extant in the time of Photius; see his Biblioth. codex lxxvii.—Schl.

⁶ Ammianus Marcellinus, a celebrated Latin historian of Grecian extract, was a soldier for at least twenty years, from A.D. 350 onwards, and served in the honourable corps called Protectores Domestici. On retiring from military life he fixed his residence at Rome, where he lived perhaps till the end of the century. There it was he composed his faithful and valuable history. The work originally consisted of thirty-one books, and gave the Roman history from the accession of Nerva (where Suetonius ends), to the death of Valens. The first thirteen books, which must have been very concise, are lost. The last eighteen, which are more full, include the period from A.D. 353—378. The style is harsh and unpolished, and sometimes difficult, but the fidelity and accuracy of the narration render the work highly valuable. Marcellinus was probably a real pagan, but he was not a bigot, and he was willing to give every one his due according to his best judgment. The best editions of his work are that of Valerius, republished by Gronovius, Leyden, 1693, and that of Ernesti, Lips. 1775. See Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Marcellin.—Mur. [Gibbon gives him a high character for accuracy and impartiality.—Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. iv. pages 389 and 406. He observes that Marcellinus was the last subject of Rome who composed a profane history in Latin. See his life, in Smith, ubi supra, vol. i. p. 142.—R.

⁷ Chalcidius, a philosopher of the fourth century, was author of a Latin translation of the Timæus of Plato, and of a commentary on it, which were published by Meursius, Leyden, 1617, 4to. Mosheim's opinion of his religious faith is farther developed in his Diss. de turbata per Recentiores Platonicos Eccl. na, sec. xxxi. and in his notes on Cudworth's Intellectual System, vol. i. p. 732, &c. Fabricius (in his notes on Chalcidius, passim, and in his Biblioth. Latina, lib. iii. cap. vii. p. 557, &c.) and some others hold that Chalcidius was a pagan.—Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. p. 472, &c.) makes him a Christian, though infected with the new Platonism of his age.—Mur.

⁸ Themistius, a Greek philosopher of Paphlagonia, called Euphrades (the fine speaker) from his eloquent and commanding delivery, was made a Roman senator, and enjoyed the favour of Constantius, Julian, and the succeeding emperors, down to Theodosius the Great, who made him prefect of Constantinople, and appointed him tutor to his son Arcadius. He wrote when young some commentaries on Aristotle, fragments of which are still extant, and thirty-three Orations. His works are best edited by Harduin, Paris, 1684, fol. He was a strenuous advocate for the free toleration of all religions, as being all good and tending to the same result by different ways. Concerning him and his religious others, who conceived that both religions were in unison as to all the more important points, if they were rightly understood; and therefore held, that Christ was neither to be condemned nor to be honoured, to the exclusion of the pagan deities.¹

19. As Constantine the Great and his sons and successors took much pains to enlarge the Christian Church, it is not strange that many nations, before barbarous and uncivilized, became subject to Christ.² Many circumstances make it probable that the light of Christianity cast some of its rays into both Armenias, the Greater and the Less, soon after the establishment of the Christian church.³ But the Armenian church first received due organization and firm establishment in this century, near the beginning of which, Gregory, the son of Anax, commonly called the Illuminator, [Φωστήρ], because he dispelled the mists of superstition which beclouded the minds of the Armenians, first persuaded some private individuals, and afterwards Tirdates, the king of the Armenians, as well as his nobles, to embrace and observe the Christian religion. He was therefore ordained the first bishop of Armenia by Leontius, bishop of Cappadocia, and gradually diffused the principles of Christianity throughout that country.⁴

20. In the middle of this century, one Frumentius proceeded from Egypt into the neighbouring country of Abyssinia or Ethiopia, the inhabitants of which were called Auxumitæ, from their capital city Auxuma, and baptized both the king of the country and very many of the nobles. Afterwards returning to Egypt, he was consecrated by St. Athanasius, first bishop of the Auxumitæ. From this circumstance the Ethiopic church, even to this day, is dependent on that of Alexandria, and receives its bishop from it.⁵ In Iberia, a province of Asia which is now called Georgia, a Christian woman who had been carried captive into that country, partly by the sanctity of her life and partly by miracles, induced the king and his queen to renounce idolatry and embrace Christ, and also to send for priests from Constantinople, from whom they and their people might gain a fuller and more accurate knowledge of the Christian religion.⁶

21. A part of the Goths inhabiting Thrace, Mæsia, and Dacia (now the north-east part of Rumelia, with Bulgaria and Walachia on the Danube), had embraced Christianity before the commencement of this century,⁷ and Theophilus, their bishop, was present at the Nicene council.⁸ Constantine the Great, after having vanquished them and the Samaritans, induced great numbers of them to become Christians.⁹ But still a large part of the nation remained estranged from Christ until the time of the emperor Valens, who permitted them to pass the river Ister [or Danube], and to inhabit Dacia, Mæsia, and Thrace, on condition that they would be subject to the Roman laws and would embrace Christianity, to which condition their king Fritigern consented.¹⁰ The bishop of the Goths inhabiting Mæsia in this century was the much celebrated Ulphilas, who, among other laudable deeds, gave his countrymen an alphabet of his own invention, and translated the bible for them into the Gothic language.¹¹ views, see Brucker's Hist. Crit. Philor. tom. ii. p. 481, &c.—Mur.

¹ This favourite opinion Mosheim defends more at length in his Diss. de turbata per Recentiores Platonicos Ecclesiâ, sec. xxx. xxxi. xxxii.; among his Dissert. ad Hist. Eccles. pertinentes, vol. I. pages 85—216, Altona, 1733.—But it does not seem necessary to adopt this hypothesis, which has but slender support from argument, because the Eclectic or new Platonic philosophy might easily lead its votaries to speak in terms of moderation, and even of commendation of the Christian religion, especially in an age when it prevailed almost universally, and was the religion of the state and of the imperial court.—Mur.

² Gaudentius, Vita Philastrii, sec. iii.; Philastrius, De Hæres. Præf. p. 5, ed. Fabricii; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xix.; Georgius Cedrenus, Chronograph. p. 234, ed. Paris; and others.

³ For Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xvi.) informs us that Dionysius of Alexandria, about the year 260, "wrote concerning penance to the brethren of Armenia, over whom Meruzanes was bishop;" and, according to the Acta Martyrum, some Armenians suffered martyrdom in the persecution under Decius, (A.D. 253) and Diocletian (A.D. 304).—Schl.

⁴ See Narratio de Rebus Armenicis, in Combefis, Auxiliarium Biblioth. Patr. Græcor. tom. ii. p. 287, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. pages 419 and 1356; Schröder, Thesaur. Lingue Armenicæ, p. 149, &c. [Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. ii. 8; Moses Choronenis, Hist. Armenicæ, lib. iii. ed. Whiston, Lond. 1736, 4to. p. 256, &c.; Martin, Mém. Hist. et Geogr. sur l'Arménie, Paris, 1818, 8vo.—Mur.

⁵ Athanasius, Apologia ad Constantium, Opp. tom. i. pt. ii. p. 316, ed. Benedict; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xlix.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xxiv.; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xxiii.; Ludolf, Comment. ad Hist. Ethiopicæ, p. 281.; Lobo, Voyage d'Abissinie, tome ii. p. 13, &c.; Fontaninus, Hist. Literar. Aquileæ, p. 174. [Bruce's Travels in Abyssinia, Edin. 1804, vol. v. p. 4, &c.; and vol. vii. p. 73, &c.—Mur.

⁶ Rufinus, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. x.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. vii.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. p. 1333, &c. [Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. i. cap. xxiv.—Mur.

⁷ Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. v.—Schl.

⁸ Harduin, Concilia, tom. i. p. 319.—Schl.

⁹ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xviii.

¹⁰ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xxxiii.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. p. 1242; Benzol, Præf. ad in. Evangelia Gothica (ascribed to Ulphilas), cap. v. p. 18, &c. ed. Oxon. 1750, 4to.

¹¹ Mascovius, Hist. German. tom. i. p. 317; tom. ii. Note, p. 49; Acta Sanctior. March, vol. iii. p. 619; Benzol, ubi supra, cap. viii. p. xxx. [Zahn, Einkleitung in Ufflas Bibelübersetzung, p. iv. &c. ed. Weissenfels, 1805, 4to, where is condensed all that is stated of Ulphilas and his translation by the ancients. viz. Philostorgius, H.E. lib. ii. cap. v.; Socrates, H.E.

22. In the European provinces of the Roman empire there still remained a vast number of idolaters; and though the Christian bishops endeavoured to convert them to Christ, the business went on but slowly. In Gaul, the great Martin, bishop of Tours, was not unsuccessful in this work. Travelling through the provinces of Gaul, by his discourses and by his miracles (if we may believe Sulpitius Severus) he everywhere persuaded many to renounce their idols and embrace Christ, while he destroyed their temples, and threw down their statues.¹ He therefore merited the title of the Apostle of the Gauls.

lib. ii. cap. xlii. and lib. iv. cap. xxxiii.; Sozomen, H. E. lib. iv. cap. xxiv. lib. vi. cap. xxxvii.; Theodoret, H. E. lib. iv. cap. xxxvii.; and others. Ulpilas (or Ufilas, Uphilas, Gulfalas, &c. but should, according to Jornandes, be written Wulfila, i.e. Wölfein, diminutive of Wulf or Wolf, a wolf) is said by Philostorgius to have been descended from Christian Greeks of Sadagolima in Cappadocia, who were carried into captivity by the Goths in the year 266. Others suppose from his name that he was of Gothic extract. Philostorgius also makes him first bishop of the Goths, and says he was ordained by the Arian Eusebius of Nicomedia, in the reign of Constantine the Great. Others make him to have succeeded Theophilus, and to have flourished from the year 360 to 380. He was a man of talents and learning, an Arian (at least in the latter part of his life), and possessed vast and salutary influence among the Goths in Dacia, Mæsia, and Thracia. He was at the Arian synod of Constantinople in the year 359, and was twice sent on embassies by the nation to the imperial court. His last embassy was in the reign of Valens, A.D. 376, to obtain permission for the Goths to pass the Danube and settle in Mæsia. He was successful; and 200,000 Goths were admitted into the Roman empire, on conditions of obeying the Roman laws and joining the Arian interest. It is not known when he died, but it was some time in the reign of Theodosius the Great (A.D. 379—395); he was succeeded in his episcopal office by Theotimus, or, as some report, by Sabinas. He was author of a translation of the whole Bible except the books of Kings, from Greek into the language of the Goths of Mæsia. The books of Kings were omitted by him, lest their history of wars and battles should inflame the already too great thirst of the Goths for war and carnage. The alphabet he used was of his own devising, and formed chiefly from the Greek and Latin. Nothing remains of this translation except a single copy, somewhat mutilated, of the four Gospels, called the Codex Argenteus, because written in letters of silver, now at Upsal in Sweden; and a few fragments of the epistle to the Romans, recovered from an erasure of a MS. of the eighth or ninth century. Uphilas's Gospels were first published by Junius, Dort, 1665, 2 vols. 4to; afterwards at Stockholm, 1671, 4to; very learnedly at Oxford, 1750, fol.; and lastly, in a very convenient German edition, by Zahn, Weissenfels, 1805, 4to, with a complete Apparatus in the German language.—Mur. [A few unimportant fragments have been recently recovered by Cardinal Mai, among the MSS. of the Ambrosian Library in Milan, and published there in 1819 under this title:—Uphilas partium ineditarum in Ambrosianis Palimpsestis ab Ang. Majo repertarum Specimen, &c. Milan, 1819, 4to. The latest edition of the Gothic translation, is that entitled—Vet. et Nov. Test. versionis Gothice Fragmenta quæ supersunt ad fidem cod. castigata, cum Glossario, &c. curâ H. C. de Gabelentz et Loebe, 4to, in two volumes. The first contains the Text, Leips. 1843; and the second contains the Glossary and a Grammar of the Gothic language. Leips. 1843.—R.

¹ See Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. De Vita Martini, cap. xlii. xv. xvi. Dial. ii. p. 106, &c. ed. Hier. a Prato, Verona, 1741, fol.—[This Martin was born in Sabaria in Pannonia, and brought up at Pavia in Italy. He embraced Christianity contrary to the will of his

23. It is very evident that the victories of Constantine the Great, and the fear of punishment, as well as the desire of pleasing the Roman emperors, were cogent reasons, in the view of whole nations as well as of individuals, for embracing the Christian religion. Yet no person well informed in the history of this period will ascribe the extension of Christianity wholly to these causes; for it is manifest that the untiring zeal of the bishops and other holy men, the pure and devout lives which many of the Christians exhibited, the translations of the sacred volume, and the excellence of the Christian religion, were as efficient motives with many persons as the arguments from worldly advantage and disadvantage were with others. As for miracles, I cheerfully unite with those who look with contempt on the wonders ascribed to Paul, Antony, and Martin.² I also grant that many events were inconsiderately regarded as miracles which were according to the laws of nature, not to mention pious frauds. Still I cannot join with such as believe that in this age God did never manifest his power by any extraordinary signs among Christians.³

24. Although the Christian church within the Roman empire was involved in no severe calamities from the times of Constantine the Great onwards, except during the commotion of Licinius and the short reign of Julian, yet slight tempests sometimes beat upon it in certain places. Athanasius, for instance, a king of the Goths, fiercely parents, and served in the army, following the occupation of his father. He afterwards left the military life, and committed himself to the instruction of Hilary of Poitiers. From the Arians he suffered much persecution; and he was principally instrumental in the introduction of monasticism among the Gauls. [He was ordained bishop of Tours, A.D. 374, and died in the year 397, aged 81.] For other particulars of his life see his biography, Sulpitius Severus; also Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. de l'Eglise, tome x.; and the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome i. pt. ii. p. 413.—Schl. [The English reader may consult Milner's Church History, cent. iv. chap. xiv.—Mur.

² Hieronymus a Prato in his preface to Sulpitius Severus, p. xlii. &c. contends zealously for the miracles of Martin and others in this century. [An account of the miracles of St. Martin may be found in Sulpit. Sever. Vita Martini; and Epistles i.—iii. and Dialogus ii. lii. The miracles of some contemporary monks of Egypt and the East are the subject of Dialogue i. For the history of Paul, see Jerome, De Vita S. Pauli Eremitæ, in his Opp. tom. i.; and for that of Antony, see Athanasius, De Vita S. Antonii Eremitæ, in his Opp. tom. ii. ed. Paris, 1627.—Mur. [The life of Antony, by Athanasius, has been translated into English, Lond. 1697, 12mo. The student should turn to what is said of this piece of biography, as illustrative of the state of the Nicene Church, in Taylor's Ancient Christ. vol. i. p. 198, &c.—R.

³ See Eusebius, Contra Hieroclem, cap. iv. p. 431, ed. Olearii; Dodwell, Diss. ii. in Irenæum, sec. iv. p. 195, [also Middleton's Fæd. Inq. into the Miraculous Powers in the Christian Church, and the other works referred to in Note 1, page 54, above.—R.

assailed for a time that portion of the Gothic nation which had embraced Christianity.¹ In the more remote provinces also, the adherents to idolatry often defended their hereditary superstitions with the sword, and murdered the Christians, who, in propagating their religion, were not always as gentle or as prudent as they ought to have been.² Beyond the limits of the Roman empire, Sapor II. surnamed Longævus, the king of Persia, waged three bloody wars against the Christians in his dominions. The first was in the eighteenth year of his reign, A.D. 317; the second was in the thirtieth year; and the third, which was the most cruel, and destroyed an immense number of Christians, commenced in the next year, A.D. 330, and lasted forty years, or till A.D. 370. Yet religion was not the ostensible cause of this dreadful persecution, but a suspicion of treasonable practices among the Christians; for the Magi and the Jews persuaded the king to believe that all Christians were in the interests of the Roman empire, and that Symeon, the archbishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, sent to Constantinople intelligence of all that passed in Persia.³

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. THE Greeks and Romans of this century, who wished to pass for the literati of the age, devoted themselves particularly to eloquence, poetry, and history; and not a few of both nations might be named who acquired some reputation in these studies; yet they all fell very far short of the highest excellence. The best of these poets, as Ausonius,⁴ if compared with those of the Augustan age, are harsh and inelegant. The rhetoricians, abandoning wholly the noble simplicity and majesty of the ancients, taught the youth how to speak ostentatiously and sophistically on all subjects; and most of the historians were less attentive to method, perspicuity, and fidelity, than to empty and insipid ornaments.

2. Nearly all who attempted philosophy in this century were of the sect called Modern Platonists. It is not strange therefore that some Platonic notions are to be met with in the works of the Christians as well as others; yet there were fewer of these philosophers in the West than in the East. In Syria, Jamblichus of Chalcis expounded Plato, or rather palmed his own conceptions upon that philosopher.⁵ His writings show that he was superstitious, obscure, credulous, and of ordinary intellectual powers. He was succeeded by Ædesius,⁶ Maximus,⁷ and others, of whose follies Eunapius gives us an account. In Egypt, Hypatia,⁸ a dis-

¹ See Ruinart, Acta Martyrum; and among these, the Acta Sti Sabæ, p. 598, &c.

² See Ambrose, De Officiis, lib. i. cap. xliii. sec. xvii. where there is an important statement.

³ See Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. i.—xiii. These Persian persecutions are expressly treated of in the Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatican. tom. i. pages 6, 16, 181, and tom. iii. p. 52, &c.; with which, however, should be compared Asseman, Præf. ad Acta Martyrum Oriental. et Occidental. splendidly edited, Rome, 1748; 2 vols. fol. p. lxxi. &c. He has published the Martyrologium Pericum in Syriac, with a Latin translation and excellent notes.

⁴ Decius, or Decimus Magnus Ausonius, was a Latin poet, born and educated at Bordeaux, who flourished in the last half of this century. He was probably a nominal Christian, was a man of poetic genius, and much caressed and advanced to high honours by those in authority. His poems were chiefly short pieces, eulogies, epigrams, &c. and not devoid of merit. Yet the style attests the declining age of Roman literature. Some of the pieces are also very obscene. Edited by Tollius, Leyden, 1671, 4to; and Lat. and Fr. by Jaubert, Paris, 1769, 4 vols. 12mo.—Mur. [The student will find an excellent life of Ausonius by Professor Ramsay, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 444.—R.]

⁵ Jamblichus. There were three of this name, the first lived early in the second century, his works are now lost; the second probably died about the year 333, and wrote largely; the third was contemporary with Julian, and wrote the life of Alypius the musician. The second is the one intended by Moshelm. He was a pagan, an enthusiast, and a great pretender to superior talents and learning. Of his works there remain a Life of Pythagoras, published Gr. and Lat. with notes by Kuster, Amsterdam, 1707, 4to; Exhortation to the Study of Philosophy; three books on Mathematical Learning; Commentary on Nicomachus; Institutes of Arithmetic; and a Treatise on the Mysteries of the Egyptians and Chaldeans of Assyria, published Gr. and Lat. with notes, by Tho. Gale, Oxf. 1678, fol. See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. pages 260—270. Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. iv. p. 282, &c. and Lardner's Works, vol. viii.—Mur.

⁶ Ædesius of Cappadocia, a disciple of Jamblichus, and like his master a devotee of theurgy. See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 270, &c.—Mur.

⁷ Maximus of Ephesus, called the Cynic, another pretender to superhuman knowledge. He is said to have persuaded Julian to apostatize; and he certainly had great influence over that emperor. He was put to death for practising magic, in the reign of Valens. See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 281, &c. Eunapius (De Vita Sophistarum) gives account of Jamblichus, Ædesius, and Maximus.—Mur.

⁸ Hypatia of Alexandria, a lady who excelled all the philosophers of her age, and who publicly taught philosophy with great applause, flourished in the close of tinguished lady, Isidorus,¹ Olympiodorus,² Synesius, a semi-Christian,³ and others of less fame, propagated this kind of wisdom, or rather folly.

3. As the emperor Julian was a passionate admirer of this philosophy (which his writings clearly show), very many were induced by his influence to vie with each other in their endeavours to set it forth in the most alluring dress.⁴ But when Julian died a dreadful storm burst upon the Platonists during the reign of Valentinian, and several of them were arraigned and tried for their lives, on the charge of practising magic and other crimes. In these commotions Maximus, the preceptor of Julian, among others, suffered death;⁵ but it was rather the intimacy of these men with Julian, whose counsellors they had been, than the philosophy they embraced, which proved their ruin. Hence, the rest of the sect which had not been connected with the court, were exposed to very little danger or loss in this persecution of the philosophers.

4. The Christians, from the time of Constantine the Great, devoted much more attention to the study of philosophy and the liberal arts than they had done before; and the emperors omitted no means which might awaken and cherish a thirst for learning. Schools were established in many of the towns, libraries were formed, and literary men were encouraged by stipends, privileges, and honours.⁶ All this was requisite to the accomplishment of their object of gradually abolishing pagan idolatry; for the old religion of the pagans derived its chief support from the learning of its advocates; and, moreover, if the Christian youth could find no instructors of their own religion, there was danger of their applying to the pagan teachers of philosophy and rhetoric, to the injury of the true religion.

5. Yet it must not be supposed that the Christian church was full of literary, erudite, and scientific men, for there was no law as yet to prevent the ignorant and illiterate from entering the sacred office; and it appears, from explicit testimony, that very many of both bishops and presbyters were entirely destitute of all science and learning; besides, the party was both numerous and powerful who considered all learning, and especially philosophical learning, as injurious and even destructive to true piety and godliness. All the ascetics, monks, and eremites, were inclined towards this party, which was also highly favoured, not only by women, but by all those who estimate piety by the gloom of the countenance, the sordidness of the dress, and the love of solitude, or, in other words, by the many.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH, AND OF ITS TEACHERS.

1. CONSTANTINE the Great permitted the external organization of the church to remain as it had been; yet in some respects he improved and extended it. While therefore he suffered the church to continue to be, as before, a sort of republic, distinct from the political body, he assumed to himself the supreme power over this sacred republic, and the right of modelling and controlling it in such a manner as would best subserve the public good. Nor did any bishop call in question this power of the emperor. The people therefore in the same manner as before, continued to elect freely their own bishops and teachers; and the bishops severally, in their respective districts or cities, directed and regulated all ecclesiastical affairs, using their presbyters as their council, and calling on the people for their assent. The bishops also met together in conventions or councils, to deliberate on the subjects in which the churches of a whole province were interested, on points of religious controversy, on the rites of worship, and other matters of like import. To these minor councils of one or more provinces there were now added, by authority of the emperor, assemblies or grand councils of the whole church, called œcumenical or general councils, the emperor having first summoned one of this this century and the first part of the next. She was murdered in a tumult, A.D. 415. See Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xv.; Suidas, art. Hypatia, tom. iii. p. 533; Tillmont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccles. tome xiv. p. 274; Menage, Hist. Mulier. Philos. sec. xlix. &c. p. 494, &c.; and Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 351.—Mur. [To these works may be added J. Ch. Wernsdorf, Dissert. Acad. iv. de Hypatia. Wittem. 1747; and Wolfius, Catalogus Seminar. Illustr. pages 368—71.—R.

¹ This Isidorus was surnamed Gazæus, from Gaza in Palestine, the place of his birth. Concerning him, see Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 343, &c.—Schl.

² Olympiodorus, author of a Commentary upon Plato, still preserved in MS. at Paris, and a Life of Plato, of which a Latin version has been published. There were several persons of this name. See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 490.—Mur.

³ Synesius, of Cyrene in Africa, studied under Hypatia; resided at Constantinople from A.D. 397—400, as deputy from his native city; was made bishop of Ptolemais, A.D. 410. He wrote well for that age, though he was too much infected with the reigning philosophy. His works have been edited by Petauius, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1612 and 1631, fol.—Mur.

⁴ See Spanheim, Prefatio ad Opp. Juliani, et ad versionem Gallicam Cesarum Juliani, pt. iii. et Adnotat. p. 234. Bletterle, Vie de Julien, liv. i. p. 26, &c.

⁵ Ammianus Marcellin, Hist. lib. xxix. cap. i. p. 556, ed. Valesii; and Bletterle, Vie de Julien, p. 80, &c. 155, 159, &c.; and Vie de Jovien, tome i. p. 194.

⁶ See Gothofredus, ad Codic. Theodos. under the titles or chapters, De Professoribus et Artibus Liberalibus; Balduin, Constantinus Magn. p. 22, &c.; Conringius, Diss. de Studiis Romæ et Constantinop. subjoined to his Antiquit. Academica.

character at Nice; for he deemed it suitable (very probably at the suggestion of the bishops), that causes of great moment, and affecting either the church universally or the general principles of Christianity, should be examined and decided in conventions of the whole church. There were never, indeed, any councils held which could strictly and properly be called universal; those, however, whose decrees and enactments were received and approved by the whole church, or by the greatest part of it, have been commonly called oecumenical or general councils.

2. Most of these rights and privileges, however, were gradually diminished very much, from the time that various disturbances, and quarrels, and threatening contests arose here and there respecting ecclesiastical affairs, religious doctrines, or the elections of bishops. For, as the weaker parties generally appealed to the court, this afforded to the emperors the best opportunity of encroaching on the power of the bishops, the liberties of the people, and the ancient customs of the church. The bishops likewise, whose wealth and influence were not a little augmented from the time of Constantine, gradually subverted and changed the ancient principles of church government. For they first excluded the people altogether from having a voice in ecclesiastical affairs, and next by degrees deprived the presbyters of their former authority, so that they might control everything at their discretion; and in particular appropriate the ecclesiastical property to themselves, or distribute it as they pleased. Hence, at the close of this century, only a mere shadow of the ancient form of church government remained; and the former rights of the presbyters and the people were engrossed chiefly by the bishops, while those of the whole church passed into the hands of the emperors or their provincial governors and magistrates.

3. Constantine, to render his throne secure and prevent civil wars, not only changed the system of Roman jurisprudence, but likewise altered in many respects the constitution of the empire.¹ And as he wished, for various reasons, to adapt the ecclesiastical administration to that of the commonwealth, it became necessary that new grades of honour and pre-eminence should be introduced among the bishops. The chief among the bishops were those who had before held a pre-eminent rank, namely, the bishops of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria, with whom the bishop of Constantinople was joined, after the imperial residence was transferred to that city. These four prelates answered to the four praetorian prefects created by Constantine, and perhaps, even in this century, bore the Jewish title of Patriarchs. Next to these were the exarchs, corresponding with the civil exarchs, and presiding each over several provinces. The metropolitans came next, who governed only single provinces. After them ranked the archbishops, who had the inspection only of certain districts. The bishops brought up the rear, whose territories were not in all countries of the same extent, being in some more extensive and in others confined to narrower limits. To these several orders of bishops I should add that of the chorepiscopi, or rural bishops, the superintendents of the country churches, were it not that the bishops, in order to extend their own power, had caused this order to be suppressed in most places.²

This is shown by Thomassin, Disciplina Eccles. Vet. et Nova circa Beneficia, tom. i. various passages. [Though the ecclesiastical divisions of the Roman empire did not coincide exactly with the civil divisions, yet a knowledge of the latter will help us to form a better idea of the former. Accordingly, we annex the following account of the civil distribution copied from an ancient Notitia Imperii, said to have been written before the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, or before A.D. 395. See Pagi, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 37, tom. i. p. 29, &c. I. The Praetorian prefecture of the East, comprising the extensive districts, or, as they were styled, the dioceses of—1st, the East; 2d, Egypt; 3d, Asia; 4th, Pontus; and 5th, Thrace. II. The Prefecture of Illyria, comprising the dioceses of—1st, Macedonia; and 2d, Dacia. III. The Prefecture of Italy, comprising the dioceses of—1st, Italy; 2d, Illyricum; and 3d, Africa. IV. The Prefecture of Gaul, comprising the dioceses of—1st, Spain; 2d, Gaul; and 3d, Britain. Thus the civil division of the Roman empire was, in this century, into four Prefectures, containing thirteen Dioceses, which embraced one hundred and sixteen Provinces. The ecclesiastical division of the empire, though founded upon the civil division, was by no means so complete or so regular. The civil provinces were generally ecclesiastical provinces, and under the inspection severally of the metropolitans or archbishops of those provinces. Yet there were many bishops who were exempt from the inspection or jurisdiction of the metropolitans, and were therefore called ἀντοκέφαλοι, independent. They also bore the titles of archbishops and of metropolitans, although they had no suffragans or bishops depending on them. Hence there were not properly five orders of bishops above the rank of chorepiscopi, as Mosheim represents; but only three—namely, patriarchs, metropolitans or archbishops, and simple bishops.—Before the times of Constantine, provincial councils were common, and these gave rise to the order of metropolitans. Among the metropolitans, those of Rome, Antioch, and Alexandria stood pre-eminent in honour and influence. During the reign of Constantine the Great, the powers of these three metropolitans were enlarged; but whether they bore the title or possessed the authority of patriarchs at that time is not certain. They however became patriarchs, both in name and in power, before the century had elapsed. And these were the three original patriarchs. Towards the close of this century, the bishops of Constantinople obtained rank next to those of Rome, and extended their authority over several dioceses not subject to the other patriarchs. In the next century, the bishops of Jerusalem became independent of the patri-

¹ See Dos, Hist. de la Monarchie Française, tome i. p. 64; Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome i. pages 94—152.

4. The administration of ecclesiastical affairs was divided by Constantine himself into the external and the internal.¹ The latter he relinquished to the bishops and to councils. It embraced what was purely religious, theological controversies, forms of worship, functions of the priests, the irregularities of their lives, &c. The external administration he took upon himself. It included whatever relates to the external condition of the church or to its discipline, and also all contests and causes of the ministers of the church, both of the higher and of the lower orders, which did not respect religion and sacred functions, but property, worldly honours and privileges, and offences against the laws, and the like.² He and his successors therefore assembled councils, presided in them, assigned judges for religious disputes, decided contests between bishops and their people, determined the limits of the episcopal sees, and, by the ordinary judges, heard and adjudged the civil causes and common offences among the ministers of the church; but ecclesiastical causes he left to the cognizance of the councils and bishops. Yet this famous partition of the ecclesiastical government into the external and the internal administrations was never clearly explained and accurately defined. Hence, both in this and in the following centuries, we see many transactions which do not accord with it but contravene it. For the emperors not unfrequently determined matters relating to the interior of the church; and, on the other hand, councils and bishops often enacted laws respecting things which seem to belong to the external form and affairs of the church.

5. The first among the bishops, in respect to rank and dignity, was the bishop of Rome. And this pre-eminence was not founded solely on popular feeling and prejudice of long standing, and which various causes had originated, but also on those grounds which, in the estimation of men, commonly give priority and greatness. For he exceeded all other bishops in the amplitude and splendour of the church over which he presided, in the magnitude of his revenues and possessions, in the number of his ministers of various descriptions, in the weight of his influence with the people at large, and in the sumptuousness and magnificence of his style of living.³ These indications of power and worldly greatness were so fascinating to the minds of Christians even in this age, that often most obstinate and bloody contests took place at Rome when a new pontiff was to be created by the suffrages of the priests and people. A shocking example of this is afforded by the disturbance at Rome in the year 366, after the death of Liberius. When they came to the choice of a new bishop, one party was for placing Damasus, and another for appointing Ursicinus, a deacon, over the bereaved church; and the contention issued in a bloody warfare, in which there was fighting, burning of buildings, and many lost their lives. Damasus came off victorious in the contest; but whether his claims were better, or his cause more righteous, than those of Ursicinus, does not appear.⁴ I dare not pronounce either of them a good man.

6. It is however abundantly attested that the bishops of Rome did not, in this century, possess supreme power and jurisdiction in the church. They were citizens of the commonwealth; and though higher in honour, they obeyed the laws and the mandates of the emperors, just like other arels of Antioch; and thus there were five patriarchates formed. These five patriarchates continued from the fifth century onward to the Reformation. In the eleventh century, Nilus Doxopatrius of Constantinople informs us that the patriarch of Constantinople then presided over fifty-two metropolitans, who had under them six hundred and forty-nine suffragan bishops, and over thirteen titular metropolitans, i.e. bishops who were called metropolitans and ἀντοκεφάλαι, but had no suffragans, and likewise thirty-four titular archbishops. The patriarch of Antioch presided over thirteen metropolitans, with one hundred and thirty-nine suffragans, besides eight titular metropolitans, and thirteen titular archbishops. The patriarch of Jerusalem presided over four metropolitans with suffragans, and twenty-five titular archbishops. And the patriarch of Alexandria presided over seven metropolitans with suffragans, and five titular metropolitans and archbishops. The number of suffragans in the two last Patriarchates is not given.—Mur. [The student will find full information on the respective limits of these patriarchates in Bingham's Orig. Eccles. book ix. ch. i. sec. 5, 6, &c. illustrated with maps. On Ecclesiastical Geography the older works are, Carolus a St. Paulo, Geographia Sacra, Ams. 1703, fol.; Nic Sanson, Atlas Antiquus Sacre, Ecc. et Præsentis, curâ J. Clericus. Ams. 1705, fol.; and more recently Möller, Hierographia oder Topog. Synchr. Darstellung d. Gesch. d. Christ. Kirche, twelve maps, not well executed, Elber. 1825; and Wiltseh, Kirchhistorischer Atlas, Gotha, 1843. The ancient names of the several sees throughout the Christian world, which it is sometimes very difficult to identify with their modern designations, are given in an excellent Index Geographicus Episcopatum Orbis Christ. appended to Fabricius, Salutaris Lux Evangelii, &c.—It.

¹ Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. iv. cap. 24.

² See the imperial laws in both the Justinian and Theodosian Codex; and, among others, Gothofredus, ad Codicem Theodos. tom. vi. pages 55, 58, 333, &c. [This whole system resulted partly from the office of Pontifex Maximus, which was retained by Constantine and all his successors till the fifth century, and partly from the conception of Constantine, that the church was a society existing independently of the state. See Bos, Diss. de Pontificatu maximo Imperator. Christianor.—Schell.

³ Ammianus Marcellinus, Hist. lib. xxvii. cap. iii.

⁴ See the writers of Lives of the Popes, among whom Bower has stated this matter ingeniously and impartially, in his Hist. of the Popes, vol. i. p. 180, &c. London, 1749. [Ammian. Marcellin. Hist. lib. xxvii. cap. iii. says, that one hundred and thirty-seven corpses of the slain were found in one day in the church of Sixtus.—Mur.

citizens. The more weighty religious causes were determined either by judges appointed by the emperor, or in ecclesiastical councils; minor causes were decided by individual bishops. The laws relating to religion were enacted either by the emperors or by councils. No bishop acknowledged that his authority was derived from the plenary power of the Roman bishop, or that he was constituted a bishop by the favour of the apostolic see; on the contrary, they all maintained that they were the ambassadors and ministers of Jesus Christ, and that their authority was derived from above.¹ Yet it is undeniable, that even in this century several of those steps were laid, by which the Roman pontiffs afterwards mounted to the summit of ecclesiastical dominion, and this partly by the imprudence of the emperors, partly by the sagacity of the pontiffs themselves, and partly by the hasty decision of certain bishops. Among these steps, however, I would assign either no place, or only the very lowest, to the fourth canon of the council of Sardica, in the year 347, to which the friends of the Roman pontiff assign the first and the most important place; for, not to mention that the authority and regularity of this council are very dubious, and that, not without reason, the existing enactments of this council are regarded by some as corrupted, and by others as forged,² it cannot be made to appear from that canon that the bishops assembled at Sardica decided that in all cases an appeal might be made to the Roman pontiff as the supreme and final judge. But suppose they had so decided, which yet can never be proved, how weak must that right be which is founded only on the decision of a single obscure council!³

¹ All these points are discussed at large by many writers, among whom I will name De Marca, De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii; Du Pin, De Antiqua Ecclesia Disciplinâ; and especially Blondell, De la Primauté dans l'Eglise, a very learned work [also, Spanheim, Diss. de Primatu Papæ, et Canonæ vi. Nicæno. — Schll. [The sixth canon of the council of Nice, A.D. 325, gave to the bishops of Alexandria, Rome, and Antioch, severally, the same pre-eminence over their respective surrounding bishops. Meletius had encroached upon the prerogatives of his metropolitan of Alexandria; and therefore the council ordain (according to the translation of Dionysius Exiguus), Antiqua consuetudo servetur per Ægyptum, Libyam, et Pentinolim, ita ut Alexandrinus Episcopus horum omnium habeat potestatem; quia et Romæ Episcopo parilis natus est. Similiter autem et apud Antiochiam, cæterasque provincias, suis privilegiis serpenter ecclesiis. To reconcile this canon with the papal claims of universal empire, the Romanists tell us it relates merely to the patriarchal or metropolitane power of the bishop of Rome, and not to his power as pope—a distinction which does not appear to have occurred to the Nicene fathers. See Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sæc. iv. diss. xx.—Mur.

² See Mich. Geddes, Diss. de Canonibus Sardicenses, among his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. II. p. 415 [and Bower, Lives of the Popes,—Pope Julius, vol. I. p. 420, &c., 4to.—Mur.

³ This council was called by Julius, bishop of Rome,

7. Constantine the Great, by transferring the imperial residence to Byzantium, and there founding the new city of Constantinople, undesignedly raised up against the rising power of the Roman pontiff a formidable competitor in the bishop of the new metropolis; for, as the emperor wished his Constantinople to be a new Rome, and had endowed it with all the privileges, honours, and elegances of old Rome, the bishop of so great a city, which was the imperial residence, also wished to be thought every way equal to the bishop of old Rome in rank, and to have precedence of all other bishops. Nor did the emperors disapprove of this ambition, because they considered their own dignity as involved in that of the bishop of their metropolis; therefore, in the council of Constantinople, assembled in the year 381, by authority of the emperor Theodosius the Great, the bishop of Alexandria not being present, and the bishop of Rome being opposed to it, the bishop of Constantinople, by the third canon, was placed in the first rank after the bishop of Rome; the bishops of Alexandria and Antioch, of course, to take rank after him. The bishop who had this honour conferred on him was Nectarius. His successor, John Chrysostom, went further, and subjected all Thrace, Asia [the diocese of the western part of Asia Minor], and Pontus, to his jurisdiction.⁴ The subsequent bishops of Constantinople gradually advanced their claims still further; but this revolution in the ecclesiastical government, and the sudden elevation of the Byzantine bishop to high rank, to the injury of others, in the first place and was designed to be a general council; it was therefore held at Sardica in Illyricum, as accommodating both the East and the West; but as most of the eastern bishops withdrew from it, it was rather a council of the West. Its decrees were not confirmed by several subsequent councils, nor received by the whole church. See De Marca, De Concordia Sacerdotii, &c. lib. vii. cap. iv. v. xi. xii. xv. By the third canon in the Greek, or the fourth in the Latin translation by Isidorus, it was ordered that if any bishop shall think himself unjustly condemned, and wish for a new trial, his judges shall acquaint the bishop of Rome therewith, who may either confirm the first judgment or order a new trial before such of the neighbouring bishops as he may choose to name. The fourth canon, according to the Greek, adds that the see of the deposed bishop shall remain vacant, till the determination of the bishop of Rome is known. By the fifth canon, according to the Greek, and the seventh of Isidorus, it is ordered that if a condemned bishop apply to Rome for relief, the bishop of Rome may, if he see fit, not only order a new trial, but if the aggrieved bishop desire it, he may send one of his presbyters to sit and have a voice in the second trial. See De Marca, cap. iii.—Thus these canons do not give the bishop of Rome even an appellate jurisdiction, but only the power to decide whether an injured bishop shall have a new trial.—Mur.

⁴ See De Marca, Diss. de Constantinop. Patriar. Institutione, annexed to his work, De Concordia Sacerdotii tom. iv. p. 163, &c. ed. Bamb. 1789; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. p. 15, &c.; Parker, An Account of the Government of the Christian Church for the First Six Hundred Years, p. 245, Lond. 1685, 8vo. [The canon fired the Alexandrine prelates with resentment against those of Constantinople; and in the next place, it gave rise to those unhappy contests between the pontiffs of old and new Rome, which were protracted through several centuries with various success, and finally produced a separation between the Latin and the Greek churches.

8. The vices of the clergy, especially of those who officiated in large and opulent cities, were augmented in proportion to the increase of their wealth, honours, and privileges, derived from the emperors and from various other sources; and that this increase was very great, after the time of Constantine, is acknowledged by all. The bishops had shameful quarrels among themselves, respecting the boundaries of their sees and the extent of their jurisdiction; and while they trampled on the rights of the people and of the inferior clergy, they vied with the civil governors of provinces in luxury, arrogance, and voluptuousness.¹ The presbyters in many places arrogated to themselves a dignity and authority equal to bishops. Of the pride and effeminacy of the deacons we often meet with various complaints. Those especially who ranked first among the presbyters and deacons were unwilling to be considered as belonging to the same order with the others, and therefore they not only assumed the titles of archpresbyters and archdeacons, but they thought themselves authorized to assume far greater liberties than were allowed to others.

9. Among the eminent writers of this century who were an ornament to the eastern provinces and to Greece, the most distinguished were those whose names here follow. Eusebius Pamphili, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, a man of vast reading and erudition, and one who has acquired immortal fame by his labours in ecclesiastical history and in other branches of theological learning; yet he was not free from errors and defects, and he leaned towards the side of those who think there is subordination among the three persons in the Godhead. Some rank him among the Arians, but they certainly err in so doing, if they intend by an Arian one who embraces the opinions taught by Arius, the presbyter of Alexandria.² Peter, bishop of Alexan-

² No one has with more zeal and learning accused Eusebius of Arianism than Le Clerc, in his Epistole Ecclesiast. annexed to his Ars Critica, Ep. ii. p. 30, &c. To him add Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. sære. iv. diss. xvii. All however that these and others labour to prove is, that Eusebius thought there was some disparity and a subordination among the persons of the Godhead. And suppose this to have been his opinion, it will not follow that he was an Arian, unless the term be taken in a very extensive and improper sense. It is to be lamented that so many abuse this term, and apply it to persons who, though in error, are very far from holding the opinions of Arius. [Eusebius Pamphili (i.e. ἀμύκιος, φίλος) was born probably about the year 270, and at Caesarea, where he spent nearly all his life. Till about forty years of age he lived in great intimacy with the martyr Pamphilus, a learned and devout man of Caesarea, and founder of an extensive library there, from which Eusebius derived his vast stores of learning. Pamphilus was two years in prison, during which Eusebius was constantly with him. After the martyrdom of his friend, in the year 309, Eusebius fled first to Tyre and thence to Egypt, where he lived till the persecution subsided. After his return to Caesarea about the year 314, he was made bishop of his own city. In the year 325 he attended the council of Nice, was appointed to deliver the address to the emperor on his entering the council, and then to be seated at his right hand. The first draft of the Nicene creed was made by him, to which however the term ὁμοούσιος and the anathemas were added by the council, and not without some scruples on the part of Eusebius. Afterwards Eusebius appeared to belong to a moderate party, who could not go all lengths with either side. About the year 330 he was offered the patriarchal chair of Antioch, which he refused, because the ancient customs forbade the removal of bishops from one see to another. He died about the year 340. The opinion advanced by Mosheim, respecting the Arianism of Eusebius, is supported at length by Socrates, among the ancients, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxi.; and by Cave, in his Diss. de Eusebio Caesariensi. Arianismo, adv. Jo. Clericum; and in his Epistola Apolog. ad eundem; both are annexed to his Hist. Literar. Scrip. Eccles. Of the numerous works of Eusebius, the following have been preserved:—

Chronicon, originally in two parts; the first a brief history of the origin and revolutions of all nations; and the second, a full chronological table of the same events. Little of the original Greek remains, but we have the Latin translation of the second part by Jerome, which, with what could be gleaned of the Greek, and considerable additions from other ancient chroniclers, was published by Scaliger, 1606, fol. and a second ed. by Morus, 1658. Præparatio Evangelica, in fifteen books, intended to prepare the minds of pagans to embrace Christianity, by showing that the pagan religions are absurd, and far less worthy to be received than the Christian. It is a learned and valuable work. Demonstratio Evangelica in twenty books, of which the last ten are lost. This is an attempt to demonstrate the truth of the Christian religion by arguments drawn from the Old Testament, and was therefore intended especially for the Jews. It is far less valuable than the former. Contra Hieroclem, in defence of Christianity against the attack of that pagan philosopher. See the note respecting Hierocles, in page 123, above. Historia Ecclesiastica in ten books, from the birth of Christ to the death of Licinius in 324; a most valuable treasure, though less full and complete than could be wished. Eusebius was an impartial historian, and had access to the best helps for composing a correct history which his age afforded. See Kestner, Commentatio de Eusebio Hist. Eccles. conditoris Auctoritate et Fide diplomatica, sive de ejus Fontibus et Ratione, qua eis usus est; Gotting. 1816, 4to. The Hist. Eccles. with the Vita Constantini, was best edited Gr. and Lat. by Valartus, Paris, 1659 and 1671; and with improvements by Heading, Cambridge, 1720, 8 vols. fol. including the other Gr. ecclesiastical historians—namely, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Evagrius, Theodorus Lecter, and Philostorgius. The works of Euseb. Socrat. Sozom. and Evagr. with the three following, were translated into English, Cambr. 1683, 1 vol. fol. De Martyribus Palaestinae, usually appended to the eighth book of Hist. Eccles. It gives account of the sufferers in the dria, who is highly extolled by Eusebius.¹ Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, famous, among other writings and acts, for his very strenuous opposition to the Arians.² Basil,

of the council was thus expressed: "Constantinopolitane civitatis Episcopum habere oportet primatui honorem post Romanum Episcopum, propter quod sit nova Roma."—Mur.

¹ See Sulpitius Severus, Hist. Sacra, lib. i. cap. xxiii.; lib. ii. caps. xxxii. ii. Dialog. i. cap. xxi. Add to this the account given by Clarkson, in his Discourse on Liturgies (Lond. 1689, p. 185, &c.), of the extremely corrupt state of morals among the clergy, and, in particular, of the eagerness of the bishops to extend the boundaries of their authority.

East and in Egypt, during the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 303–313. De Vita Constantini Magni, a panegyric rather than a biography. Oratio de Laudibus Constantini, delivered on the emperor's vicennalia, A.D. 335. Contra Marcellum, composed by order of the council of Constantinople, 336, by which Marcellus was condemned as a Sabellian; and about a dozen other works of less value, besides several which have not reached us.—Mur. [Some important additions have been subsequently made to the catalogue of his extant writings; first by the publication at Milan, in 1816, of a Latin translation of his Chronicon, from an Armenian version, discovered at Constantinople a few years previously; the original Armenian was published at Venice in 1818, by Jo. Bapt. Aucher, in 2 vols. 4to; and more recently by the discoveries of Cardinal Mai, in the Vatican library. These he has published in the first and eighth volumes of that valuable work of his, the Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita, Roma, 1825–38, 10 vols. 4to. Another work of Eusebius in a Syrian version, was discovered in 1840 in an Egyptian monastery, by the Rev. H. Tattam, the same person to whom we owe the recovery of the Syrian version of the Epistles of Ignatius, formerly referred to. This work has been translated into English by Dr. Lee of Cambridge, and published under the title of The Theophania, or Divine Manifestation of our Lord, &c.; Cambr. 1843, 8vo. To this work the editor has prefixed an elaborate Vindication of the Orthodoxy and Prophetic Visions of Eusebius. Another vindication of this celebrated writer on a different point is much needed. Objections have been made by Gibbon, both in his History and in his Vindication of it, as well as by Waddington in his Hist. of the Church (see the note appended to chap. vi. vol. i. p. 186), and by others, to the accuracy, impartiality, and competency of Eusebius as a historian. This charge, so vitally affecting the credit of this chief source of our knowledge of ecclesiastical history, deserves and demands a full and careful examination, which it has not yet received in our literature. The way has been opened for its consideration by several tracts published in Germany, the names of which are given in Waleh's Biblio. Patristica, curâ Danz. p. 49, and Suppl. p. 8; but those which I have seen do not exhaust the subject. In addition to the translation of Eusebius's Eccles. Hist. mentioned above as published at Cambridge in 1683, which however does not include Sozomen, and which has been frequently reprinted, there are other English translations. One for instance in folio by Hammer, published so early as 1577, and often reprinted; and one in octavo by M. Crusé, an American divine, reprinted by Bagster (Lond. 1838) in his series of Greek Eccles. Historians; a series which includes also the Life of Constantine, Lond. 1845. Extracts from the Præpar. Evangel. have likewise been translated by the Rev. H. Street, under the title of Leaves from Eusebius, Lond. 1842, 8vo. The best edition, in the original Greek, of Eusebius's two historical works, and of his Evangelical Preparation, is by Hehlchen, Leip. 1827–30.—R.

¹ Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ix. cap. vi. [Peter succeeded Thomas in the chair of Alexandria in the year 300, was imprisoned in the year 303, and whether released or not before his martyrdom in 311 is uncertain. He is represented as a very learned, pious, and active bishop. Of his writings nothing remains but some rules respecting penance, and other points of ecclesiastical discipline, to be found in the collections of the ancient canons and decrees of councils.—Mur.

² The accounts given of Athanasius by the oriental writers are collected by Renaudot, in his Hist. Patriarch. Alexandrin. p. 83. All the works of Athanasius were splendidly published in three volumes, folio, by the Benedictine monk, Bernh. de Montfaucon [Paris, 1698.—R.]—[Athanasius was born at Alexandria about the year 298. He had a good education, and early displayed great strength of mind and uncommon sagacity as a disputant and a man of business. He was ordained a deacon in 319, and became the confidant and chief counsellor of his bishop Alexander, whom he accompanied to the council of Nice in 325. In that council he was very active, and acquired great reputation. In the year 326 Alexander died, and at his recommendation Athanasius succeeded to the see of Alexandria, when only twenty-seven or twenty-eight years old. For half a century he was the head of the orthodox party in the Arian controversy. This rendered him extremely odious to the Arians, and involved him in controversy and sufferings nearly all his life. False accusations were raised against him, and a council was held at Casarea, A.D. 334, before which he was summoned, but would not appear. The next year, by peremptory command of the emperor Constantine, he appeared before the council of Tyre, and answered to the charges of murder, unchastity, necromancy, encouraging sedition, oppressive exactions of money, and misuse of church property. Though his defence was good, he could not obtain justice, and he therefore fled to Constantinople, imploring the protection of the emperor. Here a council was assembled in 336, and a new charge falsely preferred against him—namely, that he prevented the shipments of corn from Alexandria to Constantinople. He was unjustly condemned, and banished to Treves in Belgium. Arius died that year, and Constantine the Great the year following. In the year 338, the sons of Constantine allowed Athanasius to return to Alexandria. He immediately began to displace Arians, and to recall the churches to the faith. Disturbances ensued, Athanasius was again accused, and made application to the bishop of Rome for aid. In 341, the council of Antioch decreed that no bishop who had been deposed by a council ought ever to return to his see; and on this ground the see of Alexandria was declared vacant, and one Gregory of Cappadocia appointed to it. Gregory took forcible possession, and Athanasius fled to Rome for protection. A provincial council held there acquitted him on all the charges of his adversaries; and three years after, A.D. 344, a much larger council held at Sardica did the same. In 347, after an exile of seven or eight years, Athanasius was permitted by the Arian emperor Constantius to return to his see. But in 350, on the death of Constant, he was again accused and persecuted. Constantius caused him to be condemned in a council at Arles in 354, and at the council of Milan in 355. Athanasius concealed himself at Alexandria two years, and then retired among the hermits of Egypt till the death of Constantius in 361. In this retirement he wrote most of his best works. On the accession of Julian in 361, he returned to his flock. But two years after, the pagans, joining the Arians, induced Julian to banish him again. But Julian died the same year, and Athanasius returned immediately to his see. In the year 367, the Arian emperor Valens made some attempts to remove him, but without success. He died A.D. 373, aged about seventy-five, having been a bishop forty-six years. He was truly a great man, a good bishop, and a most able, persevering, and successful defender of the orthodox faith in respect to the Trinity. His works are chiefly controversial, and in relation to that one doctrine. They consist of numerous letters and tracts, together with some brief expositions of the Scriptures, and a life of St. Anthony. His four Orations or Discourses against the Arians, and his Discourse against the pagans, which are his largest works, were translated into English by Parker, and printed at Oxford, 1713, 2 vols. 8vo. But a great number of letters, tracts, comments, and narratives, the production of subsequent ages, are falsely ascribed to him and printed with his works. Among these, beyond all question, is the creed, Quicumque vult, falsely called the Athanasian Creed. See Cave, Hist. Liter. i. p. 189; Oudin, De Script. Eccles. tom. i. p. 312; Fabricius, Biblio. Græc. vol. v. p. 297; Montfaucon, Præf. ad Opp. Athanasii; and Schroëckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xli. pages 93–252.—Mur. [To these may be added the most recent work, I believe, on this father, to wit, Möhler, Athanasius der Grosse, u. die Kirche seiner Zeit besonders im Kampfe mit d. Arianismus; Montz, 1827–28, 2 vols. 8vo. In addition to the translation of his four orations mentioned above, his Life of St. Anthony was translated by D. S. Lond. 1697; his treatise on the Incarnation of the Word, by Whiston, and published in his Anc. Monuments relating to the Trinity, &c.; Lond. 1713; and vols. viii. and xix. of the Oxford Library of the Fathers, contain translations of Athanasius's Select Treatises against the Arians, and vol. xlii. his Historical Tracts. A few miscellaneous extracts from his writings, with his life, may be seen in The Book of the Fathers, Lond. 1837.

surnamed the Great, bishop of Cæsarea [in Cappadocia], who was inferior to few of this century in felicity of genius, skill in debate, and eloquence.¹ Cyrillus, bishop of Jerusalem, has left us some catechetical discourses which he delivered at Jerusalem, but many suspect him of intimacy with the semi-Arians.² John, for his eloquence surnamed Chrysostom, a man of genius, who presided over the church of Antioch and that of Constantinople, and has left us various specimens of his erudition, among which his public discourses which he delivered with vast applause, stand conspicuous.³ Epiphanius, bishop of Salamina

There is an excellent life of this eminent father in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. from the pen of one whose untimely and lamented death on board the Pegasus steamer, in 1843, suddenly closed his valuable contributions to that work, and plunged all who had the privilege of being acquainted with him into the deepest sorrow—I allude to the Rev. J. Morell Mackenzie, Tutor in the Independent Theological Seminary at Glasgow, whom I had the happiness of knowing for too short a time; and whose extensive erudition and genuine piety, united to the most obliging and the most amiable dispositions, never failed to ensure him the cordial respect and esteem of all who knew him.—R.

His works are published by the Benedictine monk, Julian Garnier, Paris (1721—1730) 3 vols. fol. [Basil was born at Cæsarea in Cappadocia, about A.D. 329, and died archbishop of that church A.D. 379, A.T. fifty. His first instruction in religion was from his grandmother, Marina, a hearer and admirer of Gregory Thaumaturgus. His father, whose name was Basil, instructed him in the liberal arts. Thence he went to Constantinople or to Cæsarea in Palestine, and studied under Libanius, the philosopher and rhetorician. Next he studied at Athens, having Gregory Naz. and Julian the apostate for fellow-students. In the year 355 he returned to Cappadocia, taught rhetoric a short time, and then retired for thirteen years to a monastery in Pontus. From this time he became a most rigid ascetic, and a very zealous monk. He founded several monasteries, and composed rules and regulations for monks. In 363 he was called to Cæsarea and ordained a presbyter; in the next year, falling out with his bishop Eusebius, he retired to his monastery, but was soon recalled by the bishop. He was now a very popular and efficient preacher. On the death of archbishop Eusebius, in the year 370, Basil was raised to the archiepiscopal chair. He still dressed and lived like a monk, but was a most active and efficient bishop. He died triumphantly on the 1st of January, 379. Eulogies of him were composed by Gregory Naz. Gregory Nyssen (who was his brother), Ephrem Syrus, and Amphilochius. He was an elegant writer and a good reasoner. His works which remain are numerous, consisting of near a hundred discourses, sermons, and homilies, three hundred and sixty-five epistles, various ascetic tracts, controversial pieces, a liturgy, &c. One of his best pieces is his treatise on the person and offices of the Holy Spirit. He is unequal in his performances, and comes much short of Chrysostom as an orator. Yet his enthusiasm, his flexibility of style, and his clear and cogent reasoning, notwithstanding the gloomy austerity of his monastic character, entitle him to that high rank among the ancient clergy which has ever been assigned him. See Hermant, Vie de S. Basile le Grand, et celle de S. Grégoire de Nazianze, Paris, 1679, 2 vols. 4to; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 60, &c.; Garnier, Vita S. Basilii, prefixed to the third vol. of his Opp. Basilii, Paris, 1730; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xiii. pages 1—214; Milner's Church History, cent. iv. chap. xxiii. For his character as a pulpit orator, see Eschenberg, Gesch. der Religionsvorlesung, pages 150—162, Jena, 1785, 8vo; and J. W. Schmidt, Anleitung zum Populären Kanzelvortrag, pt. iii. pages 87—90, ed. 2; Jena, 1800, 8vo.—Mur.] [It should have been stated that the best edition of his works is the Benedictine, referred to in the beginning of this note. Indeed, wherever there is a Benedictine edition of the works of a father, it is invariably to be preferred. I know but of one exception, in the case of Jerome's works; for certainly that by Vallarsi is superior to the Benedictine. Specimens of Basil's style of writing may be seen in Boyd's Select Passages, &c. 2d. edit.; Lond. 1810, p. 220, &c.; and in The Book of the Fathers already referred to.—R.

* The later editions of his works are, in England, by Milles [Oxford, 1703, fol.], and in France, by the Benedictine August. Toutte [Paris, 1720, fol.].—[Cyril is supposed to have been born at Jerusalem about the year 315. He was made deacon in the church of Jerusalem about A.D. 335, and presbyter perhaps three years after. On the death of Maximus, the bishop Cyril was raised to the episcopal chair. But the Arian controversy, and his contest with Acacius of Cæsarea respecting the priority of their episcopal sees, caused him to be twice deposed (A.D. 357 or 358, and 360), and to be expelled from his see by the emperor Valens in 367. But he returned after short intervals to his charge; and from 379, sat peaceably in his chair till his death, A.D. 386. He appears to have been truly orthodox, though not disposed to go to extremes. (Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxvi.; and lib. v. cap. ix.) Of his works, we have twenty-three Lectures to Catechumens, which, though written when Cyril was a young man and only a presbyter, about the year 348 or 349, are an invaluable treasure to us, as they are the most complete system of theology, and most circumstantial account of the rites of the church, which have reached us from so early an age. They are plain, didactic treatises, well adapted to the object for which they were written. See Tzschirner, De Claris Vet. Eccl. Oratoribus, Lips. 1821, 4to. Besides these lectures, a letter of his to the emperor Constantius, giving account of a marvellous appearance of a luminous cross in the heavens A.D. 351, and a discourse he delivered at Tyre, are preserved. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Toutte, preface to Cyril's Works; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xii. pages 343—444.—Mur.] [The only work of Cyril which has been translated into English is his Catechetical Lectures, forming the second volume of the Oxford Library of the Fathers.—R.]

3 For the best edition of the entire works of this most elegant and gifted man, in eleven [thirteen] large folio volumes, we are indebted to the industry of Bernh. de Montfaucon, Paris, 1718—38. [John Chrysostom was the son of a respectable military gentleman of Antioch in Syria, named Secundus. He was born in the year 354 [this date is rejected by Schroeckh, Montfaucon, and others; it ought to be either 347 or 351 or 2.—R.] and lost his father in his childhood. Early discovering marks of uncommon genius, his mother Anthusa, a pious and excellent woman, procured for him the best instructors in all branches of learning. After spending three years under the religious instruction of Meletius, the bishop of Antioch, he attended the schools of Libanius in rhetoric, of Andragathias in philosophy, and of Carterius and Diodorus (afterwards bishop of Tyre), in sacred literature, who taught him to construe the Scriptures literally. Distinguished as a scholar, he was also early pious; and about the age of twenty, embracing a monastic life, he retired to the mountains and spent four years in the society of an aged hermit, and two years more in a solitary cave. Nearly worn out by his austerities, he was obliged to return to Antioch, where he was made a deacon in 381, and commenced author at the age of twenty-six. Five years after he was ordained a presbyter, and began to preach. During twelve years he wrote and delivered an immense number of sermons, orations, and homilies. In the year 398 he was made patriarch of Constantinople, and in that station laboured and preached incessantly. But his life was too austere, and his preaching too pungent, and his discipline too strict, for that corrupt metropolis. The empress, the lax clergy, and many courtiers combined against him. In the year 403 he was summoned before an irregular council, to answer to forty-six frivolous or false charges, and refusing to appear he was condemned, deposed, and banished for contumacy. But his people were so tumultuous that his enemies were compelled to recall him. The next year, however, A.D. 404, he was forcibly removed to Cucusus in Armenia, to the unspeakable grief of all good men. Here he suffered extremely, his health failed, and being removed in Cyprus, has described the various sects of Christians as far down as his own time, in a large volume, which however contains many defects and misrepresentations, arising from the credulity and ignorance of the author.¹ Gregory of Nazianzus and Gregory of Nyssa obtained much renown among the theologians and disputants of this century, and their works show that they were not unworthy to be held in estimation.²

to Pityus in Colchis, he died on the road thither, the 14th of September, 407, aged fifty-two years and eight months. For overpowering popular eloquence, Chrysostom had no equal among the fathers. His discourses show an inexhaustible richness of thought and illustration, of vivid conception, and striking imagery. His style is elevated, yet natural and clear. He transfuses his own glowing thoughts and emotions into all his hearers, seemingly without effort and without the power of resistance. Yet he is sometimes too florid, he uses false ornaments, he accumulates metaphors and illustrations, and carries both his views and his figures too far. The spirit of the man, and some idea of his style, may be learned from the following literal translation of a paragraph in one of his private letters to a friend, written during his exile:—"When driven from the city I cared nothing for it. But I said to myself, if the empress wishes to banish me, let her banish me; the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. If she would saw me in sunder, let her saw me in sunder; I have Isaiah for a pattern. If she should plunge me in the sea, I remember Jonah. If she would thrust me into the fiery furnace, I see the three children enduring that. If she would cast me to wild beasts, I call to mind Daniel in the den of lions. If she would stone me, let her stone me—I have before me Stephen the protomartyr. If she would take my head from me, let her take it—I have John the Baptist. If she would deprive me of my worldly goods, let her do it—naked came I from my mother's womb, and naked shall I return. An apostle has told me, 'God respecteth not man's person;' and, 'If I yet pleased men, I should not be the servant of Christ.' And David clothes me with armour, saying, 'I will speak of thy testimonies before kings, and will not be ashamed.'" The works of Chrysostom (including some falsely ascribed to him) consist of about three hundred and fifty sermons and orations on a great variety of subjects and occasions; about six hundred and twenty homilies or exegetical discourses, on different books of the Old and New Testaments, and about two hundred and fifty letters; together with several tracts on monasticism, and a treatise on the Priesthood. There is also a Liturgy which bears his name, being that used at Constantinople, and which perhaps received some alterations from his hand. For an account of his life and writings, see Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccles. tome xi. pages 1-405, 547-626; Schrocekh, Kirchengesch. vol. x. pages 245-490; Montfaucon, Opp. Chrysost. tom. xiii. pages 1-177. For the sentiments, character, and influence of the man, see Neander's Johannes Chrysostomus und die Kirche in dessen Zeitalter, Berlin, 1821-22, 2 vols. 8vo.—Mur. [Several of his works have been translated into English. Two of his treatises appeared in English about the middle of the 16th century. His Golden Book on the education of children, translated by Evelyn, Lond. 1659; Companion for the Penitent, by Vener, Lond. 1728; On the Priesthood, by Hollier, Lond. 1728; by Bunce, Lond. 1759, and recently by Marsh, 1844; select homilies and specimens of his extraordinary eloquence are given in Boyd's Select Passages, &c. and in the Book of the Fathers. And in the Oxford Library of the Fathers, vols. ii. and xv. contains his Homilies on Matthew; vol. vii. those on Romans; vols. iv. and v. on 1st Corinthians; vol. vi. on Galatians and Ephesians; vol. xiv. on Philippians, Colossians, and Thessalonians; vol. xii. on Timothy, Titus, and Philemon; and vol. ix. his Homilies on the Statutes, as they are called. I may add that Neander's valuable life has been translated into English by J. C. Stapleton, but only the first volume has yet appeared, Lond. 1838. The student ought to read Milner's account of this father in his Hist. of the Church, cent. v. chap. i. vol. ii. p. 279, &c.; and that given from a wholly different point of view by Milman in his Hist. of Christ, vol. iii. p. 208, &c. There is also an excellent sketch of his life in the American Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. i. p. 689. For Chrysostom's character as an expositor of Scripture, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 119.—H.

¹ His works, with a Latin translation and notes, were published by the Jesuit Petavius [Paris, 1622, 2 vols. fol. and Cologne (Lips.) 1682.] His life is given in a good sized volume by Gervasius, Paris, 1738, 4to. [Epiphanius of Jewish extract was born at Bezauducia, a village near Eleutheropolis, about twenty miles from Jerusalem, about the year 310. He became a monk in early life, visited Egypt, fell into the toils of the Gnostics, escaped, was intimate with St. Anthony, and returning to Palestine in his twentieth year, about 330, became a disciple of Hilarion, established a monastery near his native village called Ancient Ad, where he lived more than thirty years. He read much, and was ordained a presbyter over his monastery. In the year 367 he was made archbishop of Constantia (formerly Salamis) in Cyprus, but still lived by monastic rules. He engaged in all the controversies of the times, was an active and popular bishop for thirty-six years, and regarded as a great saint and worker of miracles. In 376 he was at Antioch on the Apollinarian heresy, and 382 at Rome on the Meletian controversy. He had a long and fierce contest with John bishop of Jerusalem respecting Origenism, which he regarded with strong abhorrence. His friend Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, having expelled some monks from Egypt, on the charge of Origenism, in the year 401, Epiphanius held a provincial council of the bishops of Cyprus against that error; and as the expelled monks fled to Constantinople, Epiphanius followed them in 402, intending to coerce Chrysostom into a condemnation of those monks and of Origenism. But his enterprise wholly failed, and he died on his way home, A.D. 403 (402?), aged above ninety years. He became an author when turned of sixty. His first work, Anchiratus (The Anchor), was written A.D. 374, to teach the true genuine Christianity, in opposition to the prevailing and especially the Arian heresies. Soon after he composed his great work (Panarion) contra Octoginta Hareses. He also made an epitome of this work, and wrote a treatise on (Scripture) Weights and Measures, a Letter to John bishop of Jerusalem, another to Jerome, and some other works of little value. It is said he understood five languages—Hebrew, Syriac, Egyptian, Greek, and Latin. His learning was great, his judgment rash, and his credulity and mistakes very abundant.—See Cave, Hist. Liter. pages 231-234; and Schrocekh, Kirchengesch. vol. x. pages 1-100.—Mur.

² Tolerable editions of the writings of both these men were published in France, during the seventeenth century; but better editions are anticipated from the Benedictines. [After long delay, the first volume of the expected Benedictine edition of Gregory Nazianzen's works appeared at Paris, 1778, by Clemencet, large fol. (but no additional volume has since appeared. R.) Of the old editions, the best is that of Billius, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1609, 1630, and Cologne (Lips.) 1690, 2 vols. fol. His works, as here published, consist of about fifty orations or sermons, near two hundred and fifty epistles, and about one hundred and forty poems. Besides these, Muratori has published two hundred and twenty-eight epigrams and short poems of his, in his Anecdota Gr. pages 1-116, Petav. 1709, 4to. Some of the orations are violent attacks upon Arians and others, many others are eulogies on his friends and on monks, and a few are discourses on practical subjects. Of the poems, one of the longest is an account of his own life. Most of them were written after he retired from public life and are of a religious character, but of no great merit as specimens of genius. As an orator, Gregory Naz. is considered superior to Basil for strength and grandeur. He also possessed a fertile imagination. But he has little method, and he abounds in false ornament. He was born about the year 325. His father, who was also named Gregory, was bishop of Nazianzus in Cappadocia for about forty-five years, from A.D. 329 to 374. His mother Nonna, like the mother of Samuel, devoted her son to the Lord before he was born. His education was begun at Caesarea in Cappadocia, continued at Caesarea in Palestine and at Alexandria, and completed at Athens at the age of thirty, A.D. 355. He was at

But after ages would have prized them higher if they had been less attached to Origenism, and more free from the false eloquence of the sophists. Among the Syrians, Ephræm has given immortality to his name by the sanctity of his life and by a great number of writings, in which he confutes heretics, explains the Scriptures, and treats of religious duties.¹ Among those of whom

Athens about five years, and there commenced that intimacy with Basil the Great which lasted through life. On his return to Nazianzum in 356, he was baptized, and betook himself to a retired and studious life, for which he always manifested a strong predilection. In 361 his father compelled him to receive ordination as a presbyter, and the next year he preached his first sermon. On the death of Julian, who had been his fellow-student at Athens, he composed two invectives against him. His friend archbishop Basil, in the year 372, offered him the bishopric of Sasima, which he refused with indignation on account of his aversion to public life. Yet he afterwards consented to be ordained as assistant to his aged father, on condition of not being obliged to succeed him. Soon after the death of his father in 374, he retired to Seleucia and spent three years in obscurity. In 379, being pressed beyond the power of resistance, he went to Constantinople to preach to the remnant of the orthodox there. His success in converting Arians was here very great; and he was so popular that the general council of Constantinople and the emperor Theodosius constrained him to accept the patriarchal chair of that metropolis. But before the council rose, it being objected to him that it was irregular for a bishop to be transferred from one see to another, he gladly resigned. Returning to Nazianzum, he discharged the episcopal functions there for a short time. But in 383 he retired altogether from public life, and after about seven years spent chiefly in writing religious poetry, he closed his life about A.D. 409. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xiii. pages 263—458.—Gregory, bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, and younger brother of Basil the Great, was probably born about 331, at Cæsarea in Cappadocia. Of his early education little is known. He was no monk, and at first averse from the ministry. He was made bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, about the year 372. But soon after he was driven from his see by the persecution of the Arians, and for several years travelled from place to place. In 378 he returned to his see. Afterwards he was much employed on councils, and was greatly esteemed by the orthodox. The council of Antioch, in 379, appointed him to visit the churches in Arabia, and restore order there. On his way he visited Jerusalem, and was disgusted with the profligate morals there. In the year 381, he wrote his principal work against Eunomius the Arian, which procured him great reputation. At the general council of Antioch, in the same year, he is reported to have made the new draft of the Nicene creed, which was afterwards universally adopted by the orthodox. He was also at the council of Constantinople in 394, and probably died not long after. He was a man of considerable acumen, a zealous polemic, and an extravagant orator. His works consist of polemic discourses and treatises, orations, eulogies, letters, and homilies; and were published Gr. and Lat. by F. le Duc, Paris, 1615, 2 vols. fol. to which Gretser added a third vol. Paris, 1618. The three vols. were reprinted, but less correctly, Paris, 1638, fol. A better edition has long been desired. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xiv. pages 3—147.—Mur. [Some specimens of the eloquence of these two Gregories may be seen in Boyd's Select Passages, &c. and the Book of the Fathers. Ample references to the numerous works relative to their history and writings, are given by Danz in his Walch's Biblio. Patristica; and full biographies of both may be seen in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biogr. With these accounts ought to be compared Milner's views of their character, in cent. iv. chap. xx. and xxiv. of his Hist. of the Church. On Gregory Nazianzen and his poetic talent, see Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. iii. p. 196, &c. For their character and merits as biblical interpreters, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 116—R.

¹ An elaborate account is given of him by Asseman

but few works have reached us are Pamphilus, the martyr and intimate friend of Eusebius,² Diodorus of Tarsus,³ Hosius of Corduba,⁴ Eustathius of Antioch,⁵ Didymus in his Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. i. p. 24, &c. The English published several of his works in Greek at Oxford [by Edw. Thwaites, 1709, fol.]. The same were published in a Latin translation by Vossius (Rome, 1589—97, 3 vols. fol.) His works were published in Syriac a few years since at Rome, by Asseman. [Six vols. in all; vol. i. ff. iii. Gr. and Lat. 1732—43—46; vol. iv. v. vi. Syriac and Lat. 1737—40—43. fol.—Ephram Syrus, a monk and deacon of the church at Nisibis in northern Syria, was born and spent his whole life in and near that city. When elected bishop there, he resigned himself deranged, and absconded to avoid promotion. He was a most ardent devotee of monkery, a man of genius, and a prolific writer. His works consist of essays and sermons, chiefly on the monastic and moral virtues, commentaries on nearly the whole Bible, and hymns and prayers. A few of his essays are polemic. All his works were written in Syriac, and were so popular in Syria as to be read in public after the Scriptures; and being early translated into Greek, were held in high estimation in that age. It is said his hymns and prayers are still used in the Syriac churches. He died A.D. 378. See Jerome, de Scriptur. Illustr. cap. cxv. Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xvi. Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. ii. cap. xxx. and iv. 29; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. viii. 255, &c. and xv. 527, &c. Milner's Church History, cent. iv. chap. xxi.—Mur.—[Selections from his writings, with a life, are given in the Book of the Fathers. Danz refers to two recent works by C. A. Lengerke, published the one at Halle, in 1828, and the other at Königsberg in 1831, on the character of this father as an interpreter of Scripture. See Walch's Biblio. Patrist. ed. Danz. p. 466.—R.

² Pamphilus, a presbyter of Cæsarea in Palestine, was born at Berytus, studied under Pierius of Alexandria, and spent his life at Cæsarea. He was a learned, benevolent, and devout man, and a great promoter of theological learning. He procured an immense theological library, which he gave to the church of Cæsarea. Most of the works of Origen he transcribed with his own hand, and particularly the corrected copy of the Septuagint in Origen's Hexapla. One of these transcripts, P. D. Huet states is still in the possession of the Jesuits of Clermont. He wrote a vindication and biography of Origen in five books, to which Eusebius added a sixth. The whole are lost except a Latin translation of book first made by Rufinus. During the persecution he was imprisoned two years, and then put to death. Eusebius, his great admirer, wrote his life, which is lost. See Jerome, de Scriptur. Illustr. cap. lxxvii. Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxxii. Cave, Hist. Liter.—Mur.

³ Diodorus or Theodorus, bishop of Tarsus, was head of a monastic school and presbyter at Antioch, where he had Chrysostom for a pupil. He became bishop of Tarsus in 378, sat in the general council at Constantinople 381, and was succeeded at Tyre by Phalerus A.D. 394. He was a learned man, and a voluminous though not an elegant writer. None of his works remains entire, but abstracts and numerous extracts are preserved by Photius and others. See Suidas, voce Διόδωρος, Socrates, H. E. vi. 3.; Sozomen, H. E. vii. 2.; Theodoret, H. E. iv. 25.; Jerome, de Scriptur. Illustr. cap. cxix.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 558, &c.; Tillemont, Mémoires d'Hist. Eccles. tome viii. p. 558, &c. 802, &c.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. x. pages 247—251.—Mur.

⁴ Hosius, bishop of Corduba in Spain, was born about the middle of the preceding century, became a bishop before the end of it, and sat in the council of Iliberis A.D. 305. He was chief counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs to Constantine the Great, who summoned him to the council of Arles in 314, and sent him to Egypt to settle the religious disputes of that country in 324. He stood at the head of the council of Nice in 325, and presided in that of Sardica in 347. By the Arian council of Strimmon, 356, he was banished, when near a hundred years old; and, unable to resist, he now signed an artfully drawn Arian creed, and died A.D. 361, having lived more than a hundred years, and been a bishop of Alexandria,¹ Amphiloehius of Iconium,² Palladius, author of the Lausiac History,³

Marcellus, senior and junior,⁴ Apollinaris senior,⁵ and a few others,⁶ are most remarkable during about seventy. Nothing written by him remains, except an epistle to the emperor Constantius, preserved by Athanasius in his Hist. Arian. ad. Monachos. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccl. tome vii. pages 300–321; and Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 899.—Mur.

¹ Eustathius, a native of Side in Pamphylia, was bishop of Barea (now Aleppo) in Syria, and promoted to the patriarchate of Antioch by the council of Nice, A.D. 325. He had previously distinguished himself as an opposer of Arianism, and in that council he acted a conspicuous part. This, together with his work contra Arianos, rendered him extremely obnoxious to the abettors of Arianism, who procured his condemnation in one of their councils about the year 330. Eustathius appealed in vain to the emperor, Constantine the Great; he was banished to Trajanopolis in Thrace, where he died about the year 360. The only extant works of his now extant, are his treatise on the witch of Endor, in opposition to Origen, and a short address to the emperor, delivered at the council of Nice. These, together with a treatise on the Hexameron which is ascribed to him, were published by Leo Allatius, Lyons, 1629, 4to. What remains of his work against the Arians was published by Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 170, &c. He was highly esteemed by the orthodox of his times. See Jerome, de Scriptor. Illustr. cap. lxxxv. Chrysostom, Laudatio Eustathii, Opp. Chrysost. tom. ii. p. 603; Athanasius, Epist. ad Solitarios; Cave, Hist. Liter. Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccl. vol. iii.; Fabricius, ubi supra, p. 166, &c.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. v. p. 275, &c.—Mur.

² Didymus, a learned monk of Alexandria, and head of the catechetical school there, was the preceptor of Jerome and Rufinus. He lost his eyesight when young, yet became very conspicuous as a scholar and a theologian. He was born about the year 311, and was alive A.D. 392, then more than eighty-three years old. Of his numerous works only three have reached us—namely, De Spiritu Sancto, preserved in a Latin translation of Jerome (inter Opp. Hieronymi, tom. iv. pt. i. p. 393, &c.), Scholion on the canonical Epistles, also in a Latin translation. Both these are given in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. v. pag. 320, 338. Adversus Manichæos; Gr. and Lat. in Combefis, Actuarium noviss. Biblioth. Patr. pt. ii. p. 21, &c. See Jerome, de Scriptor. Illustr. cap. cix. and Cave, Hist. Liter.—Mur.

³ Amphiloehius, after being a civil magistrate, and living a while with Basil and Gregory Naz. in their monastery, was made bishop of Iconium in Lycaonia about the year 370 or 375. He sat in the second general council at Constantinople A.D. 381; and in the same year was appointed by the emperor Theodosius inspector of the clergy in the diocese of Asia. He probably died A.D. 395. Ten short pieces, chiefly orations, and various fragments, were published as his works, though most of them are of dubious origin, by Combefis, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1644, fol. including the works of Methodius Paternensis and Andreas Cretensis. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. vii. pages 500–507; Oudin, Comment. de Script. Eccl. tom. ii. p. 216, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xii. pages 67–70.—Mur.

⁴ Palladius of Galatia, born A.D. 368, at the age of twenty went to Egypt to get a practical knowledge of monkery. After residing there several years, his health failed and he returned to Palestine, still leading a monastic life. In the year 400, going to Bithynia, Chrysostom ordained him bishop of Helenopolis, which he afterwards exchanged for Aspona in Galatia. After the fall of Chrysostom in 404, Palladius was banished, and died in exile about A.D. 431. His great work was composed about the year 420, and contains the history of the principal monks of his own times, with many of whom he was personally acquainted. Being written at the request of Lausus, the emperor's lord of the bed-chamber, it was called Historia Lausiacæ. It is the honest statement of a credulous monk who almost adored the heroes of his story. Several Latin editions have been published. In Greek it appeared at Leyden, 1616, 4to; and Gr. and Lat. in the Auctor. Biblioth. Patr. Paris, 1624, tom. ii. pages 893–1053, fol.; and in Biblioth. Patr. Paris, 1624, tom. xiii.—Some other works are ascribed to him. See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. ix. p. 2, &c.; Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs

&c.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccl. tom. xi. p. 500, &c.—Mur. [See a full account of him in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biogr. vol. iii. p. 95.—R.

⁵ Macarius senior or the Great, called the Egyptian Macarius, a native of Thchais, was born A.D. 302, early addicted himself to a monastic life, at the age of thirty retired to the wilderness of Scetis and the mountains, Nitria, where he lived a hermit for sixty years, and died at the age of ninety, A.D. 391. Much is related of his asceticities, his virtues, his wisdom, and his miracles. To him are ascribed seven opuscula and fifty homilies or discourses upon practical and experimental religion; edited last by Pritius, Gr. and Lat. Lips. 1714, 2 vols. in one, 12mo. Macarius junior, called the Alexandrian Macarius, because he was born and spent the first part of his life at Alexandria, was contemporary with Macarius senior, with whom he is often confounded. He was born about A.D. 304, pursued traffic some years, became a monk, retired to the wilderness of Scetis, was baptized at forty, became a presbyter, headed a numerous band of monks in the mountains of Nitria, and died about A.D. 404, aged one hundred years. He was no less distinguished for his virtues and his miracles than the other Macarius. But the elder Macarius was unsocial, especially with strangers, whereas the younger was very affable and often visited the city of Alexandria, whence he was called politikos, the citizen. The younger wrote nothing but a single letter to his disciples. The code of thirty monastic rules ascribed to him, was probably the production of a later age. See Socrates, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. xxiii.; Palladius, Hist. Lausiacæ, cap. xix. xx.; Rufinus, Vite Patrum, cap. xxviii.; Cassian, De Cenobior. Institut. lib. v. cap. xli.; and Collat. v. cap. 12, xv. cap. 3, xxiv. cap. 13.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. xiv. lib. vi. cap. xxix.; Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. lib. iv. cap. xxi.; Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccl. tome viii. pages 243, 264, 357; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. vii. p. 491, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter.—Mur.

⁶ Apollinaris or Apollinaris, sen. was born at Alexandria, taught grammar at Berytus, and at Laodicea in Syria, where he became a presbyter. He associated with Epiphanius the sophist, a pagan, and attended his lectures, for which both he and his son, the younger Apollinaris, were excommunicated; but repenting they were restored. In the year 362, when the emperor Julian prohibited the Christians from reading the classic poets and orators, Apollinaris and his son undertook to compose some sacred classics to supply the place of the pagan. The father took up the Old Testament, and transferred the Pentateuch into heroic verse in imitation of Homer; and also according to Sozomen the rest of the Old Testament history he formed into comedies, tragedies, lyrics, &c. in imitation of Menander, Euripides, and Pindar. The son laboured on the New Testament, and transferred the Gospels and the canonical Epistles into Dialogues, in imitation of those of Plato. Nearly all if not the whole of these sacred classics are lost; yet there is extant a poetic Gr. version of the Psalms bearing the name of Apollinaris. The tragedy of Christ suffering, published among the works of Gregory Naz. is also by some ascribed to the elder Apollinaris. The younger Apollinaris wrote several works, of which only fragments remain. He believed that the divine nature in Christ did the office of a rational human soul; so that God the Word, a sensitive soul (ψυχή), and a body, constituted the person of the Saviour. For this he was accounted a heretic, and condemned by public councils. He died between A.D. 380 and 392. Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. 104; Socrates, Hist. Eccl. li. 46 and iii. 16; Sozomen, H. E. v. 18 and vi. 25; Philostorg. H. E. viii. 11–15; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. vii. p. 659, &c. viii. p. 332. Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccl. vol. vii.; Cave, Hist. Liter.—Mur.

⁷ Less distinguished than the foregoing were, in the Eastern or Greek church, the pseudo-Dorotheus, a fabulous bishop of Tyre, who was a confessor in the Diocletian persecution and a martyr under Julian, aged more than a hundred years. To him is attributed the Epitome of the lives of the Prophets, Apostles, and the seventy Disciples of Christ, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iii. p. 421. See Cave, Hist. Liter.

quently mentioned on account of their learning and their achievements.

10. Among the Latin writers the following are most worthy of notice. Hilary, Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, A.D. 312—325, famous as beginning the controversy with Arius, who was his presbyter. Of more than seventy epistles written by him on the Arian controversy only two are extant, which are preserved, one by Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. iv. and the other by Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. vi.

Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, and afterwards court bishop of Constantinople, and the staunch patron of Arius. He was condemned in the council of Nice and banished, retracted and was restored, became the great supporter of Arianism, and died A.D. 342. A single epistle of his has been preserved by Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. vi.

James, bishop of Nisibis in Syria, a confessor in the Diocletian persecution, an assessor in the Nicene council, and died in the reign of Constantius. He probably wrote wholly in Syriac, but his works were first published, Armenian and Latin, by Antonelli, Rome, 1756, fol. containing nineteen essays and discourses, chiefly on moral and practical subjects.

Antolius [or St. Antony], a renowned Egyptian monk who flourished about A.D. 330. His life, written by Athanasius, is still extant; likewise his monastic rules, his remarks on cases of conscience, and about twenty discourses. These Opuscula were published in a Latin translation from Arabic, Rome, 1646, 8vo.

Asterius of Cappadocia, a fickle and ambitious man in the period next following the Nicene council, and a zealous Arian. He was never admitted to the clerical office, possessed some talent, and wrote comments on the Scriptures and tracts in favour of Arianism, of which only fragments remain.

Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra in Galatia. He held a council at Ancyra in 315, and was conspicuous in the orthodox ranks at the council of Nice. Afterwards his zeal against Arianism carried him into Sabellianism. He was condemned and deposed in 335, acquitted in 347, but still regarded with suspicion. He died A.D. 370. His works are lost.

Theodorus, bishop of Heraclea in Thrace, A.D. 334—344, a semi-Arian and a zealous opposer of Athanasius. He died about the year 358. His commentaries on various parts of the Bible are highly commended by Jerome and others for their style and erudition. All are lost except his commentary on the Psalms, which is prefixed to the Catenæ Veterum Patrum in Psalmos, ed. Antwerp, 1613, 3 vols. fol.

Acacius, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, A.D. 340—365, successor to Eusebius whose secretary he had been, a man of learning and eloquence, but unstable, and fluctuating between Arianism and orthodoxy. He wrote much, particularly in explanation of the Scriptures, but nothing has been preserved.

Trophilus of Ledris in Cyprus flourished A.D. 340. He was bred to the bar, and was considered one of the most elegant writers of his age. He wrote on the Canticles and the life of Spiridon, his bishop, but nothing of his remains.

Eusebius, bishop of Emessa in Phœnicia, was born at Edessa, studied there, and at Alexandria in Egypt and Antioch in Syria. As early as 312 he was distinguished for scholarship and for unassuming modesty. He refused the bishopric of Alexandria in 341, but soon after accepted that of Emessa, and died about A.D. 360. He leaned towards semi-Arianism, wrote much and elegantly on the Scriptures, and against the Jews. What has been published as his has been much questioned.

George, bishop of Laodicea, a staunch Arian and active in all their measures, from A.D. 335 to 360. He wrote against the Manichæans, the life of Eusebius, of Emessa, and several epistles, one of which is preserved by Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xiii.

Pachomius (died 350), Theodorus, his successor, and Oresius, were distinguished contemporary monks of Tabennesis in Thebais, Egypt. They flourished from A.D. 340—350. Monastic rules, some epistles, and several discourses are extant, under the names of one or more of them.

bishop of Poitiers, famous for his twelve books on the Trinity and for other writings. He possessed a considerable degree of perspicacity and ingenuity, but he was often Scrapius, a monk of Thebais, distinguished for his learning and eloquence, was the friend of Athanasius, who made him bishop of Thmuis. He died about A.D. 358. Of his once popular writings, only his book Contra Manichæos is extant, Latin, in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iv. p. 160.

Basil, bishop of Ancyra, from 336 to 360, was a semi-Arian, highly esteemed by Constantius, and very active against the orthodox. Contention between him and Acacius preceded his deposition and banishment to Illyricum in the year 360. He wrote much, and in particular against Marcellus, his predecessor; but none of his works are extant.

Leontius, the Arian bishop of Antioch, A.D. 348—358, a crafty and deceptive man, who was active in the contentions of his times. Of his writings, only a fragment of one discourse remains.

Marcus, an Egyptian bishop and a friend of Athanasius, banished in 356 by George bishop of Alexandria. He wrote an oration against the Arians, which is published with Origen's tract on the Lord's prayer, by Westein, Amsterd. 1695, 4to.

Ætius of Syria, a goldsmith, physician, deacon at Antioch, bishop somewhere, and finally a heretic. He held Christ to be a mere creature. He died about the year 366. His book, De Fide, is transcribed and refuted in Epiphanius, Hæres. 76.

Eudoxius, bishop of Germanicia on the Euphrates, and (356) of Antioch, and (360) of Constantinople, died A.D. 370. He was successively an Arian, a semi-Arian, and an Aëtian; a learned but a verbose and obscure writer. Large fragments of his discourse, De Incarnatione Dei Verbi, are extant.

Eunomius, the secretary and disciple of Ætius, but more famous than his master. He was made bishop of Cyzicum, A.D. 360, banished soon after, wandered much, and died about A.D. 394. He wrote on the epistle to the Romans, many letters, his own creed, and an apology for it. Only the two last are extant. He held Christ to be a created being, and of a nature unlike to that of God.

Meletius, bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, and (360) of Antioch. He was banished A.D. 361, returned under Julian, was banished again under Valens, and restored by Gratian, and died while attending the general council of Constantinople A.D. 381, at an advanced age. There is extant (in Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxiii. cap. xxix. —xxiv.) an able discourse which he delivered at Antioch in 361.

Titus, bishop of Bostra in Arabia, was driven from his see under Julian, A.D. 362, returned under Valentinian, and died about the year 371. He wrote Contra Manichæos, which is extant in a Latin translation in Biblioth. Patr. tom. iv. A discourse likewise on the branches of palm, Gr. and Lat. and a commentary on Luke in Latin, have been published under his name, but are questioned.

Paphnuthus, a celebrated Egyptian monk, who flourished A.D. 370. He wrote the life of St. Onyphrius, and of several other monks; still extant.

Cæsarius, youngest brother of Gregory Nazianzenus, was a learned physician of Constantinople, and was elevated to civil office. He is said to have written several works, and particularly a treatise against the pagans. There are extant, under his name, four dialogues Gr. and Lat. on one hundred and ninety-five questions in theology; in Fronto le Duc's Auctarian Biblioth. Patr. 1624, tom. i. But they are supposed not to be his.

Evagrius, archdeacon of Constantinople in 381, and after 385, an Egyptian monk. He was a pious and learned man, and a considerable writer. Several of his devotional and practical works are extant in the different collections of the works of the fathers.

Nemesius, bishop of Emessa after being a Christian philosopher. He flourished A.D. 380, and with Origen held the pre-existence of human souls, as appears from his book De Natura Humani, extant in the Auctarian Biblioth. Patr. 1624, tom. ii.; also printed Gr. and Lat. Oxford, 1671, 8vo.

Nectarius, bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 381—398.

disposed to borrow from Tertullian and Origen, whom he greatly admired, rather than to tax his own genius.¹ Lactantius, the most eloquent of the Latin Christians in this century, assailed the superstition of the pagans in his elegantly composed Divine Institutions, and likewise wrote on other subjects; but he is more successful in confuting the errors of others than in correcting his own.² Ambrose, first governor and then bishop of Milan, is not rude in diction or conception, nor is he destitute of valuable thoughts, yet he is chargeable with the faults of the age—a deficiency in solidity, accuracy, and good arrangement.³

orthodox and pious. One of his discourses is extant, inter Opp. Chrysostomi, who was his successor.

Flavianus, a monk and bishop of Antioch A.D. 381—403. He first divided the choir, and taught them to sing the Psalms of David responsively. He was strenuous against the Arians; but fragments only of his discourses and letters remain.

Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria A.D. 385—412, was famous for his contention with the Nitric monks, and for his opposition to Origenism. Of his works only a few epistles and considerable extracts from his other writings are extant.

John, bishop of Jerusalem A.D. 386—416, famous for his contests with Epiphanius and with Jerome, respecting Origen's character. Numerous works, perhaps without foundation, are published as his. Brussels, 1643, 2 vols. fol.

Hieronymus of Dalmatia, a presbyter and a monk, who flourished A.D. 366. He is author of Lives of the Egyptian Monks; the original Greek, though preserved, has not been published, because the Lausiac History of Pappadius is nearly a literal translation of it.

Sophronius, the friend of Jerome and translator into Greek of some of his works, particularly of his book De Viris Illustribus. He flourished about A.D. 390.—Mur.

1 Concerning Hilary, the Benedictine monks have given an accurate account in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. [tome i. pt. ii.] pages 139—193 [à Paris, 1733, 4to.]. The best edition of his works is that of the French Benedictines [by Coutant, Paris, 1693, fol. revised and improved by Scip. Maffei, Verona, 1730, 2 vols. fol.]. Hilary of Poitiers in France was a native of Gaul, of respectable parentage and well educated. He was a pagan till he had attained to manhood. His consecration to the episcopal office was about the year 350. For twenty years he stood pre-eminent among the Gallic bishops, and did much to arrest the progress of Arianism in the West. In the council of Bessières, A.D. 356, he handled the Arian bishops so roughly, that they applied to the emperor Constantius and had him banished to Phrygia. During the four years he was an exile in Asia he wrote most of his works, and was so active in opposing Arianism there, that the heretical clergy, to get rid of him, procured his release from banishment. He returned to his church, a more able and more successful antagonist to the Gallic Arians than he was before. He was the principal means of rolling back the Arian current which was sweeping over the West. His great work is the De Trinitate. He also wrote several other polemical works, with Commentaries on Matthew and on the Psalms, and a few works which are lost. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. c.; Fortunatus, De Vita Hilarii (prefixed to the Opp. Hilarii, ed. Bened.) Coutant. Life of Hilary, prefixed to the Benedictine edition of his works; Tillmont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Ecclési. tome vii. p. 442, &c. 745, &c.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xii. pages 253—342.—Mur. [Some specimens of his style, with a brief life of him, may be seen in the Book of the Fathers.—R.]

2 Of Lactantius also, the Benedictines have given an account in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 65, &c. His works have gone through numerous editions; the latest and best are by the celebrated Buneauin [Lips. 1739, 8vo.], the venerable Heumann [Gotting. 1736, 8vo.], and Lenglet du Fresnoy [Paris, 1748, 2 vols. 4to.], and Bipont. 1786, 2 vols. 8vo. Lucius Cæcilius Lactantius Firmilianus was probably a native of Italy, studied under Arnobius in Africa, removed to Nicomedia in the reign of Diocletian, and opened a school for rhetoric, in which he had few pupils. He was made private tutor or governor to

Crispus, the oldest son of Constantine the Great, when an old man, and probably died a little before A.D. 330. He was learned, though not a profound theologian, and the most elegant of all the Latin fathers. Some think him the best writer of Latin after the days of Cicero. His works still extant are,—Divinarum Institutionum, libri vii. written about the year 320. This is his great work. It may be called a Guide to true Religion, being designed to enlighten the pagans and convert them to Christianity. Institutionum Epitome, or an abridgment of the preceding. It is imperfect, extending over the three last books only. De Ira Dei, and De Officio Dei, or on the works of creation, particularly on the physical structure and powers of man. These two works are properly a continuation of the first, being written in furtherance of the same designs. De Mortuius Persecutorum, an account of persecutors and persecutions from Nero to Maxentius, A.D. 312. There is no good reason to doubt its genuineness. An English translation of this valuable treatise, with a long preface, was published by Gilb. Burnet, 1687, 18mo. Symposium, a juvenile performance, extant as the work of a fabled Symposium. The Carmen de Phœnice is perhaps his. Several of his works have been lost. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxxx.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Lardner, Credibility, &c. vol. vii.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. v. pages 220—262.—Mur. [To these works should be added Brucker, Hist. Crit. Phil. tom. iii. p. 465, &c. and his life, by Professor Ramsay, in Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 701. His treatise on the deaths of the persecutors has also been translated into English by Sir D. Dalrymple, Edin. 1782, with notes and illustrations; a much better translation than Burnet's.—R.]

3 The Benedictine monks of France published his works in two large folio volumes [1686—1690. Ambrose was the son of a praetorian prefect of the same name, who was governor-general of Gaul, Britain, and Spain. After a good education for civil life he became an advocate, counsellor to Probus, his father's successor, and at last governor of Liguria and Aemelia, resident at Milan. In the year 374 Auxentius bishop of Milan died, and the Arians and orthodox became tumultuous in the church, when met to elect a successor. Ambrose entered the church to quell the riot, and a little child happened to say, "Ambrose bishop," the mob presently cried out, "let him be the bishop." He was constrained to submit, gave up all his property and his worldly honours, was baptized, and became a laborious and self-denying bishop. An irruption of barbarians in 377 obliged him to flee, and he went to Illyricum and thence to Rome. In the year 381 he presided in the council of Aqulleia. In 383 the emperor Valentinian sent him as ambassador to Maximus the usurper in Gaul. Next came his contest with Symmachus, prefect of Rome, respecting the rebuilding the pagan altar of Victory in that city. In 386 he had much contention with the Arians of Milan. Afterwards he was sent on a second embassy to Maximus. Three years after he debarred the emperor Theodosius the Great from Christian ordinances, and required him to do penance for the slaughter of the citizens of Thessalonica by his order. In 392 civil war obliged him to leave Milan for a time. He soon returned, but died A.D. 397, aged sixty-four years. He was devout, energetic, orthodox, and a very useful bishop. His knowledge of theology was not great, but he was able to read the Greek fathers, and he knew the world. His writings were numerous. On the Scriptures he wrote much, but nothing that is valuable. He wrote various treatises and discourses, which with eulogies and about ninety epistles of his are extant, besides a great number of short sermons, scholia on the canonical epistles, and tracts of different kinds, which are falsely ascribed to him. His life written by Paulinus, his private secretary, is stuffed with accounts of miracles and wonders performed by him. See Opp. Ambrosii, tom. ii. Appendix, ed. Benedict; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillmont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Ecclési. tome x. pages 78—300, 720, &c.; G. Hermant, Vie de S. Ambrose à Paris, 1678, 4to, Hieronymus, a monk of Palestine, has undoubtedly merited the esteem of the Christian world by his various productions; but at the same time his bitterness towards those who differed from him, his eagerness after fame, his choleric and ungovernable temper, his unjust aspersions on good and innocent persons, his extravagant commendation of superstition and false piety, and other defects of character, have disgraced him not a little in the view of those who are neither uncandid nor incompetent judges. Among his various writings those which interpret the Holy Scriptures and his epistles are the most valuable.¹ Angustine, bishop of Hippo in Africa, is one whose fame is spread throughout the Christian world; and he certainly possessed many and great excellencies, a superior genius, a constant love of truth, admirable patience of labour, unquestionable piety, and acuteness and discrimination by no means contemptible. But his power of judging was not equally great, and often the natural ardour of his mind carried this excellent man farther than reason and prudence justified. He has therefore afforded to many much ground for controversy respecting his real sentiments, and to others occasion to tax him with inconsistency, and with hastily writing upon subjects which he had not himself duly considered.² Op-

Schrevelk, Kirchengesch. vol. xiv. pages 148—332; and Milner, Church Hist. cent. iv. ch. xii.—xvi. xviii.—Mur. [In the seventh volume of Cardinal Mai's Script. Veter. Nova Collectio, Rome, 1833, are two works of Ambrose, discovered by him in the Vatican, an Explanatio Symboli ad Iulianum, and an Epistola de Fide ad Hieronymum. See Milman's Hist. of Christ. for an eloquent appreciation of the character of Ambrose, and especially of his conduct towards the emperor, vol. iii. p. 241, &c. His treatise De Officiis Ministrorum, written after the manner of Cicero, with his conviction of Symmachus, was early translated into English. Lond. 1637, 4to.—It.

The defects of Jerome are learnedly exposed by Le Clerc, in his Questions Hieronymianæ, Amst. 1700, 12mo. His works have been published by the Benedictines [ed. Martigny, Paris, 1693—1700], in five vols. fol. This edition was republished, with considerable additions [and improvements in the arrangement, the preface, and the explanatory notes], by Vallarsius, Verona, [1734—43, eleven vols. fol. Hieronymus Stridonensis, or Jerome of Stridon in Dalmatia, was born of Christian parents about the year 331. His father, Eusebius, gave him the best advantages for education. He was early sent to Rome, where he studied many years, and under the best masters. About the year 363 he was baptized, and left Rome to travel for improvement in knowledge. He journeyed through Gaul, and resided a few years at Treves, where he became a monk and devoted many books. On his return he spent some time at Aquileia, where he formed a close friendship with Rufinus. In 373 he left Aquileia and embarked for Syria, in company with several friends, and carrying his own large collection of books. Landing in Thrace he passed the Bosphorus, and travelled overland to Antioch. Here his friend Innocentius died, and he himself was dangerously sick. After recovering, he was induced by a dream to renounce for ever the reading of the pagan classics. In 374 he retired into the wilderness eastward of Antioch; and supported by his friends he there spent about four years in the character of a learned hermit and author. In 378 or 379 he returned to Antioch, and was ordained a presbyter. The next year he visited Constantinople to enjoy the instructions of Gregory Nazianzen. Here he continued two or three years, formed a better acquaintance with the Greek fathers, and translated some of their works; in particular, Eusebius's Chronicon, which he continued down to A.D. 378, and Origen's Homilies on Jeremiah. In 382 he accompanied Paulinus and Epiphanius to Rome respecting the contests in the church of Antioch. Damasus, bishop of Rome, was much pleased with him, employed him occasionally as private secretary, and prompted him to write on several biblical subjects, and at length to undertake a correction of the vulgar Latin Bible. Jerome likewise did much to promote monkery in Italy; but the ardour he kindled up on this subject among the Roman ladies created him enemies among the other sex. He also gave offence to the clergy of Rome, and thought it best to leave Italy in 385 and return to the East, with Paula and Eustochium her daughter, wealthy Roman ladies, whom he had rendered enthusiastic in regard to monastic institutions. He first went to Antioch and thence to Jerusalem, where he and his ladies performed a winter's pilgrimage. In the spring of 386 they went to Alexandria, and thence to visit the Nitric monks. Returning the same year to Palestine they took up their permanent residence at Bethlehem. Here Paula erected four monasteries, three for nuns and one for monks. In this last Jerome passed the remainder of his days in reading, composing books, and contending with all who presumed to differ from him on any subject in which he took interest. He is said to have died on the 30th of September, A.D. 420, aged ninety years. Jerome was the best informed of all the Latin fathers in sacred literature. The Greek, Latin, and Hebrew languages were all familiar to him, and he had a very extensive acquaintance with the best writers of both the Latin and the Greek churches. He likewise possessed genius, industry, and literary enterprise, in no ordinary degree. He was also acute and discriminating; but his vivid imagination and his choleric temper, which scorned all restraint, rendered him one of the most caustic and abusive controversial writers that ever pretended to be a Christian. When he has no antagonist and sees no enemy, he is a charming writer, yet enthusiastic and often hasty and injudicious. The greater part of his works, and particularly his translations and commentaries on the Bible, were written while he resided at Bethlehem. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillamont, Mémoires d'Hist. Eccles. tome xii. pages 1—356; Martigny, Le des St. Jerome, Paris, 1706, 4to; J. Scilling, Acta Senator. September, tom. viii. pages 418—688. Antw. 1762, fol.; Schrevelk, Kirchengesch. vol. xi. pages 3—239; Milner, Church Hist. cent. iv. ch. x.—Mur. [The student should also consult Lardner's Credibility, vol. ix. p. 403, &c.; Jerome's Life, under his Latin name of Hieronymus, by Professor Ramsay, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. ii. p. 460, which contains a careful analysis of his writings in the order adopted in Vallars's edition; and Milman's Hist. of Christ. vol. iii. p. 289, &c. the eleventh chapter of which is devoted to Jerome and the monastic system. Nor should he omit reading the striking estimate of the character of this distinguished father, with all its salient faults and excellencies, as given by Isaac Taylor in his Fanaticism, Lond. 1833, pages 314—320.—It.

² After the edition by the theologians of Louvain [Antwerp, 1577, 10 vols. fol.] the Benedictine monks gave a neat and accurate edition of Augustine's works [Paris, 1679—1700, 11 vols. fol.] This was reprinted with enlargements in Holland, or as the title says, at Antwerp, under the eye of Le Clerc, under the assumed name of Jo. Theropeus [1703—1703, 12 vols. fol. printed at Amsterdam. It was also reprinted at Venice, 1729—1735.] The Jesuits censure many things in the Benedictine edition. [They think the editors leaned too much towards the Jansenists, between whom and the Jesuits there was a long and violent controversy respecting the sentiments of Augustine. Aurelius Augustinus was born Nov. 13, A.D. 354, at Tagaste, an obscure village in Numidia. His father Patricius was a pagan till near the close of life. His mother Monica was eminently pious. He had a good school education in grammar and rhetoric, but he would not study Greek. At fifteen he came home, and lived idle and vicious. At seventeen he was sent to Carthage, where he shone as the first scholar in the rhetorical school. But he was tatus of Milevi, an African, has obtained considerable reputation by his well written work on the Schism of the Donatists.¹

dissipated, turned a Manichean, and became a father when he was but eighteen. His son, named Adeodatus, was well educated, became pious, was baptized at the same time with his father at the age of fifteen, and died soon after. While a student at Carthage Augustine lost his father. By reading Cicero's Hortensius he became enamoured with philosophy, and began to read the Bible in search of it; but he could not there find that sublime system of which Cicero had given him an ideal, and he threw aside the sacred volume. At the age of twenty he had read and mastered nearly all the liberal sciences, as they were then taught. He now returned to Tagaste, and there opened a school for rhetoric. About the year 380 he again settled at Carthage, where he taught rhetoric about three years. During this period his attachment to Manichæism diminished. He was still restless, debauched, and unprincipled, yet was a fine scholar, and quite popular. In 383 he went to Rome, and the next year to Milan in the character of a teacher of rhetoric. The eloquence of Ambrose drew him to attend public worship, and under the discourses of that able and faithful preacher Augustine's mind was gradually enlightened and his conscience awakened. He had sharp and painful convictions, and became altogether a new man. He was baptized A.D. 387, set out for Africa the same year, buried his mother, stopped at Rome, and did not reach Africa till A.D. 388. He sold his estate and devoted the proceeds to charitable purposes. For three years he lived as a recluse with a few devout young men, and spent much time on scientific and metaphysical subjects. In the year 391 he went to Hippo Regius (now Bona in Algiers), where he was made a presbyter, and preached and laboured with great success. Four years after, Valerius his aged bishop, who was a native Greek and who felt the need of such an assistant as the now renowned presbyter of Hippo, caused him to be ordained his colleague bishop. From A.D. 395 to A.D. 430, Augustine, as bishop of Hippo, was indefatigable in preaching, writing, combating error and vice, and infusing life and spirituality into the churches and clergy far and near. He died on the 28th of August, A.D. 430, aged seventy-six years. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Tillenont, Mémoires à l'Hist. Eccles. vol. xlii. ed. Paris (it is omitted in the Brussels ed.); J. Stilling, Acta Sanctorum, Augusti, tom. vi. pages 213—460; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xv. pages 219—530; Milner's Church Hist. cent. v. chap. ii.—ix.; and especially Augustini Confessiones, written about A.D. 400, Opp. tom. i. ed. Benedict. The works of Augustine are so numerous that even their titles cannot be here enumerated. They fill ten fol. volumes of the Benedictine edition of his works, the eleventh being occupied with his life, and with indices, &c.—Mur. [See Lardner's Credibility, vol. iv. p. 488; also the life of this father, by the late Rev. J. M. Mackenzie, in Smith's Diet. of Greek and Roman Biog.; and the estimate of his character and works, especially of his City of God, given by Milman in his Hist. of the Church, vol. iii. p. 263. Of Augustine as a controversialist, see Wiggers, Pragmat. Darstellung der August. und Pelag. Emerson's transl. Andover, 1840; as a philosopher, see Ritter, Gesch. der Christ. Philos. vol. ii. p. 153, &c.; and as a biblical expositor, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 133. Augustine's Confessiones were early translated into English, and have been frequently reprinted. A new translation of them forms the first volume of the Oxford Library of the Fathers; vols. xvi. and xv. of the same series contain his Homilies on the New Test. and vol. xxii. comprises seventeen of his short treatises, taken, with one exception, from the sixth vol. of the Benedictine edition of his works. His City of God was translated and published so early as 1610. Some specimens of his style are given in English in the Book of the Fathers. There has been lately published at Paris, by the Abbé Caillaud, a volume of discourses and tracts by Augustine, which had hitherto remained in manuscript, amounting to nearly one hundred and ninety sermons and half a dozen tracts, one of them, De Omnibus Virtutibus, consisting of nineteen chapters. The volume is entitled S. Aur. Augustini Hippon. Epis. Sermones Inediti, Paris, 1842, fol. It may be considered as forming a twelfth volume, supplementary to the Benedictine edition.—R.

¹ After the edition of Albaspinus (Paris, 1631, and

Paulinus of Nola has left us some epistles and poems, which are neither very bad nor very good.² Rufinus, a presbyter of Aquileia, acquired fame by translating into Latin various works of the Greek fathers, particularly of Origen, by his bitter contests with Jerome, and by some expositions of the holy scriptures. He would have held no contemptible rank among the Latin writers of this century, had it not been his misfortune to have the powerful and abusive Jerome for his adversary.³ For an account of Philastrius,¹ Damasus,² Juvencus,³ and other writers of less note, the reader is referred to those who professedly treat of all the Christian writers. I shall, however,

1679, fol.] Du Pin published the works of Optatus with judicious illustrations [Paris, 1700, fol.—Of Optatus, all that is known is stated by Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. ex.—namely, "that he was an African and bishop of Milevi, who was on the side of the Catholics; and that he wrote, during the reign of Valentinian and Valens (A.D. 364—375), against the slander of the Donatists, in which he maintains that the wrong doing of the Donatists is erroneously charged on us." His work is entitled Contra Parmenianum Sceleris Donatistæ apud Carthaginum Episcopum, de Schismate Donatistarum. It is a polemic work in answer to a book published by Parmenianus, and contains much of the history of that schism, as well as of the arguments by which each party maintained its own principles and defended its own conduct.—Mur.

² The best edition of Paulinus is that published by Le Brun, Paris, 1685, 4to (in two volumes, which Muratori republished, with some additions, Verona, 1736, fol.—Macrobius Pontius Anicius Paulinus, a Roman of patrician rank, was born at Bourdeaux in France, A.D. 353. He first studied under the poet Decius Ausonius, then went to Rome, became a popular advocate, and was made consul about the year 375. About 379 he commenced his travels or wanderings in Italy, Gaul, and Spain, accompanied with his pious wife Theresia. During this period he formed acquaintance with Ambrose, Martin, and many other eminent saints. He was baptized at Bourdeaux A.D. 391, and gradually parting with most of his large estate, which he bestowed in charity, he retired to Barcelona in Spain, where he lived some years as a recluse or monk. In 393, he was ordained a presbyter at Barcelona. The next year he removed to Nola in Campania, where he had a small estate. Here Paulinus in the year 402 erected an additional church, which he adorned with emblems of the Trinity and other religious devices. In 409 he became bishop of Nola, and remained in that office till his death in 431. He was esteemed one of the greatest saints, and was undoubtedly very religious, though his piety was of a superstitious cast. His writings consist of about fifty letters to his friends, written with a pleasing simplicity of style, and exhibiting a true picture of his devout mind, yet containing little that is of much importance; also thirty-two poetic effusions, of a similar character with his letters. For an account of him and his works, see Gennadius, De Viris Illust. cap. xlviii. with the notes of Fabricius in his Biblioth. Eccles.; Le Brun, Vita Paulini, in his Opp. Paul.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. vii. pages 123—132; Milner, Church Hist. century v. chap. xiii.—Mur. [There is a French translation of his Letters, Paris, 1703.—R.

³ Simon, Critique de la Bibliothèque des Aut. Eccles. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 124, &c. A particular and full account is given of him, and his reputation is defended, by Fontaninus, Hist. Liter. Aquilei. lib. v. p. 149. [See also Cacciarli, Dissert. Hist. de Vita, Fide, &c. Rufini, subjoined to his edition of Rufinus' Hist. Ecc. and De Rubis, Dissert. de Tyrannio Rufino Presbytero, &c. Venice, 1754, 4to.; Gennadius, De Viris Illust. cap. xvii.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. x. pages 112—133; Cave, Hist. Liter.—Rufinus Toranus, or Tyraninus, was probably born at Concordia near Aquileia, about A.D. 330. After living several years in a monastery at Aquileia and forming acquaintance with Jerome, he was baptized there in 371. Soon after, the fame of the oriental monks led him to visit them. Landing at Alexandria, he became acquainted with a rich Roman lady named Melania, who was as great an admirer of monkery as himself. She became his patron, supported

him, and travelled with him through the remainder of his life. During his six years' residence in Egypt, he spent some time among the monks in the Nitric wilderness, and also heard lectures from the famous Didymus of Alexandria. About the year 378 he and Melania removed to Jerusalem, where they spent many years. Melania occupied a nunnery, in which she supported a considerable number of devout sisters. Rufinus resided with other monks in cells about the Mount of Olives, and lived in the greatest intimacy with Jerome, who then resided at Bethlehem. About the year 390 he was ordained a presbyter by John, bishop of Jerusalem, and soon after the quarrel between him and Jerome respecting Origen's orthodoxy commenced. In the year 397 that controversy seemed to subside, and shortly after Rufinus and Melania removed to Rome. Here his publications concerning Origen rekindled the quarrel with Jerome, and both Origen and Rufinus were pronounced in the wrong by Anastasius the Roman pontiff. In the year 399 Rufinus removed to Aquileia, where he spent several years in translating works of Origen, and writing apologies for him and for himself. At length, after Alarie and his Goths began to lay waste all Italy, Rufinus and Melania set out for Palestine, and got as far as Sicily, where he closed his life A.D. 410.—Rufinus was a man of respectable talents, of considerable learning, and a very diligent scholar. His orthodoxy and his piety ought never to have been called in question. The abusive treatment he received from Jerome will account for the irritation of his feelings at times, without supposing him destitute of grace.—His work, which is most frequently quoted in modern times, is his Ecclesiastical History. The first nine books are a free translation of the ten books of Eusebius, with considerable omissions in the latter part, and some additions in the first seven books. The last two books (the tenth and eleventh) are a continuation by Rufinus. This work has been very severely censured, but of late it is held to be of some value. The first good edition of it was by Cacciarli, Rome, 1740, 2 vols. 4to. Besides this Rufinus wrote Vita Patrum, or a history of the eastern monks, and several other works. An imperfect collection of his works was published by De La Barre, Paris, 1590, fol. A much better edition in 2 vols. fol. was commenced at Verona, by Vallarsa, of which the first volume appeared in 1745.—Mur.

¹ Philastrius or Philaster, bishop of Brescia in the north of Italy, A.D. 379—387. While a presbyter, he is said to have travelled nearly all over the Roman empire, combating and endeavouring to convert errorists of every sort, and especially Arians. At Milan he was severely handled by Auxentius the Arian bishop. Ambrose, the successor of Auxentius, showed him kindness, and ordained him bishop of Brescia. He is praised by Gaudentius, his immediate successor in the see of Brescia. His only work is De Hæresibus. It enumerates more heresies than any of the other ancient works, but no one considers it an accurate work. Philastrius was doubtless a pious and well-meaning man, but he was incompetent to the task he undertook. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. ix. pages 362—384. The work is extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iv. p. 701, and ed. Helmstadt, 1611, 4to, by Fabricius, Hamb. 1721, 8vo, and among the collected works of the early bishops of Brescia, Brescia, 1738, fol.—Mur.

² Damasus, bishop of Rome, A.D. 366—384, is said to have been of Spanish extraction, but his father was a presbyter of Rome, and he was probably born there about the year 305. On the death of Felix A.D. 366, there was great competition for the episcopal chair, and two bishops were chosen and ordained—namely, Damasus and Ursinus or Ursicinus. Much confusion and even bloodshed followed; but the party of Damasus finally triumphed. Damasus was active in putting down Arianism in the West, and being requested, he aided the eastern churches in healing their divisions. For these purposes he held several councils and wrote several letters, some of which are extant. Two synodic epistles and a confession of faith are preserved by Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxii.; and lib. v. cap. x. xl. An epistle to Paulinus, bishop of Antioch, and about forty epistles, inscriptions, epigrams, &c. are also extant. Several spurious epistles, as well as the Liber Pontificalis, or Brief History of the Popes, are falsely ascribed to him. The best edition of his works, is that by Merenda, Rome, 1754, fol. See Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. ciii.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. i. pages 170—233, ed. 2d, Lond. 1749; Merenda, in his edition of the works of Damasus, and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. viii. pages 107—122.—Mur. [See also Lardner's Credibility, vol. iv. p. 275.—It.

³ Caius Vettius Aquilinus Juvencus. Nearly all that is known of this man is told by Jerome, De Viris Illustr. cap. lxxvii. He says—"Juvencus, of noble extraction, a Spaniard and a presbyter, composed four books, in which the four Gospels are put into hexameter verse almost verbatim; also some poems in the same measure relating to the order of the sacraments. He flourished under the emperor Constantine." The four books of Evangelical History are of the nature of an imperfect harmony of the Gospels on the basis of Matthew. Juvencus possessed considerable poetic genius, and understood versification very well. His lines are flowing and easy, but he was more sollicitous to give the history truly and as nearly as possible in the language of the Bible, than to decorate the narrative by flights of fancy and poetic imagery. The best edition is that of Rensch, France and Leips. 1710, 8vo. The other poems mentioned by Jerome are lost. But in the Nona Collectio Vet. Monument. tom. ix. p. 15, &c. by Martene, Paris, 1724—33, there is a poetic version of the book of Genesis which bears the name of Juvencus. See Cave, Hist. Liter. and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. v. pages 262—265.—Mur. [See A. H. Geleser, Prolegomena de Juvenci Vita et Scriptis, prefixed to his works, forming the first part of a new Biblioth. Latina Poet. Vet. Christ. Jona, 1827; but I believe no additional part has since been published. See Professor Ramsay's life of this writer in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biogr. vol. ii. p. 690.—It.

⁴ Sulpitius Severus was born in Aquitain Gaul, of noble extraction, and brought up under Phœbasius, bishop of Agen in Gienne. In his youth he studied eloquence, and afterwards became an advocate, and married a lady of consular rank. Subsequently he became a monk under Martin, and a presbyter at Prinnulium, a village between Narbonne and Toulouse. He was intimate with Martin of Tours, Paulinus of Nola, and Jerome. In his old age, Genadius tells us he was entangled by the metaphysics of the Pelagians; but recovering himself, he ever after kept silence. He is supposed to have died about A.D. 420, far advanced in life. His style is chaste and neat, much beyond the age in which he lived, whence he has been called the Christian Sallust. His best work is his Historia Sacra from the creation to A.D. 409. It is a condensed narrative in a very classic style, and composed with some ability and fidelity. Besides this he wrote the Life of St. Martin, three epistles concerning him, and three dialogues on the miracles of the oriental monks and on those of St. Martin. To him Paulinus of Nola addressed fourteen epistles still extant. His works have been often printed. The last edition is that of Horman, Lugd. Bat. 1647, 4to, often reprinted, 8vo. See Genadius, De Viris Illustr. cap. xix.; Cave, Hist. Liter.—Mur.

⁵ Aurelius Prudentius Clemens of Spain was born A.D. 318; but whether at Tarragona, Calahorra, or Saragossa, is not settled. In his youth he studied eloquence, and afterwards managed causes and filled civil offices. He was openly vicious, and he served some time in the army. At length when turned off fifty, he became thoughtful, his whole character was changed, and he devoted himself to writing moral and religious poetry, considerable portions of which are still extant. Prudentius was something of a poet, but has been greatly overrated by many. His diction is not pure nor his versification correct, and his thoughts are often flat prose, and drag along to excessive length. A good critic has observed that he was a better Christian than poet. Yet he has many agreeable passages, and some that are really fine. He also serves to illustrate the history and the religious views of the age in which he lived. His collected works were published by Weit-

zen, Hanov. 1613, 8vo; with notes by Heinsius, Amsterdam, 1667, 12mo; and in usum Delphini, Paris, 1687, 4to.—See Gennadius, De Viris Illust. cap. xiii.; Cave, Hist. Liter.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. vii. pages 100—123.—Mit. [Also Lardner's Credibility, vol. v. p. 1, &c. On all these eminent Latin fathers and their works, see Bähr, Gesch. der Römisch. Liter. vol. ii. pt. ii.—R.

The Latin writers of inferior note omitted by Mosheim are the following:

Anastasia, a noble Roman lady, the wife of Publius, and a martyr in the Diocletian persecution, A.D. 303. Two letters addressed from her prison to Chrysogonus, a confessor, are extant under her name. See Suidas, in voce Ἀναστασία.

Theonas, a bishop, but where is not known. An excellent letter of his addressed to Lucian, the emperor's chamberlain, is extant in D'Achery, Addit. ad Spicil. tom. xi. or the new ed. tom. iii. p. 297. It is supposed to have been written about A.D. 305. But whether the present Latin is the original or only a translation, is uncertain. See Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. i. pages 172, 173.

Rheticus, bishop of Autun in France. He was in high esteem during the reign of Constantine, and wrote on the Canticles, and against the Novatians; but both are lost. Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. lxxxii.

Donatus, an African bishop, from whom the Donatist faction took its name. According to Jerome (De Viris Illust. cap. xciii.) he wrote many tracts in support of his sect, and a book on the Holy Spirit, which accorded with Arian views. None of his works are extant. He was expelled from Carthage A.D. 356.

Julius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 337—352, a strenuous opposer of the Arians, and a patron of Athanasius. Two of his epistles are extant, and are preserved in the works of Athanasius, and one by Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxii.; See Cave, Hist. Liter. and Bower, Lives of the Popes.

Julius Firmicus Maternus probably was first a pagan and then a Christian. He wrote a book on the falsehood of the pagan religions, addressed to the emperors Constantius and Constans, which has been often printed. There is extant likewise a work on astronomy or mathematics, which bears his name.

Fortunianus, born in Africa, and for many years bishop of Aquileia in Italy. After contending long and strenuously against the Arians, he joined with them in 354, and became as active against the orthodox. He wrote commentaries on the Gospels, but nothing of his remains.

Vitellius, an African Donatist, who flourished about A.D. 344. See Gennadius, De Viris Illust. cap. iv. Nothing of his remains.

Macrobius of Africa. As a catholic presbyter, he wrote a book addressed to confessors and virgins; afterwards, as a Donatist bishop resident at Rome, he composed the martyrdom of Maximianus and Isaac, two Donatists. A large fragment of the last is extant in Mabillon, Analect. tom. iv. He flourished A.D. 344.

Liberius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 352—366. He had a warm discussion with the emperor Constantius in the year 355 at Milan, respecting the persecution of the orthodox by the Arians, for his opposition to which he was banished. During his exile he relapsed, signed an Arian creed, and was restored A.D. 358. His dialogue with the emperor at Milan is extant in Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xvi.; and sixteen of his epistles are collected in the Concilia, tom. ii. col. 743.

Eusebius Vercellensis was a native of Sardinia, and first a lector at Rome, then bishop of Vercelli in the north of Italy, and flourished A.D. 354. For his vigorous opposition to the Arian cause he was banished in 355, first to Scythopolis in Syria, thence to Cappadocia, and afterwards to Thebais in Egypt. Under Julian he regained his liberty, travelled extensively in the eastern provinces, was at several councils, and returning to Italy, died A.D. 371. He translated the commentary on the Psalms by Eusebius Cæsariensis into Latin, but it is lost; and wrote four letters which are still extant. A manuscript of the four Evangelists according to the old Italic version, written with his own hand, is preserved in the archives of the church of Vercelli, and was published by Irici, Milan, 1748. [See also Lardner's Credibility, vol. iv. p. 247. A recent notice of this celebrated MS. may be seen in Henderson's Faudois, or a Tour to the Valleys of Piedmont in 1844.—R.

Lucifer Calaritanus, a bishop [of Cagliari] in Sardinia, contemporary with Eusebius Vercellensis and his companion in exile. He was founder of the sect called Luciferians, who held no communion with Arians, or even with such as had been Arians. Lucifer was a man of violent passions, and bold even to rashness. He addressed two indecorously written books to the emperor Constantius, which, with his other extant works, were published, Paris, 1568, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iv. p. 181; but the best edition is by Dominie and Colletti, Venice, 1778, fol. [See Lardner's Credibility, vol. iv. p. 247.—R.

Hilarius, a native of Sardinia, deacon at Rome, and associated with Eusebius of Vercelli and Lucifer of Cagliari in an embassy to Constantius, and by him sent with them into exile. He became a Luciferian. To him are attributed, though without sufficient proof, the Questions on the Old and New Testaments printed among the works of Augustine, vol. iv. and the Commentaries on the Epistles of Paul, published among the works of Ambrose.

Phœbas, bishop of Agen in the south of France, from at least 359—392. He was famous in connexion with the three preceding, in the Arian contests in the West. His book against the Arians is still extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iv. p. 300, ed. Paris, 1584; and by Barth. Francf. 1623, 8vo.

Zeno, bishop of Verona, who flourished about A.D. 390. To him are ascribed ninety sermons on various texts and subjects, which were compiled from Basil, Hilary, and others. They are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iii. p. 350.

Pabbus Marius Victorinus, of African birth, was a distinguished pagan rhetorician at Rome, who became a convert to Christianity about the middle of this century, and died about A.D. 370. After his conversion he wrote on the holy Trinity against the Arians, against the Manichean principle of two first causes, on the commencement of the day whether it be at evening or in the morning, on the generation of the divine Word, against Candidus the Arian, three hymns, on embracing the homousian faith, a poem on the seven Maccabees, and commentaries on some of Paul's epistles which were never published. His style is intricate, obscure, and inelegant. Most of what he wrote after his conversion is extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. iv. p. 293. See Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. ci. and the notes of Fabricius. [A portion of the commentaries mentioned above has been published by Cardinal Mai, in the 3d vol. of his Script. Veter. Nova Collectio, part ii. pages 1—162, comprising those on Galatians, Philippians, and Ephesians, with a small treatise of Victorinus entitled Tru religione Christiana contra Philosophos Physicos.—R.

Candidus, an Arian, who flourished about A.D. 364. He composed a book on the divine generation addressed to Victorinus, which, with the answer of Victorinus, was published by Rivinus, Gothæ, 1656.

Paclanus, bishop of Barcelona in Spain, who flourished about the year 370, and died about A.D. 390. He wrote three epistles against the Novatians, an exhortation to penitence, and a tract on baptism addressed to catechumens, all of which are published, Paris, 1538, 4to; Rome, 1564, fol.; Biblioth. Patrum, tom. iv.; and still better, in Agnre, Collectio Max. Concil. Hispan. tom. ii. p. 79, &c.

Anicia Falconia Proba, a noble lady of Rome, distinguished for her rank, piety, and beneficence. She flourished about A.D. 373. After the death of her husband, she lost most of her property by the incursion of the Goths, and fell into the hands of Alaric, who carried her to Africa, where she died in the first part of the fifth century. Her Cento Virgilianus de Rebus Divinis is extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. v. p. 1218, and Cologne, 1601, 8vo; and Halle, 1719, 8vo.

Faustinus, a presbyter among the Luciferians at Rome, flourished A.D. 384. He wrote a petition to the emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius, to which is prefixed a Confession of Faith, and subjoined is the Rescript of Theodosius. He also wrote a book on the Trinity against the Arians. His works are in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. v. p. 673, and were printed Oxford, 1678, 8vo.

Siricius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 385—397, is the earliest Roman pontiff whose Decretal Epistles are allowed to be genuine. Five of his Epistles are in the Concilia, tom. ii.; but the fourth, which is addressed to the bishops of Africa, is demonstrably spurious. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. viii. pages 122—129; and Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. i. pages 233—277.

Idadius Clarus was a Spanish bishop, perhaps of

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THEOLOGY.

1. THAT the elementary principles of the Christian religion were preserved entire and inviolate in most churches is certain, but it is equally certain that they were very often unskillfully and confusedly explained and defended. This is manifest from the discussions concerning the three persons in the Godhead among those who approved the decisions of the council of Nice. There is so little clearness and discrimination in these discussions, that they seem to rend the one God into three Gods. Moreover, those idle fictions which a regard for the Platonic philosophy and for the prevailing opinions of the day had induced most theologians to embrace, even before the times of Constantine, were now in various ways confirmed, extended, and embellished; hence it is that we see on every side evident traces of excessive veneration for departed saints, of a purifying fire for souls when separated from the body, of the celibacy of the clergy, of the worship of images and relics, and of many other opinions, which in process of time almost banished the true religion, or at least very much obscured and corrupted it.

2. Genuine piety was supplanted by a long train of superstitious observances, Merida, and flourished A.D. 385. He was conspicuous as an opposer of the Priscillianists, suffered banishment, and wrote several books and tracts against heresies, all of which are extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. v. p. 726.

Gaudentius, bishop of Brescia in northern Italy (a different person from Gaudentius, a contemporary Donatist bishop of Tamugada in Africa), was travelling in the Asiatic provinces when he was elected successor to Philastrius, bishop of Brescia, and was compelled to return and accept the office. He brought with him from the East relics of about forty saints, and served the church till A.D. 410, or as some say till 427. He wrote fifteen discourses or tracts on various subjects, and the Life of Philastrius, all published by Petavius, 1720.

Aurelius, bishop of Carthage A.D. 390—426, was a man of much influence, and wrote, A.D. 419, a circular epistle on the condemnation of Pelagius and Cælestius, which, with the letter of the emperor Honorius to him on the same subject, is in Baronius, Annales, A.D. 419, p. 455, and in the Concilia, tom. ii. col. 1609.

Tichonius, or Tychonius, flourished A.D. 390. He was a learned, moderate Donatist, and wrote Seven Rules for interpreting Scripture (extant in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. vi. p. 49), and a few other works. Some have supposed the eighteen lectures on the Revelation printed among the works of Augustine to be this commentary of Tichonius. See Gennadius, De Viris Illust. cap. xviii.; Augustine, De Doctrina Christiana, lib. iii. cap. xxx.; and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xi. p. 374—382.

Petilianus, a leading Donatist bishop of Numidia, flourished A.D. 399. He wrote De Uno Baptismo and a circular epistle to his party, to both which Augustine wrote formal answers. His works are lost.

Faustus, a Manichean bishop in Africa, flourished A.D. 400. He wrote a book against the orthodox faith, which Augustine quotes entire and refutes at large.—Mur.

which were derived partly from opinions inconsiderately embraced, partly from a preposterous disposition to adopt profane rites and combine them with Christian worship, and partly from the natural predilection of mankind in general for a splendid and ostentatious religion. At first, frequent pilgrimages were undertaken to Palestine and to the tombs of the martyrs, as if thence men could bear away the radical principles of holiness and certain hopes of salvation.¹ Next, from Palestine and from places venerated for their sanctity portions of dust or earth were brought, as if they were the most powerful protection against the assaults of evil spirits, and these were bought and sold everywhere at great prices.² Further, the public supplications by which the pagans were accustomed to appease their gods were borrowed from them, and were celebrated in many places with great pomp. To the temples, to water consecrated in due form, and to the images of holy men, the same efficacy was ascribed and the same privileges assigned which had been attributed to the pagan temples, statues, and lustrations, before the advent of Christ. Images indeed were as yet but rare, and statues did not exist; and shameful as it may appear, it is beyond all doubt that the worship of the martyrs, with no bad intentions indeed, yet to the great injury of the Christian cause, was modelled by degrees into conformity with the worship which the pagans had in former times paid to their gods.³ From these specimens the intelligent reader will be able to conceive how much injury resulted to Christianity from the peace and repose procured by Constantine, and from an indiscreet eagerness to allure the pagans to embrace this religion. But the plan of this work will not admit of long details respecting such disgraceful proceedings.

¹ See Gregory Nyssen, Oratio ad eos qui Hierosolymam adeunt, Opp. tom. iii. p. 568; Hieronymus, Ep. xiii. ad Paulinum, de Institut. Monachi, Opp. tom. i. p. 66; Gothofredus, Ad Codicem Theodos. tom. vi. p. 65, &c.; Wesseling, Dis. de Causis Pergrinat. Hierosolymit. prefixed to the Itinerarium Burdigalense, among the Vetera Romanorum Itineraria, p. 537.—[Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, seems to have been the first who gave the signal for these religious journeys. At least it is stated by Socrates, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. xvii. and by Theodoret, II. E. lib. i. cap. xviii. that she was instructed by a dream to go to Jerusalem, and that she wished to find the grave of Christ; that she actually did find three crosses with a superscription; that one of them instantly cured a dying woman, and was therefore concluded to be the cross of Christ; that she gave a part of it to the city of Jerusalem, and sent the other part to the emperor, who incased it in his own statue, and regarded it as the Palladium of his new city; and that the people used to assemble around this statue with wax candles. See Schmidt, Problema, de Crucis Dominice per Helenam Constantinii Imp. Matrem Inventionis, Helmst. 1724.—Schl. [In support of the alleged miracles connected with the discovery (or, as the Latins more appropriately styled it, the invention) of the sacred cross, see Newman's Essay on the Ecclesiastical Miracles formerly quoted, p. 143; and against them, Isaac Taylor's Ancient Christianity, vol. ii. p. 277.—R.

² Augustine, De Civitate Dei, lib. xxiii. cap. vill. sec. vi. and many others.

³ This is shown at length by Beausobre, Hist. du Manichisme, tome ii. p. 642, &c.

3. This inconsiderate piety of the common people opened a wide door to the endless frauds of persons who were base enough to take advantage of the ignorance and errors of others to advance their own interests. Rumours were artfully disseminated of prodigies and wonders to be seen in certain edifices and places (a trick before this time practised by the pagan priests), whereby the infatuated populace were drawn together, and the stupidity and ignorance of those who looked upon everything new and unusual as a miracle were often wretchedly imposed upon.¹ Graves of saints and martyrs were supposed to be where they were not,² the list of saints was enriched with fictitious names, and even robbers were converted into martyrs.³ Some buried blood-stained bones in retired places, and then gave out that they had been informed in a dream that the corpse of some friend of God was there interred.⁴ Many, especially of the monks, travelled through the different provinces, and not only shamelessly carried on a traffic in fictitious relics, but also deceived the eyes of the multitude with ludicrous combats with evil spirits.⁵ It would require a volume to detail the various impositions which were for the most part successfully practised by artful knaves, after genuine piety and true religion were compelled to resign their dominion in great measure to superstition.⁶

4. Many laboured earnestly, few successfully, on the sacred volume. Jerome, a man of great industry, and not unskilful in the languages, made a new Latin translation of all the sacred books, which was more lucid and considerably better than any of the numerous old Latin versions.⁷ He also took much pains to set forth a more correct edition of the Septuagint Greek version; and the same thing we are told was undertaken by Eusebius, Athanasius, and Euthalius.⁸ The expositors of scripture form a long list; among whom the most distinguished are Jerome, Hilary, Eusebius, Diodorus of Tarsus, Rufinus, Ephraem Syrus, Theodorus of Heraclea, Chrysostom, Athanasius, and Didymus. Yet few of these have correctly discharged the duty of interpreters. Rufinus, indeed, Theodorus of Heraclea, Diodorus, and a few others, followed the literal sense of scripture;⁹ the rest, after the example of Origen their guide, search for recondite meanings, and accommodate, or rather constrain the half-understood language of the bible to speak of sacred mysteries and a Christian life.¹⁰ Augustine and Tychonius wished to establish rules for interpretation, but neither of them had ability to do it.¹¹

this designation to every ancient Latin version which was not amended by Jerome, and this has given occasion to many mistakes. See Mosheim, De Reb. Christ. ante C. M. pages 225—229. Jerome mentions a version which he calls (Vulgata) the vulgar, and which Michaelis takes to be that used at Rome in the days of Jerome. These translations, in respect to their diction, were neither classical nor tolerable; yet they may be of use to those who wish to become acquainted with the Latin language in its fullest extent. They contain an immense number of Hebraisms, or rather Syrianisms, which leads to the conjecture that their authors were in great measure Jews. These versions fell into great disorder, in which no two copies were alike, because different translations were in fact blended together, the words of one Evangelist were transferred into the narrative of another, and many glosses were incorporated into the text. This induced the Roman bishop Damasus to commit the improving of these ancient versions to Jerome, who undertook the business in the year 384. He erased the false and incorrect readings, and improved the translations which came into his hands very faultily, uniformly guiding himself by the original text. The improved version of Jerome is held in so high estimation by the Catholic church. The really new translation of the Bible by Jerome was published from manuscripts by the Benedictine monks Martianay and Pouget, Paris, 1693, under the title, Sancti Eusebii Hieronymi Divina Bibliotheca, hactenus inedita. Their Prolegomena are worth reading. See Simon, Hist. Crit. des Versions du Nouv. Test. cap. vii.—xii, and Michaelis, Introd. to the New Test.—Schl. [See Davidson's Lectures on Bib. Crit. Lect. vi. p. 56, and Horne's Introduction, vol. ii. chap. ii. sec. 4.—R.]

⁸ Frick, De Canone Novi Testamenti, p. 180.

⁹ Simon, Critique de la Biblio. des Aut. Ecclés. par M. Du Pin, tome I. pages 61, 90, 129; and tome IV. p. 335, &c.; and Hist. Crit. des Princip. Comment. du Nouv. Test. cap. vi. &c. p. 88, &c.

¹⁰ See Gregory Nazianzen, Carmen de se ipso, in Tollius Insignia Ithieris Italicæ, pages 27, 57. He very much commends this method.

¹¹ Augustine, in his work De Doctrina Christiana; Tychonius, in his Rules of Interpretation which are extant in the Biblioth. Patrurn maximo, tom. vi. p. 48. [See the observations of the late Rev. J. J. Conybeare on the methods of interpretation introduced by Origen and followed by the Nicene expositors, in the fourth and fifth of his Bampton Lectures, entitled, An Attempt to trace the Hist. and to ascertain the Limits of the Secondary and Spiritual Interpretation of Scripture, Oxf. 1824, 8vo.] To this the student should by all means add Dr. Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics Developed and Applied, Edin. 1843, 8vo; the fifth chapter of which presents a condensed but accurate and valuable

¹ Dodwell's Dissertat. ii. in Ireneum, sec. lvi. p. 196, &c.; Le Clerc, in his Appendix Augustiniana, pages 492, 550, 575.

² Concilium Carthagin. v. canon xiv.; Harduin, Concilium, tom. i. p. 988.

³ Sulpitius Severus, De Vita S. Martini, cap. viii.

⁴ Augustine, Sermo 318, sec. i. Opp. tom. v. p. 836, ed. Antwerp.

⁵ See Guthofredus, Ad Codicem Theodor. tom. iii. p. 172; Augustine, De Opere Monachorum, cap. xxviii. sec. xxxvi.; Opp. tom. v. p. 364; Jerome, Epistola ad Rusticum, Opp. tom. i. p. 45.

⁶ The student should read with attention what Isaac Taylor has written on these Nicene miracles, and his reasons for rejecting them as so many fraudulent impostures, in his Ancient Christ. vol. ii. p. 233, &c.—R.

⁷ See Budeus, Isagoge ad Theologiam, tom. ii. p. 1332, &c.—[That there were many Latin versions extant in the fourth century is very clearly stated by Augustine, De Doctrina Christiana, lib. ii. cap. xi. Of these (as Augustine tells us, ubi supra), one was called (Itale) the Italic. But it has become usual to apply

5. The doctors who were distinguished for their learning explained the sacred doctrines after the manner of Origen (on whom they all fixed their eye), in accordance with the principles of that philosophy which they learned in their youth at school, namely, the Platonic philosophy as corrected by Origen. Those who wish to get a full insight into this subject may examine Gregory Nazianzen among the Greeks, and Augustine among the Latins, who were regarded in the subsequent ages as the only patterns worthy of imitation, and may be fitly styled, next to Origen, the parents and supporters of philosophic or scholastic theology. They were both admirers of Plato, and held as certain all his decisions which were not absolutely repugnant to the truths of Christianity; and proceeding upon these as their first principles, they drew from them many and very subtle conclusions. But there was another class of theologians which daily increased in number, who supposed the knowledge of divine things was to be acquired, not by reasoning, but by contemplation, and by recalling the mind from its converse with external objects to a concentration on itself. These are commonly called mystics. That these abounded appears from several considerations, and particularly from the numerous herds of monks who were spread over nearly the entire Christian world, and from the works of Dionysius, that coryphæus of the mystics, which were produced it seems in this century, and by some one of this class.

6. Among the writings of this age in which the doctrines of Christianity are stated and explained, the first place is justly due to the catechetical discourses of Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem; for those who would persuade us that these discourses were the production of a subsequent age are so blinded by zeal for a party as not to discern the truth.¹ Many would also place here the Divine Institutions of Lactantius, but improperly, because this work was designed rather to confute those who still adhered to polytheism than to unfold the truths taught by inspiration. The System of Doctrine addressed to the clergy and laity, which is ascribed to Athanasius, appears to have been the production of a later age.² There are, however, in the works of Athanasius, Chrysostom, the Gregories, and others, as now extant, many passages from which we may learn how the best informed men of this age handled the leading topics of the Christian religion. On the Trinity in particular we have the twelve books of Hilary of Poitiers. The Ancoratus of Epiphanius explains the doctrine concerning Christ and the Holy Spirit. On Baptism we have the work of Pacianus addressed to the catechumens, and a work of Chrysostom, on the same subject, in two books. The works of Jerome, Augustine, and others, which were designed to impart correct views on religious subjects, and to confute the opposers of the truth, are here omitted.

7. From the disputes with those who were regarded as opposed to divine truth the ancient simplicity had nearly taken its flight; and in place of it dialectical subtilities and quibbles, invectives, and other disingenuous artifices had succeeded, more becoming the patrons than the opposers of error. Censures of this custom by men of eminence are still extant.³ I pass in silence those rhetorical figures and flourishes by which many endeavoured to parry the weapons of their adversaries, and to involve in obscurity the question under discussion; likewise the inclination to excite odium against their antagonists so common to many, and the disregard of proper arrangement and of perspicuity, and other habits which were no better in their discussions. Yet so far were some writers of this century from disguising these faults, that they rather claimed praise for them. It must be owned, however, that their antagonists made use of the same weapons.

8. With the ancient form of discussion new sources of argument were in this age combined; for the truth of doctrines was proved by the number of martyrs who had believed them, by prodigies, and by the confessions of devils, that is, of persons in whose bodies some demon was supposed to reside. The discerning cannot but see that all proofs drawn from such sources are very fallacious, and very convenient for dishonest men who would practise imposition; and I greatly fear that most of those who at this time resorted to such proofs, notwithstanding they were grave and eminent men, may be justly charged with the dangerous propensity to use deception. Ambrose, in controversy with the Arians, brings forward persons possessed with devils, who are constrained, when the relics of Gervasius and Protasius are produced, to cry out that the doctrine of the Nicene council concerning three persons in the Godhead is true and history of Biblical interpretation during the first six centuries.—R.

¹ See Fecht, Comment. de Origine Misurum in Honorem Sanctorum, p. 404, &c.

² It is not so much a treatise on dogmatics as one on morals, containing rules of life especially for monks. —Schl.

³ Methodius, cited by Epiphanius, Hæres. 61, Opp. i. p. 563; Gregory Nazianzen in many places; and others.

divine, and the doctrine of the Arians false and pernicious. This testimony of the prince of darkness Ambrose regards as proof altogether unexceptionable. But the Arians openly ridiculed the prodigy, and maintained that Ambrose had bribed these infernals to bear testimony in his favour;¹ and many, I am aware, will be more inclined to believe the Arians than to give credit to Ambrose, notwithstanding he is enrolled among saints and they among heretics.²

9. Besides Apollinaris, Gregory Nazianzen, Cyril of Alexandria, and others, who confuted the emperor Julian, the adherents to idolatry were vigorously and successfully encountered by Lactantius, by Athanasius, by Julius Firmicus Maternus, by the younger Apollinaris whose books against Porphyry are unhappily lost, by Augustine in his twenty-two books on the City of God, and in his three lost books against the pagans; and above all, by Eusebius of Cæsarea in his Evangelical Preparation, and in his book against Hierocles. Attempts to convert the Jews were made by Eusebius of Emessa, by Diodorus of Tarsus, and by Chrysostom in his six books still extant. Against all the heresies Ephraem Syrus,³ James of Nisibis, Didymus, and Audentius took up the pen. So did Epiphanius in his extensive work on the heresies, which he denominated Panarium; and Gregory Nazianzen, more concisely, in his Oration on the Faith. The short works of Augustine and Philastrius rather enumerate the heresies than confute them.

10. The state of moral or practical theology would have been very flourishing if the progress of any branch of knowledge could be measured by the number of the writers on it, for very many laboured to perfect and inculcate practical religion. Among the orientals, the efforts of James of Nisibis, or as some say of Saruga,⁴ and Ephraem Syrus, were very considerable in this department. What we meet with respecting the life and duties of a Christian in the writings of Basil the Great, Gregory Nyssen, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and others, can neither be altogether approved nor wholly condemned. Many give the preference to the three books of Ambrose on the duties of ministers of the church, which are written after the manner of Cicero; and they certainly deserve commendation, so far as the intentions of the writer and the beauty of his thoughts are concerned; but they contain many things which may be justly censured. Perhaps, before all others who wrote on practical piety, the preference is due to Macarius, the Egyptian monk,⁵ from whom, after deducting some superstitious notions and what savours too much of Origenism, we may collect a beautiful picture of real piety.

11. Nearly all the writers in this department are defective in the following respects: First, they pay no regard to method and a just arrangement of their thoughts on the subject they attempt to explain. They rarely define and never divide their subject, but pour out promiscuously whatever suggests itself to their pious, but not very clear and correct minds. In the next place, they either neglect to trace the duties of men back to their sources and their first principles, or they derive them from precepts and doctrines which are either manifestly false or not fully ascertained. Lastly, when they come to the proof of their positions, most of them do not resort to the law of God for arguments to enforce duty and discountenance vice, but to airy fancies, to frigid allegories, and fine-spun subtleties, better suited to amuse the imagination than to awaken and overpower the conscience.

12. But still their works are far more tolerable than that combination of the precepts of Christ with those of Plato, or rather with those of the Alexandrine philosophers the followers of Ammonius Saccas, and that twofold kind of piety—the one more perfect and complete, and the other less so—which almost all now embraced. How very much these views of religion had gained ground may appear from the fact, that those who had long cried up a sort of recondite and mysterious knowledge of divine things wholly different from the common knowledge of the vulgar, ventured in this century to carry out their views and reduce them to a regular system. It is most probable it was among the Greeks of this century

¹ Ambrose, Epist. xxli. p. 878, &c.; Paulinus, De Vita Ambrosii, p. 81.

² See Le Clerc, Appendix Augustiniana, p. 375. More examples of this kind might be mentioned. See Gregory Nyssen, De Vita Gregorii Cæsariensis, Opp. tom. ii. pages 977, 978; Sulpitius Severus, Hist. Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xxxviii. p. 261. [On the disgraceful conduct of Ambrose in connexion with the relics of these two Milanese saints and the alleged attendant miracles, see Isaac Taylor's powerful exposure in his Ancient Christ, vol. ii. p. 242. Let the reader contrast with it the feeble and puerile defence of these palpable impostures offered by Mr. Newman in his Essay on the Eccles. Miracles, p. 145.—R.]

³ See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. pages 118, 125, &c. From his extracts it appears that Ephraem, though a pious man, was not a dexterous polemic.

⁴ Asseman, in his Biblioth. Orient. &c. tom. i. p. 17, thinks that the writings ascribed to James of Nisibis should rather be ascribed to a person of Saruga. But in his Addenda, p. 558, he corrects his opinion in some measure.

⁵ See the Acta Sanctorum, Januarii, tom. i. p. 1005.

(though some think it was earlier and some that it was later) that that fanatic lived who assumed the name and character of Dionysius the Areopagite, the disciple of St. Paul, and who under the cover of this shield gave laws to those who wished to become separated from the world, and by means of contemplation to bring back the soul—that separated particle of the divine nature—to its pristine state.¹ As soon as the writings of this man spread among the Greeks and Syrians, and especially among the solitaries and monks, it is not easy to describe how much darkness spread over the minds of many, and what an accession of numbers was made to those who maintained that converse with God is to be had by mortifying the senses, withdrawing the thoughts from all external objects, subduing the body with hunger and hardships, and fixing the attention on God and eternal things in a kind of holy indolence.

13. The truth of these remarks is evinced by that vast multitude of monks and sacred virgins who, as soon as peace was given to the Christians, spread themselves with astonishing rapidity over the whole Christian world. Many persons of this description among the Christians had long been known to live as solitaries in the deserts of Egypt. But Antony was the first who, in the year 305, collected them into an associated community in Egypt, and regulated their mode of living by fixed rules.² His disciple Hilarion the next year undertook the same thing in Palestine and Syria. About the same time, Aones or Eugenius, with his associates Gaddanas and Azyzus, introduced this mode of life into Mesopotamia and the neighbouring countries.³ These were imitated by many others with so much success, that in a short time all the East swarmed with persons who, abandoning the occupations and conveniences of life and all intercourse with society, pined away amidst various hardships, hunger, and sufferings, in order to attain to a more close communion with God and the angels. The Christian church would have remained free from these numerous torturers of mind and body, had not that great and fascinating doctrine of the ancient philosophy gained credence among Christians, that to attain to happiness and communion with God, the soul must be freed from the influence of the body, and for this purpose the body must be subdued.

14. This austere discipline passed from the East into the West, and first into Italy and the adjacent islands, though it is uncertain who conveyed it thither.⁴ Afterwards St. Martin, the celebrated bishop of Tours, erected some monasteries in Gaul, and by his example and discourses produced such eagerness to embrace a monastic life, that two thousand monks are said to have assembled together at his funeral.⁵ From thence this way of life gradually extended over the other countries of Europe. Those studious of such matters, however, must know that there has always been a wide difference between the monks of the West and those of the East, and that the former could never be brought to bear the severe rules to which the latter submitted. For our part of the world is not so filled with

¹ Those who have written concerning this deceiver are enumerated by Buddeus, Inagoge ad Theologian, lib. II. cap. iv. sec. viii. p. 602, &c. See also Launoi, Judicium de Scriptis Dionysii, Opp. tom. II. p. 562. De la Croze, in his Hist. du Christianisme d'Éthiopie, p. 10, &c. endeavours to prove that Synesius, a celebrated philosopher and bishop in Egypt of the fifth century, was the author of the Dionysian writings, and that he designed by them to support the doctrine of only one nature in Christ. But he uses feeble arguments. Nor are those more substantial by which Barlet (in his Diss. subjoined to his book De Successione Romanor. Episcop. p. 286) endeavours to prove that Dionysius of Alexandria was the true author of those writings.—[The real author of these works is wholly unknown.—That he was not Dionysius the Areopagite mentioned Acts xvii. 34, as he pretends to be and was generally believed to be, from the sixth century on to the fifteenth, is certain. That he was a Greek who lived some time in the fourth century is generally admitted, though some place him a century later. That he was Apollinarius senior or junior of Laodicea, several have laboured to evince, but without much success. He was orthodox, pious, and certainly not destitute of talent. His works consist of single books, on the Celestial Hierarchy or the Invisible world or the church above; on the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy or the visible church of God on the earth, its order, worship, and ordinances; on the Divine names or the designations of God in the Scriptures; on Mystical Theology or on the perfections of God; and eleven epistles. These with the commentaries of some of the later Greek theologians, and notes by the moderns, were printed Gr. and Lat. Antwerp, 1634, and Paris, 1644, 2 vols. fol. See Cave, Hist. Liter.; Dallé, De Scriptis Dionysii Areopagite, Geneva, 1666, 4to; Bp. Pearson, Vindicia Ignatiana, pt. I. cap. x.—Mur. [The most recent work on this subject is by Karl Vogt, entitled, Neo-platonismus und Christenthum, Untersuchungen über die Schriften Dionysius des Areopagiten, Berlin, 1836, 1st part. See also Ritter Geschichte der Christ. Philos. vol. II. p. 515, &c.—R.

² Antony and his regulations are treated of in the Acta Sanctor. ad diem 17 Januarii, tom. II. p. 107.

³ See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic. tom. III. pt. II. p. 48, &c.

⁴ The majority follow Baronius, maintaining that it was Athanasius who, about the year 340, transplanted the monastic institution from Egypt into Italy, and erected the first monastery at Rome. See Mabillon, Præfatio ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. I. p. 9 &c. But Muratori opposes this opinion, and contends that the first European monastery was built at Milan. Antiq. Italicæ. Medii ævi, tom. V. p. 364. Again, Fontaninus in his Hist. Liter. Aquilens. p. 155, &c. maintains that the first society of monks was collected at Aquileia. None of these writers adduces unexceptionable proof. The first convent of nuns was erected at Verona near the close of this century, and by Zeno, the bishop of Verona, if we may give credit to the brothers Ballerini, in their Diss. II. ad Zenonem Veronens. p. 115, &c.

⁵ See Sulpitius Severus, De Vita Martini, cap. x. p. 17, ed. Verona, where the mode of life adopted by these Martinian monks is particularly described. See also the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome I. pt. II. p. 42, and others.

persons who are by nature austere, morose, delirious, and fanatical, as those oriental regions are; nor will our bodies endure that abstemiousness in regard to nourishment which those will who were born under a dry and burning atmosphere. It was therefore rather the name and the shadow of that solitary life which Antony and others instituted in the East, than the thing itself, which was brought into the countries of Europe.¹

15. These monks² were not all of the same kind; for first, they were divided into Cœnobites and Eremites. The former lived and ate together in the same house, and were associated under a leader and head whom they called Father, or, in the Egyptian tongue, Abbot.³ The latter, the Eremites, led a cheerless, solitary life in certain parts of the country, dwelling in hovels among the wild beasts.⁴ Still more austere than the Eremites were those who were called Anchorites. These lived in desert places with no kind of shelter, fed on roots and plants, and had no fixed residence, but lodged wherever night overtook them, so that visitors might not know where to find them.⁵ The last class of monks were the Vagrants, called by the Egyptians Sarabites, who roamed about the provinces and from city to city, and got their living without labour, by pretended miracles, by trafficking in relics, and by other impositions.⁶ Among the Cœnobites many were vicious and profligate, but not so many as among the Sarabites, most of whom were knaves and villains. Of the Eremites, the greater part were delirious fanatics who were not in their right mind.⁷ All these monks were hitherto laymen or separate from the clerical order, and under the care and protection of the bishops; but many of them were now admitted into the rank of clergymen even by the command of the emperors, and so great was their reputation for sanctity, that bishops were often chosen from among them.⁸

16. To these defects in the moral system of the age must be added two principal errors now almost publicly adopted, and

¹ This difference between the oriental and the occidental monks, as to their mode of living and the cause of it, are pleasantly noticed by Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. De Vita Martini, cap. ii. p. 65, ed. Verona. One of the interlocutors having described the dry and sparing diet of the Egyptian monks, Sulpitius turned to his Gallic friend and said, "How would you like a bunch of herbs and half a loaf as a dinner for five men? Ho, reddening a little on being so rallied, replied, 'You are at your old practice, Sulpitius, for you neglect no opportunity that occurs to tax us [Gallic monks] with voracity. But it is cruel in you to require us Gauls to live in the manner of angels. But let Cyreniar [monk] content himself with such a dinner, since it is his necessity or nature to go hungry. We, as I have often told you, are Gauls.'" In the same dialogue, cap. iv. pages 69, 70, he taxes Jerome with accusing the monks of edacity, and goes on to say, "I perceive that he refers rather to the oriental monks than to the occidental; for edacity in the Greeks [and orientals] is gluttony, in the Gauls it is nature." Immediately therefore on the introduction of the monastic institution into Europe, the occidental monks differed widely from the oriental in their customs and mode of living, and were taxed by them with voraciousness and gluttony.

² The word monk (μοναχὸς, from μοναχῆν, to live alone) first occurs in the fourth century, and is kindred with ascetic (ἀσκητής, from ἀσκέω, to practice, to exercise). At least the monks were also called ascetics, though all ascetics were not monks; for the name ascetic denotes a Christian who devotes himself to severe religious exercises, and particularly to abstinence and fasting. Such ascetics have always existed among Christians, but these were not always monks. The word ascetic is a generic term; the word monk denotes a species under that genus. This is conceded by the Catholics, Valesius (notes on Euseb. Hist. Eccles. lib. xi. cap. xvii. and De Martyr. Palest. cap. xi.) and by Pagi, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 62, sec. iv. tom. i. p. 48.—The males among the monks were called Monni and the females Monne. See Jerome, Ep. ad Eustoch. Opp. tom. iv. pt. ii. p. 34, ed. Martianay. Erasmus derives the term monnus from the Egyptian language; Vossius derives it from the Hebrew מנחם son de Pithi Sermonis, lib. i. cap. vi. p. 9; lib. ii. cap. xiii. De Orig. Idolol. lib. i. cap. xxiv.—Schl.

³ The Cœnobites derived their name from (κοινὸν βίον) cœnobium (κοινὸς βίος), a habitation in which several monks lived together. The ancients discriminated between a cœnobium and a monastery. The latter was the residence of proper and solitary monks; the former, of associated monks who lived together in a society. The habitation of a single, solitary monk, might be called a monastery, but not a cœnobium. See Cassianus, Collat. xviii. cap. x. Opp. 525; and compare Jerome, Ep. xcv. ad Rusticum Monachum, Opp. tom. iv. pt. ii. p. 775; and Gregory Naz. Orat. xxi. Opp. tom. i. p. 384.—The nuns also had their presidents, who were called Mothers. See Jerome, Ep. xx. Opp. tom. iv. pt. ii. p. 51. See also Bingham, Origines Ecclesiast. vol. II. p. 63.—Schl.

⁴ From a passage in the beginning of the Historia Lausiaca of Palladius, it may be inferred that in the most ancient times the eremites and the anchorites were the same, for he speaks of the ἀναχωρητὰν τὰν ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ. But subsequently a distinction was made between them.—Schl. [The terms monks, eremites, anchorites or anachorites, were at first all used as synonymous, and were applied indiscriminately to those Egyptian ascetics who (ἀναχωρητὰν) retired from the world and lived solitary (μοναχοί, from μόνος, alone) in the wilderness, (ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ), for the sake of practising (ἀσκέειν) religious exercises without interruption. The words ascetic and monk continued to be generic, and were applied to all who devoted themselves to a religious life, and subjected themselves to strict rules of living. The other terms acquired more appropriate significations, when the monks became distributed into various classes or sorts.—Mur. [Further information on all that relates to the ascetics of the primitive church may be found in Bingham's Orig. Eccles. book vii. in his Works, vol. ii. p. 234, &c.—R.]

⁵ See Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. De Vita Martini, cap. ix. p. 80, &c. ed. Verona. [When several anchorites lived in the same wilderness only a little separated from each other, they were collectively called a Laura. See Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xxi., and Valesius, note on this passage. See also Walch's Hist. Eccles. p. 1670.—Schl.] from which afterwards immense evils resulted. The first was, that to deceive and lie is a virtue when religion can be promoted by it. The other was, that errors in religion, when maintained and adhered to after proper admonition, ought to be visited with penalties and punishments. The first of these principles had been embraced in the preceding centuries; and it is almost incredible what a mass of the most insipid fables, and what a host of pious falsehoods, have through all the centuries grown out of it, to the great detriment of true religion. If some inquisitive person were to examine the conduct and writings of the greatest and most pious teachers of this century, I fear he would find nearly all of them infected with this leprosy. I cannot except Ambrose, nor Hilary, nor Augustine, nor Gregory Nazianzen, nor Jerome. And perhaps it was this same fault which led Sulpitius Severus, who was in other respects no incompetent historian, to ascribe so many miracles to St. Martin. The other principle, from the very time when Constantine gave peace and security to the Christians, was approved by many; and in the conflicts with the Priscillianists and Donatists it was corroborated by examples, and unequivocally sanctioned by the authority of Augustine, and transmitted to succeeding ages.

⁶ Concerning the Sarabites, see Cassian, Collatio, xviii. cap. 7. Opp. p. 731, &c. and the notes of Gazenus there.—Mur.

⁷ On the vices of the monks of this century see Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. De Vita Martini, cap. viii. pages 69, 70; cap. xxi. p. 88, where he chastises in particular the pride of those who coveted the honours of clergymen; Dial. ii. cap. viii. p. 112; Dial. iii. cap. xv. pages 144, 145; also the Consultatio Apollonii et Zachari, published by D'Achery, in his Spicilegium, tom. i. lib. iii. cap. iii. p. 53, &c.

⁸ See Golthofredus on the Codex Theodos. tom. vi. pt. i. pages 76—106, ed. Ritter.

17. If we look at the lives and morals of Christians, we shall find as heretofore that good men were commingled with bad; yet the number of the bad began gradually to increase, so that the truly pious and godly appeared more rare. When there was no more to fear from enemies without; when the character of most bishops was tarnished with arrogance, luxury, effeminacy, animosity, resentments, and other defects; when the lower clergy neglected their proper duties, and were more attentive to idle controversies than to the promotion of piety and the instruction of the people; when vast numbers were induced, not by a rational conviction, but by the fear of punishment and the hope of worldly advantage, to enrol themselves as Christians, how can it surprise us that on all sides the vicious appeared a host, and the pious a little band almost overpowered by them? Against the flagitious and those guilty of heinous offences the same rules for penance were prescribed as before the reign of Constantine; but as the times continually waxed worse, the more honourable and powerful could sin with impunity, and only the poor and the unfortunate felt the severity of the laws.

18. This century was fruitful in controversies among Christians, for, as is common with mankind, external peace made room for internal discords and contentions. We shall here mention the more considerable ones which did not give rise to obstinate heresies. In Egypt, soon after the century began, or about the year 306, commenced the long-continued schism, which from the author of it was called the Meletian controversy. Peter, the bishop of Alexandria, deposed Meletius, the bishop of Lycopolis in Thebais. The cause is involved in uncertainty. The friends of Peter represent Meletius as one who had sacrificed to the gods, and had committed other crimes.¹ Others say he was guilty of no offence but that of excessive severity against the lapsed.² Meletius disregarded the sentence of Peter, and not only continued to exercise the functions of his office, but assumed to himself the power of consecrating presbyters, a right which, according to established usage in Egypt, belonged exclusively to the bishop of Alexandria. The partisans of this energetic and eloquent man were numerous, and at length not a few of the monks espoused his cause. The Nicene council attempted in vain to heal this breach. The Meletians on the contrary, whose chief aim was to oppose the authority claimed by the bishop of Alexandria, afterwards joined themselves to his great enemies, the Arians. Thus a contest, which at first related only to the limits of the Alexandrian bishop's powers, became through the influence of heated passions a controversy respecting an article of faith. The Meletian party was still existing in the fifth century.³

¹ Athanasius, Apologia Secunda, Opp. tom. i. p. 777, &c.

² Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxviii. Opp. tom. i. p. 716, &c. See Petavius, note on Epiphanius. tom. ii. p. 274; and Basnage, Exercitatione de Rebus Sacris contra Baronium, p. 305, &c.

³ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. vi.; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. viii. [Two widely different accounts of the origin and cause of the Meletian schism have reached us. The one is from the pen of Athanasius, their avowed foe; the other is from Epiphanius, the historian of the early heresies. The Romish writers prefer the statement of Athanasius; but the most learned Protestant writers of late generally follow Epiphanius. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. iv. pages 355–410; Henke, Kirchenges. vol. i. p. 196, &c.; Schroeckh, Kirchenges. vol. v. pages 265–273; Neander, Kirchenges. vol. ii. pt. i. pages 463–471; and Gieseler's text-book translated by Cunningham, vol. i. p. 166. The statement of Athanasius (Apolog. ad Imp. Constantinum, Opera, tom. i. p. 777, ed. Colon. 1696) is as follows:—"Peter, a bishop among us before the persecution and an acknowledged martyr in it, deposed in a common council of bishops an Egyptian bishop called Meletius, who stood convicted of many crimes, and especially of sacrificing to idols. Meletius did not appeal to another council, nor endeavour to purge himself before Peter's successors, but created a schism; and his followers, instead of being called Christians, are called Meletians to this day. He at once began to utter reproaches against the bishops; and first he calumniated Peter, then his successor Achilles, and after him Alexander; and he did this with craftiness, after the example of Absalom, that, by calumniating the innocent, he might hide the shame of his own deposition." Such is the invective of their avowed

19. Not long after Meletius, one Eustathius excited great commotions in Armenia, Pontus, and the neighbouring countries, and was therefore condemned in the council of Gangra, which was held not long adversary. On the contrary, Epiphanius, who spent several years in Egypt, several of them probably in the lifetime of Meletius and certainly while the schism excited great attention, and who passed the rest of his life in the neighbourhood of Egypt and had constant communication with it, gives us a full and apparently very candid history of the schism, which is too long to be transcribed, but which is substantially as follows (Her. lxxviii. Opera, tom. i. p. 716, &c. ed. Petau, Colon.):—During the persecution under Diocletian and Maximian, Peter the archbishop of Alexandria and Meletius an eminent bishop in Thebais (who ranked next to Peter, and under him managed ecclesiastical affairs) and many others were imprisoned. While several of these had suffered martyrdom and others had yielded to their fears, and saved themselves by sacrificing to idols, those eminent bishops were kept long in prison and reserved for the last victims. Those who had lapsed became anxious for reconciliation to the church, and they besought the confessors still in prison to interpose their authority. Warm debates arose on the subject among these confessors. Meletius and others held that the lapsed ought to be excluded from the church to the end of the persecution, and then if they appeared worthy, to be admitted to penances proportionate to their offences. But Peter maintained that they should at once be admitted to suitable penances, and so be restored. At length Peter, finding his proposal defeated by the zeal of Meletius, hung out his mantle in the midst of the prison for a standard, and called on those who agreed with him to assemble round it, and those who sided with Meletius to repair to him. But the mass of the imprisoned confessors gathered round Meletius, and only a very few joined Peter. From this time the two parties worshipped separately, and the schism became complete—even in the prison! (This was in the year 306, according to Baronius, Annal. ann. 306, no. 44, or in the year 301, according to Pagi, Critica, ad Baron. ann. 306, no. 29.) Peter afterwards suffered martyrdom, but Meletius and others were transported from place to place—sometimes shut up in the mines and sometimes banished to distant regions. Everywhere Meletius ordained bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and erected separate churches, his followers having no communion with the others. Peter's successors retained the ancient churches, which were called the churches of the Catholics, while the new churches of the Meletians bore the title of the martyrs' churches. According to this account of the origin of the schism, the only crime of Meletius was that he erected separate churches and ordained bishops, &c. over them, not subject to the archbishops of Alexandria nor holding communion with the Catholics. No other crime is alleged against him by the council of Nice which censured him, nor by the four bishops and martyrs (Hesychius, Pachomius, Theodorus, and Philas) who remonstrated with him for his conduct. (See their letter in Maffei, Osservazioni Letterarie, tom. iii. Verona, 1738; also Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. lib. viii. cap. xlii.) What therefore Athanasius charges upon him as his greatest offence, that he offered sacrifices to idols, is not only inconsistent with the explicit statement of Epiphanius, but is also highly improbable, not to say impossible, since the Meletian party owed its existence to its peculiar rigour against the lapsed; for such a party cannot be supposed to have been formed and ruled over from its commencement by the most notorious of all the lapsed, and one already deposed for this very crime. The subject of this schism was brought before the council of Nice in 325, and they endeavoured to remove it by confirming the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Alexandria and limiting that of Meletius to his own diocese, and subjecting him and his clergy to certain other restrictions. See the letter of the council to the African clergy in Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. ix. The list of the Meletian clergy at that time embraced the names of twenty-eight bishops, with four presbyters and five deacons of Alexandria. See Athanasius, Apolog. ad Imp. Constant. Opp. tom. i. pages 788-9, after the Nicene council. Whether this man was Eustathius the bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, who was the coryphæus of the semi-Arians, or whether the ancients confounded two persons of the same name, is debated with nearly equal weight of argument on both sides.¹ The founder of the Eustathian sect is charged not so much with unsoundness in the faith as with extravagant notions of piety, for he is said to have prohibited marriage, the use of flesh and wine, love-feasts, &c. and to have recommended immediate divorce to all married persons, and to have granted to children and servants the liberty of violating the commands of their parents and masters under pretext of religion.²

20. Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari in Sardinia, a man of decision, sternness, and vigour, who was driven into exile by the emperor Constantine for defending the Nicene doctrine of three persons in one God, first separated from Eusebius of Vercelli in the year 363, because the latter was displeased that the former had consecrated Paulinus bishop of the church of Antioch. He afterwards separated himself from the communion of the whole church, because it had decreed that absolution might be granted who adds that there were in Egypt, &c. nearly one hundred bishops in his communion. Meletius did not long survive his censure, and after his death Alexander resorted to coercive measures in order to bring the Meletians to submission. They now applied to the emperor Constantine, and Eusebius bishop of Nicomedia promised to assist them if they would join with Arius. They consented, and he obtained from the emperor the privileges of a tolerated sect. But this alliance involved them in the Arian contests, and from this time many of the Meletians embraced the opinions of Arius. See Epiphanius, Her. lxxviii. and Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxi.—Nur.

¹ See Basnage, Annales Politico-Eccles. tome ii. p. 840, &c.

² Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xliii.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xiv. lib. ii. cap. xxiv.; Epiphanius, Her. lxxvi. p. 110; Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xvi.; and Gundling, Notæ ad Concilium Gangrense, p. 9, &c. [Walch, in his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iii. pages 536—577, has treated circumstantially and solidly concerning the Eustathians. See also his Hist. der Kirchenversammlungen, p. 216, &c. The chief sources for a history of the Eustathians are the documents of the council of Gangra, consisting of a synodical epistle and twenty canons. From these sources both Socrates and Sozomen derived their information. The author of the Life of St. Basil which is prefixed to the third vol. of the works of Basil, maintains (cap. v. sec. iv. &c.) that the founder of this party was not Eustathius, but rather Arius; and that therefore the persons with whom the council of Gangra had to do should not be called Eustathians but Arians. But the arguments are not so powerful as to compel a reflecting reader to abandon the common opinion. Whether the bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, who is so famous in the history of the Arian heresy, and who had some connexion with Arius, or another Eustathius, was the origin of this controversy, cannot be determined with certainty. Yet the arguments for the first supposition seem to preponderate. This Eustathius was a pupil of Arius, and a lover of monkery. Many different councils passed their judgment on him—some putting him down, and others regarding him as a valuable man. He has been accused of instability in his belief; but he seems properly to have been a semi-Arian.—Schl.

to those bishops who under Constantius had deserted to the Arians;¹ at least this is cer-

¹ Rufinus, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. xxx.; Socrates, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. ix. See also Tillemont, Mémoires de l'Hist. de l'Eglise, tome vii. p. 521, ed. Paris [and, above all others, Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iii. pages 338—377. From him we shall enlarge the account given by Mosheim. When the orthodox party under Constantius, after the adverse result to them of the council of Arles, found themselves in great danger, and were deliberating about requesting the emperor to summon a new council, Lucifer proceeded to Rome, and being constituted envoy of the Romish bishop Liberius, he thence repaired to the imperial court in Gaul, and obtained of the emperor the council of Milan, by which however the emperor intended to further his own purposes. And as Lucifer was one of those who in that council zealously espoused the cause of the orthodox, he fell under the emperor's displeasure, and was sent among others into banishment. When the death of the emperor left him at liberty to return from exile, he became involved in the Meletian controversy at Antioch, and this occasioned his falling out with Eusebius, bishop of Vercelli; for he led on and consecrated the aged Paulinus bishop, which Eusebius greatly disapproved, because, according to the decrees of the council held at Alexandria by Athanasius, he with Lucifer was commissioned to heal the division at Antioch, which was now widened still more by the unwise step of Lucifer. The same council had also decreed that the Arian bishops, after acceding to the Nicene creed, might be received into the church and remain in their offices. But the refusal of Eusebius to approve of the proceedings of Lucifer at Antioch, and the mild regulations of the Alexandrian council respecting those he accounted apostate bishops, which he could by no means approve, induced him to break off all church communion with such as approved those regulations; and thence arose the schism which bears his name. After this separation he continued to exercise his functions at Cagliari for nine years, and at last died at an advanced age.—Schl. [The following more full account of the Meletian controversy at Antioch is given by Schlegel from Walch:—After the council of Nice, Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, very strenuously opposed the progress of Arian doctrines, and was therefore deprived of his office, and another was elected in his place who was more favourable to the Arians; and after him succeeded others, all holding Arian sentiments. The last of these was Eudoxius, who was removed to Constantinople on the deposition of Macedonius, bishop of that city, A.D. 360. Meletius of Syria was now chosen bishop of Antioch by a council. He had before been bishop of Sebaste, and the heads of the Arian party supposed him to hold the Arian sentiments. He at least held communion with Arians, and had by his virtuous life obtained a high reputation. At first Meletius concealed his sentiments, and in his public discourses treated only on practical subjects. But as one part of his hearers were orthodox and the other part Arians, he did not long leave them in uncertainty, but acknowledged to them his conviction of the correctness of the Nicene faith. This acknowledgment was the source of much suffering to Meletius. The Arians resented it very highly that he should disappoint their expectations; and as he would not retract, they deprived him of his office A.D. 362, by the aid of the emperor Constantius, and banished him from the country. Meletius now left Antioch and went to his native city Melitene. In his place Euzotus, one of the oldest friends of Arius, was appointed. But the orthodox, who would not acknowledge him as a bishop, now wholly ceased to worship with the Arians, which they had done up to this time. Thus there were now three parties at Antioch—the Arians who acknowledged Euzotus for their bishop; the Eustathians, who ever since the deposition of Eustathius (A.D. 327), whom they regarded as the legitimate bishop of Antioch, had ceased to worship with the Arians, and held their separate meetings without making disturbance; and the Meletians, who were the majority and who acknowledged Meletius for the legitimate bishop. The Meletians were willing to unite with the Eustathians, on condition that they would look upon Meletius as themselves did. But the Eustathians refused to do so, and would not acknowledge the Meletians for brethren, that the little company of his followers or the Luciferians, would have no intercourse with the bishops who joined themselves to the Arian sect, nor with those who had absolved these bishops after confessing their fault, and thus they renounced the whole church.² They are likewise reported to have held erroneous sentiments respecting the human soul, viewing it as generated from the bodies of the parents, or as transfused by the parents into their children.³

21. About the same time, or not long after, Aërius, a presbyter, monk, and semi-Arian, rent Armenia, Pontus, and Cappadocia, by opinions different from those commonly received, and thus founded a sect. First, he maintained that by divine appointment there was no difference between bishops and presbyters. Yet it is not very clear how far he carried this sentiment, though it is certain that it was very pleasing to many who were disgusted with because they considered both them and their bishop as not pure enough from the Arian infection. Athanasius, Eusebius of Vercelli, and Lucifer, attempted to reconcile these divisions. Lucifer afterwards (A.D. 362) consecrated a new bishop of Antioch, whom however the Eustathians only would receive. Meletius now came back to Antioch, and thus there were two bishops of Antioch, Paulinus (the Eustathian bishop) and Meletius, and the difficulties were increased rather than settled by the procedure of Lucifer. The foreign bishops took part in this controversy. Athanasius looked on Paulinus as the most orthodox, and therefore he and the greater part of the West took the side of Paulinus. The eastern bishops were on the side of Meletius, who was exiled by the emperor Valens, but returned after that emperor's death, and suddenly died, A.D. 311. The Greek and the Latin churches enrolled him among the saints after his death. As respects the Latin church, this was a very extraordinary transaction. Meletius died entirely out of communion with the Romish see; and yet he is numbered among their saints! Either the pope then must not be infallible, or the Romish church worships as saints persons who, according to her own principles, are unworthy of worship. The death of Meletius did not restore peace at Antioch. The Meletians, instead of acknowledging Paulinus for a legitimate bishop, elected Flavianus, an orthodox and irreproachable character, for a successor to Meletius. This Flavianus was supported by the bishops of Syria, Palestine, Phœnicia, Cappadocia, Galatia, the Lesser Asia, and Thrace; on the side of Paulinus were the bishops of Rome and Italy, and of Egypt and Arabia, who wished for the deposition of Flavianus. Paulinus died in 389; but instead of giving peace to the church, influenced probably by a fanatical obstinacy, he consecrated before his death one Evagrius as his successor over his little party. Soon after A.D. 393 Evagrius died, but the disunion still continued. Finally, through the prudence and the peace-making temper of Chrysostom, peace and ecclesiastical communion between the two parties were restored. Flavianus was acknowledged by the foreign bishops as the bishop of Antioch. Yet there remained a little handful of Eustathians, who did not unite with the general church, till Flavianus was succeeded by other bishops. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iv. pages 410—502.—Schl.

² See the petition addressed to Theodosius, by Marcellinus and Faustinus, two Luciferians, in the works of Sirmond, tom. ii. p. 229, &c.

³ See Augustine, De Hæres. cap. lxxxi.; and on that passage see Damascus, p. 346. [This account is very doubtful, and Augustine himself does not state it as a matter of certainty. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 368.—Schl.

the arrogance of the bishops of that age. In the next place, Aërius disapproved of prayers for the dead, the stated fasts, the celebration of Easter, and other things, which most persons regarded as the very soul of religion.¹ He seems to have aimed to reduce religion to its primitive simplicity; a design which, in itself considered, was laudable, though in the motives and the mode of proceeding there were perhaps some things censurable.

22. There were various persons of this character in the fourth century who were disgusted with the progress of superstition and of errors respecting the true nature of religion, and who opposed the general current; but the only fruit of their labour was that they were branded with infamy. Eminent among them was Jovinian, an Italian monk, who taught first at Rome and then at Milan near the close of the century, and persuaded many that all persons whatsoever, if they keep the vows they make to Christ in baptism and lead godly lives, have an equal title to the rewards of heaven, and consequently that those who spent their lives in celibacy, or macerate their bodies by fasting, are no more acceptable to God than those who lived in wedlock, and nourished their bodies with moderation and sobriety. These sentiments were first condemned by the church of Rome, and then by Ambrose in a council held at Milan in the year 390.² The emperor Honorius enacted penal laws against those holding such sentiments, and Jovinian he banished to the island Boa.³ Jovinian published his opinions in a book, against which Jerome in the following century wrote a most bitter and abusive treatise, which is still extant.

23. Of all the religious controversies, those concerning Origen made the greatest noise and continued the longest. Though Origen had long been accused of many errors, yet hitherto most Christians had regarded his name with veneration. But now the Arians, cunningly looking on every side for support, maintained that this great man had been of their party. Some believed them, and therefore indulged the same hatred towards Origen as towards the Arians. Yet some of the most eminent and best informed men rebutted the charge, and strove to vindicate the reputation of their master against these aspersions. Among these,

¹ Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxv. p. 905, &c.; Augustine, De Hæres. c. liii. and some others. [The last is not a witness of much weight. He had no acquaintance with the Arians, but took one part of his statement from Epiphanius ubi supra, and the other from Philastrius, De Hæres. c. lxxii. p. 140. Epiphanius had it in his power to get, and did get, better information respecting the oriental controversies than Philastrius could. The latter speaks of Aërius as one unknown to him; the former as one whose history he well knew, and who was then alive. Epiphanius knew the Encratites very well, and he distinguishes them from the Arians; but Philastrius confounds them. Aërius was a native of Pontus or of the Lesser Armenia, an eloquent man, and a friend of the well-known semi-Arian Eustathius, afterwards bishop of Sebaste, with whom he lived at the same time among the monks. The elevation of Eustathius to the see of Sebaste first awakened envy in Aërius, he having himself aspired after that promotion. To allay that feeling Eustathius made his friend a presbyter, and committed to his care the superintendence of a house for the reception of strangers. But the good understanding between them was of short continuance. Aërius could be restrained by nothing from his restless conduct towards his bishop, whom he accused of avarice and misappropriation of the funds for the poor. At last they came to a breach. Aërius abandoned his office and his hospital, and acquired many adherents, to whom none would show indulgence, as the disposition to persecute was then almost universal among the clergy. Aërius maintained that in the times of the apostles there was no difference between a bishop and a presbyter; and this he solidly proved from passages in Paul. He was not disposed to abolish the human rights of bishops, but only to rescue the presbyters from episcopal oppression in the exercise of their legitimate functions. He held the prayers and the alms of the living for the dead to be useless and dangerous, and discarded the regular prescribed Christian fasts on certain days. The festival of Easter he did not wholly discard, as it is commonly supposed, but only the ceremony of slaying a lamb at Easter, which according to ancient custom was practised by some Christians. This appears from the argument by which he supported his opinion. For he says, "Christians should keep no Passover, because Paul declares Christ, who was slain for us, to be our Paschal Lamb." This reasoning would be insipid, if Aërius proposed by it to put down altogether the whole festival of Easter. Aërius was therefore in the right and his opposers in the wrong. Only his obstinacy in pushing matters to a schism is blameable. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. iii. pages 321—338.—Schl.

² See Jerome In Jovinianum, Opp. tom. ii; Augustine, De Hæres. c. lxxxii.; Ambrose, Ep. vi. &c. [Jovinian lived at Rome when he advanced the doctrines which were so strenuously opposed; yet it is uncertain whether Rome or Milan was his native place. He was not unlearned, and he lived a single life. To the preceding doctrines of Jovinian the following may be added:—That Mary ceased to be a virgin by bringing forth Christ, which some denied; that the degrees of future blessedness do not depend on the meritoriousness of our good works; and that a truly converted Christian, so long as he is such, cannot sin wilfully, but will so resist the temptations of the devil as not to be overcome by him. For these doctrines Jovinian was accused by some Christians at Rome, before Siricius, the Roman bishop. A council was assembled by Siricius, by which Jovinian was condemned and excommunicated. He then retired with his friends to Milan. There they were condemned by a council which Ambrose assembled. By such persecution the party was soon crushed. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. iii. pages 635—682.—Schl. [The reader will find further references to this controversy between Jerome and Jovinian in the next century, pt. ii. chap. iii. sec. 14. when the kindred dispute between the same father and Vigilantius is discussed.—It.

³ Codex Theodosianus, tom. iii. p. 218, tom. vi. p. 193. [This law is dated in the year 412; but according to the representation of Jerome, Jovinian, in the year 406, must have been dead some considerable time. The law therefore must have been aimed against altogether a different person—and there appears in it no traces of the complaints brought against Jovinian—or the date of it must be erroneous, as was conjectured by Tillemont, tome; x. pages 229, 753. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. iii. p. 664, &c.—Schl. [Jovinian was condemned at Rome and Milan about the year 398, and with him eight other persons. About the year 390, Sarmatio and Barbatianus, two monks of Milan, advanced similar doctrines at Vercelli. See Ambrose, Epist. lxxii. (or xxv. or lxxxii. in some editions) ad Vercell. Eccles.—Mur.

Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea, stood pre-eminent in consequence of his written Apology for Origen. And I believe this storm, raised against the honour of a man to whom the whole Christian world paid respect, would have soon subsided if new comminations had not arisen which proceeded from another source.

24. All the monks, and especially those of Egypt, were enthusiastic admirers of Origen, and they spared no pains to disseminate everywhere the opinions which they imbibed from him. Yet they could not persuade all to believe that those opinions were sound and correct. Hence first appeared a kind of smothered disagreement respecting the character of Origen's doctrines, which gradually increased till it burst into an open flame. Among many others, John, bishop of Jerusalem, was in favour of Origen; and as Epiphanius and Jerome were from other causes hostile to John, they endeavoured to excite odium against him on this ground. He defended himself in such a way as to protect the reputation of Origen, and at the same time to have the whole swarm of monks and innumerable others on his side. From this beginning arose those vehement contests respecting the doctrines of Origen which pervaded both the East and the West. In the West they were fomented especially by Rufinus, a presbyter of Aquileia, who translated some of Origen's books into Latin, and who showed not obscurely that he was pleased with the sentiments those books contained.¹ He therefore now incurred the implacable wrath of Jerome. But at length Rufinus being dead, the men of high reputation in the West opposing the progress of Origenism both by their influence and their writings, these comminations seemed to subside in the West.

25. In the East far greater troubles came upon the church on account of Origenism. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who was for various reasons hostile to some of the monks of Scetys and Nitria, taxed them with their Origenism, and ordered them to throw away the books of Origen. The monks resisted his command, alleging sometimes that the objectionable passages in the writings of that holy man were interpolations of the heretics, and sometimes that it was improper to condemn the whole together on account of a few censurable passages. Theophilus therefore having assembled a council at Alexandria in the year 399, which condemned the Origenists, with an armed force drove the monks from the mountain of Nitria. They first fled to Jerusalem, and thence removed to Scythopolis; but finding themselves insecure there likewise, they set sail for Constantinople, intending to lay their cause before the imperial court.² The remainder of their history belongs to the next century. But it is proper to remark that those who are denominated Origenists in the writings of this age were not all of one character; for this ambiguous term sometimes denotes merely a person who was friendly to Origen, one who looked upon his books as corrupted and did not defend the errors of which he was accused; but at other times it designates persons who admitted that Origen taught all that he was charged with teaching, and who resolutely defended his opinions. Of this latter class were many of the monks.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES.

1. WHILE the fostering care of the emperors sought to advance the Christian religion, the indiscreet piety of the bishops obstructed its true nature and oppressed its energies by the multiplication of rites and ceremonies. The observation of Augustine is well known—That the yoke once laid upon the Jews was more supportable than that laid on many Christians in his age.³ For the Christian bishops introduced with but slight alterations into the Christian worship, those rites and institutions by which formerly the Greeks and Romans and other nations had manifested their reverence towards their imaginary deities, supposing that the people would more readily embrace Christianity if they perceived the rites, handed down to them from their fathers, still existing unchanged among the Christians, and perceived that Christ and the martyrs were worshipped in the same manner as formerly their gods were. There was of course little difference in these times between the public worship of the Christians and that of the Greeks and Romans. In both alike there were splendid robes, mitres, tiaras, wax-tapers, croziers,⁴ processions,

² See Huet, Origeniana, lib. ii. cap. iv. p. 196, &c.; Doucin, Hist. de l'Origenisme, livr. iii. p. 95, &c.; Hieron. a Prato, Diss. vi. in Sulpitium Severum De Monachis ob Origenis Nomen ex Nitria totaque Ægyptu pulsii, p. 273, Veron. 1741, fol. These writers cite the ancient authorities, but they make some mistakes. [The literary history of this controversy is given by Walch, Hist. Eccles. p. 1042, &c.—Schl. [The history itself, but without naming authorities, is given by Neander in his Chrysostomus u. dessen Zeitalter. pt. ii. p. 163, &c.—Mur.

³ Augustine, Ad Iunarium, Epist. cxix. according to the ancient division.

⁴ The crozier or bishop's staff was exactly of the

¹ See especially Fontaninus, Hist. Liter. Aquileiens. lib. iv. cap. lii. p. 177, &c. where he gives an elaborate history of Rufinus.

lustrations, images, golden and silver vases, and innumerable other things.¹

2. No sooner had Constantine renounced the religion of his ancestors than magnificent temples were everywhere erected, which were adorned with pictures and images, and which both in their external and their internal form were very similar to the fanes and temples of the gods.² These temples were of two kinds. Some were erected at the graves of the martyrs, and were called Martyria. The people assembled in these only at stated times. Others were intended for the ordinary and common meetings for religious worship, and were afterwards called by the Latins Tituli.³ Both were consecrated with imposing pomp, and with rites borrowed in great measure from the ancient pontifical code of the Romans; and what is more strange, a great part of religion was supposed to consist in a multitude of churches, and the right of patronage, as it is called, was introduced among Christians for no other reason than to induce opulent persons to build churches.⁴ Thus in this particular the true religion evidently copied after superstition; for the ancient nations supposed that a country or province would be the more prosperous and secure, the more temples, fanes, and chapels were there erected to the gods and heroes, because those gods would be ashamed not to show themselves patrons and defenders of the people who worshipped and honoured them with so much zeal. The same sentiment prevailed among the Christians. They supposed the more temples there were dedicated to Christ, to his servants and friends, the more certain they might be of assistance from Christ and his friends; for they supposed God, Christ, and the inhabitants of heaven equally with us wretched mortals to be delighted and captivated with external signs and expressions of respect.

3. The Christian worship consisted in hymns, prayers, reading the holy scriptures, a discourse to the people, and then closed with the celebration of the Lord's supper; but these exercises were accompanied with various ceremonies, better calculated to please the eye than to excite true devotion.⁵ But all congregations did not by any means follow one and the same rule or form. Each individual bishop according to his own views, and as the circumstances of times, places, and persons suggested, prescribed to his own flock such a form of public worship as he judged best. Hence the variety of liturgies which were in use before the Roman pontiff arrogated to himself supreme power in religious matters, and persuaded people that they ought to copy after the principal church, the common mother of them all, as well in doctrine as in their modes of worship.

4. It would be tedious to go over all the parts of public worship; I will therefore content myself with a few observations. The prayers had declined very much from their primitive simplicity and solemnity, and became turgid and bombastic. Among the public hymns the Psalms of David were now received.⁶ The public discourses among the Greeks especially were formed according to the rules for civil eloquence, form of the lituus, the chief ensign of the ancient Augurs. See Cicero, De Divinatione, lib. i. cap. xvi. — Mur.

¹ Those who wish to inquire farther into this resemblance between Christian and Pagan rites should read Middleton's Letter from Rome, showing the exact Conformity between Popery and Paganism; Lond. 1740. This discussion had been opened in the beginning of the previous century by a French divine, De Croy, in his Les Trois Conformités, 1605, afterwards translated into English, entitled, Harmony of the Romish Church with Gentilism, Judaism, and Ancient Heresies; Lond. 1626. Various other works on this question have been published on the continent, the names of which may be seen in Walch's Biblio. Theol. Selecta, vol. ii. p. 371, &c. — R.

² See Spanheim, Proverbes sur les Césars de Julien, p. 47; but especially Le Brun, Explication Littérale et Histor. des Cérémonies de la Messe, tome ii. p. 101, &c. For a description of such a temple see Eusebius, De Vita Constantini, lib. iii. cap. xxxv. &c. Plates representing the interior form are given by Beveridge, Adnotat. ad Pandectas Canonum, tom. ii. p. 70, and by Spanheim, Indit. Hist. Eccles. in his Opp. tom. i. p. 860. Some parts of the Christian temples were after the pattern of the Jewish temple. See Vitrunga, De Synagoga Petere, lib. iii. p. 466. [Some of these temples were new buildings erected by the emperors, others were pagan temples transmutated to Christian churches. See Codex. Theodos. lib. ix. tit. xvii. legem. ii.; and Jerome, Chronicon, ann. 332. From the Jews was borrowed the division into the holy of holies, the holy place and the court; from which came the chancel, the nave, and the porch, ἁγία, ναὸς, and παράρτη. — Schl.

³ Mabillon, Museum Italic. tom. ii. in Comment. ad Ordin. Roman. p. 16, &c. [The Tituli of the middle ages were properly the parish churches under the care of presbyters, who derived their titles from the respective churches. See Du Cange, Glossarium Med. et Inf. Latin. voce Titulus. — Mur.

⁴ Boehmer, Jus Eccles. Protestant. tom. iii. p. 466, &c. Bibliothèque Italique, tome v. p. 166, &c. [Whoever erected to any god either a larger or a smaller temple had the right of designating the priests and attendants on the altar who should officiate there. And whoever erected a Christian temple possessed the same right in regard to those who should minister there. This induced many persons to build churches. — Schl.

⁵ The form of public worship or the liturgy of this age, may be very well learned in general from Cyril of Jerusalem, Catechesis xxii.; and from the Apostolic Constitutions, which are falsely ascribed to Clemens Romanus. These writers are carefully explained and interpreted by Le Brun, Explication Littér. et Histor. de la Messe, tome ii. p. 53, &c. which is a very learned work. [See also Ernesti's Antimurator. p. 13, &c. — Schl.

⁶ Beausobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, tome ii. p. 614, &c. [They were sung in course or in their order. Cassian, Institution. lib. ii. cap. ii. iv. lib. iii. cap. iii. Yet for the public worship on certain occasions particular psalms were appointed (Augustine on Ps. xxi.), and it lay with the bishop to designate what psalms he would have sung. Athanasius, Avolog. ii. Augustine on Ps. cxxxviii. — Schl.

and were better adapted to call forth the admiration of the rude multitude who love display than to amend the heart. And that no foolish and senseless custom might be omitted in their public assemblies, the people were allowed to applaud their orators as had been practised in the forum and in the theatres; nay, they were instructed both to applaud and to clap the preachers.¹ Who could suppose that men professing to despise vain glory, and who were appointed to show to others the emptiness of all human things, would become so senseless?

5. The first day of the week, on which Christians were accustomed to meet for the worship of God, Constantine required by a special law to be observed more sacredly than before.² In most congregations of Christians five annual festivals were observed, in remembrance namely of the Saviour's birth, of his sufferings and death for the sins of men, of his resurrection, of his ascension to heaven, and of the descent of the Holy Ghost upon his ministers. Of these festivals that of the fourteen days sacred to the memory of Christ's return to life was observed with much more ceremony than the rest.³ The oriental Christians kept the memorial of the Saviour's birth and of his baptism on one and the same day, namely, the sixth day of January, and this day they called Epiphany;⁴ but the western Christians seem always to have consecrated the twenty-fifth day of December to the memory of the Saviour's birth; for what is reported of the Roman bishop, Julian I. that he transferred the memorial of Christ's birth from the sixth of January to the twenty-fifth of December,⁵ appears to me very questionable. The untoward success of the age in finding the dead bodies of certain holy men increased immensely the commemorations of the martyrs. Devout being chiefly Jews, who were accustomed to assemble at Jerusalem on the great festivals, found it advantageous after their conversion to continue to meet in that city on the two great feasts of the Passover and Pentecost. While thus assembled at Jerusalem, they would naturally recognise with thrilling emotions the recurring anniversaries of their Lord's crucifixion, resurrection from the dead, ascension to heaven, and sending down the Holy Spirit at Pentecost. All these days—Good Friday, Easter Sunday, Ascension Day, and Whitsuntide—occurred during the Jewish feasts of the Passover and Pentecost, or in the interval between them, and having been observed with peculiar interest were at length considered as Christian festivals which apostolic usage had introduced, and were sanctioned by general councils. Augustine (Epist. liv. or cxviii. cap. i.) mentions them as the only festivals which were then regarded as having such an origin and sanction. He admits indeed that the Christians of his age observed also Christmas, or the day of Christ's nativity, as a festival; but he considered it of later origin and less sacred than the four above mentioned (Epist. lv. or cxix. cap. i.). As Augustine represents Christmas as neither derived from apostolic usage nor sanctioned by any general council, Baillet very candidly says (Vies des Saints, tom. iii. p. 290), "There can be no reasonable doubt that it had its rise after the council of Nice." Such a conclusion is the more probable from the ante-Nicene fathers omitting to speak of any such festival in the church, and from their great indifference about ascertaining the day of the Saviour's birth. The following passage from Clemens Alex. (Stromata, lib. i. p. 340 or 249) is almost the only genuine passage of an ante-Nicene writer which can be supposed to allude to such festivals, and as it states the different conjectures in that age respecting the day of Christ's birth, and manifests the indifference with which even the learned treated the subject, the passage is worth giving entire. Clemens had just given a list of all the Roman emperors till the death of Commodus, A.D. 192, and had stated in what years of certain emperors the Saviour was either born, or baptized, or crucified. He then says:—"There are some who ouer curiously (μετ' ἐπιθυμίας) assign not only the year, but also the day of our Saviour's nativity, which they say was in the twenty-eighth year of Augustus, on the (25th of Pachon) 20th of May. And the followers of Basilides observe also the day of his baptism as a festival, spending the whole previous night in reading; and they say it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, on the (15th of Tybi) 10th of January; but some say it was on the (11th) 7th of that month. Among those who nicely calculated the time of his passion, some say it was in the sixteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, the (35th of Phamenoth) 22d of March; others say the (25th of Pharmuthi) 21st of April; and others that it was on the (19th of Pharmuthi) 15th of April that the Saviour suffered. Nay, some of them say that he was born in (Pharmuthi) April, the (25th or 26th) 20th or 21st day." After the establishment of Christianity by Constantine, and among the new institutions which were intended for the benefit of the church, we seem authorised to place the commemoration of Christ's advent. This the oriental Christians generally assigned to the 6th of January, on which day they supposed both the birth and baptism of Christ occurred, and in reference to both they called it Epiphany. But the Western Christians observed the 25th of December as their festival of the nativity. According to an epistle of John, archbishop of Nice (in the Auctor. Bibliot. Patr. ed. Combefis, tom. ii. p. 207) and an anonymous writer cited by Cotelerius (ad Constit. Apostol. v. xlii.), it was Julian I. bishop of Rome, A.D. 337–352, who first ascertained this to be the right day; and though this authority is not the best, yet it is generally admitted that the designation of the 25th of December for the festival was first made about the middle of the fourth century. Afterwards the oriental churches gradually came into the Roman custom, most of them before the end of the century. On the other hand the Western churches adopted the oriental Epiphany on the 6th of

¹ Ferrarius, De Veterum Acclamationibus et Plausu, p. 66.

² Gothofredus, Notes to the Codex Theodos. tom. i. p. 135. [See Eusebius, De Vita Const. lib. iv. cap. xviii. xix. xx. xxiii.: Sozomen, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. viii. The principal laws of Constantine and his successors in regard to the Lord's day and the other festivals, are collected in the Codex Justinianus, lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. 1–11. The Lord's day and the other festivals were placed on the same level. On them all the courts of justice and the public offices were to be closed, except in certain urgent cases. Constantine in the year 321 required the inhabitants of cities and all mechanics to suspend their business on the Lord's day; but he allowed such as resided in the country full liberty to pursue their agriculture, because it was supposed necessary for them to sow their fields and prop their vines when the weather and the season best suited. The emperor Leo however in the year 469, thought agriculture required no exception, and therefore he included farmers under the same prohibition with mechanics. See Imp. Leonis Novella, constitut. 54.—Mur.

³ Gothofredus, Notes on the Codex Theodos. tom. i. 143.

⁴ See Beausobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, tome ii. p. 693, &c.

⁵ See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement Vatic. tom. ii. p. 164; Alph. Du Vignoles, Dissert. in the Biblioth. German. tom. ii. p. 29. [Additional remarks on the origin of the festivals:—The first Christians men would have readily consented to the multiplication of festivals, if the time that Christians consumed in them had been employed to advance them in true holiness; but the majority spent the time rather in idleness and dissipation and other vices than in the worship of God. It is well known among other things what opportunities of sinning were offered to the licentious by the Vigils, as they were called, of Easter and Whitsuntide.

6. It was believed that nothing was more effectual to repel the assaults of evil spirits and to propitiate the Deity than fasting. Hence it is easy to discover why the rulers of the church ordained fasts by express laws, and commanded as a necessary duty what was before left at discretion. The Quadragesimal or Lent fast, as it was called, was considered more sacred than all the rest, though it was not as yet fixed to a determinate number of days.¹ But it should be remembered that the fasts of this age differed much from those observed by Christians in preceding ages. Anciently those who undertook to observe a fast abstained altogether from food and drink; in this age many deemed it sufficient merely to omit the use of flesh and wine,² and this sentiment afterwards became universal among the Latins.

7. For the more convenient administration of baptism sacred fountains or baptisteria³ were erected in the porches of the temples. This sacred rite was always administered, except in cases of necessity, on the vigils of Easter and Whitsuntide, with lighted wax candles and by the bishop, or by the presbyters whom he commissioned for that purpose. In some places salt, a symbol of purity and wisdom, was put into the mouth of the baptized; and everywhere a double anointing was used, the first before and the other after the baptism. After being baptized the persons appeared clad in white gowns during seven days. The other rites, which were either of temporary duration or confined to certain countries, are here omitted.

8. The instruction and discipline of the catechumens were the same in this century as the preceding. That the Lord's supper was administered twice or three times a week (though in some places only on Sundays) to all who assembled for the worship of God, appears from innumerable testimonies. It was also administered at the sepulchres of the martyrs and at funerals; whence arose afterwards the masses in honour of the saints and for the dead. The bread and wine were now everywhere elevated before distribution, so that they might be seen by the people and be viewed with reverence; and hence arose, not long after, the adoration of the symbols. Neither catechumens nor penitents, nor those who were supposed to be under the power of evil spirits, were allowed to be present at this holy ordinance, nor did the sacred orators in their public discourses venture to speak

January, as the proper festival of Christ's baptism. The motives which led the Western churches to place the festival of the nativity on the 25th of December are not clearly ascertained. Some among the Catholics (as Harduin), and many among the Protestants (as Hospinian, Jablonski, Eisenschmid, Gieseler, &c.), think that day was chosen—first, because it was the day on which the Romans celebrated their festival of natalis solis invicti, or of the sun's passing the southern solstice and beginning to return northward—a fit emblem of the approach of the Sun of Righteousness to mortals (see the orations of Augustine and Chrysostom on the nativity of Christ); and, secondly, because the establishment of a Christian festival of several days, at that season of the year, might supplant the Saturnalia and other corrupting festivals of the pagans. But other reasons may be stated. Some no doubt believed that the 25th of December was the most probable day; and all might have felt it desirable to have a Christian festival at some other season of the year than the fifty or sixty days next after the vernal equinox, into which all the older festivals were clustered. From the first institution of this festival the Western nations seem to have transferred to it many of the follies and censurable practices which prevailed in the pagan festivals of the same season, such as adorning the churches fantastically, mingling puppet shows and dramas with worship, universal feasting and merry-making, visits and salutations, presents and jocularities, revelry and drunkenness. For, from the days of Augustine and Chrysostom down to our present times, we find many devout persons deprecating the heathenish manner in which the festival was kept, and labouring to give it a more Christian character. The Christmas holidays—which by a law of Theodosius the Great (A.D. 383–395) were to comprise fourteen days, or the seven days before and after Christmas (Codex Justinian. lib. iii. tit. xii. leg. ii.)—have borne so close a resemblance to the Roman Saturnalia, Sigillaria, &c. and to the Juel [Yule] feast of the ancient Goths, as to afford strong presumption of an unhappy alliance between them from the first. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, Dec. 25, tome iii. p. 295, &c.; Eisenschmid, Geschichte der Sonnent-Festtage, Leipzig, 1793, p. 99, &c.; Hospinian, De Orig. Festor. Christ. ed. 1684, p. 168, &c.; Neander, Kirchengesch. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 527, &c.; and his Chrysostom u. dessen Zeitalter, vol. i. p. 236, &c. 259, &c. 288, &c.; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. x. p. 349, &c.; and Bingham, Orig. Eccles. book xx. chap. iv.—Mur.

¹ Daillé, De Jejunii et Quadragesimæ, lib. iv. [The Quadragesimal fast was at first of only forty hours, afterwards it was extended to several days and even weeks, and at last settled at thirty-six. In the oriental churches Lent commenced with the seventh week before Easter, because two days in each week they suspended the fast; but in the Western churches it commenced with the sixth week, because they fasted on the Sundays. Finally, Gregory the Great in the sixth century, or as others say Gregory II. in the eighth century, added four days more to this fast, so as to make it full forty days. In the fourth century however the Lent fast was in a degree optional, and the people were exhorted with entreaties to its observance. See Baumgarten's Erläuterung der Christ. Alterth. p. 329, &c.—Schl.

² See Barbeyrac, De la Morale des Pères, p. 250, &c.

³ The Baptisteries were properly buildings adjacent to the churches, in which the catechumens were instructed and where were a sort of cisterns into which water was let at the time of baptism, and in which the candidates were baptized by immersion. See Baumgarten's Erläuterung der Christ. Alterth. p. 388.—Schl. [See also Hob. Robertson's History of Baptism, chap. xii. pages 67–73, 1817.—Mur.

openly and plainly concerning its true nature. The origin of this custom was not very creditable, as has been stated before, yet many offer an honourable excuse for it by saying that this concealment might awaken eagerness in the catechumens to penetrate early into these mysteries.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF THE HERESIES.

1. THE seeds and remains of those sects which were conspicuous in the preceding centuries continued in this, especially in the East; nor did they cease to make some proselytes, notwithstanding the absurdity of their opinions. The Manichæan sect beyond others, and by its very turpitude, ensnared many, and often persons of good talents also, as appears by the example of Augustine. This wide spreading pestilence the most respectable doctors of the age, and among them Augustine, when recovered from his infatuation, made efforts to arrest; some indeed with more learning and discrimination, and others with less, but none of them without some success. But the disease could not be wholly extirpated either by books or by severe laws,¹ but after remaining latent for a time, and when most people supposed it extinct, it would break out again with greater violence; for the Manichæans, to avoid the severity of the laws, assumed successively various names, as Encratites, Apotactics, Saccophori, Hydroparastites, Solitaries, &c. and under these names they often lay concealed for a time, but not long, for the vigilance of their enemies would find them out.²

2. But the state had little to fear from these people, whose energies were gradually impaired and oppressed in the Roman empire by penal laws and persecutions. A much more threatening storm arose in Africa which, though small in its commencement, kept both the church and the state in commotion for more than a century. Mensurius, the bishop of Carthage in Africa, dying in the year 311, the majority of the people and of the clergy elected Cæcilian, the archdeacon, to the vacant chair, and he was consecrated immediately without waiting for the bishops of Numidia by the bishops of Africa [Proper, or the province of which Carthage was the capital]. The Numidian bishops who, according to custom, should have been present at the consecration, were highly offended at being excluded from the ceremony, and therefore having assembled at Carthage they summoned Cæcilian to appear before them. The feelings of these excited bishops were still more inflamed by the efforts of certain presbyters of Carthage, especially Botrus and Cæsius, the competitors of Cæcilian, and by an opulent lady named Lucilla, who was unfriendly to Cæcilian (by whom she had been reproved for her superstition), and who distributed large sums of money among those Numidians, that they might vigorously oppose the new bishop. When therefore Cæcilian refused to appear before the tribunal of these bishops, they, seventy in number, and headed by Secundus, bishop of Tigisis, with the approbation of a considerable part of the clergy and people of Carthage, pronounced Cæcilian unworthy of his office, and created Majorinus, his deacon, bishop of Carthage. Hence the Carthaginian church was divided into two factions, headed by the two bishops Cæcilian and Majorinus.

3. The Numidians stated two grounds for their sentence against Cæcilian. 1st, That the principal bishop concerned in his consecration, Felix of Aptunga, was a traitor; that is, that during the persecution of Diocletian he had delivered up the sacred books to the magistrates to be burned, and therefore that he was an apostate from Christ, and of course could not impart the Holy Ghost to the new made bishop. 2d, That Cæcilian himself when a deacon had been hard-hearted and cruel to the witnesses for Christ or the martyrs during the Diocletian persecution, and had forbidden food to be carried to them in prison. To these two causes they added the contumacy of Cæcilian, who being summoned to a trial before them refused to appear. Among these Numidian bishops no one was more ardent and violent than Donatus, the bishop of Casæ Nigræ; whence, as most writers suppose, the whole party opposed to Cæcilian were from him called Donatists, though there are those who think the name was derived from the other Donatus, whom the Donatists called the Great.¹ In a very short time this controversy was diffused over the whole, not only of Numidia but even of Africa; and most of the cities had two bishops, one taking side with Cæcilian and the other with Majorinus.

¹ See in the Codex Theodos. tom. vi. pt. i. ed. Ritter. various and peculiarly severe laws of the emperors against the Manichæans. In the year 372 Valentinian senior forbade their holding meetings, and laid their preachers under heavy penalties, p. 126. In the year 381 Theodosius the Great pronounced them infamous, and deprived them of all the rights of citizens, p. 133. See other laws even more severe than these, pages 137, 138, 170, &c. [The writers who confuted the Manichæans are very fully enumerated by Walch, in his Hist. der Ketzer. vol. i. p. 808, &c.—Schl.]

² See the law of Theodosius, in the Codex Theodos. tom. vi. pages 134, 136, 138. [The popular names assumed by the Manichæans were, synagistai, confitents, from their condemning marriage; ἀσρατιστοί, set apart or consecrated to God; σακκοφόοι, wearers of sackcloth; ὕδρωπαροῦνται, presenters of water, from their using water only in the eucharist; and solitarii, solitaries or monks.—Mur.]

4. The Donatists having brought this controversy before Constantine the Great in the year 313, the emperor committed the examination of it to Melchiades, the Roman bishop, with whom he joined three bishops from Gaul as assessors. In this court Cæcilian was acquitted of the charges alleged against him, but the allegations against Felix of Aptunga, who had consecrated him, were not examined. The emperor therefore in the year 314 committed the cause of Felix to the separate examination of Ælian, his proconsul for Africa, by whom Felix was pronounced innocent; but the Donatists raised many exceptions against the decisions of Melchiades and Ælian, and especially they objected to the small number of bishops who were joined with Melchiades as judges. They said a formal decision of seventy venerable bishops of Numidia ought undoubtedly to have far more weight than a decree of only nineteen bishops (the number present at Rome),² and those but partially acquainted with the transactions in Africa. To quiet these murmurs the emperor, in the year 314, appointed a much larger tribunal to meet at Arles, composed of bishops from the provinces of Italy, Gaul, Germany, and Spain. Here again the Donatists lost their cause, and appealed to a trial before the emperor himself. He did not reject the appeal, but in the year 316 examined the cause at Milan, the parties being present before him.

¹ In the Donatist contests, two persons of the name of Donatus distinguished themselves; the one was a Numidian, and bishop of Case Nigra; the other was the second leader of the Donatists, succeeded Majorinus as bishop of Carthage, and on account of his learning and virtues was honoured by his partisans with the title of the Great. The learned have raised the question—"From which of these men did the Donatists derive their name?" Arguments of nearly equal strength may be adduced on both sides of this unimportant question. I should think the name was derived from both. [The Donatists received several names. In the commencement of the schism they were called the party of Majorinus. Afterwards they were called Donatians and Donatists, though they would not allow of this name which was given them by the orthodox. Finally, they were called (Montenses) Mountaineers (a name which they bore only at Rome, and either because they held their meetings in a mountain, or because they resembled the Montanists), also Campitæ and Rupitæ [or Rupitani, because they assembled on the plains and among the clefts of the rocks].—Schl.

² The Emperor, in his letters to Melchiades, named no more than three prelates—viz. Maternus, Rheticius, and Marinus, bishops of Cologne, Autun, and Arles, to sit with him as judges of this controversy; but afterwards he ordered seven more to be added to the number, and as many as could soon and conveniently assemble, so that they were at last nineteen in all.—Black.

His decision also was against the Donatists,³ and this contumacious party now cast reproaches on the emperor himself, and complained that Hosius, the bishop of Corduba, who was the friend both of the emperor and Cæcilius, had corrupted the mind of the former to give an unrighteous decision. This moved the emperor's indignation, and he now, in the year 316, ordered their temples to be taken from them in Africa, and the seditious bishops to be banished, and some of them also—perhaps for the licentiousness of their tongues and pens—he put to death. Hence arose violent commotions and tumults in Africa, for the Donatist party was very numerous and powerful, and the emperor in vain strove to allay these tumults by his envoys.

5. It was unquestionably amid these terrible commotions that those called Circumcelliones⁴ first originated; a furious, headlong, sanguinary set, composed of the peasantry and rustic populace, who espousing the cause of the Donatists defended it by the force of arms, and roaming through the province of Africa filled it with slaughter, rapine, and burnings, and committed the most atrocious crimes against the adverse party. This mad throng who disregarded death and every evil, nay, faced death when there was occasion with the greatest alacrity, brought extreme odium upon the Donatists; and yet it does not appear from any competent evidence that the Donatist bishops, and especially those possessed of any measure of good sense and religion, approved or instigated their proceedings. The storm continuing to increase and seeming to threaten a civil war, Constantine after attempting a reconciliation without effect, at the suggestion of the prefects of Africa, repealed the laws against the Donatists [A.D. 321], and gave the African people full liberty to follow either of the contending parties at their own option.¹

³ No proofs could be more clear than those afforded by this whole controversy, of the supremacy of the emperor's power in matters of religion. It is obvious that no person in that age conceived of a single supreme judge over the whole church appointed by Christ himself. The conventions at Rome and Arles are commonly called councils; but whoever views them impartially will perceive that they were not properly councils, but rather courts held by special judges appointed by the emperor, or to speak in the language of modern times, High Commission Courts. [To this opinion Walch subscribes in his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iv. p. 343, &c. where he says:—"The whole history speaks out loudly that in settling this controversy and restoring peace, the bishop of Rome did nothing and the emperor everything. In the numerous transactions the bishop Melchiades appears only once, and then not as supreme head of the church but merely as the emperor's commissioner, charged with the execution of his commands. No papal ordinance, no appeal to the court of Rome, no dernier decision, was here once thought of. So the ecclesiastical law of Africa in that age had no article respecting the authority of the pope. On the contrary, from the commencement to the final subjugation of the Donatists, we everywhere meet with the emperor, imperial trials, imperial commissioners, imperial laws, imperial punishments, imperial executive officers, all in full operation."—Schl.

⁴ They were called Circumcelliones (vagrants), or by contraction Circelliones, from the (cellæ) cottages of the peasants among which they hovered, having no fixed residence. They styled themselves Agonistici (combatants), pretending that they were combating and vanquishing the devil. Walch, ubi supra, p. 157, thinks it cannot be proved that the Circumcelliones appeared before the time of Constantine.—Schl.

6. After the death of Constantine the Great, his son Constans, on whom the African province devolved, in the year 348 sent thither Macarius and Paulus as his lieutenants, to heal this deplorable schism and to persuade the Donatists to reconciliation with the orthodox. But the chief Donatist bishop, Donatus, whom his sect denominated the Great, strenuously opposed a reconciliation, and the other bishops followed his example. The Circumcelliones still contended furiously with slaughter and war in support of the party whose interest they espoused. After Macarius had vanquished these in battle at Bagnia [or Bagaja], he no longer recommended but enjoined peace and reconciliation. A few Donatists obeyed, the majority either fled or were sent into banishment, among whom was Donatus the Great, and many suffered the severest punishments. In this persecution of the Donatists, which lasted thirteen years, many things were done, as the Catholics themselves concede,² which no upright, impartial, and humane person can well say were righteous and just; and hence the numerous complaints made by the Donatists of the cruelty of their adversaries.³

7. Julian on his accession to the government of the empire in the year 362, permitted the Donatists to return to their country and enjoy their former liberty. After their return they drew the greater part of Africa in a short time into their communion.⁴ Gratian enacted indeed some laws against them, and especially in 387 commanded all their temples to be taken from them, and all their assemblies, even in the fields and private houses, to be broken up.⁵ But the fury of the Circumcelliones, who were the soldiery of the Donatists, and the fear of producing intestine war, undoubtedly prevented the vigorous execution of these laws, for it appears that in the conclusion of this century the Donatist community in Africa was so extensive as to have more than four hundred bishops. As the century drew to a close, however, two things impaired not a little the energies of this very flourishing community. The one was a great schism which arose in it, occasioned by one Maximinus,⁶ which afforded the Catholics great advantage in opposing the Donatists; the other was the zeal of Augustine, first a presbyter and then bishop of Hippo; for he assailed them most vigorously in books, sermons, conferences, by his advice, admonitions, and activity in assemblies, and being very ardent and energetic, he roused against them not only Africa but all christendom, as well as the imperial court.⁷

8. That the Donatists were sound in doctrine their adversaries admit, nor were their lives censurable, if we except the enormities of the Circumcelliones, which were detested by the greatest part of the Donatists. Their fault was that they regarded the African church as having fallen from the rank and privilege of a true church, and as destitute of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, in consequence of its adherence to Cæcilian, not-pending upon their own strength. Most unhappy proceedings ensued, which have brought lasting disgrace upon the Donatists. Bloodshed, merciless denial of the necessities of life, violation of females, in a word, the worst excesses of an oppressed party, which after long continued sufferings felt itself authorised to take unparrying revenge, attended the restoration of the Donatists. The orthodox made resistance and would not tamely suffer. And hence arose those tumultuous scenes which the magistrates reported to the court; and very probably had Julian lived a little longer, persecuting laws would have been issued by the government. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iv. p. 175.—Schl.

⁵ Codex Theodos. lib. ii. ne sanct. Bapt. iteretur.—Schl.

⁶ On this schism among the Donatists and others of less magnitude, see Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iv. pages 258—267.—Schl.

⁷ A full catalogue of the writings of Augustine against the Donatists is given by Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iv. p. 254, &c. and of his other efforts against them an account is given, ibid. p. 181, &c. We will make here a single remark, that it was during these contests Augustine first exhibited in his writings that horrid principle—Heretics are to be punished with temporal punishments and death—a principle wholly inconsistent with Christianity, and one which in after ages served as an excuse for inhuman cruelties. Only read Augustine's 48th Epistle, Ad Vincent. and his 50th, Ad Bonifac. and several others, and you will there meet with all the plausible arguments which the spirit of persecution in after ages so dressed up—to the disgrace of Christianity—as to blind the eyes of kings.—Schl.

¹ The Donatists soon became very numerous throughout Africa. In some places they were more numerous than the Catholics. In the year 330 one of their councils consisted of no less than two hundred and seventy bishops. See Augustine, Ep. 93.—Mur.

² I will here give a quotation from Optatus of Melevi, whom none will refuse as a witness, De Schismate Donatistar. lib. iii. sec. i. p. 51, ed. Du Pin: "Ab Operariis unitatis (the imperial legates Macarius and Paulus) multa quidam aspera gesta sunt.—Fugerunt omnes Episcopi cum clericis suis, aliqui sunt mortui: qui fortiores fuerunt, capti et longe relegati sunt." Through this whole book Optatus is at much pains to apologise for this severity, the blame of which he casts upon the Donatists. Yet he does not dissemble that all of it cannot by any means be approved or justified.

³ See the Collatio Carthagin. diei tertie, sec. cclviii. at the end of Optatus, p. 315.

⁴ When the Donatists returned under the permission of Julian, they demanded of the orthodox the restoration of their churches. But as they were not willing to give them up, and as little could be expected from the civil authorities, the Donatists felt justified in de-

withstanding his offences and those of his consecrator, Felix of Aptunga; and all other churches which united and communed with that of Africa they looked upon as defiled and polluted, and believed that themselves alone, on account of the sanctity of their bishops, merited the name of the true, pure, and holy church, and in consequence of these opinions they avoided all communion with other churches in order to escape defilement. This error led them to maintain that the sacred rites and administrations of the Christians who disagreed with them were destitute of all efficacy, and not only to rebaptize those who came over to them from other societies, but either to exclude from the sacred office or to re-ordain those ministers of religion who joined their community. This schismatic pestilence scarcely extended beyond Africa, for the few small congregations which the Donatists formed in Spain and Italy had no permanence, but were soon broken up.¹

9. Not long after the commencement of the Donatist controversy, or in the year 317, another storm of greater consequence and more pernicious arose in Egypt, which spread its ravages over the whole Christian world. The ground of this contest was the doctrine of three persons in the Godhead, a doctrine which during the three preceding centuries had not been in all respects defined. It had indeed often been decided, in opposition to the Sabellians and others, that there is a real difference between the Father and the Son, and also between them and the Holy Spirit, or as we commonly express it, that there are three distinct persons in the Godhead. But the mutual relations of these persons and the nature of the difference between them had not been a subject of dispute, and therefore nothing had been decreed by the church on these points, much less was there any prescribed phraseology which it was necessary to use when speaking of this mystery. The doctors therefore explained this subject in different ways, or gave various representations of the difference between the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, without offence being taken. The majority in Egypt and the neighbouring countries had, on this subject as well as others, followed the opinions of Origen, who taught that the Son is in God what reason is in man, and that the Holy Spirit is nothing else than the divine energy or power of acting and working; which opinion, if it be not cautiously stated, may lead, among other difficulties, to the subversion of any real distinction between the divine persons, or in other words to Sabellianism.

10. Alexander, the bishop of Alexandria—it is uncertain on what occasion—expressed himself very freely on this subject in a meeting of his presbyters, and maintained, among other things, that the Son possesses not only the same dignity as the Father, but also the same essence.² But Arius, one of the presbyters, a man of acuteness and fluency, influenced perhaps by ill-will towards his bishop,³ at first denied the truth of Alexander's positions, on the ground that they were allied to the Sabellian errors which were condemned by the church, and then going to the opposite extreme, he maintained that the Son is totally and essentially distinct from the Father; that he was only the first and noblest of those created beings whom God the Father formed out of nothing, and the instrument which the Father used in creating this material universe; and therefore that he was inferior to the Father both in nature and in dignity.⁴

² See Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. v.; Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. ii.

³ A historian should be cautious of judging of the motives of human actions, for there are cases in which a man's motives are discernible only to the eye of Omniscience. The present is such a case. Here we can express only a dubious "perhaps," when we impartially survey the sources of the history of Arius. We commonly read, it is true, that ambition of distinction led Arius to contradict his bishop. But this cannot be proved by credible testimony, and his opposers, Alexander and Athanasius, who would surely have used this fact to his disadvantage if it had been known to them, observe a profound silence on the subject. On the contrary, Philostorgius relates (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. iii.) that Arius, when the votes of the electors were very favourable to himself, modestly directed the choice on Alexander. Philostorgius, it must be owned, was an Arian, and his testimony is of no great weight. But the direct contrary to what he states is not capable of proof. The motives therefore which actuated Arius in opposing his bishop must be regarded as dubious. Probably something of human infirmity was found on both sides. The conduct of Arius in the contest itself betrays pride, conceit of learning, and a contentious disposition. On the other hand, the Arians complain that Alexander was actuated by envy and personal hatred of Arius, because the great popularity of Arius had excited his jealousy. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer vol. ii. p. 395, &c.—Schl.

⁴ Both Alexander and Arius have left us statements, each of his own doctrinal views, and also what he understood to be the sentiments of his antagonist. The statements are in their private letters, written after long and public discussions at Alexandria, and when Arius and his friends were cast out of the Church. The letter of Alexander is addressed to his namesake, Alex

¹ A more full account of the Donatists is given by Valestus, Diss. de Schismate Donatistarum, subjoined to his edition of Eusebius's Hist. Eccles.; by Ittig, Hist. Donatismi, in an appendix to his book De Hæres. Æri Apost. p. 241; by Witsius, Miscel. Sacra. tom. i. lib. iv. p. 742; by Norris, Hist. Donatiani, a posthumous work which the brothers Ballerini enlarged and published, Opp. tom. iv. 45, &c.; and by Long, History of the Donatists, London, 1677, 8vo. The narrative we have given above is derived from the original sources; and if our life is spared it will in due time be corroborated by a statement of the requisite testimonies. [What Mosheim was prevented from fulfilling by his death, his successor in the professorial chair of church history, Dr. Walch, has accomplished to the satisfaction of all the friends of this branch of knowledge, in the fourth volume of his Hist. der Ketzer, pages 1—354.—Schl.]

What were his views of the Holy Spirit is not equally manifest. That his views of the Son of God were combined with some other opinions differing from the common sentiments of Christians cannot be doubted,¹ but no one of the ancients has left us a connected and systematic account of the religion professed by Arius and his associates.²

11. The opinions of Arius were no sooner divulged than they found very many abettors, and among them men of distinguished talents and rank both in Egypt and the neighbouring provinces. Alexander on the ander of Byzantium, since of Constantinople, and that of Arius to his friend Eusebius of Nicomedia. Both are preserved by Theodoret, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. cap. iv. v. [They are both given in the translation of Theodoret, in Bagster's Greek Eccles. Historians, Lond. 1844, p. 6, &c. and 23, &c.] According to these statements, both the Arians and the orthodox considered the Son of God and Saviour of the world as a derived existence, and as generated by the Father. But they differed on two points. 1st. The orthodox believed his generation was from eternity, so that he was coeval with the Father. But the Arians believed there was a time when the Son was not. 2d. The orthodox believed the Son to be derived of and from the Father, so that he was ὁμοούσιος, of the same essence with the Father. But the Arians believed that he was formed out of nothing, ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἐκείνῃ by the creative power of God. Both however agreed in calling him God and in ascribing to him divine perfections. As to his offices or his being the Saviour of sinful men, it does not appear that they differed materially in their views. Indeed, so imperfect and fluctuating were the views of that age respecting the offices of Christ and the way in which sinners are saved, that he was for aught they could see an equally competent Saviour, whether he were a finite creature or the infinite and all-perfect God. Hence both the Arians and the orthodox then embraced the same system of theology in substance; and the chief importance in a theological view of their controversy respecting the Sonship of Christ, related to the assigning him that rank in the universe which properly belonged to him.—Mur.

¹ This conjecture of Mosheim (which his former translator has swelled into a strong affirmation) appears to be gratuitous. See the preceding note.—Mur.

² The history of the Arian contests is to be drawn from Eusebius, De Vita Constantini, from various tracts of Athanasius, Opp. tom. i.; from the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret; from Epiphanius, Hæres. lxi. and from other writers of this and the following century. But among all these, there is not one whom we may justly pronounce free from partiality. And the Arian history still needs a writer of integrity and void alike of hatred and love. There were faults on both sides, but those who hitherto have described this controversy could discover the faults of only one of the parties. [This has now ceased to be absolutely true, since Walch, in the second volume of his Hist. der Ketzer, pages 383—700, has so treated the history of Arius and his followers, that a man must himself be in the highest degree partial if he can deny the honour of impartiality to this writer.—Schl.] It is a common opinion that Arius was too much attached to the sentiments of Plato and Origen. See Petavius, Dogmat. Theol. tom. ii. lib. i. cap. viii. p. 38. But those who think so are certainly in an error. For Origen and Plato differ widely from Arius; on the contrary it cannot well be doubted that Alexander, the opposer of Arius, in his explanation of the doctrine of three Persons in one God, closely followed the footsteps of Origen. See Cudworth's Intellectual System, vol. i. p. 676, &c. [The student should consult on the Arian doctrines and the whole of this controversy, Hagenbach, Lehrbuch d. Dogm. sec. lxxvii.—xcviii.; Buch's transl. in Clark's Foreign Theo. Library, vol. i. p. 240, &c.; Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. sections 81—84; Davidson's transl. vol. i. p. 330, &c.; and Ritter, Gesch. der Christ. Philos. vol. ii. pages 1—152.—R.

other hand accused Arius of blasphemy before two councils assembled at Alexandria, and cast him out of the church.³ He was not discouraged by this disgrace, but retiring to Palestine he wrote several letters to men of distinction, in which he laboured to demonstrate the truth of his doctrines, and with so much success, that he drew over immense numbers to his side, and in particular Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, who was a man of vast influence.⁴ The emperor Constantine, who considered the discussion as relating to a matter of little importance and remote from the fundamentals of religion, at first addressed the disputants by letter, admonishing them to desist from contention.⁵ But when he found that nothing was effected by this measure, and that greater commotion was daily rising throughout the empire, in the year 325 he summoned that famous council of the whole church which met at Nice in Bithynia, to put an end to this controversy. In this council, after various altercations and conflicts of the bishops, the doctrine of Arius was condemned, Christ was pronounced to be (ὁμοούσιος) of the same essence with the Father, Arius was sent into exile in Illyricum, and his followers were compelled to assent to a creed or confession of faith composed by the council.¹

³ Alexander first employed milder measures; for he sent a letter which was subscribed by the clergy of Alexandria to Arius and the other clergymen united with him, warning them to abandon their error. (Athanasius, Opp. tom. i. pt. i. p. 356.) When this measure failed he brought the subject before the bishops of his party. He first held a council at Alexandria (A.D. 321), composed of Egyptian and Libyan bishops; and then another assembly composed only of the presbyters and deacons of the city of Alexandria and the province of Marceotis. The first was properly a council, the other was not. And hence it is that some historians speak of but one council of Alexandria. See Walch's Hist. der Kirchenvermann. p. 140; and his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. ii. p. 424, &c.—Schl.

⁴ These bishops held a council in Bithynia, probably at Nicomedia, in which two hundred and fifty bishops are reported to have been present. Of their acts and decisions we know nothing more than that they sent letters to all the bishops of Christendom, entreating them not to exclude the friends of Arius from their communion, and requesting them to intercede with Alexander that he would not do so. "This first Arian council is either wholly overlooked by modern writers or is confounded with that of Antioch in the year 330. Sozomen gives account of it, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xv. See Nicetas, in Biblioth. Max. Patr. tom. xxv. p. 151; and Celler's Hist. des Auteurs, tome iii. p. 566; Walch, Hist. der Kirchenvermann. p. 142. But he mistakes in saying that this council is "overlooked by modern writers." It is mentioned by Maimbourg, Le Clerc, Du Pin, Fleury, Cave, Whitty, and Tillenont.—Mur.

⁵ Constantine not only wrote a letter in the year 324, but he sent it with as his envoy the famous Hosius, bishop of Corduba. What part the envoy acted is unknown, but the letter is extant at large in Eusebius, De Vita Constantini, lib. ii. cap. lxi.—lxiii. and with some curtailment, in Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. vii. This singular document shows the feelings of one more solicitous for the great cause of our common Christianity, than for absolute perfection in speculative theology.—Mur. [The English reader may see it in Eusebius's Life of Constantine, in Bagster's Greek Ecc. Historians, Lond. 1845, p. 103.—R.]

12. No part of church history perhaps has acquired more celebrity than this assembly of bishops at Nice to settle the affairs of the church; and yet, strange as it may appear, scarcely any part of ecclesiastical history has been investigated and explained more negligently.² The ancient writers are not agreed as to the time, the year, the place, the number of the judges, the president of this council, and many other particulars.³ No written journal of the proceedings of this venerable tribunal was kept, at least none has reached us.⁴ How

¹ This creed is illustrated from ancient records in a learned work on the subject, by Suicer, Utrecht, 1718, 4to. [The creed used in the Catholic, Lutheran, and English churches, and called the Nicene creed, is in reality the creed set forth by the council of Constantinople in the year 381. It is considerably more full than the original Nicene creed, which is here subjoined together with a translation. *Πιστεύομεν εἰς ἕνα Θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα, πάντων ὁρατὸν τε καὶ ἀόρατον ποιητὴν, καὶ εἰς ἕνα Κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν, τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, γεννηθέντα ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς μονογενῆ, τούτῳστι, ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας τοῦ πατρὸς, Θεὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ, φῶς ἐκ φωτός, Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ ἀληθινοῦ, γεννηθέντα οὐ ποιηθέντα, ὁμοούσιον τῷ πατρί, δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα γέγονον, τὰ τε ἐν τῷ οὐρανῷ καὶ τὰ ἐν τῇ γῇ τὸν δι' ἡμᾶς τῶν ἀνθρώπων καὶ διὰ τὴν ἡμετέραν σωτηρίαν κατελθόντα καὶ σαρκωθέντα, ἐνανθρωπήσαντα, παθόντα καὶ ἀναστάντα τῇ τρίτῃ ἡμέρᾳ, ἀνελθόντα εἰς τοὺς οὐρανοὺς καὶ ἐρχόμενον κρῖναι ζῶντας καὶ νεκρούς. Καὶ εἰς τὸ Ἅγιον Πνεῦμα. Τοὺς δὲ λέγοντας, ὅτι ἡν ποτὶ ὅτε οὐκ ἦν, καὶ πρὶν γεννηθῆναι οὐκ ἦν, καὶ ὅτι ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων γέγονε, ἡ εἰς εἰρήμην ὑποστάσις ἡ οὐσίας ὁμοκείμενη, ἡ κτιστὸν τρεπτὴν ἡ ἀλόγων τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀναθεματίζει τὴν καθολικὴν ἐκκλησίαν. See Walch, Biblioth. Symbol. Fetus, pages 73, 76. Translation:—We believe in one God, the Father, almighty, the maker of all things visible and invisible: and in one Lord, Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, only-begotten (that is), of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made; of the same substance with the Father; by whom all things were made that are in heaven and that are in earth; who for us men, and for our salvation, descended, and was incarnate, and became man; suffered, and rose again the third day, ascended into the heavens; and will come to judge the living and the dead; and in the Holy Spirit. But those who say that there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was begotten, and that he was made out of nothing, or affirm that he is of any other substance or essence, or that the Son of God is created, and mutable or changeable, the catholic church doth pronounce accursed.—*Mur.

² See Ittig, Hist. Concilii Niceni, published after his death [Lips. 1712, 4to.]; Le Clerc, Biblioth. Hist. et Univ., tom. x. p. 421, and tom. xxii. p. 291; Beausobre, Hist. de Marcelline, tom. i. p. 520, &c. The accounts left us by the originals of this council are contained in Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexandrinor. p. 69, &c. [To the preceding works may be added Walch's Hist. der Kirchensamman. pages 144—158.—Schl.

³ There is no great disagreement on most of these points. There is scarcely a dissenting voice as to the year, which was A.D. 325, though there is a disagreement as to the month when the council first met—namely, whether it was the 13th of the Kalends of June or July—that is, the 20th of May or the 19th of June. All agree that the council closed on the emperor's Vicennalia in July of that year. As to the place, there is overwhelming proof that it was the central hall or building in the imperial palace at Nice in Bithynia, which the emperor caused to be fitted up especially for the purpose. Some moderns however maintain that this hall must have been a church, because they cannot believe so holy a body would assemble anywhere except in a church duly consecrated. As to the number of members of which the council was composed, Eusebius indeed (De Vita Constantini iii. cap. viii.) says, "they exceeded two hundred and fifty bishops." But the MS.

here is believed to be corrupted, for Socrates (Hist. Eccles. i. cap. viii.) expressly quoting this passage of Eusebius, says "they exceeded three hundred bishops." There is satisfactory proof that there were three hundred and eighteen members of the council, besides a vast number of clergymen and others who attended from curiosity or for their own improvement in knowledge. The ancient writers make no mention whatever of any president or scribe of the council. They represent the council as assembling and the emperor as entering, advancing to the upper end of the hall, and upon a signal from the bishops taking his seat, which was a golden chair, after which the whole council was seated; several of the principal bishops on the right and left of the emperor, and the main body of them arranged on the two sides of the hall. Before this formal opening of the council, there were several encounters of the bishops of different parties and also of members of the council, with the philosophers and others who were assembled in the city. Of these private meetings, pompous accounts are left us by Gelasius and others. But when the council assembled in form, they did no business but remained silent till the emperor came in. He was then addressed either by Eustathius of Antioch, or Eusebius of Caesarea, or by both, in short complimentary speeches; after which he himself harangued the council, and having thrown into the fire, unrent, all the private petitions and complaints which had been previously handed him, he bade them proceed to business. A free discussion now ensued, but it would seem without the formalities observed in modern deliberative assemblies. Individuals of different sentiments offered their opinions; and the emperor heard, remarked, commended, or disapproved, and so influenced the whole proceedings as to bring about a good degree of unanimity. Yet he did not act the dictator or judge, but left the bishops to decide all the questions respecting faith and discipline uncontrolled, for he regarded them as the divinely constituted judges of such matters. He only wished them to come to some agreement, which as soon as they had done, he regarded their decision as final and as obligatory on himself as well as all others. How many sessions were held we are not told. But after all the business was finished, on the 24th of July, when the emperor entered on the twentieth year of his reign, he celebrated his Vicennalia with the council in a splendid banquet in his own palace. On that occasion, Eusebius of Caesarea delivered an oration in praise of Constantine, which is lost. After the feast, the bishops were dismissed with presents and exhortations to peace and love. They returned as they came by the public conveyances, having been supported by the emperor from the time they left their homes. See Eusebius, De Vita Constant. lib. iii. c. vi.—xxii.; Socrates, Hist. Eccles. i. vii.—xi.; Sozomen, H. E. i. xvii.—xxv.; Theodoret, H. E. i. vii. ix. x. xii.; Rufinus, H. E. lib. i.; Gelasius Cyzicenus, Comment. de Synodo Niceno, lib. iii. in Harduin's Concilia, tom. 1. p. 345, &c.; Acta Concilii Niceni, in Combefis' Anectarum Biblioth. Patr. tom. ii. p. 573; Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexandrinor. p. 69, &c.; various treatises in the first volume of the works of Athanasius, especially his Epistola de Necessitate Decretis, and several detached passages in Epiphanius, contra Hæreses, lib. iii. These are the only authentic sources for the history of this council.—Mur.

⁴ See Valesius, Note on Euseb. De Vita Constant. lib. iii. cap. xiv. Maruthas, a Syrian, wrote a history of this council, but it is lost. See Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Patrie, tom. i. p. 195, &c. [Eusebius in the passage just referred to, says: "What met the general approbation of the council was committed to writing, and confirmed by the subscription of each member." Whence Valesius infers that nothing was committed to writing by the council except the results to which they came, and which they individually subscribed, namely, the creed, the canons, and the synodic epistle which was addressed to the church of Alexandria and the brethren in Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis. He therefore supposes the council kept no Journal, or had no written Acta Concilii, in the technical sense of the phrase. And indeed we have no intimation that they kept any Journal of their proceedings, or had any proper scribe of council. What are called the Acta

many and what canons were enacted, is not agreed by the oriental and the occidental Christians. The latter tell us they were only twenty in number, but the orientals make them far more numerous.¹ From the Concilia, as given us by Gelatius and others, are an account of various discussions between individual members of the council and certain philosophers or sophists, together with the creed, the canons, the synodic letter, several epistles of the emperor, one of Eusebius to his church of Cesarea, and various extracts from ancient authors.—Mur.

¹ Ittig, Suppl. Opp. Clementis Alex. p. 191; Asselman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. pages 22—195, &c.; Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexandrin. p. 71; and many others. [The twenty Nicene canons, and those only, were received by the ancient church. Some attempts indeed were made by the bishops of Rome in the fifth century to make certain canons of the council of Sardica pass for canons of the council of Nice. On that occasion the African bishops resisted, and sent to the patriarchs of Alexandria, Antioch, and Constantinople, for complete copies of all the Nicene canons which they knew of. The returns showed that these twenty canons, and these only, were then recognised in the Greek church. See the acts of the sixth council of Carthage, A.D. 419. Theodoret also (H. E. i. 8), and Gelasius Cyzicenus (lib. ii. cap. xxxi.), expressly affirm that the number of the Nicene canons was twenty. But in the sixteenth century an Arabic copy of eighty canons, including these twenty, was brought from Alexandria to Rome, and soon afterwards translated and published. At first there was some doubt, but in a short time all the learned were fully satisfied that the additional sixty canons were not of Nicene origin, though now regarded as such by most of the eastern sects. See Natalis Alexander, Hist. Eccles. cent. iv. dissert. xviii. vol. vii. pages 501—511, ed. Paris, 1742, 4to. These twenty canons (or twenty-two as some divide them) are extant in Beveridge's Pandect. Canon. tom. i. p. 58, &c. and in all the larger collections of councils. The substance of them is as follows: The first canon forbids the admission of self-made eunuchs to the sacred ministry; the second forbids the hasty ordination of new converts to Christianity, agreeably to 1 Tim. iii. 6. The third forbids clergymen of all ranks from having subordinated females or housekeepers, except only their nearest blood relations. The fourth directs that ordinations be generally performed by all the bishops of a province, and never by less than three bishops, and requires the confirmation of the metropolitan in all cases. The fifth requires that an excommunication, either of a clergyman or a layman, by the sentence of a single bishop, shall be valid everywhere till it is examined and judged of by a provincial council; and requires such a council to be held for this and other objects of general interest twice a year, once in the autumn and once a little before Easter. The sixth secures to the patriarch of Alexandria all the rights which he claimed by ancient usage over the bishops and churches of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; also to the patriarchs of Rome and Antioch their prerogatives, and gives to metropolitans generally a negative on all elections to the episcopal office within their respective provinces. The seventh gives to the bishop of Ælia (or Jerusalem) the rank of a metropolitan, but without depriving Cesarea, the ancient metropolis, of its dignity. The eighth permits Novatian bishops and clergymen to return to the church and retain their rank and offices, on their assenting to the rules of the church respecting second marriages and communion with the lapsed. The ninth and tenth require that presbyters who before their ordination had lapsed, or had committed any other offence which was a canonical disqualification for the sacred office, be deprived of their office as soon as the disqualification is ascertained. The eleventh requires the lapsed, during the late persecution under Licinius, first, to do penance three years without the doors of the church; secondly, six years in the porch among the catechumens; and thirdly, to be allowed to witness but not join in the celebration of the eucharist for two years more. The twelfth requires flagrant apostates to go through the same course, but they must spend ten years in the second stage. Yet the bishops are to exercise canons universally received, and from the other monuments of the council, it appears not only that Arius was condemned by this council, but that other things were decreed with a view to settle the affairs of the church.

In particular, the controversy respecting the time of celebrating Easter, which had long perplexed Christians, was terminated; the Novatian disturbance respecting the re-admission of the lapsed to communion was composed; the Meletian schism with its causes was censured; the jurisdiction of the greater bishops was defined; and several other matters of a like nature determined.² But while the prelates were eager to correct the faults of others, they narrowly escaped falling into a great one themselves, for they were on the point of imposing celibacy on the clergy by an express law; but the act was prevented by Paphnutius, who had himself lived all his days in celibacy.³

13. But the passions of men were of more avail than either the decrees of the Nicene council or the authority of the emperor; for there were those who, though they did not fall in with the doctrine of Arius, yet were dissatisfied with some things in the decrees and the creed of the council,⁴ discretionary power in regard to the length of time. The thirteenth allows the sacrament to be given to any penitent who seems to be dying, but if he recovers he is to rank only with the penitents in the third stage. By the fourteenth, lapsed catechumens are to spend three years in the first stage, or among those who worship without the doors of the church. By the fifteenth, the translation of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, from one church to another is forbidden. By the sixteenth, presbyters or deacons forsaking their own church and going over to others are to be denied communion and be sent back; bishops also are forbidden to ordain the subjects of other bishops without their consent. The seventeenth requires the deposition of all clergymen who lend money or goods on interest. By the eighteenth, deacons are forbidden to present the bread and wine to the presbyters, or to taste them before the bishop, or to sit among the presbyters. By the nineteenth, the followers of Paul of Samosata, on returning to the church, are to be rebaptized and to be reordained before they can officiate as clergymen. The twentieth disapproves of kneeling at prayers on the Lord's day, and from Easter to Pentecost.—Mur.

² The synodic epistle which is preserved by Socrates, H. E. i. ix. and by Theodoret, H. E. i. ix. acquaints us with the principal transactions of the council, and also shows the spirit of that venerable body.—Mur. [It may be seen in the English translation of either of these works in Bagster's Greek Ecc. Historians; in Socrate's, p. 35, and in Theodoret, p. 37.—It.

³ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xi. compare Baldwin's Constantinus Magnus, p. 76, and Calixtus, De Conjugio Cleric. p. 170, &c.

⁴ The word ὑποκριται (of the same essence) in particular was not agreeable to all. At first, seventeen bishops hesitated to subscribe the creed and the condemnation of Arius, because they wished to shun the appearance of favouring the Sabellian error; and they objected that the word ὑποκριται had been disapproved of in the time of Paul of Samosata. (Socrates, H. E. lib. i. cap. viii. xxiii. &c. Basil, Ep. ccc.) And in fact Paul of Samosata had abused the word ὑποκριται, to controvert any other distinction between the Son or Word and the Father, except the difference of names and of external relations in reference to the divine manifestation. And though it be not fully proved that this term, in the Samosatian sense of it, was rejected and the Arians left no means untried to free themselves from the evils inflicted on them by these. The issue was agreeable to their wishes; for in a few years after the Nicene council, an Arian presbyter whom Constantia, the emperor's sister, at her death had recommended to the care of her brother, succeeded in persuading Constantine the Great that Arius had been unjustly oppressed by his enemies. Accordingly in the year 330 the emperor recalled Arius from exile, rescinded the decrees passed against his associates and friends, and permitted Eusebius of Nicomedia, the principal supporter of Arius, and his powerful faction now thirsting for revenge, to persecute the defenders of the Nicene council.¹ They

by a council at Antioch in the year 269 (which decision at Antioch is pronounced fabulous by Fœderlein, in his Dissertation on the question: Dei filium patri esse hominibus antiquæ ecclesiæ doctores in concilio Antiocheno utrum negaverint? Gotting, 1755), yet it is certain that the Arians had before alleged this Antiochian decree, and no one had charged them with mistake in so doing. Nevertheless, those who were not pleased with the creed were generally brought to acquiesce in it, partly by the threats of the emperor to banish all who would not subscribe, and partly by the advice of the princess Constantia. Only Arius, with the bishops Theonas and Secundus, persevered in a refusal. Yet some [namely, Eusebius of Nicomedia, and Theognis of Nice] subscribed the creed but not the anathema.—Schl. [See Wordsworth's Letters to Gindon, 1847, p. 181.—R.]

¹ So sudden a change was not to be expected. The council of Nice had taken every precaution to prevent the further spread of Arianism; and its decrees had been approved by other councils in distant provinces, and thus had obtained the authority of decrees by the whole church. The emperor had superadded to the sentence of the bishops civil penalties, ordering the recusants into exile; and had condemned the writings of Arius to the flames, and commanded them to be delivered up on pain of death. [See the emperor's letter to the bishops and people in Socrates, H. E. i. ix.] Thus the Arian party seemed to be wholly suppressed. But it only seemed to be so. Four years after the atmosphere about the court of Constantine at once became clear and serene to the Arians, and the causes of so great a change are not well known, for the history of Constantine here has a chasm of three years. The princess Constantia seems to have had a hand in this great revolution. The bishops who were favourably disposed towards Arius had recommended themselves to her by yielding in the Nicene council and subscribing the creed, very much in compliance with her recommendation. (Philostorgius, H. E. i. cap. ix.) This attention shown her would naturally pave the way for them to the confidence of the princess. And therefore the statement of Socrates (lib. i. cap. xxv.) and Sozomen (lib. iii. cap. xix.) is not improbable—namely, that it was by her and by an Arian priest whom she at her death recommended to him, that Constantine was brought to entertain more favourable views of the Arians. At the instigation of this priest the emperor despatched a gracious letter to Arius, bidding him come to the court. Arius hastened to Constantinople with his friend Euzoius, and was graciously listened to by the emperor, whom he satisfied as to his orthodoxy. At the requisition of the emperor, they both presented a confession of their faith, which was so artfully drawn up as to conceal their real sentiments under orthodox phraseology. In this way Arius obtained permission to return to Alexandria. Antecedently to this Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, and Theognis, bishop of Nice, had obtained complete reinstatement in their offices, and the former now commenced persecuting the orthodox party and especially Athanasius. The deposition of Athanasius was decreed by the council of Tyre, but his banishment was by order of the emperor, assailed no one more fiercely than Athanasius, the bishop of Alexandria. When he could in no way be brought to restore Arius to his former honours and ecclesiastical standing, Athanasius was first deprived of his office in a council held at Tyre A.D. 335, and then banished to Gaul, while in the same year, by a numerous council held at Jerusalem, Arius and his friends were solemnly admitted to the communion of the church. But by none of these proceedings could the Alexandrians be induced to receive Arius among their presbyters. Accordingly the emperor called him to Constantinople in the year 336, and ordered Alexander, the bishop of that city, to open the doors of his church to him; but before that could take place Arius died at Constantinople in a tragical manner,² and the emperor himself departed this life shortly after.

14. After the death of Constantine the Great, one of his sons, Constantius, the emperor of the East, with his wife and his court, was very partial to the Arian cause; but Constantine and Constans, in the western parts where they governed, supported before whom he was accused of threatening to prevent the exportation of grain from Egypt to Constantinople. As Arius met with more opposition at Alexandria than he expected, and as his presence there caused commotions which seemed almost to amount to an insurrection, he was called back to Constantinople. Here he had another hearing before the emperor, and swore to a formula of faith presented by himself, which sounded very orthodox. The emperor was so well satisfied with this exhibition of Arius, that he sent for Alexander the bishop of Constantinople, and earnestly enjoined upon him to admit Arius the next Sunday to his communion. The terrified bishop retired to the church of St. Irene, and there prayed that the calamity might be averted. On the day appointed, Arius, accompanied by Eusebius of Nicomedia and others of his adherents, proceeded through the principal streets of the city in order to enter the church in triumph, and entertained his friends with playful discourse. But as he passed along, the calls of nature obliged him to step aside. He entered one of the public offices erected for such purposes, and left his servants waiting at the door; and here he died with a violent colic. See Walch's Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. 486, &c.—Schl.

² Some of the moderns are disposed to call in question this account of Arius's death, but without good reason, since it is attested by such unexceptionable witnesses as Socrates, Sozomen, Athanasius, and others. Yet the cause of his sudden and extraordinary death—for the unfortunate man is said to have discharged his own bowels—is a subject of much controversy. The ancients who tell us that God, being moved by the prayers of holy men, miraculously avenged the wickedness of the man, will hardly find credit at this day among candid persons well acquainted with Arian affairs. When I consider all the circumstances of the case, I confess that to me it appears most probable the unhappy man lost his life by the machinations of his enemies, being destroyed by poison. An indiscreet and blind zeal in religion has in every age led on to many crimes worse than this. [The preceding account of Arius's death and of the circumstances attending it, is given by Athanasius (Ep. ad Scrapiam de morte Arit. p. 522, &c. Opp. tom. ii. ed. Combellin), by Socrates (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xxvii. xxxviii.), Sozomen (Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xxix. xxx.), by Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. xv.) and by several other writers of the fourth century. See Schroeckh, Kirchengechichte, vol. v. pages 386, 387.—Mur.]

the decisions of the Nicene council. Hence there were no bounds and no end to the broils, the tumults, the conspiracies, and the wrongs; and councils were arrayed against councils by both the contending parties. Constans died in the year 350, and two years after a great part of the West, particularly Italy and Rome, came under the dominion of his brother Constantius, and this change was most disastrous to the friends of the Nicene council; for this emperor being devoted to the Arians involved them in numerous evils and calamities, and by threats and punishments compelled many of them, and among others as is well attested, the Roman pontiff, Liberius, A.D. 357, to apostatize to that sect to which he was himself attached.¹ The Nicene party made no hesitation to return the same treatment as soon as time, place, and opportunity were afforded them. And the history of Christianity under Constantius presents the picture of a most stormy period, and of a war among brethren which was carried on without religion, justice, or humanity.²

15. On the death of Constantius in the year 362, the prosperous days of the Arians were at an end. Julian had no partiality for either, and therefore patronized neither the Arians nor the orthodox. Jovian [A.D. 363—364] espoused the orthodox sentiments, and therefore all the West, with no small part of the East, rejected Arian views and reverted to the doctrines of the Nicene council. But the scene was changed under the two brothers, Valentinian [in the West], and Valens [in the East], who were advanced to the government of the empire in the year 364. Valentinian adhered to the decisions at Nice, and therefore in the West the Arian sect, a few churches excepted, was wholly extirpated. Valens on the contrary joined the Arians; and hence in the eastern provinces many calamities befel the orthodox.³ But when this emperor had fallen in a war with the Goths, A.D. 378, Gratian [who succeeded Valentinian in the West in the year 376, and became master of the whole empire in 378], restored peace to the orthodox.⁴ After him Theodosius the Great [A.D. 383—395], by depriving the Arians of all their churches and enacting severe laws against them,⁵ caused the decisions of the Nicene council to triumph everywhere, and none could any longer publicly profess Arian doctrines except among the barbarous nations, the Goths,⁶ the Vandals,⁷ and the Burgun-

³ The persecution of Valens extended not only to the orthodox but also to the semi-Arians and other minor parties, and the semi-Arians, after much negotiation, resorted to the unexpected measure of sending messengers to Rome, and by subscribing to the Nicene creed attempted to form a coalition with the occidental Christians. But this coalition was frustrated partly by the repugnance of some of the semi-Arians to the word ὁμοούσιος and partly by the exertions of the powerful Arians at court, and a new persecution ensued. The orthodox ventured to make a representation to the emperor Valens, and for this purpose sent a delegation composed of eighty clergymen to the court of Nicomedia. The emperor cruelly ordered Modestus the praetorian prefect to put them all to death, but without noise, which he accomplished by putting them on board of a vessel, and when at sea causing the vessel and all the unhappy men to be burnt. Such cruelty perhaps is without a parallel among the persecutions by the pagans. See Socrates, H. E. iv. cap. xv.; Sozomen, H. E. vi. cap. xlii.; Theodoret, H. E. iv. cap. xxi.; and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. 543, &c.—Schli.

⁴ Gratian granted religious freedom to all his subjects at the commencement of his reign, and excluded only the Manicheans, the Photinians, and the Eunomians from the liberty of holding assemblies for worship. He also recalled all the bishops whom Valens had banished. Some of the semi-Arians now again held their own synods, and renewed their confession of faith, that the Son is of like essence [ὁμοούσιος] with the Father, in a council held at Antioch in Caria. On the other hand, the orthodox again set up public worship in Constantinople, and obtained the zealous Gregory Nazianzen for their bishop. Gratian at length forbade the assemblies of the heretics without distinction. Codex Theodos. lib. v. De Hæret. and the Notes of Gothofredus, tom. vi. p. 128; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. 547, &c.—Schli.

⁵ See Codex Theodos. tom. vi. pages 5, 10, 130, 146, and Gothofredus, Note on these laws. [See also Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. 549, &c.—Schli.

⁶ The Goths were entangled in the Arian heresy on the following occasion. Being driven by the Huns from their former residence on the Tanais, they sent an embassy to the emperor Valens, and obtained liberty to plant themselves [within the empire] on the banks of the Danube, promising not only to serve the Romans in their wars, but to embrace the Christian religion as soon as teachers should be sent among them. Uphilas was one of their ambassadors, who was himself an Arian, and Valens also gave him only Arian teachers for his assistants. It was not strange therefore that the Arian doctrine obtained so great currency among this people. The subsequent history of Arianism among them is related by Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. ii. p. 553.—Schli.

⁷ Neither the time nor the circumstances in which

¹ It appears from the letters of Liberius which are still extant, and from the testimony of Hilary of Poitiers, Jerome, and others, that Liberius boldly resisted the Arians, and was therefore banished to Bercea in Thrace; that at the end of two years his eagerness to return to his bishopric led him to consent to the condemnation of Athanasius, and to subscribe the Arian creed set forth by the third council of Sirmium. This weakness in a Roman bishop has furnished the Protestants with an argument against the Catholic doctrine of papal infallibility, which they have not failed to urge successfully and to the great annoyance of the Catholics. See, among others, Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. i. p. 136, &c.—Mur. [Some Roman historians, however, have suggested that this "fall of Liberius ought to be considered as no more than a fiction of the Arians, and have maintained that these heretics corrupted those parts of the works of St. Athanasius and the fragments of St. Hilary in which the account of it is contained." See Dollinger's Hist. of the Church, translated by Cox, Lond. 1840, vol. ii. p. 112.—R.

² The Orthodox and the Arians were constantly in the field, and they often came to bloodshed. The victorious party oppressed the vanquished with false accusations, banishments, deprivations of office, anathemas of councils, artifice, and violence. For proof the reader is referred to Athanasius, Apolog. ad Constant. p. 207, &c.; Hist. Arianor. ad Monach. p. 373, &c. 393, &c.; Sozomen, H. E. lib. iv. cap. ix. xix.; Socrates, H. E. lib. ii. cap. xxxvii.; and the dark picture of the state of the church, by Vincentius Lerinensis, in his Commonit. cad. vi.—Schli.

dians.¹ That there were great faults on both sides in this long and violent contest no candid person can deny, but which party was guilty of the greatest wrong it is difficult to say.

16. The Arians would have done much more harm to the church if they had not become divided among themselves after the Nicene council, and split into sects which could not endure each other. The ancients enumerate as Arian sects, the semi-Arians, the Eusebians,² the Aëtians, the Eunomians, the Acacians,³ the Psathyrians,⁴ and others. But they may all be reduced to three classes. The first class embraces the old and genuine Arians who, rejecting all new terms and modes of expression, taught explicitly that the Son was not begotten by the Father, but was created or formed out of nothing.⁵ From these on the one side deviated the semi-Arians, and on the other the Eunomians or Anomæans, that is, the disciples of the acute Eunomius and of Aëtius. The former class maintained that the Son of God was ὁμοούσιος, i. e. of like essence with the father, yet not by nature but only by grace. The leaders of this party were George of Laodicea and Basil of Ancyra.⁶ The latter, who were also called pure Arians, Aëtians,⁷ and Euxeonians,⁸ contended that Christ was ἑτεροούσιος or ἀνόμοιος, i. e. dissimilar, both in essence and in other respects, to the Father.⁹ Under each of these classes there were other subordinate sects, whose subtleties and refinements have been but obscurely devethis people embraced Christianity can be ascertained. Only it is certain that they were, in great measure, believers in Christianity before they came into France (Salvianus, De Ira Dei, lib. vii. pages 845 and 228); and from a passage in Jornandes, De Rebus Geticis, cap. xxv. it is probable that they got their first knowledge of Christianity from their neighbours the Goths, and according to the Arian principles. The Vandals were persecutors of the orthodox, which cannot be said of the Goths. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. ii. p. 559, &c.—Schl.

¹ These settled permanently in Gaul during the next century, and there first embraced the Christian religion and according to the orthodox faith. Orosius, lib. viii. cap. xxxii. and the history of the fifth century, below, pt. 1. chap. 1. sec. 4. But their intercourse with the neighbouring Arians, the West Goths [and perhaps also their hatred of the Roman power identified by them with the orthodox system.—R.] infected them with the leaven of Arianism. Yet under the successors of their king Gundobald the orthodox doctrine again got the upper hand, and under the domination of the Franks, the adherents to Arian principles were wholly rooted out. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. ii. p. 564, &c.—Schl.

² These derived their name from two bishops named Eusebius, the one of Cæsarea, and the father of church history, the other of Nicomedia, and afterwards of Constantinople, who was intimate with Constantine the Great. They belonged to the class of semi-Arians, called at this day Subordinationists, because they maintained a subordination among the persons of the God-head.—Schl.

³ These bore the name of Acacians, a bishop of Cæsarea, and successor of Eusebius Pamphil. He allowed that the Son was like the Father, but only in respect to his will.—Schl.

⁴ This word imports pastry-cooks, because a person of this occupation, a Syrian named Theoklistus, was particularly zealous in defending one of the minor parties of Arians in Constantinople.—Schl.

⁵ Arius maintained that there were three substances in God—namely, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. The first is the only eternal God. There is absolutely none like him, and his essence is incomprehensible. He is called the Father, in a sense corresponding with that in which the Son is called the Son; and as the latter was not always the Son, so the former was not always the Father. The second substance is the person who is denominated in the Scriptures the Son, the Word, and the Wisdom of God. He is absolutely a creature of God, and one whom God created as he did the other creatures immediately from nothing. This creation of the Son the Scriptures denominate a generation; and this creature is called the Son of God in a figurative sense of the word, because God has adopted him. God, of his voluntary choice, produced this person to be an instrument in his hand in the creation of the world. The Son therefore is, in his essence, totally different from the Father. As a rational creature he possesses free will, is changeable, and so might become either vicious or virtuous; though by his diligence and his long practise he has acquired permanent habits of virtue. And God has chosen for his Son the most virtuous of all created spirits. Thus the Son, according to Arius's views, is not truly God, not eternal, not omniscient. There are to his understanding some mysteries, and he does not comprehend clearly the essence of the Father nor his own nature. Yet God has graciously imparted to him pre-eminent gifts. Thereby he is become the Son of God, nay, obtained for himself the name of God, though not in the proper sense of the word. Such is Walch's representation of the doctrine of Arius, in his Hist. der Ketzer. vol. ii. p. 559, &c.—Schl.

⁶ See Maran, Dissert. sur les semi-Ariens, which has been reprinted by Voigt, in Biblioth. Hæcæsiolog. tom. ii. p. 119, &c. [The semi-Arians were also called Homœousians, from the word ὁμοούσιος, which was as it were their symbol. George of Laodicea was a native of Alexandria, and a very learned man. He had personal difficulties with bishop Alexander, and obtained the bishopric of Laodicea through the Eusebian party, to which he devoted himself. Basil, bishop of Ancyra, had the reputation of an upright and learned man, and was in great favour with the emperor Constantine. He can be taxed with no other fault than that of not tolerating the word ὁμοούσιος. He drew on himself much persecution by his zealous opposition to Photinus and to the genuine Arians, and was deprived of his office by the Acacians.—Schl.

⁷ They had this name from their chief person, Aëtius of Antioch. This man applied himself to the sciences at Alexandria, and as all his instructors were of Arian sentiments, he applied his talents and his dexterity in debate to the vindication of the Arian doctrines. He was made a deacon at Antioch, but the semi-Arians and the orthodox hated him, and he was deposed and banished in the reign of Constantine. Julian recalled him and gave him a bishopric. He had the surname of the Atheist. Socrates, H. E. l. cap. xxxv.; Sozomen, H. E. lib. cap. xv. &c.; and iv. cap. xxiii.—Schl.

⁸ This name is derived from the Greek words ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων. They said that the Son of God might indeed be called God and the Word of God, but only in a sense consistent with his having been brought forth ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων [from non-existences], that is, that he was one of those things which once had no existence, and of course that he was properly a creature; and was once a nonentity.—Schl.

⁹ See Basnage, Diss. de Eunomio, in Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. 1. p. 172, &c. where are extant the creed and apology of Eunomius. See also Fabricius, Biblio. Gr. vol. viii. pages 100–148; and Codex Theodoe. tom. vi. pages 147, 155, 157, 167, 200, &c. [Eunomius, a Cappadocian, was a scholar of Aëtius, and was made bishop of Cyzicum by his partisans. But he was soon displaced and his whole life was full of unpleasant occurrences. He was peculiarly lucid in his style, and his writings are on that account the most valuable documents for the history of Arianism.—Schl. [See note, p. 137.—Mur.

loped by the ancient writers. This discord among the Arians was as injurious to their cause as the confutations and the zeal of the orthodox.

17. Unhappily the Arian contests, as was very natural, produced some new sects. Some persons, eager to avoid and to confute the opinions of the Arians, fell into opinions equally dangerous. Others, after treading in the footsteps of Arius, ventured on far beyond him and became still greater errorists. The human mind, weak, powerless, and subject to the control of the senses and the imagination, seldom exerts all its energies to comprehend divine subjects in such a manner as to be duly guarded against extremes. Among the former class I would reckon Apollinaris the younger, bishop of Laodicea, though otherwise a man of great merit, and one who in various ways rendered important service to the church.¹ He manfully asserted the divinity of Christ against the Arians, but by philosophizing too freely and too eagerly he almost set aside the human nature of the Saviour. He maintained that Christ assumed only a human body, endowed with a sentient soul, but not possessed of intellect, and that the divine nature in Christ did the office of a rational soul or mind;² whence it seemed to follow that the divine nature became mingled with the human,³ and with it suffered pain and death. This great man was led astray, not merely by the ardour of debate but by his immoderate attachment to the Platonic doctrine concerning a twofold soul; from which if the divines of that age had been free, they would have formed more wise and more correct judgments on many points. Some among the ancients attribute other errors besides this to Apollinaris, but how much credit is due to them is doubtful.⁴ The doctrine of Apollinaris met the approbation of many in nearly all the eastern provinces, and being explained in different ways it became the source of new sects. But as it was assailed by the laws of the emperors, the decrees of councils, and the writings of learned men, it gradually sunk under these united assaults.

18. In the same class must be reckoned Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra in Galatia,⁵ if confidence may be placed in Eusebius of Cæsarea and in his other adversaries, who tell us that he so explained the mystery of the holy Trinity as to fall into the Sabellian and Samosatene errors. Yet there are many who think that both Eusebius of Nicomedia and Eusebius of Cæsarea unfairly represent his sentiments, because he gave offence by the severity of his attacks upon the Arians and upon the bishops who favoured them. But admitting that his accusers were influenced in some respects by their hatred of the man, it is certain that their accusations were not altogether groundless; for it appears from a careful examination of the whole subject, that Marcellus considered the Son and the Holy Spirit as two emanations from the divine republiched with some learned additions by Voigt, Biblioth. Hæresiológica, tom. i. fascic. i. pages 1—96. See also Ibid. tom. i. fascic. iii. p. 607. The laws against the Apollinarians are extant in the Code Théodos. tom. vi. p. 144, &c. See likewise (Chaufepié) Nouveau Diction. Hist. et Crit. tome i. p. 304, &c. (See an account of Apollinaris and his heresy in the English edition of Bayle's Dictionary, at the article Apollinaris.—Macl. [Concerning this sect, Walch has treated most solidly and with the application of impartial criticism, in his Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. pages 119—229.—Schl.

⁵ This Marcellus was a person of weight in the Nicene council, and there opposed the Arians with a zeal and energy which procured him praise from his own party, and hatred and obloquy from the opposite side. (See Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxii. cap. ii.; Athanas. Apolog. contra Arian. tom. i. pt. ii. pages 135—150; and Constantine, Epist. Pontif. pages 379—383.) Asterius, a defender of the Arian doctrine, attacked him in writing and accused him of Sabellianism. Marcellus in reply wrote a book to defend the true doctrine respecting the subordination of Jesus Christ to the Father. In the year 336 the Arian bishops assembled at Constantinople deposed him, as one convicted of the Sabellian or Samosatene heresy, and elected Basil in his place. After the death of Constantius he recovered his see, but lost it again almost immediately, as the Arians again got the ascendancy. He now fled to Rome, and exhibited a confession of his faith to the bishop Julius, by whom with the other bishops of the Athanasian party assembled at Rome he was recognised as orthodox, and as a sufferer for the truth. But when Photinus, a pupil of Marcellus, commenced his disturbance, Athanasius now first threw out some suspicions that his doctrine was not pure, but he soon dropped them. Basil the Great was more decided in his opposition to Marcellus, and held him to be actually a heretic. Yet he afterwards acknowledged himself in the wrong. Marcellus was in reality not without considerable learning, but his judgment was weak, and he had the habit of talking at random, and was at the same time very bitter against his antagonists. It is therefore not only possible but very probable that he often let drop faulty expressions, which in the view of his enemies contained dangerous errors. See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. p. 232, &c.—Schl.

¹ See a sketch of his life and writings above, p. 136, note 5.—Mur.

² Apollinaris believed that Christ had no need of a rational soul, because the divine nature was competent to all the rational and free acts which the Saviour performed; and he could see no reason why Christ must have had two intelligent natures and two free wills. He supposed further that a rational human soul, as it was the seat of sinful acts, was liable to moral changes; and therefore Christ, if he had possessed a rational human soul, could not have had an unchangeable, that is, a sinless, human nature. And he supported his opinion by the many passages of Scripture which speak of Christ's becoming man, in which only the word σὰρξ, flesh, is used for the human nature; e.g. John i. 14. See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. p. 186, &c.—Schl.

³ This consequence however Apollinaris did not admit. He was indeed accused of denying the actual distinction of the two natures, and of inculcating such a confusion of them as Eutyches afterwards maintained. But he rejected the term mixture, and expressly taught that he did not subvert the doctrine of two distinct natures in Christ, but that the divinity remained divine and the flesh remained flesh. See Walch's Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. p. 183, &c.—Schl.

⁴ See Basnage, Hist. Hæresis Apollinaris, which is nature, which, after performing their respective offices, were to return back into the substance of the Father, and whoever believed so could not, without self-contradiction, hold the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, to differ from each other in the manner of distinct persons.¹ Marcellus increased the odium and suspicions against him by refusing in the last years of his life to condemn Photinus his disciple.²

19. At the head of those whom the contests with Arius led into still greater errors, may undoubtedly be placed Photinus, bishop of Sirmium,³ who in the year 343 advanced opinions concerning God, equally remote from those of the orthodox and those of the Arians. On attentively considering what the ancients have stated without much perspicuity or uniformity, it appears that he supposed Jesus Christ was born of the virgin Mary by the Holy Spirit; that with this extraordinary man a certain divine emanation, which he called the Word, became united; that on account of this union of the Word with the man Jesus, he was called the Son of God and also God; and that the Holy Spirit was a virtue or energy proceeding from God and not a person.⁴ The temerity of the man was chastised not only by the orthodox in their councils of Antioch A.D. 345, of Milan A.D. 347, and of Sirmium,⁵ but also by the Arians in a council held at Sirmium A.D. 351. He was deprived of his office, and died in exile in the year 372.⁶

20. After him, Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, a distinguished semi-Arian teacher, being deprived of his office through the influence of the Eunomians, by the council of Constantinople in the year 360,⁷ and the Holy Spirit: but we are to understand by them only one person, who in Scripture is called the Father. What the Scriptures call the Word of God is by no means a substance or a person, still less is it a person begotten by the Father and therefore called the Son. For with God there can be no generation, and of course he can have no Son. Neither is the Word that person who made the World, but the Word is properly the understanding of God, which comprehends the designs of God in all his external operations and is therefore called God. The Holy Spirit also is not a person but an attribute of God. Hence followed (2) erroneous ideas of the person of Christ. He maintained that Jesus Christ was a mere man, that before his birth he had no existence except in the divine foreknowledge, and that he began to be when he was born of Mary by the Holy Spirit. Yet he received the special influences of divine power whereby he wrought miracles. This is the indwelling of the word. On account of these excellent gifts and his perfect virtue, God took this man into the place of a son, and therefore he is called the Son of God and also God. Therefore it must be said that the Son of God had a beginning.—Schl.

5 Concerning the time and succession of these councils there has been much debate between Petavius, Sirmund, La Roque, and others, of which an account is given by Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. p. 5, &c. We will only add in correction of Moehlm's statements—1st, that the earliest of these councils was held in the year 343, as appears from three documents first brought to light by Maffei; and 2dly, that it was held by the semi-Arians. So that the first orthodox council against Photinus was that of Milan. In that of Sirmium the eastern bishops were assembled, and they pronounced Photinus a heretic. Photinus when adjudged to be deprived of his office and sent into exile made application to the emperor, and obtained leave publicly to defend his doctrine. Basil bishop of Ancyra was appointed to dispute with him, and a formal discussion took place. Both parties became angry, but the victory was adjudged to Basil, and the former decision was affirmed. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 51, &c.—Schl.

6 De la Roque, De Photino jusque multiplici damnatione, Geneva, 1670, 8vo; Ittig, Hist. Photini, in his Heptas Disertat. subjoined to his Diss. de Hæresarchis Aei Apost. [We may add Petavius, Diss. de Photino hæretico ejusque damnatione, in his Rationarium Temporum, 3d edition, and among the Opuscula of Peter de Marca [vol. v. p. 183, &c. Ad. Bamberg, 1789, where it is accompanied with the two Diatribæ of Sirmund respecting the councils of Sirmium] and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. pages 1–70.—Schl.

7 There were several persons of the name of Macedonius who should not be confounded with this man. The most noted of them were Macedonius of Mopsuestia, a contemporary with our Macedonius, and also involved in the Arian contests (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. xix.) and Macedonius bishop of Constantinople in the reign of the emperor Anastasius [A.D. 491–518], by whom he was banished for his zeal against the Eutychians. The election of our Macedonius was attended with disorders which merit notice. This metropolis had one Paul for its bishop, who was deposed by the emperor Constantius, and Eusebius of Nicomedia chosen in his place. After the death of Eusebius the orthodox replaced Paul in his office, but the Eusebian bishops appointed Macedonius. The emperor Constantius was displeased with the movement of the orthodox, and ordered his general Hermogenes to drive Paul from the city. And as his adherents made opposition and the general had to use

1 It is nevertheless uncertain whether Marcellus really denied the personal distinctions in the Trinity. The accusations of his opposers are not credible evidence in this case. Marcellus and his friends constantly denied that they were Sabellians. He denied indeed that there were three ὑποστάσεις, affirming that there was one ὑπόστασις. But this word had then so indeterminate a meaning, that nothing certain can be inferred from it; for it denoted sometimes what we should call substance, and at other times was equivalent to person. Walch, ubi supra, p. 290, thinks it probable, as Marcellus always strenuously contended, and with justice, that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are ἀδιασπέρως and ἀχωρίστως (inseparably) united, he must have regarded the word ὑπόστασις as equivalent to the phrase ὑπόστασις διασπέρως a different substance. Yet clearly he often used unsuitable descriptions and comparisons respecting the eternal generation of the Son, and the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son, and such as seem to show that he understood by these persons only certain attributes and acts of God. But perhaps these were only unfortunate expressions or errors of the moment, which he could repudiate when the heat of contest subsided.—Schl.

2 See Montfaucon, Diatribe de Causa Marcelli, in the Nona Collectio Patrum Græcorum, tom. ii. p. 51, &c. [Republished with some notes by Volgt, Biblioth. Hæreticolog. vol. i. fascic. ii. p. 297.—Schl.] and Gervaise, Vie de S. Epiphane, p. 42, &c. [Add also Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. pages 229–299; and Vogel's Disputation at Göttingen, 1757, De Marcello Ancyrae Episcopo.—Schl.

3 Yet Photinus was not a native of Sirmium as some have supposed, being misled by a faulty Latin version of a passage in Epiphanius, De Hæres. lxxi. sec. 1. He was rather a Galatian (Jerome, De Viris Illust. cap. cvii.; and Socrates, H. E. li. cap. xviii.) and most probably of Ancyra. He was an author, but his writings are lost. See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. p. 9, &c.—Schl.

4 To give a more distinct view of the opinions of Photinus, we will here state them as they are arranged by Walch, ubi supra, p. 34. Photinus had (1) erroneous views of the Trinity. On this subject he taught thus:—The holy Scriptures speak indeed of the Father, the Son, in his exile founded the sect of the Pneumatomachi. For he now openly professed what he had before concealed, that the Holy Spirit is a divine energy diffused throughout the universe, and not a person distinct from the Father and the Son.¹ This doctrine was embraced by many in the Asiatic provinces. But the council of Constantinople assembled by Theodosius the Great in the year 381, and which is commonly considered as the second œcumenical council, early dissipated by its authority this young and immature sect. One hundred and fifty bishops present in this council defined fully and perfectly the doctrine of three persons in one God, as it is still professed by the great body of Christians, which the Nicene council had only in part performed. They also anathematized all the heresies then known, assigned to the bishop of Constantinople, on account of the grandeur of the city over which he presided, a rank next after the bishop of Rome, and made such other regulations as the general interests of the church seemed to require.²

21. The frenzy of the ancient Gnostics, which had been so often confuted, revived again in Spain. In the beginning of this century, one Mark, a native of Memphis, introduced it from Egypt, and at first communicated it to a few individuals. It had proceeded considerable lengths, and had infected some persons in reputation for their learning and piety, when Priscillian, force, there was a popular insurrection which cost both sides much blood. The orthodox populace set fire to the general's house and dragged him about the streets with a rope around his neck, and finally killed him. The emperor now came himself to Constantinople, drove Paul from the city, and punished the people. He also refused to establish Macedonius in the office because he had given occasion to the bloodshed; but he allowed him to remain in the city and to hold worship in one of the churches which was assigned him (Socrates, H. E. ii. cap. xiii. and Sozomen, H. E. iii. cap. viii.). Paul returned again to Constantinople and was again chased away by the soldiery; and on the other hand Macedonius was in the year 312 reinstated by an imperial general, which occasioned another massacre, in which more than three thousand persons lost their lives. But as Constantius was compelled by his brother Constans to reinstate the orthodox bishops, Paul shared in this good fortune, and Macedonius with his adherents had to content themselves with a single church to worship in. After the death of Constans Paul was again displaced, and Macedonius once more seated in the episcopal chair. Here, confiding in the protection of the emperor, he stirred up a general persecution against the adherents to the Nicene creed, which extended to the provinces adjacent to Constantinople (Socrates, H. E. ii. cap. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii. and Sozomen, H. E. iv. cap. xx. xxvi.). In the year 356 that church at Constantinople in which was placed the coffin of Constantine the Great seemed ready to fall down, and Macedonius therefore would remove the coffin. Some, including the orthodox party, maintained that this removal was improper and irregular, being influenced partly by respect for the deceased emperor, and partly by hatred against Macedonius. But as Macedonius notwithstanding had proceeded to the removal and had brought the coffin into another church, the two parties came to blows in the latter church, and such a slaughter was there made that the porch was filled with dead bodies. This unfortunate step drew upon Macedonius the emperor's displeasure (Socrates, H. E. ii. cap. xxviii.; Sozomen, H. E. iv. cap. xxi.). About this time the disagreement among the opposers of the Nicene faith came to an open rupture, and Basil of Ancyra, the leader of the semi-Arians, drew Macedonius over to his party (Philostorgius, Hist. Eccles. iv. cap. ix.). From this time onward Macedonius held a high rank among the semi-Arians, and supported their cause in the council of Seleucia. But he thus drew on himself such hatred from the whole Arian party, that in the year 360, with Acacius and Eudoxius at their head, they deprived him of his office at Constantinople. Macedonius was very restless under this, and laboured to establish the semi-Arians by defending their opinions; and this gave occasion to the semi-Arians to be sometimes called Macedonians. He died soon afterwards. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iii. p. 74, &c.—Schl.

¹ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. iv. [For a more full exhibition of the Macedonian doctrines we will subjoin the statement of Walch, ubi supra, p. 96. As to their doctrine concerning the Son of God, some Macedonians agreed with the adherents of the Nicene fathers, but others, and among them Macedonius himself, coincided with the mildest form of the semi-Arian creed. In regard to the Holy Spirit they departed wholly from the opinions of the orthodox. Some indeed did not declare themselves in regard to the divinity of the Holy Spirit. They did not expressly deny that he was God, and yet they hesitated to affirm it. And this was no unusual thing. Even Basil the Great would not recommend to have the name of God applied in public to the Holy Spirit, nor condemn those who refused thus to use it. Nor would Gregory disapprove this. See Petavius, Dogm. Theolog. lib. i. De Trinitate, cap. x. tom. ii. pages 45—64; and Semler, Einführung zum 3ten Theil der Baumgarten's Polmik. pages 173—183. Others who did declare themselves affirmed that the Holy Spirit was not a person in the Godhead, that he was not what the Father and the Son are, and therefore no divine honours were due to him. Some held the Holy Spirit to be a creature, and therefore did not deny his personality. Others denied his personality, and regarded him as a mere attribute of God.—Schl.

² Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. viii.; Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. vii. [The Macedonians led an externally good and strict life, and by promoting monkery obtained such reputation for piety, agreeably to the taste of that age, as contributed much to their popularity in Constantinople and its vicinity. After their separation from the Arians, and after their attempt to unite themselves with the orthodox had failed, they spread themselves considerably, especially in Thrace, along the Hellespont, and in Phrygia. In the western provinces they were not found. At Constantinople they had their own churches and bishops. Among the attempts to reclaim the Macedonians from their errors, the most remarkable was that of the second general council at Constantinople. The emperor Theodosius hoped they might be won over more readily than the Arians, because they differed less from the orthodox. He therefore called Macedonian bishops to the council. There were thirty-six of them present, and much pains was taken to persuade them to embrace the Nicene decisions. But all efforts were vain; they declared that they would sooner embrace the Arian than the Nicene faith. And hence their doctrine was opposed in this synod by an addition made to the Nicene creed, and by express forms of condemnation. With these spiritual weapons against the Macedonians secular ones were combined. In the statutes of the elder Theodosius (lib. xi. xii. xiii. Codex Theodos. de Hæreticis), they are mentioned by name; and in those of the younger Theodosius, which are inserted in the Codex Theodos. (lib. ix. lxx.), it will be seen that they still existed, but could hold worship only in the principal cities. These civil regulations gave ill-disposed bishops too much liberty to manifest their persecuting spirit towards the Macedonians, and enabled them wholly to exterminate them it would seem under these emperors. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iii. pages 70—118; and, respecting the council of Constantinople, his Hist. der Kirchensamm. p. 224, &c. The decrees of this council are given in Beveridge's Pandectæ Canonum, tom. i. p. 85.—Schl.

a man of birth, fortune, and eloquence, and afterwards bishop of Avila, imbibed it. Being accused by some bishops before the emperor Gratian, Priscillian and his followers were banished from Spain, but he returned soon after. Accused again in the year 384, before Maximus (the usurper in Gaul after the assassination of Gratian), he was condemned with several of his associates, and executed at Treves in the year 385.¹ The instigators of this capital execution for heresy were however regarded with abhorrence by the bishops of Gaul and Italy; for it was not yet considered among Christians as a pious and religious act to deliver heretics over to the civil power to be punished.² Priscillian being

¹ This was the first instance of a heretic being punished with death. The first law authorizing capital punishment for holding heretical opinions, is that of Theodosius against the Manicheans in 382.—It.

² See Sulpitius Severus, Hist. Sacra, lib. ii. cap. xlv. li. and Dialog. iii. De Vita Martini, cap. xv. Among the adherents of Priscillian there were some bishops, particularly Instantius and Salvianus, and many ladies of respectability. Hyginus, bishop of Corduba, who afterwards went over to the Priscillianists, was the first to oppose his doctrine, and for this purpose made a representation of it to Idacius, the bishop of Merida, who by his rash violence against bishop Instantius, blew the fire of the Priscillianist war into a great flame. After many and long contests a council was held at Sagrassia in 380, at which the Priscillianist doctrine was condemned, and the bishop Instantius and Salvianus, with the laymen Elpidius and Priscillian, were excommunicated. This measure rendered the sect more resolute and determined; and Priscillian, that he might be more safe, was raised by the party from a layman to a bishop of Avila. The civil power was put in motion against the sect, and Idacius obtained from the emperor Gratian a decree, by which this sect as well as others was banished the country. This decree depressed them for a time. The leaders of the party took their course towards Rome; and while passing through France they seduced many, especially in Aquitain Gaul. Although they got no hearing at Rome, yet they found means to obtain a rescript from Gratian, by which the former decree was repealed, and these bishops were restored again to their offices. When Maximus had seized the government, he issued, at the instigation of Idacius, a command to the Priscillianist teachers to appear before the ecclesiastical council of Bourdeaux. Hero Instantius, who readily and frankly answered the interrogatories of the council, was deposed, but Priscillian appealed to the emperor. Martin of Tours saw with concern a civil judge about to pass sentence in an ecclesiastical affair, and made representation on the subject to the emperor, who assured him that no blood should be shed. Yet the emperor was finally persuaded by some bishops to commit the investigation of the subject to his minister of state, Evodius, a stern judge. He at Treves in the year 385 put Priscillian to the rack, and extorted from him a confession that he had uttered impure principles, had held nocturnal meetings with base females, and prayed naked; and after the facts had been reported to the emperor, Priscillian and some of his adherents were put to death, and others were punished with banishment. The emperor had it in contemplation to send military officers into Spain, with full power to search out the heretics and deprive them of life and property. But here again Martin of Tours showed himself in an amiable light. He repaired to Treves and there made such representations as prevented the execution of the emperor's designs. Yet the people shed the blood of heretics in many places, and some bishops had such unchristian minds as to approve of it. Yet others on the contrary disapproved of it, and had great discussion with the former in regard to it. The Priscillianists however still continued to be numerous in Spain, especially in Galicia; and in the fifth slain, his opinions were not at once suppressed, but spread far and wide in Spain and Gaul, and even in the sixth century the Priscillianists caused much trouble to the bishops of those provinces.

22. No one of the ancients has accurately described the doctrines of the Priscillianists; on the contrary, some of them have perplexed and obscured the subject. It appears however from authentic records, that the Priscillianists came very near in their views to the Manicheans. For they denied the reality of Christ's birth and incarnation; maintained that the visible universe was not the production of God, but of some demon or evil principle; preached the existence of Æons or emanations from God; declared human bodies to be prisons for celestial minds fabricated by the author of evil; condemned marriages; denied the resurrection of the body, &c. Their rules of life were very severe, for what many state concerning their flagitious and libidinous practices rests on no credible testimony. That the Priscillianists used dissimulation, and eluded their enemies by deceiving them, is true; but that they regarded all kinds of lying and perjury as lawful, as is commonly reported of them, has not even the appearance of truth.³

century, when the irruption of the barbarians into Spain threw the ecclesiastical affairs into great disorder, it afforded this sect opportunity again to spread itself very much. And in the sixth century Aguirre has inserted in the Concil. Hispan. tom. ii. p. 269, &c. a letter of Montanus, bishop of Toledo, in the year 527, from which it appears that many persons of this sect then lived in Valencia, and in the year 561 a council was held against them at Braga. From this time onwards no more is heard of them, and they must either have gradually wasted away or have fallen at once on the irruption of the Saracens. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. iii. pages 387-430.—Schl.

³ See Simon de Vries, Diss. Critica de Priscillianistis, Utrecht, 1745, 4to, in which the principal fault is that he follows too closely Beausobre's Hist. du Manich. taking everything there asserted to be true. Giresius, Hist. Priscillianistarum Chronologica, Roma, 1750, 8vo. In Angelus Calogera, Opuscoli Scientifici, tom. xxvii. p. 61, occurs: Bacharius illustratus seu de Priscillianiana heresi, which however is less occupied in illustrating the affairs of the Priscillianists than [the work of] Bacharius [a learned Spaniard], who composed a short treatise De Fide first published by Muratori (Anecdota Latinorum, tom. ii.) and which some consider as a polemic tract against the Priscillianists. To these must be added Walch, ubi supra, pages 378-481. To ascertain the real doctrines of the Priscillianists is very difficult, and perhaps impossible. The quotation from an epistle of Priscillian which Orosius has preserved (in his Communitorium, inter Opp. Augustini, tom. viii. p. 431), is so obscure that it would be very natural to suppose his contemporaries did not correctly understand him. Hence we cannot rely entirely on the testimony of the ancients, even if they appear to have been impartial writers. Still it appears unquestionable that Priscillian embraced Gnostic and Manichean errors, that he misconstrued the Scriptures and perverted them by allegorical interpretations, that he relied on apocryphal books as of divine authority, that he believed in the eternity of matter and held that the evil angels were not creatures of God, that he also believed the world was not the work of God, and that all changes in the material universe originated from the evil spirit.

23. To these larger sects certain minor ones may be added. One Audæus, an honest man and ejected from the church in Syria for too freely reproofing the corrupt lives of the clergy, collected a congregation and became its bishop. Being banished by the emperor into Scythia he went among the Goths, and there propagated his sect with good success. As to the time when this sect arose the ancients are not agreed. In some of their practices they deviated from other Christians, among which this is especially noticed by the ancients, that contrary to the decree of the Nicene council they celebrated the feast of Easter on the same day with the Jewish Passover. It is also said that they attributed to the Deity a human form, and held some other opinions which were erroneous.¹

Concerning the soul, he taught that it is a particle of the divine nature, separated from the substance of God. The human body, as all other flesh according to the Priscillian doctrine, came from the devil. And even the production of man, by the union of a soul with a body, was the work of evil spirits. They believed in an unconditional necessity for the changes a man undergoes, and which they ascribed to the influence of the stars. They denied the personal distinction of the three persons in the Godhead. It is very probable that they controverted the human nature of Christ; and it is still more probable that they denied him a real body, than that they denied him a human soul. From these principles it would follow that they did not believe in a resurrection of the body. The same principles led them to disapprove of marriage and of the procreation of children, and to forbid the eating of flesh. Their moral principles were in general strict, and tended to produce an ascetic life. And on this account the accusation of stances debauchery, brought against them by their adversaries, is very improbable. Whether they all held prevarication, lying, and perjury, to be allowable even in cases where one's religion is to be avowed, is uncertain. Yet it is very certain that some of them held this dangerous principle; as for instance Dicitinus, from whose book Augustine quotes the arguments used to justify lying, which he also confutes in his book De Mendacio, ad Consent. Yet that Priscillian and his first set of followers did not think so, appears from their suffering martyrdom.—Schl. [See an ample notice of this sect and their leader in Lardner's Credibility, vol. iv. p. 337, and a brief one in Matter, Hist. du Gnos. tome iii. p. 95. Gieseler refers to a recent publication on this subject by Lübker, De Hæresi Priscillian. Copen. 1840, 8vo.—R.]

¹ Epiphanius, Hæres. lxx. p. 811; Augustine, De Hæres. cap. i.; Theodoret, Fabul. Hæret. lib. iv. cap. ix.; Schröder, Diss. de Audæanis, which is in Voigt, Biblioth. Hæretic. tom. i. pt. iii. p. 578 [and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. pages 300—321. The founder of this sect is called both Audius and Audæus, and his followers are likewise called both Audiani and Audæani, and not unfrequently Anthropomorphites, because they were taxed with attributing to God a human form. Audius was of Mesopotamia, and stood in high estimation among the Syrians, on account of his holy life and his great zeal for the honour of God. The last was so great that he publicly punished his own brother, and would not flatter the avaricious and luxurious bishops; and for this he endured persecution, hatred, and reproach. But he was undismayed and bore it all with patience. Yet when at last the hatred of his enemies went so far as often to beat him and his friends, he separated himself from the church (though previously some had refused him communion) formed a party, and got himself ordained its bishop. This step made the separation complete, for it was contrary to all ecclesiastical rules, which required at least three bishops to solemnize an ordination, and also forbade the ordination of any schismatical bishop. The orthodox bishops en-

24. To this century also the Greeks and orientals refer the origin of the sect called Messalians and Euchites, and indeed clear traces of them first appear in the latter part of this century, though their principles were much more ancient, and were known before the Christian era in Syria, Egypt, and other countries of the East. These persons, who lived secluded from intercourse with the world in the manner of monks, derived their name from their incessant prayers; for they believed that an evil demon naturally dwells in the mind of every man, which can be expelled no otherwise than by continual praying and singing, and that this demon being once expelled, the soul will return to God pure, and be again united to the divine essence of which it is a portion. To this leading principle they added, as may readily be supposed, many other strange notions closely allied to the sentiments of the Manichæans, and drawn from the same source from which the Manichæans derived their doctrines, namely, the oriental philosophy.² In short, the Euchites were a sort tered a complaint against him before the emperor, who banished him at an advanced age into Scythia. This occasioned his going among the Goths, and converting many of that nation to Christianity. He erected monasteries among them, recommended the monastic life, ordained bishops, and died before the general persecution by Athanasius. Audæus held a few errors. He believed that God possessed not a perfect human body, but a human shape, and of course the form of human limbs; and that the fashion of the human body was copied from the divine shape, to which the Scriptural term, Image of God, is to be referred. In regard to their worship his followers were strict separatists, and would not worship at all with those Christians who were of an irreligious life, or who held church communion with the irreligious. Nay, they discarded the name of Christians for that of Audians, because many of them had abused the name of Christians in order to secure their safety. In regard to the feast of Easter, they were Quartodecimarians—that is, they kept this festival at the time the Jews did, and defended the practice by appealing to the Apostolical Constitutions. They held apocryphal books, and had their own system of church discipline. In general it may be said they were rather fanatics than proper heretics.—Schl.

² Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxx. p. 1067; Theodoret, Hæret. Fabul. lib. iv. cap. x.; Timotheus Presbyter, De Receptione Hæreticor. in Cotelier's Monumenta Eccles. Græcæ, tom. iii. p. 403, &c.; Tollius, Insignia Iternis Græcæ, p. 110, &c.; Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. i. p. 128, tom. iii. pt. ii. p. 172, &c. and others [in particular Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. iii. pages 481—536. The names Messalians and Euchites signify prayers or praying brethren. The first is Syriac [or Aramaic, Ezra, vi. 10.—Mur.] and the latter is Greek [Εὐχιστα or Εὐχισταί, from εὐχῆ, oratio. See Suicer, Theaur. Eccles. tom. i. p. 1285, &c. and Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. iv. cap. ii.—Mur.] They were also called Enthusiasts, because they pretended to be inspired and to hold converse with the Holy Spirit; Choreutæ (χορευταί, dancers) from the motion of their bodies which they commonly used; the Spiritual (πνευματικοί) which was the name they gave to themselves; also Lampetians, Adelphiens, and Marcellians, from certain of their leaders. There were both pagan and Christian Messalians. The former acknowledged indeed a plurality of gods, though they worshipped but one whom they called ὁ παντοκράτωρ, the Almighty. These were more ancient than the Christians, built houses for worship similar to the Christian churches, and assembled morning and evening with torches and of mystics, who, according to the oriental notion, imagined that two souls resided in man, the one good and the other evil, and who laboured to expedite the return of the former to God by contemplation and prayer. This sect drew over many to its ranks by its outward show of piety, and the Greeks waged war with it through all the subsequent centuries; yet it should be remembered that the names Messalians and Euchites were used with great latitude among the Greeks and the orientals, and were applied to all who endeavoured to raise the soul to God, by recalling it from all influence of the senses, though those persons often differed very materially in their religious opinions.

25. Towards the close of this century Arabia and the adjacent countries were disturbed by two opposite sects, the Antidico-Marianites and the Collyridians. The former contended that the Virgin Mary did not remain always a virgin, but that she had intercourse with her husband, Joseph, after the birth of our Saviour. The latter, candles, and employed their time in praising God; whence they were called Euphenites. The Christian Messallians were so named from the coincidence of their practice with that of the pagans; they seem to be the offspring of monkish enthusiasm, and to have first appeared in Mesopotamia, and thence to have spread into Syria, but their origin cannot be traced with more particularity. Their religious theory was founded on an impure mysticism, like to what is common to nearly all fanatical persons and communities, and which originated, like the system of Manes, from the principles of the oriental philosophy. Yet the Messallians, like all enthusiasts, appear to have relied more upon spirits, apparitions, and revelations, than upon the oriental system of metaphysics. Their principles did not necessarily lead to vicious conduct, yet they might afford occasion for it. And in fact there were among them many improper persons, whom idleness and spiritual pride led into gross offences. And there were not wanting among them real villains, who abused the mystical stupidity of others to subserve their own wicked purposes.—Schl.

whom the ladies especially favoured, went to the opposite extreme; they worshipped St. Mary as a goddess, and thought she ought to be honoured and appeased with libations, sacrifices, and offerings of cakes [καλλυρίδες, in Latin collyridæ.]¹ The more obscure and unimportant sects I pass without notice.

¹ See Epiphanius, Hæres. lxxviii. lxxix. pages 1033 and 1037. [Among the moderns, Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iii. p. 577. &c. Walch makes mention (ubi supra, p. 598) of one Bonosus, concerning whom he also published a dissertation at Gottingen, 1754, De Bonoso hæretico. This Bonosus was probably bishop of Sardica in Illyricum near the end of this century. He was accused of maintaining that Mary did not always remain a virgin, but bore several children. And this charge seems not to have been a false one. But whether Bonosus denied also the divinity of Christ, and taught that he was the Son of God only by adoption, is very dubious. Yet so much is certain, that in the fifth and sixth centuries there were opposers of the doctrine of the Trinity and of the divinity of Christ, who in France and Spain were known by the name of Bonosians. Still it is uncertain whether they derived the name from this or from some other Bonosus. The reader may consult Ittig's Supplementum Operum Clementis Alexand. where in the annexed Faciculus, Obser. Miscellaneæ ad Hist. Eccles. p. 242, there is an Essay, De Hæresi Bonosi. The Collyridians (for Epiphanius makes them all females) were women who carried their respect for the mother of Jesus so high that they were justly charged by the orthodox fathers with superstition and idolatry. They came from Thrace and the yet more distant regions of Scythia into Arabia. It was their practice to dress out a car or a square throne (κερικόν), spread over it a linen cloth, and on a clear day once a year place on it during the day a loaf of bread or a cake (καλλυρίς), which they offered to the virgin Mary. Mosheim (in his Lectures) considered them as a set of simple persons who had considerable heathenism about them, and supposed this offering of a cake was derived from paganism. While they were mere pagans they were accustomed to bake and present to the goddess Venus or Astarte (the moon) certain cakes which were called collyrides; and when they became Christians they thought this honour might now be best shown to Mary. The historian had in his eye perhaps a passage in Jeremiah (viii. 48), where the prophet speaks of such a sort of worship; and in general it is well known that the offering of cakes in the pagan worship was a customary thing. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 625, &c.; and Tillemont, Mémoires d'Hist. Eccles. tome xii. p. 83.—Schl.

CENTURY FIFTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. To understand the causes of events affecting the condition of Christians in this century, it is necessary to keep in view a portion of the civil history of the period. We shall therefore first observe concisely that the Roman empire at the commencement of this century was divided into two parts, one of which embraced the eastern and the other the western provinces. Arcadius, the emperor of the East, resided at Constantinople. Honorius, who governed the West, lived at Ravenna in Italy. The latter, distinguished by nothing but the mildness of his disposition, neglected the affairs of the empire. Hence first the Goths laid waste Italy several times, and plundered Rome in a distressing manner; and this first defeat of the Romans in the West was followed by others still more grievous under the succeeding emperors, for the ferocious and warlike people of Germany overran those fairest provinces of Europe, Italy, Gaul, and Spain, and set up new kingdoms in them. At last the Heruli, in the year 476, under Odoacer their chief, having vanquished Romulus Augustus, who is commonly called Augustulus, overturned the empire of the West, and brought Italy under their subjection. Sixteen years after, Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths inhabiting Illyricum, invaded these unwelcome intruders by the authority of the Greek emperor, and vanquished them; in consequence of which, the kingdom of the Ostrogoths was established in Italy in the year 493, and continued with various fortune till the year 552.¹ The new kings of the West professed to respect the authority of the emperors resident at Constantinople, whom they acknowledged as sovereigns over them; but in reality they were quite independent, especially Theodoric in Italy, a man of distinguished abilities, and they left nothing to the emperors but the shadow of supremacy.²

2. Amidst these wars and the dreadful calamities they produced, the cause of Christianity suffered much. Yet the Christian emperors, especially those of the East, continued their efforts to extirpate what remained of the ancient idolatry. In particular, Theodosius the younger [A.D. 408—450] has left us striking proofs of his zeal in this matter; for we have still extant various laws of his requiring the idolatrous temples to be utterly destroyed, or to be dedicated to Christ and the saints, abrogating the pagan ceremonies and rites, and excluding the adherents of paganism from all public offices.³ In the western parts alone the efforts of this kind were somewhat less, and we therefore find the Saturnalia, the Lupercalia, the gladiatorial shows, and other idolatrous customs observed with impunity both at Rome and in the provinces, and men of the highest rank and authority publicly professing the religion of their ancestors.⁴ But by degrees this liberty was

² Du Fresne, Diss. xxlii. ad Hist. Ludovici Sancti. p. 280; Muratori, Antiq. Ital. tom. ii. pag. 578, 832; and Annal. Italie; Giannone, Hist. de Naples, tome i. p. 207; Coehneus, Vita Theod. Ostrog. regis, with the observations of Peringskiöld Stockholm, 1699, &c.

³ See Codex Theodos. tom. vi. pages 327, 331, &c.
⁴ See Macrobius, Saturnalia, in particular, lib. ii. p. 190, ed. Gronovii; Maffei, Dell' Anfiteatri, lib. i. pages 56, 57; Pierre le Brun, Hist. Crit. des Pratiques Superstitieuses, tome i. p. 237, and others; but especially Montfaucon, Diss. de Moribus temporis Theodosii M. et Arcadii ex Chrysostomo, which is found in Latin in the Opp. Chrysostomi, tom. xi. and in French, in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tome xx. p. 197, &c. [The pagans traced the calamities of the empire to the prevalence of Christianity. Therefore in the year 408, at the instigation of the Tuscan soothsayers, idolatrous sacrifices were again established at Rome, in order to procure success against Alaric; and the existing bishop Innocentius, who was apprised of the measure, allowed it to take place, if we may believe Zosimus, on condition that the sacrifices should be offered without noise. See Zosimus, lib. v. cap. xli. To confute this accusation of the populace against Christianity, was the design of Augustine's work, De Civitate Dei, addressed to Mar-

¹ For a fuller account, see the Abbé de Bos, Hist. Critique de la Monarchie Franç. tome i. p. 558, &c.; and Mascov's History of the Germans, written in German. [Also Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, chap. xxix.—xxx. xxxlii.—xxxvi.—xxxvii.]

confined to narrower limits, and those spectacles which were most inconsistent with the sanctity of the Christian religion were everywhere suppressed.¹

3. The limits of the Christian church were extended both in the East and in the West among the people addicted to idolatry. In the East the inhabitants of the two mountains, Libanus and Antilibanus, being extremely annoyed by wild beasts sought aid against them from the famous Symeon Stylites, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. Symeon told them that their only remedy was to forsake their ancient superstitions and embrace Christianity. These mountaineers obeyed the counsel of the holy man, and having become Christians they saw the wild beasts flee from their country, if writers tell us the truth. The same Symeon by his influence (for I doubt the existence of any miracle) caused a part of the Arabians to adopt the Christian worship.² In the island of Crete a considerable number of Jews, finding that they had been basely imposed upon by one Moses of Crete, who pretended to be the Messiah, voluntarily embraced Christianity.³

4. The German nations who rent in pieces the western Roman empire were either Christians before that event, as the Goths and others, or they embraced Christianity after establishing their kingdoms, in order to reign more securely among the Christians. But at what time and by whose instrumentality the Vandals, the Suevi, the Alans, and others became Christians, is still uncertain and is likely to remain so. As to the Burgundians who dwelt along the Rhine, and thence passed into Gaul, it appears from Socrates⁴ that they voluntarily became Christians near the commencement of the century. Their motive to this step was the hope that Christ, or the God of the Romans, who they were informed was immensely powerful, would protect them from the incursions and the ravages of the Huns. They afterwards [about A.D. 450] joined the Arian party, to which also the Vandals, Suevi, and Goths, were addicted. All these warlike nations measured the excellence of a religion by the military successes of its adherents, and esteemed that as the best religion, the professors of which were most victorious over their enemies. While therefore they saw the Romans possessing a greater empire than other nations, they viewed Christ, the God of the Romans, as the most worthy of their homage.

5. It was this motive which produced the conversion of Clovis [Chlodovæus, Iludovicius, Ludovicus]⁵ or Lewis, king of the Salii, a tribe of the Franks, who conquered a large part of Gaul and there founded the kingdom of the Franks, which he endeavoured to extend over all the Gallic provinces; a valiant prince, but cruel, barbarous, selfish, and haughty. For in the year 496, in a battle with the Alemanui at Tolbiacum,⁶ when his situation was almost desperate, he implored the aid of Christ, whom his wife Clotildis [or Clotilla], a Christian, and daughter of the king of the Burgundians, had long recommended to him in vain; and he made a vow that he would worship Christ as his God, provided he obtained the victory. Having been victorious he fulfilled his promise, and in the close of that year was baptized at Rheims.⁷ Some

¹ Near the close of the century, Anastasius in the East prohibited the combats with wild beasts and the other shows. See Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. pages 298, 272. [See also Beugnot, Hist. de la destruction du Paganisme en Occident, vol. ii. the whole of the 12th book.—R.]

² Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. p. 246, &c.

³ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxxviii. [where the account briefly is, that in the time of Theodosius the younger an impostor arose called Moses Cretensis. He pretended to be a second Moses sent to deliver the Jews who dwelt in Crete, and promised to divide the sea and give them a safe passage through it. They assembled together with their wives and children, and followed him to a promontory. He there commanded them to cast themselves into the sea. Many of them obeyed and perished in the waters, and many were taken up and saved by fishermen. Upon this the deluded Jews would have torn the impostor to pieces, but he escaped and was seen no more. In the island of Minorca also many persons abandoned Judaism. Yet their conversion does no great honour to the Christians: for it was in consequence of great violence done to the Jews, of levelling their synagogues with the ground, and taking away their sacred books. See the account of their conversion by the bishop of the Baleares islands, Severus, Epist. Encycl. de Judeorum in hac insula Conversione et de Miraculis ibidem factis, published from a MS. in the Vatican library by Baronius, in his Annales A.D. 418, and abridged by Fleury, Hist. de l'Eglise, liv. xxiv. Yet it is certain that the Jews even in that age often imposed on the Christians, by pretending to have favourable views of Christianity. This appears from the Codex Theodos. lib. xvi. tit. viii. leg. xxlii., and Socrates (Hist. Eccles. lib. lii. cap. xvii.) mentions a Jew who with baptism received a considerable sum of money successively from the orthodox, from the Arians, and from the Macedonians, and finally applying to the Novatians for baptism, was detected by the miracle of the disappearance of the water from the font. Although this miracle may be doubted and the impostor may have been detected by an artifice of the Novatian bishop, yet it appears from the story that what is practised by many Jews at the present day is no new thing.—Schl.]

⁴ Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxx. [They applied to a bishop in Gaul, who directed them to fast seven days, and baptised them on the eighth. Semler (in his Hist. Eccles. Selecta Capita, tom. i. p. 203) supposes this event took place about the year 415. And according to the Chronicon of Prosper, it was in this year that the Burgundians took possession of a part of Gaul on the Rhine, with the consent of the Romans and their confederates, having promised to embrace Christianity.—Schl.]

⁵ See Milman's Gibbon, vol. vi. page 293.—R.]

⁶ Tolbiacum is thought to be the present Zulpick, which is about twelve miles from Cologne.—Mach.]

⁷ See Gregory of Tours, Hist. Francor. lib. ii. cap. xxx. xxxi. Henry Count de Runau, Hist. Imperii Romano-Germatici, tom. i. p. 588, &c. Abbe de Bos, Hist. Crit. de la Monarchie Franc. tome ii. p. 340, &c.

thousands of Franks followed the example of their king. It has been supposed that besides the exhortations of his wife the expectation of an extension of his dominions contributed to induce him to renounce idolatry for Christianity; and it is certain that his professing Christianity was very subservient to the establishment and enlargement of his kingdom. The miracles reported on this occasion are unworthy of credit; in particular, that which is the most astounding of them all, the descent of a dove from heaven with a phial full of oil at the baptism of Clovis, is either a fiction or as I think more probable, a deception craftily contrived for the occasion;¹ for such pious frauds were much resorted to in that age both in Gaul and Spain, in order to captivate more readily the minds of the barbarous nations. It is said that the conversion of Clovis gave rise to the custom of addressing the French monarchs with the titles of Most Christian Majesty, and Eldest Son of the Church;² for the kings of the other barbarous nations which occupied the Roman provinces were still addicted to idolatry, or involved in the errors of Arianism.

6. Celestine, bishop of Rome, first sent into Ireland to spread Christianity among the barbarians of that island Palladius, whose labours were not crowned with much success. After his death Celestine sent to Ireland, in the year 432, Succathus, a Scotchman, whose name he changed to Pa-tricius [Patrick], a man of vigour, and as appears from the event not unfit for such an undertaking. He was far more successful in his attacks upon idolatry, and having converted many of the Irish to Christianity, in the year 472 he established at Armagh the see of an archbishop of Ireland.³ Hence St. Patrick, although there were some Christians in Ireland before his arrival, has been justly called the Apostle of Ireland and the father of the Irish church, and he is held in high veneration to this day.

7. The causes which induced all these pagan nations to abandon the religion of their ancestors and profess Christianity may be gathered from what has been already said. He must lack discernment who can deny that the labours, the perils, and the zeal of great and excellent men dispelled

¹ See the Acta Sanctorum, tom. ii. Martii, 517, tom. iii. Februar. pag. 131, 179, &c.; James Ware's, Hibernia Sacra, p. 1, &c.; Dublin, 1717, fol. The same Ware published the Opuscula Sti Patricii with notes, London, 1656, 8vo. The synods held by St. Patrick are given by Wilkins, Concilii Magnæ Brit. et Hiberniæ, tom. i. p. 2, &c. [and thence republished in Harduin's Concilii, tom. i. p. 1790, &c.] Concerning the famous cave called the purgatory of St. Patrick, see Peter le Brun, Hist. Crit. des Pratiques Superstit. tome iv. p. 34, &c. [A full account of St. Patrick and his labours in Ireland is given by archbishop Ussher, Ecclesiast. Britannicar. Primordia, cap. xvii. p. 815, &c.—Mur. (Rapin, in his History of England (vol. i. book ii.) remarks, that there were three Patricii or Patricks. 1. The elder, who died in the year 449 mentioned in the Chronicle of Glastonbury. 2. The great, who died in 493, after governing the Irish church for sixty years; he is the one mentioned by Mosheim. 3. The younger, who was a nephew of Patrick the Great and survived his uncle some years.—Schl [Mosheim, following Ussher, asserts that Patrick was a Scotchman. More recent and trustworthy authorities incline to the belief that he was from ancient Britany in Gaul, and a native of Boulogne. He was first carried as a captive to Ireland, where he was sold as a slave; and after a residence of from four to six years, he succeeded in effecting his escape to Gaul. He then became acquainted with the bishop of Auxerre and the celebrated Martin of Tours, and is said to have spent some time in the famous monastery of Lerins in the south of France. Romanist historians assure us that he went thence to Rome, where he was ordained a bishop by Pope Celestine; but it has been satisfactorily shown by Mr. Petrie (Trans. Royal Irish Acad. vol. xviii. p. 108, &c.) that these statements are incorrect, and that Patrick never was at Rome. In 432 he returned to Ireland and had great success in planting the Gospel there, where he died about the year 492. It must be added, however, that great uncertainty rests upon the chronology of his life; even his very existence has been plausibly denied; and judicious critics are disposed to believe that what is related of the one Patrick really belongs to two, if not to the three, of the same name mentioned by Schlegel in the previous part of this note. Some of his writings are still extant; they were for the first time collected and published by Sir James Ware, as stated above by Mosheim, in 1656. They are all to be found in the 10th volume of Gallandius, Bibliotheca Vet. Pat. Ven. 1764-81, and they have been recently re-edited by S. L. Villanueva, S. Patricii Ibernorum Apostoli Opuscula et Fragmenta, Scholii illustrata, Dub. 1835, 8vo. A full account of the famous purgatory of St. Patrick in the County of Donegal, and of the superstitious observances of the pilgrims who resorted thither, may be seen in Richardson's Folly of Pilgrimages in Ireland, especially of that to St. Patrick's Purgatory, Dub. 1747, 12mo, and Wright's St. Patrick's Purgatory, &c. Lond. 1844.—R.

[and Walch, Diss. de Clodoveo M. cæ rationibus politicis Christiano, Jena, 1751.—Schl. [Clovis once hearing a pathetic discourse on the sufferings of Christ exclaimed, "Si ego ibidem cum Franciis meis fuisset, injurias jus viderem;" Had I been there with my Franks, I would have avenged his wrongs. See Fredegarus, Epitom. cap. xxi.; Almoyn, lib. i. cap. xvi.; and Chronicon S. Dionysii, lib. i. cap. xx.—Mur.

² Against this miracle of the phial, Chiffet opposed his book De Amulio Rhenani, Antw. 1651, fol. The reality of the miracle is defended, among many others, by the Abbé Vertot, Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tome iv. p. 350, &c. After considering all the circumstances, I dare not call the fact in question. But I suppose St. Remigius, in order to confirm the wavering mind of the barbarous and savage king, artfully contrived to have a dove let down from the roof of the church bearing a phial of oil at the time of the king's baptism. Similar miracles occur in the monuments of this age. [The possibility of the event is made conceivable in this way. Yet there still remain weighty historical objections to the reality of the fact. The story rests solely on the authority of Hincmar, a writer who lived three hundred years after the time. Avitus, Anastasius, and even Gregory of Tours, and Fredegarus, are wholly silent on the subject. Besides, Hincmar's narrative contains the improbable circumstance, that the clergy who should have brought the oil that was wanting, could not get near the font on account of the pressure of the crowd; but as anointing with oil was then practised at every person's baptism, it is improbable that on so solemn an occasion as this, due preparation for this part of the service would have been neglected.—Schl.

³ See Daniel's and the Abbé de Camp's Diss. de Titulo Regis Christianissimi, in the Journal des Savans for the year 1720, pages 243, 404—448, 536. Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions, tome xx. p. 466, &c.

the clouds of darkness from the minds of many; and on the other hand he must be shortsighted, and not well versed in the history of this century, who is unable to see that the fear of the vengeance of man, the hope of temporal advantage and honours, and the desire of obtaining aid from Christians against their enemies, were prevalent motives with many to abandon their gods. How much influence miracles may have had it is difficult to say; for I can easily believe that God was sometimes present with those pious and good men who endeavoured to instil the principles of true religion into the minds of barbarous nations;¹ and yet it is certain that the greater part of the prodigies of this age are very suspicious. The greater the simplicity and credulity of the multitude the more audacious would be the crafty in playing off their impostures;² nor could the more discerning expose their cunning artifices with safety to their own lives and worldly comfort.³ It is commonly the case, that when great danger attends the avowal of the truth then the prudent keep silence, the multitude believe without reason, and the fabricators of imposition triumph.

CHAPTER II.

THE CALAMITIES OF THE CHURCH.

1. It has been already observed that the Goths, the Heruli, the Franks, the Huns, the Vandals, and other fierce and warlike nations, who were for the most part pagans, had invaded and miserably rent asunder the Roman empire. During these commotions the Christians at first suffered extremely. These nations were, it is true, more anxious for plunder and dominion than for the propagation of the false religions of their ancestors, and therefore did not form any set purpose to exterminate Christianity; yet the worshippers of idols, who still existed everywhere scattered over the empire, neglected no means to inflame the barbarians with hatred against the Christians, hoping by their means to regain their former liberty. Their expectations were disappointed, for the greatest part of the barbarians soon became Christians themselves; yet the followers of Christ had everywhere first to undergo great calamities.

2. The friends of the old religion, in order to excite in the people greater hatred against the Christians while the public calamities were daily increasing, renewed the obsolete complaint of their ancestors—that all things went well before Christ came, that since he had been everywhere embraced, the neglected and despised gods had sent forth evils of every kind upon the world. This weak attack was repulsed by Augustine in his book, On the City of God, a copious and erudite work. He also prompted Orosius to write his History, in order to show that the same and even greater calamities and plagues afflicted mankind before the Christian religion was published to the world. In Gaul the calamities of the times drove many to such madness that they wholly excluded God from the government of the world, and denied his providence over human affairs. These were vigorously assailed by Salvian in his book, On the government of God.

3. But the persecutions of the Christians deserve to be more particularly noticed. In Gaul and the neighbouring provinces the Goths and Vandals, who at first trampled under foot all rights, human and divine, are reported to have laid violent hands on innumerable Christians. In Britain, after the fall of the Roman power in that country, the inhabitants were miserably harassed by the neighbouring Picts and Scots, who were barbarians. Having therefore suffered various calamities, in the year 445, they chose Vortigern for their king, and finding his forces inadequate to repel the assaults of the enemy, in the year 449 he called the Anglo-Saxons from Germany to his aid. But they, landing with their troops in Britain, produced far greater evils to the inhabitants than they endured before; for these Saxons endeavoured to subdue the people whom they came to assist, and to bring the whole country into subjection to their own power. This produced an obstinate and bloody war between the Britons and the Saxons, which continued with various fortune during one hundred and thirty years, till the Britons were compelled to yield to the Anglo-Saxons and take refuge in Batavia and Cambria [the modern Holland and Wales]. During these conflicts the condition of the British church was deplorable; for the Anglo-Saxons, who worshipped exclusively the gods of their ancestors, almost wholly prostrated it, and put a multitude of Christians to a cruel death.⁴

¹ There is a remarkable passage concerning the miracles of this century in the Theophrastus seu de Immortalitate Animæ, of the acute Æneas Gæzæus, p. 78, ed. Barthil. Some of these miracles, he tells us, he himself has witnessed, pages 80, 81.

² The Benedictine monks speak out freely on this subject, in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. page 83. It is a fine saying of Livy, Hist. lib. xxiv. cap. x. sec. vi., "Prodigia multa nuntiata sunt que magis credebant simplices ac religiosi homines, eo plura nuntiabantur."

³ Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. p. 438; Ep. i. p. 457; Dial. iii. cap. ii. p. 487.

⁴ See Bede and Gildas among the ancients, and

4. In Persia the Christians suffered grievously in consequence of the rash zeal of Abdas, bishop of Suza, who demolished the Pyraum, a temple dedicated to fire; for being commanded by the king, Isdegerdes, to rebuild it, he refused to comply, for which he was put to death in the year 414, and the churches of the Christians were levelled to the ground. Yet this conflict seems to have been of short duration. Afterwards, Vararanes, the son of Isdegerdes, in the year 421, attacked the Christians with greater cruelty, being urged to it partly by the instigation of the Magi and partly by his hatred of the Romans, with whom he was engaged in war. For as often as the Persians and Romans waged war with each other the Christians resident in Persia were exposed to the rage of their monarchs, because they were suspected, and perhaps not without reason, of being favourably disposed towards the Romans, and disposed to betray their country to them.¹ A vast number of Christians perished under various exquisite tortures during this persecution;² but their tranquillity was restored when peace returned between Vararanes and the Romans, in the year 427.³ The Jews also who were opulent and in good credit in various parts of the East, harassed and oppressed the Christians in every way possible.⁴ None of them was more troublesome and overbearing than Gamaliel, their patriarch, who possessed vast power among the Jews, and whom therefore Theodosius Junior restrained by a special edict in the year 415.⁵

5. So far as can be learned at this day, no one ventured to write books against Christianity and its adherents during the fifth century, unless perhaps the Histories of Olympiodorus⁶ and of Zosimus⁷ are to be considered of this character, the latter of whom is uniformly sarcastic and unjustly severe in his attacks on the Christians. Yet no one can entertain a doubt that the philosophers and rhetoricians who still kept up their schools in Greece, Syria, and Egypt, secretly endeavoured to corrupt the minds of the youth, and laboured to instil into them at least some of the principles of the proscribed superstition.⁸ The history of those times and the writings of several of the fathers, exhibit many traces of such clandestine machinations.

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. ALTHOUGH the illiterate had access to every office both civil and ecclesiastical, yet most persons of any respectability were persuaded that the liberal arts and sciences were of great use to mankind. Hence public schools⁹ were flourishing in the larger cities as Constantinople, Rome, Marseilles, Edessa, Nisibis,¹⁰ Carthage, Lyons, and Treves; and masters competent to teach youth were maintained at the expense of the emperors. Some of the bishops and monks also of this century, here and there, imparted to young men what learning among the moderns, Ussher, Britann. Ecclesiast. Primor. cap. xii. p. 415, &c.; and Rapin, History of England, vol. i. b. II. [The Saxons were not directly persecutors of the Christians, but only involved them in the common calamities of their slaughtered and oppressed countrymen.—Mur.]

¹ Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxxix. [where there is a full account of the conduct of Abdas, and of the sufferings of the Christians during the persecution.—Mur.] Bayle, Dictionnaire, article Abdas, Barbeyrac, De la Morale des Pères, page 320. [An account of the manner in which Christianity obtained free toleration and an extensive spread in Persia at the commencement of this century, through the influence of Maruthus, a bishop of Mesopotamia, who was twice an ambassador to the court of Persia, is given by Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. viii.—Mur.]

² Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. ii. pages 182, 248. [See also Theodoret, ubi supra. The most distinguished sufferers in this persecution were Abdas, the bishop of Suza, Hormisdas, a Persian nobleman and son of a provincial governor, Benjamin a deacon, James who apostatized but repented, and Severus who possessed a thousand slaves.—Mur.]

³ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xx.

⁴ Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xxiii. and xvi.; and Codex Theodor. tom. vi. p. 265, &c.

⁵ In the Codex Theodor. tom. vi. p. 262, &c.

⁶ Photius, Biblioth. Cod. lxxx. p. 178. [Olympiodorus was a native of Thebes in Egypt, a poet, a historian, and an ambassador to the king of the Huns. He flourished about the year 425, and wrote a History addressed to Theodosius Junior, and containing the Roman history, particularly of the West, from A.D. 407 to 425. The work is lost, except the copious extracts preserved by Photius, ubi supra.—Mur.]

⁷ Zosimus was a public officer in the reign of Theodosius Junior, and wrote a history in a neat Greek style. The first book gives a concise history of Roman affairs from Augustus to Diocletian; the following books are a full Roman history down to A.D. 410. The best editions are by Cellarius, Jena, 1728, 8vo, and by Reitemier, Lips. 1784, 8vo.—Mur.

⁸ Zacharias Mitylen. De Opificio Dei, pages 165, 200, ed. Barthil.

⁹ The history and progress of schools among Christians, are the subject of an appropriate work by Geo. Gottl. Reufel, Helmst. 1743, 8vo.—Schl.

¹⁰ The schools at Edessa and Nisibis are noticed by Valesius on Theodore Lector's Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. p. 164, b.—Schl.

they possessed;¹ yet the wretchedness of the times, the incursions of barbarous nations, and the paucity of great geniuses, prevented either the church or the state from reaping such advantages from these efforts as were hoped for by those who encouraged them.

2. In the western provinces, especially in Gaul, there were several men of learning who might have served as patterns for others to follow. Such among others were Macrobius, Salvian, Vincentius of Lerins, Ennodius, Sidonius Apollinaris, Claudianus Mamertus, and Dracontius, who as writers were not indeed equal to the ancient Latin authors, yet not altogether inelegant, and who devoted themselves to the study of antiquities and other branches of learning. But the barbarians who laid waste or took possession of the Roman provinces choked these surviving plants of a better age; for all these nations considered arms and military courage as the only source of glory and virtue, and therefore despised learning and the arts. Hence, wherever they planted themselves, there barbarism insensibly sprang up and flourished, and the pursuit of learning was abandoned exclusively to the priests and monks. And these, surrounded by bad examples and living in the midst of wars and perils, gradually lost all relish for solid learning and renown, and substituted in place of it a sickly spectre and an empty shadow of erudition. In their schools the boys and youth were taught the seven liberal arts,² which being comprised in a few precepts, and those very dry and jejune, as appears from the treatises of Augustine upon them, were rather calculated to burden the memory than to strengthen the judgment and improve the intellectual powers. In the close of this century therefore learning was almost extinct, and only a faint shadow of it remained.

3. Those who thought it expedient to study philosophy—and there were but few who thought so—did not in this age commit themselves to the guidance of Aristotle. He was regarded as too austere a master, and one who carried men along a thorny path.³ Perhaps more would have relished him had they been able to read and understand him. But the system of Plato had for several ages been better known, and was supposed to be not only less difficult of comprehension but more in accordance with the principles of religion. Besides, the principal works of Plato were then extant in the Latin translations of Victorinus;⁴ therefore such among the Latins as had a taste for philosophical inquiries contented themselves with the decisions of Plato, as will appear to any one who shall only read Sidonius Apollinaris.⁵

4. The state of learning among the Greeks and the people of the East, both as respects elegant literature and the severer sciences, was a little better, so that among them may be found a larger number of writers who exhibit some marks of genius and erudition. Those who prosecuted the science of jurisprudence resorted much to Berytus in Phœnicia, where was a celebrated law school,⁶ and to Alexandria.⁷ The students in physic and chemistry resorted also to Alexandria. The teachers of eloquence, poetry, philosophy, and the other arts, opened schools almost everywhere, and yet the teachers at Alexandria, Constantinople, and Edessa, were supposed to excel the others in learning and in the art of education.⁸

5. The sect of the younger Platonists sustained itself and its philosophy at Athens, at Alexandria, and in Syria, with no small share of its ancient dignity and reputation. Olympiodorus,⁹ Hero,¹⁰ and other men of high renown, adorned the school of Alexandria. At Athens, Plutarch¹¹ and his

⁴ See Augustine, Confessiones, lib. i. cap. ii. sec. i. Opp. tom. i. pages 105, 106.

⁵ See his Epistole, lib. iv. ep. lii. xi. and lib. ix. ep. ix. and others.

⁶ See Hæcscus, De Acadēmia Jureconsultorum Berytensis; and Zacharias Mitylen. De Officio Dei, p. 164.

⁷ Zacharias Mitylen. De Officio Dei, p. 179. [Among the moderns may be consulted Schmidt's Preface to Hyperius, De Schola Alexandrina Catechetica, Heilmst. 1704, 8vo.; Dodwell ad fragmentum Philippi Sideræ; at the end of his Dissert. on Irenæus; Thomassin, De Doctrin. Eccles. tom. i. p. 1, lib. II. cap. x. p. 210, &c.; Michaëlis, Errat. de Schola Alexandrina sic dictæ Catechetice origine, progressu, et præcipuis doctoribus; in tom. Symbolæ Liter. Bremens. p. 195, &c. and Bingham, Antiq. Eccles. book iii. chap. x. sec. 5.—Schl. [A few additional notices may be seen in Matter, Hist. de l'École d'Alexandrie, vol. i. periods v. and vi. and especially in Guericke, De Schola Alex. Catechet. Halle, 1824. The student will find in the American Biblical Repository for the year 1834 (vol. iv. of the series), a well-digested account of this famous school, of its several presidents and the religious doctrines taught in it, written by Prof. Emerson of Andover.—R.

⁸ Eneas Gæzæus, in his Theophrastus, pages 6, 7, 16, &c. passim.; Zacharias Mitylen. ubi supra, pages 164, 179, 217, &c. and others.

⁹ See Note 6 above, p. 177.—Mur.

¹⁰ Marinus, De Vita Procli, cap. ix. p. 19, ed. Fabr. cil. [Hero was a preceptor of Proclus, and is the second of the three of his name mentioned by Brucker in his Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 323.—Schl.

¹¹ This Plutarch, in distinction from the elder Plutarch, who was more of an historian than a philosopher, is denominated Plutarchus Nestorici, or Plutarch the son of Nestorius. See concerning him Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 312, &c.; Marinus, De Vita Procli, cap. xii. p. 27, and Suidas, article Plutarchus Nestorici, p. 133.—Schl.

¹ On the diocesan and cloister schools in Africa, Spain, Italy, and Gaul, remarks are made by Thomassinus, De Disciplinâ Ecclesiâ, tom. i. pt. ii. lib. ii. p. 27, &c.—Schl.

² These comprised, 1st, the Trivium—namely, grammar, rhetoric, and logic; and 2d, the Quadrivium, or arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. See below, cent. xi. pt. ii. chap. i. sec. 5, p. 353.—Mur.

³ Passages from ancient writers in proof are collected by Launoï, De varia Aristotelis Fortuna in Academia Parisiensi.

successor, Syrianus,¹ with Theophrastus, procured for themselves fame and distinction. From them Proclus received instruction, became the chief of the Platonists of this century, and acquired for himself and for the species of wisdom which he professed so much celebrity among the Greeks, that he seems almost the second father of the system.² His disciples, Marinus of Neapolis, Ammonius the son of Hermias, Isidorus, Damascius, and others, followed eagerly in the footsteps of their instructor, and left many followers who copied their example. Yet the laws of the emperors and the continual advances of Christianity, gradually diminished very much the fame and the influence of these philosophers.³ As there was a sufficient number now among the Christians who cultivated and were able to teach this species of learning so much confided in at that day, it naturally followed that fewer persons than formerly frequented the schools of these heathen sages.

6. But though the philosophy of Plato appeared to most persons more favourable to religion and better founded than that of Aristotle, yet the latter gradually emerged from its obscurity, and found its way into the hands of Christians. The Platonists themselves expounded some of the books of Aristotle in their schools, and particularly his Dialectics, which they recommended to such of their pupils as were fond of disputation. The Christians did the same in the schools in which they taught philosophy. This was the first step made by the Stagirate towards that universal empire which he afterwards obtained. Another and a more active cause was found in the Origenian, Arian, Eutychian, Nestorian, and Pelagian contests, which produced so much evil in the church during this century. Origen, as well known, was a Platonist. When therefore he fell under public censure, many, that they might not be accounted his adherents, applied themselves to the study of Aristotle, between whom and Origen there had been little or no connexion. In the Nestorian, Arian, and Eutychian controversies, both sides had recourse to the most subtle distinctions, divisions, and sophisms, and with these they were supplied by the philosophy of Aristotle and not at all by that of Plato, who never trained men to disputation. The Pelagian doctrine had great affinity with the opinions of Plato concerning God and the human soul. Many therefore ceased to be Platonists as soon as they perceived this fact, and suffered their names to be enrolled among the Peripatetics.

CHAPTER II.

THE GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH AND ITS TEACHERS.

1. FROM the operation of several causes the outward form of government in the church experienced some change. The power of the bishops, particularly of the higher orders, was sometimes augmented and sometimes diminished, according as times and circumstances altered; yet the caprice of the court and political considerations had more influence in this matter than any principles of ecclesiastical law. These changes however were of minor importance. Of much more consequence was the vast increase of honour and power acquired by the bishops of New Rome or Constantinople, in opposition to the most strenuous efforts of the bishop of ancient Rome. In the preceding century the council of Constantinople [A.D. 381] had conferred on the bishop of New Rome the second rank among the highest bishops of the world, on account of the dignity and prerogatives of the city where he presided. The Constantinopolitan bishops (with the consent no doubt of the court) had likewise extended their jurisdiction over the provinces of [proconsular] Asia, Thrace, and Pontus. In this century, with the consent of the emperors, they not only acquired the additional province of eastern Illyricum but likewise a great extension of their honours and prerogatives; for in the year 451 the council of Chalcedon, by their twenty-eighth canon, decreed that the bishop of New Rome ought to enjoy the same honours and prerogatives with the pontiff of ancient Rome, on account of the equal dignity and rank of the two cities;⁴ and by a formal act they confirmed his jurisdiction over the provinces which he claimed. Leo the Great, bishop of ancient Rome, and some other prelates, strenuously resisted this decree, but in vain; for the Greek emperors supported the cause of their own bishops.⁵ Subsequently to this council the

¹ Concerning Syrianus, see Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 315.—Schl.

² His life was written by Marinus, and was published with learned notes by Fabricius, Hamib. 1700, 4to. [See also Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 318, &c.—Schl.

³ See Æneas Gazæus. In his Theophrastus, pages 6, 7, 8, 13, ed. Barthil. [Among the moderns, Brucker (Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 337) has treated of all these disciples of Proclus.—Schl.

⁴ Yet it appears from the words of the canon that the bishop of Constantinople, though made equal in power and authority with the bishop of Rome, was to yield to him a precedence in rank or honour; because New Rome took rank after her older sister, θεωκραταις ἡ ἐκείνη πρῶτος.—Mur.

⁵ Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. i. p. 30, &c. [See also Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversamml. p. 310; and Hist. der Päpste, p. 106.—Schl. [And Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. ii. pages 64—84, 4to.—Mur.

Constantinopolitan bishop began to contend fiercely for supremacy with the Roman bishop, and to encroach on the privileges of the bishops of Alexandria and Antioch. In particular, Acacius of Constantinople is said to have exceeded all bounds in his ambitious projects.¹

2. It was nearly at the same time that Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, or rather of Ælia, attempted to withdraw himself and his church from the jurisdiction of the bishop of Cæsarea, and affected to rank among the chief prelates of the Christian world. His designs were rendered plausible by the high veneration entertained for the church of Jerusalem, as being not only founded and governed by apostles, but a continuation of the primitive church of Jerusalem, and in a sense the mother of all other churches. Therefore Juvenal, the emperor Theodosius junior favouring his designs, not only assumed the rank of independent bishop of the three Palestines or that of a patriarch, but likewise wrested Phœnicia and Arabia from the patriarchate of Antioch. And as this produced a controversy between him and Maximus, bishop of Antioch, the council of Chalcedon settled the dispute by restoring Arabia and Phœnicia to the see of Antioch, and leaving Juvenal in possession of the three Palestines,² with the title and rank which he had assumed.³ In this manner there were five principal bishops over the Christian world created in this century, and distinguished from others by the title of patriarchs.⁴ The oriental writers mention a sixth, namely, the bishop of Seleucia and Ctesiphon, to whom they say the bishop of Antioch voluntarily ceded a part of his jurisdiction;⁵ but they can bring no proof except the Arabic decrees of the Nicene council, which are well known to have no authority.

3. These patriarchs had great prerogatives. To them belonged the consecration of the bishops of their respective provinces. They annually convoked councils of their districts to regulate and settle ecclesiastical affairs. If any great or difficult controversy arose, it was carried before the patriarch. The bishops accused of any offences were obliged to abide by his decision. And finally, to provide for the peace and good order of the remoter provinces of their patriarchates, they were allowed to place over them their own legates or vicars.⁶ Other prerogatives of less moment are omitted. In fact however some episcopal sees were not subject to the patriarchs, for both in the East and in the West certain bishops were exempt from patriarchal jurisdiction, or were independent.⁷ Moreover, the emperors who reserved to themselves the supreme power over the church listened readily to the complaints of those who thought themselves injured; and the councils also in which the majesty and the legislative power of the church resided, presented various obstacles to the arbitrary exercise of patriarchal power.

4. The constitution of ecclesiastical government was so far from contributing to the peace and prosperity of the Christian church, that it was rather the source of very great evils, and produced boundless dissensions and animosities. In the first place, the patriarchs who had power either to do much good or much evil, encroached without reserve upon the rights and privileges of their bishops, and thus gradually introduced a kind of spiritual bondage; and that they might do this with more freedom

¹ Blondell, De la Primauté de l'Eglise, chap. xxv. p. 332, &c.; Ruinart, De Pulio Archi-Episcopati, p. 445, tom. ii. of the Opp. Posthuma of Mabillon.

² Brerewood, De Pætris Ecclesie Gubernatione Patriarchali, a tract which is subjoined to Usher's Opuscula de Episcopis et Metropolibus Origine, Lond. 1687, and Bremen, 1701, 8vo, pages 56—85. [The metropolitans and bishops who were subject to no patriarch, were by the Greeks called ἀποκεφαλοί. Of this description were the metropolitans of Bulgaria, Cyprus, Iberia, Armenia, and also of Britain, before the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons by the Romish monk Augustine. For the Britons had their archbishop of Cærlæon (Episcopus Cærlægonis super Osea), who had seven bishops under him, but acknowledged no superintendence from the patriarch of Rome, and for a long time opposed him; and in Wales, as well as in Scotland and Ireland, this independence continued many centuries. The Church of Carthage was also properly subject to no other church; as appears from Leydecker's Hist. Eccles. Africanæ, and from the writings of Capell and others, De Appellationibus ex Africa ad sedem Romanam. Some common bishops likewise were subject to no metropolitan, but were under the immediate inspection of their patriarch. Thus the patriarch of Constantinople had thirty-nine bishops in his diocese, who were subject immediately to him; and the Romish patriarch had in all his countries (e. g. in Germany, at Bamberg and Fulda), bishops who were subject to no archbishop or primate, but dependent immediately on himself. There were also certain bishops who were subject neither to any archbishop nor to a patriarch; as was the case with the bishop of Tomis in Scythia, according to Sozomen, Hi l. Eccles. lib. vi. cap. xxi. The churches in countries lying without the Roman empire at first had no bishops dependent on the bishops within the empire, as e. g. the churches in Persia, Parthia, and among the Goths; and these did not come under the power of Romish patriarchs, until they fell under the civil power of the Romans. Most of the conversions of pagans by missionaries from Rome, were in the western provinces of the empire. See Baumgarten's Erklärung der christl. Alterthums, p. 158, &c.—Schl.

¹ Nouveau Diction. Hist. Crit. tome I. article Acacius, p. 75, &c. [Mosheim here speaks incautiously; for in fact Acacius, when all circumstances are considered, was to be justified. See below, chap. v. sec. 21.—Schl.

² Concerning the three Palestines, see Carolus a S. Paulo, Geographia Sacra, p. 307, &c.

³ Le Quien, Oriens Christ. tom. III. p. 110, &c.

⁴ See the writers who have treated of the patriarchs, as enumerated by Fabricius, Bibliograph. Antiquar. cap. xiii. p. 453, &c. [See also note 2, p. 128, &c. of this volume.—Mur.

⁵ Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. I. pages 9, 13, &c.

they made no resistance to the encroachment of the bishops on the ancient rights of the people. For the more the prerogatives and the honours of the bishops who were under their control were increased, the more was their own power enlarged. In the next place, they designedly excited dissensions and fomented controversies of bishops with one another and with other ministers of religion, and also of the people with the clergy, so that they might have frequent occasions to exercise their authority, be much appealed to, and have a multitude of clients around them. Moreover, that the bishops might not be without intestine foes, nor destitute of strenuous defenders of their authority, they drew over to their side the numerous tribe of monks who were gradually acquiring wealth, and attached them to their interests by the most ample concessions. And these monks contributed much—perhaps more than any other cause—to subvert the ancient discipline of the church, to diminish the authority of the bishops, and to increase beyond all bounds the power of their patrons.

5. To these evils must be added the rivalry and ambition of the patriarchs themselves, which gave birth to abominable crimes and the most destructive wars. The patriarch of Constantinople in particular, elated with the favour and the proximity of the imperial court, on the one hand subjected the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch to a subordination to himself, as if they were prelates of a secondary rank, and on the other hand he boldly attacked the Roman pontiff, and despoiled him of some of his provinces. The two former, from their lack of power and from other causes, made indeed but feeble resistance, though they sometimes caused violent tumults and commotions; but the Roman pontiff possessing much greater power and resources, fought with more obstinacy, and in his turn inflicted deadly wounds on the Byzantine prelate. Those who shall carefully examine the history of events among Christians from this period onward, will find that from these quarrels about precedence and the boundaries of their power among those who pretended to be the fathers and guardians of the church, chiefly originated those direful dissensions which first split the eastern church into various sects, and then severed it altogether from that of the West.

6. None of these ambitious prelates was more successful than the Romish patriarch. Notwithstanding the opposition of the Constantinopolitan bishop various causes enabled him to augment his power in no small degree, although he had not yet laid claim to the dignity of supreme law-giver and judge of the whole Christian church. In the East the Alexandrine and Antiochian patriarchs finding themselves unequal to contend with the patriarch of Constantinople, often applied to the Roman pontiff for aid against him,¹ and the same measures were adopted by the ordinary bishops, whenever they found the patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch invading their rights. To all these the pontiff so extended his protection, as thereby to advance the supremacy of the Roman see. In the West the indolence and diminished power of the emperors left the bishop of the metropolis at full liberty to attempt whatever he pleased; and the conquests of the barbarians were so far from setting bounds to his domination that they rather advanced it. For these kings, caring for nothing but the establishment of their thrones, when they saw that the people obeyed implicitly the bishops, and that these were dependent almost wholly on the Roman pontiff, deemed it good policy to secure his favour by bestowing on him privileges and honours. Among all those who governed the see of Rome in this century, no one strove more vigorously and successfully to advance its authority than Leo, who is commonly surnamed the Great; but neither he nor the others could overcome all obstacles to their ambition. This is evident, among other examples, from that of the Africans, whom no promises nor threats could induce to consent to have their causes and controversies carried by appeal before the Roman tribunal.²

¹ This is illustrated, among other examples, by the case of John Talala, patriarch of Alexandria, who being deposed (A.D. 482) applied to the Roman bishop Simplicius for protection. See Liberatus Diaconus, Itinerarium, cap. xviii.—Schl. [And Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. ii. p. 189, &c. 194.—Mur.]

² Du Pin, De Antiq. Eccles. Disciplina, Diss. ii. p. 166, &c.; Leydecker, Hist. Eccles. Africana, tom. ii. Diss. ii. p. 505, &c. [A concise view of the steps by which the bishops of Rome mounted to the summit of their grandeur is thus given by Cramer, in his German translation of Bossuet's Universal History, vol. iv. p. 558, &c. as cited by Von Einem in a note on this page of Mosheim. They were appointed by the emperors to decide causes in the western churches; they encouraged appeals to themselves; they assumed the care of all the churches as if it were a part of their official duty; they appointed vicars in churches over which they had no jurisdiction; where they should have been only mediators they assumed to be judges; they required accounts to be sent them of the affairs of foreign churches; they endeavoured to impose the rites and usages of their own church upon all others as being of apostolic origin; they traced their own elevation from the pre-eminence of St. Peter; they maintained that their fancied prerogatives belonged to them by a divine right; they threatened with excommunication from the church those who would not submit to their decrees; they set up and deposed metropolitans in provinces over which they never legally had jurisdiction; and each successive pope was careful at least not to lose anything of the illegal usurpations of his predecessors, if he did not actually add to them. The truth of this representation is abundantly confirmed by the

7. Of the vices of the whole clerical order, their luxury, their arrogance, their avarice, their voluptuous lives, we have as many witnesses as we have writers of integrity and weight in this age, whose works have come down to us. The bishops, especially such as were distinguished for their rank and honours, employed various administrators to manage their affairs, and formed around themselves a kind of sacred court. The dignity of a presbyter was supposed to be so great that Martin of Tours did not hesitate to say, at a public entertainment, that the emperor himself was inferior to one of that order.¹ The deacons were taxed with their pride and their vices in many decrees of the councils.² These stains on the character of the clergy would have been deemed insufferable had not most of the people been sunk in superstition and ignorance, and had not all estimated the rights and privileges of Christian ministers by those of the ancient priests, both among the Hebrews and among the Greeks and Romans. The fierce and warlike tribes of Germans, who vanquished the Romans and divided the empire of the West among themselves, after they had embraced Christianity, could bear with the dominion and the vices of the bishops and the clergy, because they had before been subject to the domination of priests, and they supposed the Christian priests and ministers of religion possessed the same rights with their former idolatrous priests.³

credence of historical facts by various Protestant writers, and among others by Bower, in his Lives of the Popes, seven vols. 4to, &c.—Mur. (See a very valuable section (sec. 94.) on the Roman patriarchs and the western hierarchy, in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Davidson's Transl. vol. i. p. 430, &c.—R.)

¹ Sulpitius Severus, De Vita Martini, cap. xx. p. 339, and Dial. ii. cap. vi. p. 457.

² See Blondell, Apologia pro sententia Hieronymi de Episcopis et Presbyteris, p. 140.

³ That these pagan nations had been accustomed to treat their idolatrous priests with extraordinary reverence, is a fact well known. When they became Christians, they supposed they must show the same respect to the Christian priests. Of course they honoured their bishops and clergy as they had before honoured their Druids; and this reverence disposed them to bear patiently with their vices. Every Druid was accounted a very great character, and was feared by every one; but the Chief Druid was actually worshipped. When these people became Christians they supposed that the bishop of Rome was such a Chief Druid, and that he must be honoured accordingly. And this was one cause why the Roman pontiff obtained in process of time such an ascendancy in the western countries. The patriarch of Constantinople rose indeed to a great elevation, but he never attained the high rank and authority of the Roman patriarch. The reason was, that the people of the East had not the same ideas of the dignity of a Chief Priest as the people of the West had. The eastern clergy also practised excommunication as a punishment of transgressors, but it never had such an influence in the East as it had in the West; and for this reason, that the effects of a pagan exclusion from religious privileges never were so great in the East as in the West. The effects in the latter are described by Julius Caesar, De Bello Gallico,

8. This corruption among an order of men whose duty it was to inculcate holiness both by precept and example, will be less surprising when we consider that a great multitude of persons were everywhere admitted indiscriminately, and without examination, among the clergy, the greater part of whom had no other object than to live in idleness. And among these, very many were connected with no particular church or place, and had no regular employment, but roamed about at large, procuring a subsistence by imposing upon the credulity of others and sometimes by dishonourable artifices. Whence then, some may ask, came those numerous saints of this century, who are handed down to us by both the eastern and the western writers? I answer, they were canonized by the ignorance of the age. If any possessed some superiority of talents, if they excelled as writers or speakers, if they possessed dexterity in managing important affairs, or were distinguished for their self-government and the control of their passions, these persons, in an age of ignorance, appeared to those around them to be not men but gods; or, to speak more correctly, were considered as men divinely influenced and fully inspired.

9. The monks who had formerly lived for themselves, and who had not sought to rank among the clergy, gradually became a class distinct from the laity, and acquired such opulence and such high privileges that they could claim an honourable rank among the pillars of the church.⁴ The reputation of this class of persons for piety and sanctity was so great, that very often when a bishop or a presbyter was to be elected he was chosen from among them;⁵ and the erection of edifices in which monks and nuns might conveniently serve God was carried beyond all bounds.⁶ They did not however all observe one and the same system of rules, but some followed the rules of Augustine, others those of Basil, and others those of Antony, or Athanasius, or Pachomius, &c.⁷ Yet it

lib. vi. cap. xlii. n. 6, &c. "Si quis aut prius aut populus coram decreto non stetit, sacrificiis interdicunt. Hec pena apud eos est gravissima. Quibus ita est interdictum, si numero impiorum ac sceleratorum habentur; ab his omnes decedunt, aditum eorum sermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione incommuni accipiant: neque his petentibus jus redditur, neque honos ullus communicatur."—Schä.

⁴ Epiphanius, Exposit. Fidei, Opp. tom. i. p. 1094. Mabillon, Réponse aux Chanoines réguliers, Opp. l'orthum, tome ii. p. 115.

⁵ Sulpitius Severus, De Vita Martini, cap. x. p. 320. Add. Dial. i. cap. xxi. p. 426.

⁶ Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. p. 419; Noris, Hist. Palagiana, lib. ii. cap. lii. in Opp. tom. i. p. 272; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 35.

⁷ A monk was one who professed wholly to renounce this world with all its cares and pleasures, and to make religion his sole business. The particular manner in which he proposed to employ himself was called his

must have been the fact, that they were all very remiss and negligent in the observance of their rules, since the licentiousness of monks was even in this century become proverbial,¹ and these armies of lazy men, we are told, excited in various places dreadful seditions. From the enactments of the councils of this century it clearly appears that all monks of every sort were under the protection of the bishops in whose dioceses they lived, nor did the patriarchs as yet arrogate to themselves any jurisdiction over them.²

10. Among the Greek and oriental writers of this century the most distinguished was Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, very famous for his different controversies and writings. No impartial person will divest him of all praise, yet no good man will excuse his quarrelsome temper, his restless spirit, and his very great transgressions.³ Next to rule. The early monks of the third century were all Eremites or hermits—that is, they retired from all human society and lived in solitude in the deserts and mountains. Such in particular were the Egyptian monks. In the fourth century they became so numerous in Egypt as to turn their favourite desert into a populous country; and St. Antony, a leading man among them, induced great numbers to adopt his particular rule. Pachomius about the same time organised the monks of Tabennesis into a kind of society, and henceforth most monks became associated hermits, having separate cells, but living under chiefs called abbots. Basil the Great improved on the plan of Pachomius by erecting houses in different parts of the country, in which monks might live together in a kind of family state. He also made his monasteries schools for the cultivation of sacred learning. Athanasius according to some (see note 4, p. 147, above), while resident in Italy, taught the people of that country how to form and regulate these associations of monks. And Augustine first established a kind of monastery in his native town in Africa; and afterwards when bishop of Hippo, he and some of his clergy formed an association for religious purposes which gave rise to the regular Canons, a species of clergy whose private life was that of monks. During the fifth century the passion for monastic life was very great, and monks and nuns became extremely numerous in the West as well as the East. Yet hitherto there had not been required of monks any vows of perpetual celibacy, poverty, and obedience, nor of adherence for ever to any one rule of life; but every one was free to continue a monk or not, and to pass from one society or class of monks to another at his option. Different monasteries had different rules, according to the will of their founders or governors; but in all the written rules, if they had any, were few and simple, the abbots possessing despotic power over their little kingdoms. The diversity which now prevailed among the monasteries as to their rules, is described by Father Mabillon, Annales Benedictini, lib. i. sec. xiii. tom. i. p. 6, &c.—Mur.

¹ Sulpitius Severus, Diad. i. cap. viii. p. 399, &c.
² See Launo, Inquisitio in Chartam Inimunitatis B. Germani, in his Opp. tom. iii. pt. ii. p. 3, &c. 38, &c. In the ancient records posterior to this century, the monks are often called (clerici) clergymen. See Mabillon, Præfatio ad Sæcul. ii. Actor. Sanctior. Ord. Bened. p. 14. And this is evidence that they now began to be ranked

³ The works of Cyril were published by Aubertus, at Paris, 1638, six vols. [In seven parts] folio. [Cyrillus was nephew to Theophilus and his successor in the chair of Alexandria, from A.D. 412 to 444. Soon after his election he persecuted the Novatians, assumed the direction of political affairs, quarrelled with Orestes, the governor of Egypt; and is said to have occasioned several insurrections and much bloodshed at Alexan-

him must be placed Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, an eloquent, copious, and learned writer, whose merits in every branch of theological learning are by no means contemptible, although he is said to have imbibed some part of the Nestorian doctrine.⁴

dria, to have instigated the murder of Hypatia, an eminent female philosopher, and to have pulled down the Jews' synagogue, plundered it, and chased the Jews from the city. See Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. vii. xiii. xiv. xv. and Damasius, in Suidas, Lex. voce Ivaria. From the year 329 he was the most zealous and efficient opposer of Nestorius and his doctrines, wrote against him, condemned his doctrines in a synod at Alexandria in his noted twelve chapters, presided in the council of Ephesus, where Nestorius was condemned and deposed, A.D. 431. His zeal against Nestorius drew on himself deposition by some oriental bishops, but he was soon restored. With the bishop of Rome he was always on the most friendly terms. He was certainly a man of talents, and his voluminous writings display much acuteness and learning, though the style is unpolished and not very clear. More than half of them are expositions of the Scriptures—viz. of the Pentateuch, Isaiah, the minor prophets, and the Gospel of John. The others are polemic treatises against Arians, Nestorians, and others, who erred in respect to the Trinity and the person of Christ, ten books against Julian, about fifty sermons, and near sixty letters. See his life in Schroeckh, Kirchen-gesch. vol. xviii. pages 313–354.—Mur. [See also an ample notice of his life and extant works by Doctor S. Davidson, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 917, &c. It might have been stated there that Cardinal Mai has published in the eighth vol. of his valuable Script. Veterum nova Collectio, Rome, 1838, several works by Cyril not previously extant, consisting of treatises against the Nestorian errors, letters, and fragments of commentaries on Matthew and the Hebrews; with the Greek text of a few things extant only in a Latin version. An elaborate life of this father and saint may be seen in that copious repository of truth and fiction, the Acta Sanctorum of the Bollandists, under the date of Jan. 28. Oudin has also a dissertation on his life and writings in his Comment de Script. Ecc. vol. i. p. 1007.—R.

⁴ For a fine edition of the whole works of Theodoret we are indebted to the Jesuit Sirmond, who edited them at Paris, 1642, in four volumes, folio. The Jesuit Garnier afterwards added a fifth volume, Paris, 1685, folio. [Theodoret or Theodotus was born at Antioch about the year 386, of wealthy and pious parents, who named him Theodoretus, given of God. When not quite seven years old he was placed in a neighbouring monastery for education, where he had for associates Nestorius and John, who became the patriarchs of Constantinople and Antioch; and for instructors, Theodorus, bishop of Mopsuestia, and Chrysostom, from whom he learned eloquence and sacred literature. He became early pious, was made first lector and then deacon in the church of Antioch, and in the year 420 was ordained bishop of Cyrus, a considerable city in Syria near the Euphrates, where he is said to have had the charge of 800 churches. The country was overrun with anti-trinitarian sectarians and with Maronites, of whom he nearly purged his diocese, having as he says baptized no less than 10,000 Maronites. In the year 429 his early friend Nestorius bronched his errors respecting the person of Christ, and was condemned by Cyril of Alexandria. Theodoret espoused the cause of his friend, which involved him in a quarrel with Cyril as long as they lived. He was one of those who, in the year 431, deposed Cyril at Ephesus, for which he was sent home in disgrace by the emperor Theodosius Jun. Cyril died in 444, and Theodoret expressed his joy at the event, which so enraged the emperor that he confined him to his house. In 449 he was deposed in the second synod of Ephesus, and applied to the bishop of Rome, who now espoused his cause. Theodosius died in 450, and his successor restored Theodoret to his see, and afterwards summoned him to be a member of the council of Chalcedon in 451, where he professed his orthodoxy, and was reluctantly brought to condemn Nestorius. After this, returning to his diocese, he devoted most of his episcopal duties on Hypatius, and devoted himself to writing books till the year 457, when he died, aged about seventy-one. He was frank, open-hearted, ingenuous, had elevated views and feelings, was resolute and unbending, yet generous, sympathetic, and ardently pious. His learning was great, his genius good, and his productions among the best of that age. All his works, Greek and Latin, with notes, were republished by Schulze, Halle, 1768-74, in five volumes, in nine, avo. See his life in Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xviii. pages 355-432.—Mur. [See also Oudin, De Script. Eccles. vol. i. p. 1051; Holzhausen, De fontibus quibus Socrates, Sozomenus et Theodoretus in scrib. Hist. Sac. uti sunt. Gott. 1825, 4to. His Ecclesiastical History has been translated into English, and forms one of Bagster's series of the Greek Ecclesiastical Historians.—R.

Isidorus of Pelusium has left us epistles, which display more piety, ingenuity, erudition, and judgment, than the bulky volumes of some others.¹ Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, has left us very little in writing, but has perpetuated his name by his opposition to Origen and his followers.²

¹ The best edition of these letters is that of the Jesuit Schott, Paris, 1638, fol. [Isidorus was probably a native of Alexandria, but he spent his life in a monastery near Pelusium, now Damietta, on one of the mouths of the Nile, and hence his surname of Pelusiota. He flourished about A.D. 412, but was active and conspicuous from the year 384 to 431. As a monk he was very austere in his mode of living, and retiring from the noise and bustle of the world he devoted himself to reading and expounding the Scriptures, and to the practice and the promotion of piety and virtue. He chose the epistolary form of writing, and has left us two thousand and thirteen short letters which are divided into five books. In most of them a question is proposed and answered by the exposition of a text of Scripture. The object is to expound the Scriptures, and to inculcate the doctrines and duties of religion. He was an admirer of Chrysostom, and of course had difficulty with Theophilus and Cyril, the patriarchs of Alexandria. But he feared no man, whenever he thought duty called him to defend truth or to censure vice.—Mur. [It is singular that Mosheim took no notice of the dissertation of Heumann of Göttingen, published in 1737, impugning the genuineness of many of these letters. An account of Isidore's method of interpretation may be seen in Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 147, &c. There is a recent work on the life and writings of this father, by Niemeyer, Halle, 1825, 8vo. See Danz, Biblio. Patriar. p. 83.—R.

² See Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexand. p. 103. [Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria from the year 385 to the year 412, was a man of a strong, active, courageous mind, but crafty, unscrupulous, selfish, and ambitious. He probably spent some of his early years among the monks of Nitria. Afterwards he became a presbyter of Alexandria, wrote a Paschal Cycle in 380, and was made bishop in 385. In the year 388, when Theodosius senior waged war in Italy upon Maximus the usurper, Theophilus sent his legate, Isidorus, to Rome with letters and presents for both emperors, but with instructions to await the issue of the battle, and then to present only the letter and presents directed to the victor (Sozomen, H. E. vii. 2). In the year 391 he solicited and obtained of the emperor leave to persecute the pagans of Alexandria, and proceeded to demolish their temples and seize whatever was valuable in them. Insurrections, and bloodshed, and the flight of the philosophers from Egypt, were the consequence. (Socrates, H. E. v. cap. xvi.) The major part of the ignorant monks of Nitria had so gross ideas of the supreme Being, as to suppose he literally had eyes and feet and hands, and were therefore called Anthropomorphites. But the better informed monks held that these expressions were to be taken metaphorically, as Origen had always interpreted them. And thus this controversy resolved itself into a contest respecting Origen's correctness as a theologian. At first Theophilus favoured the Origenists, but the Anthropomorphites came upon him tumultuously about the year 399, and compelled him to change sides. From this time he was a zealous

Palladius, on account of his Lausiac History and his Life of Chrysostom, deserves a place among the more respectable and useful writers.³ Notwithstanding Theodorus of Mopsuestia was accused after his death of the grossest errors, yet every one who has examined the extracts from his writings by Photius, will regret that his works are either entirely lost or exist only in Syriac among the Nestorians.⁴ Nilus persecutor of all Origenists (notwithstanding he continued to read and admire his works), and actually made a bloody crusade against those Nitric monks who opposed the Anthropomorphites, drove them from Egypt, and followed them with persecution, and also all who befriended them—in particular Chrysostom, whom he deposed in the year 403. See Socrates, H. E. vi. vii.—xvii; Sozomen, viii. xi.—xix. His works are not numerous, and have never been collected and published by themselves. They consist of three Paschal Letters or Episcopal Charges, several letters, and considerable extracts from different polemic treatises.—Mur. [His extant works are collected and published by Gallandius in Greek and Latin, in his Bibliotheca Vet. Patrum, vol. vii. No. xix.—R.

³ Palladius was born in Galatia, in the year 368. In his twentieth year he went to Egypt, and spent several years among different tribes of monks. The failure of his health obliged him to return from the wilderness to Alexandria, and thence to Palestine. In the year 400 Chrysostom made him bishop of Helenopolis in Bithynia, which he exchanged some years after for Aspona in Galatia. The time of his death is unknown, but it is supposed to have been before A.D. 431. Palladius was a man of moderate talents and erudition, but pious, a devoted monk, and a perspicuous, unassuming writer. His works are: 1. Historia Lausiaca seu de SS. Patrum Vitis ad Lausum cubiculi Praefectum, (Biography of thirty of the most famous monks) written about the year 421; edited Greek and Latin by Fronton le Duc, in his Auctarium Biblioth. Patr. tom. ii. pages 893-1053, Paris, 1624, fol. Some additions were afterwards published by Cotelier, Monument. Eccl. Gr. tom. iii. Several Latin translations are extant, often published. 2d. Dialogus de Vita S. Joh. Chrysostomi inter Palladium Episc. Helenopolitaurum et Theodorum, first published Greek and Latin by Bigot, Paris, 1680, and again 1738, 4to, with some other works. Whether the Palladius who wrote this was the same as the author of the Lausiac History has been questioned. 3d. De Gentibus Indiae et Brachmanis is extant under his name, but it is not supposed to be genuine.—Mur.

⁴ See Assenian, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatic. tom. iii. p. ii. p. 227 [and ibid. pt. i. pages 3-362, where we have Ebed Jesu's catalogue of his works.—Theodorus was born and educated at Antioch, where he was some time a presbyter, and where he and Chrysostom instructed youth in a monastery, and had for pupils Theodoret, the famous Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, and John, patriarch of Antioch. In the year 392 he was made bishop of Mopsuestia in Cilicia, where he spent thirty-six years with great reputation as a preacher, a bishop, and especially as an author. After his death, which happened in the year 428, he was accused of Nestorian and likewise of Pelagian sentiments, and was condemned as a heretic in the fifth general council at Constantinople A.D. 553. His writings were very numerous, embracing literal expositions of nearly the whole Bible, elaborate polemic works against the Arians, Eunomians, Apollinarians, &c. with many sermons and epistles, and a liturgy. A Latin translation of the last is in Renaudot, Liturgiar. Oriental. Collectio, tom. ii. pages 616-625. His Expositio Fidei entire, with copious extracts from many of his other works, is extant in the acts of the fifth general council in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. In the works of Marius Mercator and of other fathers, in the Catena Patrum, especially the Catena in Octateuchum, Lips. 1772, two vols. fol. and in Münster's Fragmenta Patr. Gr. Fascic. i. p. 79, &c. Copenhagen, 1788, 8vo. See Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xv. pages 176-218; and Lardner, Credibility, &c. vol. ix. p. 389, &c.—Mur. [In the sixth volume of Cardinal Mai's Script. Veter.

composed many works calculated to excite religious emotions, but more commendable for the pious intentions of the writer than for his accuracy and diligence.¹ Our designed brevity obliges us to pass over what might be worthy of notice in Basil of Seleucia,² Theodotus of Ancyra,³ Gelasius of Cyzicus,⁴ and others.⁵

Vatic. nova Collectio, Rome, 1832, p. 5, &c. there is published for the first time the Greek text of a commentary by this father on the twelve minor prophets. It had long been known to exist in manuscript in several public libraries, and among others in the Vatican; and thus the hope expressed by Lardner nearly a century ago that it might one day be published, has at length been realised. See his Credibility, chap. cxiii. Works, vol. iv. p. 397.—R

¹ Nilus was born of a noble family at Constantinople, where he was prefect of the city. Under the preaching of Chrysostom he became pious, renounced the world, separated from his wife, and taking one of his two sons with him retired among the monks of Egypt, where he spent the remainder of his days. By robbers he lost all his property and had his son captured; but he recovered his son. He was made a presbyter, and probably lived till near the middle of this century. His numerous writings have been read with pleasure by the lovers of monastic piety. His three hundred and fifty-five epistles were published, Greek and Latin, by Leo Allatius, Rome, 1698, fol.; and his Opuscula (twenty-one treatises on moral and ascetic subjects), Greek and Latin, by Suarez, Rome, 1673, fol.—Mur.

² Basil was bishop of Seleucia in Isauria before the year 448, and continued so till after the year 458. He possessed some talents, but he was an unstable man. In the council of Constantinople, A.D. 448, he voted with the orthodox, and condemned Eutyches. The next year, in the council of Ephesus, he openly sided with the Eutychians and anathematized the orthodox. And two years after, in the council of Chalcedon, he appeared again on the orthodox side, and said he had been compelled to act with the Eutychians; but he had much difficulty to persuade the orthodox of his sincerity, and to allow him his episcopal office.—His works were published, Greek and Latin, subjoined to those of Gregory Thaumaturgus and Macarius the monk, Paris, 1622, fol. They consist of orations, of which seventeen are on the Old Testament and twenty-six on the New, written in a lofty style and tolerably perspicuous, but excessively flowery. The Demonstration that Christ has come against the Jews, founded on the seventy weeks of Daniel, and the two books on the Life of St. Thecla, the virgin and martyr, though printed among his works, are supposed not to be genuine.—Mur.

³ Theodotus, bishop of Ancyra in Galatia, flourished about the year 430. Little is known of him, except that he acted a conspicuous part in the council of Ephesus, which condemned Nestorius in the year 431. Three orations which he delivered at Ephesus are extant, Greek and Latin, among the acts of that council, Concilia, tom. iii. pages 988, 1008, 1024. Another of his orations was published with the works of Amphilo-chius, Paris, 1644. His Exposition of the Nicene Creed, or Confutation of Nestorius, was published, Greek and Latin, by Combefis, Paris, 1675, 12mo. Theodotus in the close of the last mentioned work refers to his three books on the Holy Spirit, which are lost, as are his seven books against Nestorius addressed to Lausus. He has been accounted a good polemic writer.—Mur.

⁴ Gelasius Cyzicenus was a native of Cyzicus, an island in the Propontis, where his father was a presbyter. He flourished about A.D. 476, and was bishop of Caesarea in Palestine. He is known chiefly by his History of the Nicene Council, or as the Greek MSS. style it, his Ecclesiastical History, in three books. The first book contains the affairs of Constantine till the death of Licinius in 324. The second contains subsequent events, the calling of the council, and its transactions, especially the disputes of the philosophers and Arians with the Nicene fathers. The third book, now lost, contained the subsequent life and deeds of Constantine. As for the sources from which he drew his information, he tells us that when a boy at Cyzicus he met with an old MS. history of the Nicene council written by one Dalmatius, a former bishop of Cyzicus; that he then made large extracts from it, and many years after composed his history from these extracts and from the writings of Eusebius, Rufinus, &c. This work of Gelasius, once in high repute, is now little esteemed; in particular, the account of the disputes of the philosophers and Arians, which constitute the greater part of the second book, are considered very questionable. The two surviving books were published, Greek and Latin, by R. Balfour, Paris, 1599, 8vo, and in Harduin's Concilia, tom. i.—Mur.

⁵ The Greek and oriental writers, passed by in silence by Moshelm, are very numerous. As some knowledge of them is useful and indeed necessary for a theologian, a tolerably complete catalogue of them, extracted from Cavo's Historia Literaria, is here subjoined. Asterius, bishop of Amasea in Pontus, flourished about A.D. 401, an eloquent and popular preacher. More than twenty of his homilies are published by Combefis and Coteller, Mon. Ecc. Græc. tom. ii. Marcus, a monk of Nitria in Egypt, flourished A.D. 401. Seven tracts on practical piety, written with great simplicity, are extant in Fronto le Due, Auctar. Biblioth. Patr. tom. i. Victor of Antioch, a contemporary of Chrysostom, wrote a commentary on Mark's Gospel, extant, Latin, in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. iv. p. 370. Severianus, bishop of Gabala in Syria, flourished A.D. 401, a turgid writer but a popular preacher. Twelve of his orations are extant among the works of Chrysostom.

Heraclides, a monk of Constantinople, flourished A.D. 402. He wrote Paradoses or Lives of the Monks, much of which is copied into the Lausiac history of Palladius, and the remainder was published by Coteller, Monument. Eccl. Gr. tom. iii.

Atticus, bishop of Constantinople A.D. 406—427, an enemy of Chrysostom, but famed for learning, address, and piety. Two of his letters and some fragments are extant.

Polychronius, bishop of Apamea, flourished A.D. 410—427, was brother to Theodorus of Mopsuestia. His exposition of the Canticles and fragments of his Commentary on Ezekiel and Daniel are extant.

Nonnus, a converted pagan poet of Egypt, flourished A.D. 410. His Dionysiacs, written before his conversion, has been often published, e.g. Hanover, 1605, 8vo. His poetic version of John's Gospel was published, Greek and Latin, by Heinsius, 1627, 8vo, and his Collectio et Explicatio Historiarum, by R. Montague, Eton, 1610, 4to. He was a scholar, but a turgid writer.

Synesius, a philosopher, statesman, poet, and after A.D. 410 bishop of Ptolemais in Cyrene, Africa, a man of fine talents, and a devoted bishop, but more of a philosopher than theologian. Besides several treatises, philosophical, political, and historical, he has left us one hundred and fifty-five epistles, ten hymns, and some sermons, all published, Greek and Latin, by Petavius, Paris, 1612 and 1633, fol. [This writer is entitled to a more lengthened notice. See the works and references relating to him in Danz's edition of Walch's Bibl. Patr. p. 82. See also Clausen, De Synesio Philosopho, Copen. 1831, 8vo. A few of his poems have been translated into English by H. S. Boyd, Lond. 1814, 8vo. They have also been translated into French by Percheron, Paris, 1581; and recently by MM. Gregoire and Collobert, 2d edit. Paris, 1839, with a memoir of Synesius' life prefixed.—R.

Philip of Side in Pamphylia, a friend of Chrysostom, and candidate for the see of Constantinople in 427. He wrote a religious history from the creation to his own times, a tedious work, of which only extracts remain. Eudocia, a learned Athenian lady, born A.D. 401, converted to Christianity at twenty, and soon after married to the emperor Theodosius II. proclaimed empress in 432, divorced for a slight cause in 445, then retired to Jerusalem and spent her life in works of charity and beneficence, and in composing Centones Homerici, poetic paraphrases of the Bible, and other religious poems. She died A.D. 459, aged fifty-eight. [Her name was Athenais. See her life in Smith's Dict.

of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 78, where it might have been stated that her poem on the martyrdom of Cyprian, mentioned by Photius and long considered as lost, had been published by Blandini, in the first volume of his Græcæ Eccles. Vet. Mon. Flor. 1762.—R.

Philostorgius, born in Cappadocia A.D. 368, well educated at Constantinople, a Eunomian or semi-Arian in principle. He composed about the year 425 an Ecclesiastical History, extending from the first rise of Arianism to A.D. 425. The work itself is lost, but an epitome of it by Photius was edited by Valesius among the Greek ecclesiastical historians. His work was partial to the Arians, and is censured by Photius and others. Sabinus, bishop of Hieraclea in Thracia, flourished A.D. 425. He was of the sect of Macedonius, and published a collection of the acts of the councils from A.D. 325 to 425. The work is lost, except some extracts preserved by Socrates and others.

John, bishop of Antioch A.D. 427—441. He at first supported his early friend Nestorius, but afterwards abandoned him and his sect. Six of his epistles are extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Concilia, tom. iii. and fifteen more, Latin, in Lupus's Collection of Ephesine Epistles.

Nestorius, presbyter at Antioch and bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 428—431. As a bishop he was very zealous to suppress all the prevailing heresies; but he soon incurred the charge of heresy himself, by maintaining that in the person of Christ the two natures were not so united as to form but one person, and that it was improper to call Mary Θεοτόκος the mother of God, though she might be called Χριστοτόκος the mother of Christ. For this opinion he was condemned and deposed in the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. Afterwards the emperor confined him to a monastery near Antioch, and then banished him to the deserts of Egypt, where he wandered several years, suffered much, and at last died. He was a popular preacher and an active bishop, but, according to Socrates (H. E. viii. xxvii.), not a very profound man. Besides numerous extracts from various of his works, several entire epistles and some sermons are extant in the Concilia, in Lupus's collection of Ephesine epistles, and in the works of Chrysostom, Mercator, &c.

Meletius, bishop of Mopsuestia, A.D. 428 and onwards, a staunch Nestorian, deposed and banished for this heresy. Eleven of his epistles are in Lupus's Ephesine Epistles.

Isaac, a converted Jew, flourished A.D. 430, author of a treatise on the Trinity and the incarnation of Christ in bad Greek, extant among the Opuscula Veterum dogmatica published by Sirmoud, Paris, 1630, 8vo.

Acacius, a monk and bishop of Ilerœa, from about 378 to 436. He was a man in high repute and has left us three epistles.

Acacius, bishop of Melitence in Armenia, a staunch opposer of Nestorius in the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. A homily he delivered there and an epistle are extant in the Concilia, tom. iii. and in Lupus's Ephesine Epistles.

Dorotheus, bishop of Maritanopolis in Mæsia, a bold defender of Nestorius at Ephesus, A.D. 431, and therefore deposed and at last banished. Four of his epistles are in the Ephesine collection.

Alexander, bishop of Hierapolis in Syria, a defender of Nestorius at Ephesus, A.D. 431, and therefore deposed and banished. He has twenty-three epistles in the Ephesine collection.

Maximinus, bishop of Anazarbus in Cilicia, a defender of Nestorius at Ephesus, A.D. 431, but afterwards renounced him. He has three epistles in the Ephesine collection.

Helladius, for sixty years abbot of a monastery near Antioch, and then bishop of Tarsus. While a bishop he defended Nestorius in the council of Ephesus, and for some time after, but at length renounced him. Six of his epistles are in the Ephesine collection.

Eutherius, archbishop of Tynece, defended Nestorius in the council of Ephesus, though not a Nestorian in sentiment. He was deposed and banished. Five of his epistles are extant in the Ephesine collection, and seventeen of his sermons against various heresies, Gr. and Lat. among the works of Athanasius.

Paul, bishop of Emesa, a defender of Nestorius in the Ephesine council, but who afterwards retracted. He has left us a confession of his faith, two homilies, and an epistle.

Andreas, bishop of Samosata, a defender of Nestorius from the year 429 to 436, when he renounced him. He has eight epistles in the Ephesine collection.

Proclus, amanuensis to Chrysostom and to Atticus, and the bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 432—446. He was a very pious man, a good scholar, and a popular preacher. His works, consisting of twenty sermons and six epistles, were published, Gr. and Lat. by Ricciardi, Rome, 1630, 4to.

Ibas, from about A.D. 436, bishop of Edessa. He was accused of Nestorianism and acquitted in 448, but was accused again and condemned in 449, and restored in 451. The greater part of a valuable letter of his, containing a history of the Nestorian contests, is extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Concilia, tom. iv. p. 661.

Socrates, Scholasticus or a barrister, flourished at Constantinople, A.D. 440. He composed a faithful Ecclesiastical History from the accession of Constantine the Great to A.D. 439, which is edited by Valesius, among the Greek Ecclesiastical Historians (and an English translation is in the English edition of Eusebius in folio, and in Bagster's Greek Ecc. Historians—R.).

Hennas Sozomenus, also a Constantinopolitan barrister and an author of an Ecclesiastical History, from A.D. 324 to A.D. 439. He is a more vivacious writer than Socrates, but is deemed less judicious. Yet writing after Socrates, he has supplied some of his deficiencies. The work was edited by Valesius among the Greek Ecclesiastical Historians. [And an English translation is published in Bagster's Greek Ecc. Historians. The student will see a critical examination of the work of this and the preceding historian, in Holzhausen, De Futilibus quibus Socrates, Sozomenus, ac Theodoretus in scrib. Hist. Sac. uti sunt, adjuncta corum episcopi. See also Dowling on the Study of Ecclesiastical History p. 28, &c.—R.]

Irenæus, Count of the empire and the emperor's commissioner at the council of Ephesus in 431. He favoured the Nestorians in that council, and defended their cause all his life, and therefore was excluded the court in 435, became bishop of Tyre in 444, was deposed by the emperor in 448, and then commenced writing a copious Memoir of the Ephesine council and of ecclesiastical affairs in the East for about twenty years. The work is lost, except the old Latin translation of certain parts of it, which was published by Lupus, Louvain, 1682, 4to, under the title of Variarum Patrum Epistole ad Concilium Ephesinum Pertinentes, [referred to in previous notes as the Collection of Ephesine Epistles.—R.]

Flavianus, bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 447—449. He has left us two Epistles and a Creed, extant in Baluze, Nova Collect. Conciliorum.

Eutyches, the heretic, a presbyter of Constantinople. He so opposed Nestorianism as to confound the two natures as well as the two persons of Christ. This error he broached in the year 448. He was condemned the same year, appealed to a general council, and was again condemned in 451. A confession of his faith with a few of his letters is extant.

Eusebius, first a civilian at Constantinople and then bishop of Dorylæum in Phrygia. He was the public accuser of Nestorius, of Eutyches, and of Dioscorus, from the year 430 to 451. His Libels and some other of his documents are extant.

Diadochus, bishop of Photice in Epirus, flourished A.D. 450. He has left us some treatises on practical religion, edited in Greek at Florence, 1578, and Latin in Biblioth. Patrum, tom. v.

Euthallus, a deacon in Egypt, flourished perhaps A.D. 458. He wrote an analytical Introduction to the books of the New Testament, published, Gr. and Lat. by Zacagnius, Rome, 1698, 4to.

Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, A.D. 471—488, very ambitious and active for the aggrandisement of his see. He has left us only two Epistles.

Nestorianus, a Greek chronographer who flourished about the year 474. He wrote Lives of the Roman Emperors, to A.D. 474. The work was highly commended by John Malala, but it is lost.

Johannes Ageates, a Nestorian, flourished A.D. 483, or later, and wrote an Ecclesiastical History, of which (says Photius) the first five books reached from A.D. 428 to 479. Only some extracts of it remain.

Sabas, a Syrian monk and abbot, born in 439, died 531. He wrote a Typicum or the order of prayer for the whole year, which was adopted in all the monasteries about Jerusalem, and is still extant.

Justin, a bishop in Sicily, A.D. 484, author of some Epistles and (as Dodwell supposes) of the Questiones ad Orthodoxos, published among the works of Justin Martyr.

Eneas Gazaus, a sophist and a Platonist and then a the extension of the limits of his power.¹ Orosius acquired fame by his History, written with a view to confute the cavils of the pagans, and by his books against the Pelagians and Priscillianists.² Cassian, an Christian, flourished about A.D. 488. He was the author of a noted dialogue entitled Theophrastus, or on the immortality of souls and the resurrection of the body, ed. Gr. and Lat. by Barth, Lips. 1658, 4to.

Athanasius junior or Celtes, bishop of Alexandria A.D. 490—497, a fine biblical scholar, an active and good bishop, and a devout man. He is supposed to be the author of several of the words ascribed to Athanasius the Great, and published as such—namely, 1. Serie Scripturæ Synopsis; 2. Questiones et Responsiones ad Autheum; 3. the two tracts, De Incarnatione Verbi Dei; 4. Synagoga Doctrinæ ad Clericos et Laicos; 5. De Virginitate stes Jædæ.

Zacharias, a rhetorician, flourished A.D. 491. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History from A.D. 430—491, which is often quoted as well as censured for partiality, by Evagrius in his Historia Ecclesiastica.

Eustathius of Syria flourished A.D. 496. He wrote Chronicorum Compendium, from Euseus to Anastasius, or A.D. 496, which is lost.

Malchus, a Byzantine sophist, flourished A.D. 496. He composed a Roman history from Constantine the Great to the emperor Anastasius. Two large extracts only are extant.

Basil of Cilicia, first a presbyter at Antioch and then bishop of Irenopolis in Cilicia, flourished A.D. 497. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History extending from A.D. 451 to A.D. 527; also contra Johannem Scythopolitanum, accusing him of Manichæism. Neither work is extant.

Candidus, a scrivener to the governors of the province of Isauria, flourished A.D. 496. He wrote Historiarum libri iii. extending from A.D. 457 to A.D. 491. Some extracts by Photius are all that remain.

Andreas, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, flourished about A.D. 500. He wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse, which is extant, Gr. and Lat. inter Opp. Chrysostomi, tom. xli. ed. Morell.; also Therapeutica Spiritualem, of which only some fragments remain.—Mur.

1 The entire works of Leo I. [comprising one hundred sermons and one hundred and forty-one epistles] were edited with great care by the celebrated presbyter of the Oratory, Quæsmel, Lyons, 1700, two vols. folio. [This edition being proscribed by the pope, because the editor defended the cause of Hilary of Arles and the liberties of the Gallican church against Leo, a new edition was published by Cacciari [Rome, 1753-55, 2 tom. fol.] and the brothers Ballerini [Verona, 1755-57, 3 tom. fol. This last edition is decidedly the best.—R.] Leo was a man of extraordinary talents, a good writer, an indefatigable bishop, and very successful in promoting the glory of the see of Rome. It has been said that he possessed every virtue which was compatible with an unbounded ambition. He was bishop of Rome from A.D. 440 to A.D. 461. In the beginning of his reign he persecuted the sectarians of Africa, who took refuge in Italy on the conquest of Africa by the Vandals. In 445 commenced his controversy with Hilary archbishop of Arles, whom he divested of his rights as a metropolitan, in violation of the liberties of the Gallican church. He also obtained from Valentinian III. a decree confirming his usurpations over the Gallic church. In 451 he showed the violence of his passions and the excess of his ambition, by his opposition to the decree of the council of Chalcedon, which raised the bishop of Constantinople to the rank of a patriarch, and extended very much his jurisdiction. In the year 455 he was a protection to the city of Rome, when it was pillaged by Genseric, king of the Vandals. See Schroëckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xvii. pages 90—169, and Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. ii. pages 7—140.—Mur. [See Professor Ramsay's account of his life and writings in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 746.—R.

2 Peter Bayle, Dictionnaire, tom. iii. voce Orosius. The works of Orosius have at length been published, with some medals, by Havercamp, Leyden, 1738, 4to. [Paul Orosius was a presbyter of Tarragona in Spain. In the year 413 he was sent into Africa to consult Augustine illiterate and superstitious man, by his oral communications, his writings, and his Institutes, instructed the Gauls in the mode of living pursued by the monks of Syria and Egypt, and was a leading teacher among those denominated semi-Pelagians.³ The Homilies of Maximus of Turin, which are still extant, are short but generally neat and pious.⁴ Eucherius of Lyons ranks not respecting the rising sect of the Priscillianists. Augustine now put him upon writing his history, which he completed four years afterwards. In the year 415 Augustine sent him to Palestine to visit Jerome, and learn his opinion respecting the origin of souls. He was present at some councils in Palestine, and there opposed the errors of Pelagius. On his return to Africa he brought with him the relics of St. Stephen, which were highly valued. He afterwards returned to Spain. The time of his death is unknown. His works written in good Latin, comprise—1. Historia adversus Paganos, in which he endeavours to show from the Roman history that as great calamities had happened in the empire under the reign of paganism as under that of Christianity. 2. Apologeticus contra Pelagianos de arbitrii libertate. These two works are in the edition of Havercamp. 3. His written statement to Augustine, in the year 413, which is published among the works of Augustine, and is entitled Communitorium sive Consultatio ad S. Augustinum, de errore Priscillianistarum et Origenistarum.—Mur. [See a valuable tract by Theod. de Möner, entitled, De Orosii Vita ejusque Historiar. lib. septem adversus Paganos, Berlin, 1844, 8vo, in which he investigates anew the facts connected with the life of this writer, and treats fully of his historical work and of the principal sources from which he had drawn his information.—R.

3 Hist. Littér. de la France, tome II. p. 215, &c.; Simon, Critique de la Bibl. Eccles. par M. Du Pin, tome i. p. 156. The works of Cassian, with a prolix Commentary, were published by Alard, Gazeux; latest ed. Francf. 1722, fol. [John Cassian, of Scythian extract, was born at Athens A.D. 351. He early devoted himself to a monastic life, which he pursued first at Bethlehem, then at Nitria in Egypt, next at Constantinople, where Chrysostom made him deacon of a church. On the banishment of Chrysostom, A.D. 404, the clergy of Constantinople sent Cassian into Italy to solicit aid to their cause from the Roman pontiff. At Rome Cassian was ordained a presbyter, and there he remained till A.D. 410, when, on the capture of Rome by the Goths, he retired to Marseilles in France. Here he erected two monasteries, one for males and one for females, and thenceforth devoted himself to the furtherance of monkery in Gaul. He commenced author in 424, and died A.D. 449, aged ninety-seven years. He was not a great man, but he was active, pious, and sincere. He was a leading man among the semi-Pelagians, and held, perhaps, nearly the same sentiments respecting original sin, and grace, and human ability, with the Remonstrants or Arminians of Holland in the seventeenth century. His works are—1. De Institutis Cænobiorum, of which the first four books describe the form and regulations of a monastery, and the eight following treat of as many principal sins. 2. xlv. Collationes Patrum, discourses or rather colloquies, chiefly on monastic virtues. 3. De Christi Incarnatione adversus Nestorium.—Mur. [The student will see a detailed account of Cassian and his works by Professor Ramsay, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 622.—R.

4 Maximus was bishop of Turin in Piedmont from A.D. 422 to A.D. 466. Little is known of his life. His works consist of eighty-five short homilies or sermons. Of these, thirty-two were published among the works of Ambrose, and eight among the discourses of Augustine. Raynaud collected and published seventy-three of them under the name of the real author, in a volume containing the works of Leo I. and of Peter Chrysologus, Lyons, 1652, and Paris, 1671, fol. Afterwards Mabillon collected twelve more, which he published in his Museum Italicum, tom. i. pt. ii. p. i. &c. And Bruno Brunl published the whole, Rome, 1784, fol.—Mur.

the last among the Latins of this century who treated moral subjects skilfully and eloquently.¹ Pontius [Paulinus] of Nola, highly esteemed by the ancients for his piety, has recommended himself to posterity by his poems and by some other things.² Peter, bishop of Ravenna, acquired the surname of Chrysologus on account of his eloquence, and his discourses are not entirely destitute of genius.³ Salvian was an eloquent but a gloomy and austere writer, who in the vehemence of his declamation against the vices of the times unwarily discloses the weaknesses and defects of his own character.⁴ Prosper of Aqutain⁵ and Marius Mercator⁶ are well known to every one who has paid any attention to the Pelagian and other controversies of this century. Vincentius of Lerins has transmitted his name to posterity by a short but elegant tract against the sects which he entitled Commonitorium.⁷ I designedly pass over Sidonius Apollinaris, a tumid writer, though not destitute of eloquence,⁸ Vigilius

¹ Concerning Eucherius, the Benedictine monks treat largely in their Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 275. [He was of an honourable family in Gaul, of monkery in his youth, and resided some time in a monastery in the island Lerins. But he afterwards married and had two sons, Salonius and Veranius, who became bishops. He was bishop of Lyons from A.D. 434 to A.D. 454. His most admired work is his epistle to Valerianus, On Contempt of the World and Secular Philosophy. Besides this he wrote in praise of monkery, instructions for his sons, and a few homilies. Several works are falsely ascribed to him. The whole were published, Basil, 1531, and Rome, 1564, 4to, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. vi.—Mur. See also Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 62.—R.

² See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 179. The works of Paulinus were published by Le Brun, Paris, 1685, two vols. 4to. [See note 2, p. 140, on the preceding century, where he is particularly described.—Mur. [and Smith, ubi supra, vol. iii. p. 144.—R.

³ See Agnell, Liber Pontificalis Eccles. Ravennat. tom. i. p. 321, ed. Bachinil. [Peter Chrysologus was an Italian of a noble family. He was born at Inola, and educated under the bishop of that see. In the year 433 he was made bishop of Ravenna, where he died about A.D. 450. He has left us one hundred and forty-seven short homilies or sermons, and one epistle addressed to Eutyches the heretic in the year 449. His works have been often published; the latest edition is, perhaps, that of Venice, 1742, fol.—Mur. [A still later edition is that by Sebast. Paul, published also at Venice in 1750, fol.—H.

⁴ See Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 517. [The authors of the history here referred to give a different account of Salvian's character. They acknowledge that his declamation against the vices of the age, in his Treatise against Avarice and his Discourse concerning Providence, are warm and vehement; but they represent him notwithstanding as one of the most humane and benevolent men of his time.—Mur.—[Salvian was a native of Gaul, probably of Cologne, lived long at Treves, and married a pagan lady, who however became a Christian after marriage, and had one child, a daughter. At length he removed to the south of France and became a presbyter of Marseilles, where he lived to a great age. He flourished as early as 440, but was alive, though an old man, in the year 495. See Gennadius (who was a contemporary presbyter of Marseilles), De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, cap. 67. The works of Salvian now extant are, 1. On the Providence and Government of God and his Righteous Temporal Judgments. 2. Nine epistles. 3. Against Avarice, especially in Clergymen and Bishops. His style is barbarous, yet vivid and energetic. His conceptions are clear, his reasoning pungent, and his sentiments for the most part correct. Yet his descriptions are coarse and often too highly coloured, and his positions sometimes untenable. The works of Salvian have been often published. The best edition is that of Baluze, Paris, 1669, 8vo.—Mur. [Perhaps a still better is the collection of his works in Gallandius, Biblioth. Patr. v. x. They have been translated into French, Paris, 1735, 12mo, and his well-known treatise on God's Government into English, by R. T. Lond. 1700, 8vo. See also Lardner's Credibility, &c. vol. v. p. 64.—R.

⁵ For a good account of Prosper, see the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 369. [Tiro Prosper, a layman but a learned theologian of Aquitain in Gaul, flourished A.D. 444. He was a great admirer and an able defender of the doctrines of Augustine respecting original sin, predestination and free grace. In the year 426 he addressed a letter to Augustine, acquainting him with the incipient progress of Pelagian errors in Gaul, and soliciting him to write against them. In 431 he visited Italy to procure the aid of the Roman pontiff against these errors, and returned strengthened by a doctrinal letter addressed to the bishops of Gaul. In 433 he wrote his strictures on the thirteenth Collatio of Cassian, which is an able performance. In 443 Leo I. called him to Rome and made him his private secretary, and employed him in the Pelagian contests of Italy. He was alive in 455, but the time of his death is unknown. He was a man of strong reasoning powers, soundly orthodox, and a good model in controversial writing. Most of his works are in defence of the doctrines of original sin, predestination, and free grace; and especially his two books (if indeed they are his) De Vocatione Gentium (on the offer of salvation to all men), will be read with interest by the modern theologian. He also composed a Chronicon, continuing that of Eusebius down to A.D. 455, a commentary on the last fifty Psalms, several letters, and some poems. His works were published, Paris, 1711, fol. and by Salina, Rome, 1732, 8vo.—Mur.

⁶ Marius Mercator was probably an African, yet may have lived some time in Italy. He was undoubtedly a layman, a friend and admirer of Augustine, and an active defender of his doctrines from A.D. 418 to the year 451. His works are almost wholly translations from the Greek fathers, particularly Nestorius, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Cyril of Alexandria, Proclus, Theodoret, &c. accompanied with prefaces and notes or strictures by the translator. They are all designed to confute either the Nestorian or the Pelagian errors, and were edited, with copious notes, by Garnier, Paris, 1673, fol. and still better by Baluze, Paris, 1684, 8vo.—Mur.

⁷ A good account of Vincentius of Lerins is found in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 305. [He was born of a noble family at Toul in the French Netherlands, became a soldier, and afterwards a monk at Lerins, where he was made a presbyter. He flourished A.D. 434 and died before the year 450. He was probably a semi-Pelagian, as may be inferred from his Objections against the writings and doctrines of Augustine, which (though lost) are confuted by Prosper of Aquitain. His only surviving work is his Commonitorium adversus Hæreticos. This he re-wrote but lost the copy, and therefore added notes to the first draft. It is an attempt to confute all heresies at once, by showing what are the marks of the true church as distinguished from all errorists. It has been often published, e.g. by Baluze, subjoined to Salvian's works, Paris, 1669, 8vo, and Cambridge, 1697, 12mo.—Mur. [Also by Jo. Salsinas, with the works of Hilary, Rome, 1701, 8vo, the best edition. The Commonitorium is a favourite book with the Romanists, being one of their most plausible defences of tradition as the rule of faith. It was translated into French, Paris, 1686, 12mo; into German, by Feder, Bamberg, 1785, 8vo; and into English, London, 1691; by Reeves, in his Primitive Apologies, Lond. 1709, vol. ii. and anonymously, along with a reprint of the Latin text, at Oxford, 1836, 12mo, being one of the significant indications of the rise of Puseyism.—R.

⁸ C. Sollius Apollinaris Sidonius was born of a noble family at Lyons in France, A.D. 431. His father and grandfather both bore the name of Apollinaris, and both were prætorian prefects of the Gallias. After an expensive education he became a soldier, married the daughter of Avitus who was afterwards emperor, had three children, was captured at the siege of Lyons, A.D. 457, yet was advanced to honour by the new emperor Majorianus whom he eulogized in 458, had a statue erected to him, and was advanced to the dignity of count. In the year 467 he went to Rome as legate from the city of Clermont, pronounced a eulogy on the emperor Anthemius, was made prefect of Rome, and performed his duties so faithfully that he had another statue decreed him, was made a patrician and a senator of Rome. In the year 472 he was almost compelled to accept the office of bishop of Clermont in France. He now laid aside all his civil honours, gave up his property to his son, and devoted himself to sacred studies and to his episcopal functions. His influence among the clergy and the churches was very great. When the Goths attacked Clermont he put himself at the head of the citizens as their military commander, and when the city was captured in 480 he retired in safety, was restored to his see, and died in the year 482. He has left numerous epistles published, with one sermon, and twenty-four poetic effusions interspersed. Several of his works in prose and verse are lost. His works were published by Simond, Paris, 1614, 8vo, and with additional notes, Paris, 1652, 8vo. His epistles are useful, as throwing light on the history of his times.—Mur.

of Tapsus,¹ Arnobius junior, who commented on the Psalms of David,² Draconius,³ and others,⁴ who were of a secondary rank.

1 Vigilius, bishop of Tapsus in Africa, flourished A.D. 484, at which time he was summoned to appear at Carthage before Hunneric, the Arian king of the Vandals, and give account of his faith. He boldly professed orthodoxy, but the persecution which followed obliged him to quit Africa, and he retired to Constantinople, and after some years removed to Italy, where he composed several, perhaps the greater part of his works. To conceal himself from his persecuting enemies he composed much under borrowed names, and especially that of Athanasius. During the middle ages he was confounded with Vigilius of Trent, who flourished at the beginning of this century. His works are all directed against the Arians and the Nestorian heresy. He is supposed to be the author of that confession of faith which is commonly called the Athanasian Creed. His works were first published as his by Chifflet, Dijon, 1664, 4to.—Mur.

² An account of Arnobius junior is given in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 312. [He is called junior, to distinguish him from the African Arnobius, who lived at the beginning of the preceding century. This Arnobius junior is supposed to have lived in Gaul. He flourished about A.D. 461, and wrote a Commentary on the Psalms, notes on some passages in the Gospels, and a Dispute with Serapion of Egypt respecting the Trinity, the person of Christ, and the consubstantiality of grace with free will. He was a semi-Pelagian. His works are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii. p. 203, &c.—Mur.

³ Draconius was a presbyter and a poet, probably of Spain, who flourished A.D. 440, and was alive in 450. He has left us a heroic poem on the Creation or the Hexameron, and an elegy on Theodosius II, both published by Simond, Paris, 1619, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix. pages 724, 729.—Mur.

⁴ Catalogue of Latin writers omitted by Mosheim, extracted from Cave's Historia Literaria.

Chromastus, bishop of Aquileia, a friend of Rufinus and a defender of Chrysostom, flourished A.D. 401 and died 410. He has left us some Homilies on the Beatitudes, and a few Epistles.

Innocent I, bishop of Rome A.D. 402–417, a firm friend of Chrysostom and strenuous against the Nestorians and Pelagians. Of thirty-four Epistles published as his the genuineness of nearly all is questioned.

Zosimus, of Greek extract, bishop of Rome A.D. 417–418, famous for his attempt to subject the African churches to his see. He has left us thirteen Epistles.

Boniface, bishop of Rome A.D. 418–423, prosecuted the attempt of Zosimus. We have three of his Epistles. Severus, bishop of Minorca, flourished A.D. 418. His Epistle, describing the conversion of the Jews of Minorca, was published by Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 418.

Julian, an Italian bishop, born before A.D. 386, and died about the year 440 or 450. He studied under Pe-lagius, became a deacon, lecturer, husband, and bishop of a small town among the Hirpini. In the year 417 he came out an open defender of Pelagianism, in 420 he was condemned, went to Constantinople, and thence to Cilicia, where he lived long with Theodorus of Mopsuestia, and devoted himself to writing in defence of his sentiments. In 423 he was condemned by a synod of Cilician bishops, returned to Italy in 424, hoping to recover his see; failed and went again to Constantinople to beg the interference of the emperor, but here Mercator's Commentorium to Theodosius II. met him and blasted his prospects. Being driven from Constantinople and condemned in a council at Rome A.D. 431, he pretended to renounce his errors, and applied to the Roman pontiff in 439 to restore him to his see, but in vain. He was a man of superior talents, well acquainted with the scriptures, and so eloquent that he was styled the Roman Demosthenes. He was also famed for his piety and benevolence to the poor; but he was accused of dissension to his adversaries, and of using bitter language towards his servants. Large extracts are preserved from his Epistles, his Commentary on the Canticles, and his twelve books against the first and second books of Augustine on marriage.

Priscus Fastidius, a British bishop, flourished A.D. 420. He has left us a Tract on Christian life and widowhood addressed to a pious widow, extant among the Works of Augustine, tom. ix.

Evdodius, bishop of Uzala in Africa, an intimate friend of Augustine, flourished A.D. 420. Four of his Epistles, to Augustine and one book De Fide Contra Manicheos are extant among the Works of Augustine.

Isidorus, bishop of Cordova in Spain, flourished A.D. 420 and died A.D. 430. He was probably the author of four books of Allegories or Commentaries on all the books of Kings, extant among the Works of Isidorus Hispalensis.

Celestine, bishop of Rome A.D. 423–432, and active in the Nestorian contests. He has left us fourteen Epistles.

Lupus, bishop of Troyes in France, flourished A.D. 427. He was sent by the Gallic bishops to Britain in 429 to root out Pelagianism, was successful, and returned in 430, and died A.D. 479. He has been pronounced one of the greatest men of his age. Two of his epistles are extant.

Pisidius or Possidonium, bishop of Calama near Hippo in Africa, flourished A.D. 430. He was an intimate friend of Augustine, and wrote his life and a catalogue of his works, still extant among the works of Augustine.

Hilary, bishop of Arles, born A.D. 401, became a monk of Lerins, and was made bishop in 430 and died in 449. As metropolitan of Arles, he deposed Celsodolus bishop of Vienna, who appealed to Rome and was supported by Leo I, which involved Hilary in war with Leo all their lives. He wrote the life of St. Honoratus his predecessor, heroic poems on Genesis, one epistle to Eucherius of Lyons, two others to Augustine, and an account of the miracles of St. Genesius, all which were published by the Benedictines, Paris, 1693, folio, and by Salina, Rome, 1701, 8vo.

Capreolus, bishop of Carthage, flourished A.D. 431. His epistle to the council of Ephesus and another to the Spanish bishop against Nestorius, are extant in Baronius and in other collections.

Patricius (St. Patrick, the apostle of Ireland). See Note 3, p. 175.

Sixtus III, bishop of Rome A.D. 432–440, has left us several epistles. The three books on riches, chastity, false teachers, &c. are erroneously ascribed to him.

Adrian, who lived perhaps about A.D. 450, wrote an Imagie in 8. Scripturam, which is extant in Poole's Synopsis Critic. Sacra, tom. vi. p. 11.

Maximus, a Gallic monk, abbot of Lerins in 426 and bishop of Riez in France A.D. 433, lived till 451 or longer, and wrote several homilies, which are extant among those of Eusebius of Emesa and Eucherius of Lyons.

Claudius Marius Victor or Victorinus, a rhetorician and poet of Marseilles, flourished A.D. 434, and died before A.D. 450. He wrote a Poetic Commentary on Genesis to the death of Abraham, a poetic Epistle to the abbot Solomon on the corrupt morals of the age, both extant, Paris, 1560, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii. p. 580.

Celcius Sedulius, a Scotchman and poet, who flourished A.D. 434. He studied in Italy, became a presby-

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THEOLOGY.

I. In the controversies which in this century agitated nearly all Christendom, many points of theology were more fully explained and more accurately defined than they had been before. Thus it was with the doctrine concerning Christ, his person and natures; and those concerning the innate depravity of the human soul, the natural ability of men to live and act as the law of God requires, the necessity of divine grace in order to salvation, human liberty, and the like. For that devout and venerable simplicity of the first ages of the church, which taught men to believe when God speaks and to obey when God commands, appeared to the leading doctors of this age to be clownish and vulgar. Many of those however who attempted to explain and illustrate these doctrines, opened the way rather for disputation than for a rational faith and a holy life; for they did not so much explain as involve in greater obscurity and darken with ambiguous terms and incomprehensible distinctions the deep mys-

ter, and perhaps a bishop. His works were collected by Asterius towards the close of this century, comprising Carmen Paschale (on the miracles of Christ) Feteris et Noni Test. Collatio, an elegiac poem, Præva Alphabeticæ de Christo, in lambic measure (on the life of Christ), and Paschale Opus in prose, An Exposition of all the Epistles of Paul is falsely ascribed to him. The works of Sedulius have been published repeatedly, and are to be found in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. vi.—[The best edition is in the fourth volume of the Poetæ Christianæ of F. Arevalus, Rome, 1788-94, in four vols. 4to. This collection includes the works of Prudentius, Dracontius, Juvenius, and Sedulius. The Paschale Opus in prose is merely another version by the author himself of his poem entitled Carmen Paschale.—R.]

Valerianus, a bishop in the maritime Alps, flourished A.D. 430, and was alive in 455. His twenty homilies and an epistle were published by Sirmond, Paris, 1612, 8vo, also in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii.

Eustathius flourished A.D. 410, the neat Latin translator of St. Basil's nine homilies on the Hexæmeron, extant among the works of Basil the Great.

Philippus, a presbyter and disciple of Jerome, flourished A.D. 410, and died A.D. 455. He wrote a Commentary on Job, published, Basil, 1527, 4to and fol. It has been ascribed both to Bede and to Jerome.

Idatius or Hydatus, a Spanish bishop who flourished A.D. 443, and died A.D. 468. He wrote a Chronicon from A.D. 379 to A.D. 428, and afterwards continued it to A.D. 467, first published entire by Sirmond, Paris, 1619, 8vo, and since in the works of Sirmond, Paris, 1696, and Venice, 1729. It is barbarous in style and frequently inaccurate as to facts, yet affords valuable aid in tracing the movements of the Goths and Suevi.

Zacharius, the reputed author of three books of discussion between Zachæus a Christian and Apollonius a pagan, in regard to Christianity. The book was probably written about A.D. 450, and is published in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. x.

Salonius, son of Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, and himself a Gallic bishop, flourished A.D. 453. He wrote an Exposition of the Parables of Solomon, and a Mystical Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes, both extant in the Orthodoxographia, and in Biblioth. Patr. tom. vii.

Victorius or Victorinus, a Gallic mathematician, flourished A.D. 457, author of a Paschal Canon in two parts; the first part exhibits the principles and the method of calculating Easter, the second is a table of Easter days from A.D. 28 to A.D. 457. This Canon was recommended by the council of Orleans, A.D. 451, and was first published by Bucherius, Antw. 1634, fol.

Hilary, bishop of Rome, A.D. 461-467. He was the bishop of Rome's legate to the council of Ephesus in 449. Twelve of his Epistles are extant.

Paulinus Petriordius or Vesuntinus (i. e. of Besançon), a Gallic poet, who flourished A.D. 461, and is often confounded with Paulinus of Nola. He wrote De Vita Sti Martini, an uninteresting poem, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. vi. and published by Daunius, with notes, Lips. 1866, 8vo.

Claudius Mamertus, a Gallic poet, a presbyter, and assistant to the bishop of Vienne, flourished A.D. 462. He wrote De Statu Animæ, two Epistles, a Poem against various errors, and a Hymn on the Crucifixion, all extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. vii.

Simplicius, bishop of Rome. A.D. 467-483. He was much engaged in contests with the eastern patriarchs, and has left us nineteen Epistles, extant in the Concilia, tom. iv.

Ruricius senior, bishop of Limoges in France, flourished A.D. 470, but was alive in 536. He has left us two books of Epistles, published by Canisius, Antiq. Lectiones, tom. v. (or tom. i. of new ed.) and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii.

Remigius, bishop of Rheims, A.D. 471-533. He baptized Clovis, king of the Franks, with many of his lords, was a man of note, and has left us five Epistles, together with his Will. The Exposition of Paul's Epistles attributed to him is not his.

Faustus, abbot of Lerins and then bishop of Riez in France, A.D. 472-489 or 485, a semi-Pelagian. His works are, De Gratia Dei et Libero Arbitrio, with several Sermons, Epistles, and Tracts, collected in Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii.

Felix, bishop of Rome, A.D. 483-492; was much in controversy with the eastern patriarchs. Fifteen of his Epistles are extant.

Victor Vitensis, an orthodox African bishop who fled to Constantinople A.D. 457, and there composed a History of the Persecutions in Africa under Genseric and Hunneric, kings of the Vandals. It was published with Optatus Milevitanus, Paris, 1659, 8vo, with Vigilius Tapsensis, Dijon, 1664, 4to, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. viii.

Aleimus Ecdicius Avitus, bishop of Clermont, A.D. 490-523. He has left us five poetic books On the Creation and Fall of Man, the Flood, and the Passage of the Red Sea, a poem in praise of Virginity, eighty-seven epistles, and some sermons, published by Sirmond, Paris, 1663, and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix. [See an account of his life and writings in Smith's Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 434.—R.]

Gelasius, bishop of Rome, A.D. 492-496. Sixteen of his epistles and fragments of various other works are extant. The famous decree of a Roman council, A.D. 491, De Libris Canonicis, Ecclesiasticis, et Apocryphis, ascribed to Gelasius, is of dubious authenticity.

Gennadius, a presbyter of Marselles, flourished A.D. 495, and wrote De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, or a catalogue of authors continuing Jerome's catalogue from the year 393 to A.D. 495. His book De Fide and his Life of Jerome are also extant. But his works against all the heresies, against Nestorius, and against Pelagius, his tract on the Millennium, and his translations from the Greek fathers, are lost.

Rusticus Elpidius, physician to Theodoric, king of the Goths, flourished about A.D. 498, and has left twenty-four epigrams on Scriptural facts, and a poem on the Benefits of Christ.

Julianus Pomerius of Mauritania, a teacher of rhetoric at Arles and a presbyter there, flourished A.D. 498. His work De Anima, and several smaller ones, are lost. But his treatise De Vita Contemplativa, is extant among the works of Prosper, to whom it has been wrongly ascribed.

Symmachus, bishop of Rome, A.D. 498-514, famous for his excommunication of the emperor Anastasius, has left us twelve epistles.—Mur. [To this list should be added the names of Nicetas or Nicæus of Romæ, mentioned below at page 192, and Nicetas, bishop of Aquileia, several tracts by whom have been recently published by Cardinal Mai, in his Script. Vet. nova Collectio, vol. vii. part i. pages 314-340.—R.]

teries of revealed religion; and hence arose abundant matter for those difficulties, contentions, and animosities which have flowed down to succeeding ages, and which can scarcely be removed by the efforts of human power. It hardly need be remarked that some, while pressing their adversaries, incautiously fell into the opposite errors which were no less dangerous.

2. The superstitious notions and human devices by which religion was before much clogged, were very considerably augmented. The aid of departed saints was implored with supplications by vast multitudes, and no one censured this absurd devotion. Nor did the question which afterwards occasioned much debate—namely, in what way the prayers of mortals could reach the ears of residents in heaven, present any difficulties to the Christians of those times. For they did not suppose the souls of departed saints to be so confined to the celestial mansions, as not to have liberty of paying visits to mortals and of travelling over various regions at their pleasure. These unembodied spirits were supposed to be frequent and willing visitors at the places where their bodies were buried;¹ and this opinion transmitted to Christians from the Greeks and Romans, drew a great conflux of supplicants to the sepulchres of the saints.² The images of those who were in reputation for sanctity while alive, were now honoured with extraordinary devotion in several places; and there were those who believed what the pagan priests had maintained respecting the statues of Jupiter and Mercury³—namely, that those inhabitants of heaven were favourably present in these their images. The bones of martyrs and the sign of the cross, were supposed to be the most sovereign remedy against the assaults of demons and all other calamities, and to have power not only to heal diseases of the body, but likewise those of the mind.⁴ Of the public processions, the holy pilgrimages,⁵ the superstitious offices of devotion paid by the living to the souls of the dead, the multiplication and extravagant veneration of temples, chapels and altars, and innumerable other proofs of degenerate piety, I forbear to speak particularly. As no one in those times objected to Christians retaining the opinions of their pagan ancestors respecting the soul, heroes, demons, temples, and the like, and their transferring them into their devotions; and as no one proposed utterly to abolish the ancient pagan institutions but only to alter them somewhat and purify them, it was unavoidable that the religion and the worship of Christians should in this way become corrupted. This also I will add, that the doctrine of the purification of souls after death by means of some sort of fire, which afterwards became so great a source of wealth to the clergy, acquired in this age a fuller development and greater influence.⁶

3. The number of those who devoted their talents to the explanation of the Scriptures was not so great as in the preceding century, when there was less controversy among Christians; and yet the number was not small. I pass over those who expounded but one or only a few books of Scripture, Victor of Antioch, Polychronius, Philo of Carpathus, Isidore of Cordova, Salonus, and Andreas of Cæsarea. The two most distinguished interpreters of this century who explained a great part of the sacred volume, and not altogether without success, were, Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, and Theodorus of Mopsuestia. Both possessed genius and learning, and neither would follow in the footsteps of preceding expositors without some reason. The expositions of the former are before the public;⁷ those of the latter lie concealed in the East among the Nestorians for various reasons, and are worthy to see the light.⁸ Cyril of Alexandria deserves a place among the interpreters, but a far more honourable

¹ On the rise and spread of this intercession of departed spirits and other innovations referred to in this paragraph, see Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. sec. 99, or sec. 97, in Cunningham's Translation, Philad. 1836. This translation will henceforth be referred to, being the only extant English translation, as the second volume of Dr. Davidson's more accurate translation of Gieseler's later edition was not published when these sheets were passing through the press [June, 1847].—R.

² Lactantius, Divinar. Instit. lib. I. p. 164; Hesiod. Opp. et Dier. line 122; with which compare Sulpitius Severus, Epist. II. p. 371; Dial. II. cap. xiii. p. 474; Dial. III. p. 65; Macarius, in Tollius, Insignia Itineris Italici, p. 197, and other writers of that age.

³ Clementina, Humil. x. in Patr. Apostol. tom. I. p. 697; Arnobius, Adv. Gentes, lib. VI. p. 254, &c.; Barthius, Ad Rutilium Numantian. p. 250.

⁴ Prudentius, Hymn. XI. De Coronis, pages 150, 151; Sulpitius Severus, Epist. I. p. 364; Æneas Gazæus, Theophrastus, p. 173, ed. Barth.

⁵ These pilgrimages were then so common that some Christians fell into absurdities truly ridiculous. They journeyed quite to Arabia in order to see the dunghill on which the diseased Job sat, and to kiss the ground which had absorbed his precious blood; as Chrysostom describes it (Homily v. to the Antiochians) where he says in his rhetorical way, that the dunghill of Job was more venerable than the throne of a king.—Schl.

⁶ On this subject Augustine deserves especially to be consulted, De Octo Quæstionibus ad Dulcitium Libr. cap. xiii. Opp. tom. VI. p. 128, De Fide et Operibus cap. xvi. p. 182, De Fide, Spe, et Caritate, sec. cxviii p. 222, Exposition of Psalm xxxv. sec. iii. &c.

⁷ See Simon, Hist. Crit. des Princip. Comment. du Nouv. Test. chap. xxii. p. 314, and Crit. de la Biblio. Ecclès. de M. Du Pin tome I. p. 180 [and note 4, p. 183, above.—Mur.]

⁸ Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatic. tom. III. sec. II. p. 327; Simon, Crit. de la Biblio. Ecclès. par M. Du Pin, tome I, pages 108, 677, [See also note 4, p. 184 above.—Mur.]

one is due to Isidore of Pelusium, whose epistles contain much which tends to elucidate and explain the holy Scriptures.¹

4. Most of these interpreters, whether Greeks or Latins, everywhere copy after Origen, and despising the genuine and obvious meaning of the Scriptures, search after abstruse senses, or what the Latins of that age called mysteries, in the plainest passages and sentences of the Bible. Some of the Greeks indeed, and in particular Theodoret, laboured not unsuccessfully in explaining the pages of the New Testament, which we may ascribe to their skill in the Greek language, with which they had been familiar from their infancy; but upon the Hebrew Scriptures neither the Greeks nor the Latins cast much light. Nearly all who attempted to explain them, making no use of their judgment, applied the whole either to Christ and his benefits, or to anti-Christ and his wars and desolations, and to the kindred subjects.

5. Here and there, however, one more sagacious and wiser than the rest ventured to point out a safer path. This is evident from the Epistles of Isidore of Pelusium, who in various places censures in a pertinent manner those who, disregarding the historic sense, referred all the narrative and prophetic parts of the Old Testament to Christ; and yet he himself was by no means entirely free from the fault of his age, the love and pursuit of allegories. No one went further in censuring the imitators of Origen than Theodorus of Mopsuestia. He not only wrote a book concerning allegory and history against Origen,² but also in his own Commentaries on the Prophets of the Old Testament he ventured to explain most of their predictions with reference to events in ancient history;³ and this method of explaining the Old Testament perhaps raised as much ill-will against him as those other sentiments which brought on him the charge of heresy. The example of this excellent man was followed especially by the Nestorians.⁴ Nor have they yet ceased to follow it, for to this day they preserve his books with care, and venerate him as a saint of the highest order.

6. It is very evident that the doctrines of religion were not exhibited with due purity and simplicity by most persons, but were sometimes with uncommendable zeal expanded beyond what was revealed, were anatomized with too great art and subtlety, and were supported not so much by Scripture evidence, as by the authority and reasonings of the ancient doctors. I know of no one who embraced a complete system of Christian doctrines in a single work, unless Nicæas of Romæa may be considered as doing this in the six books of instruction for Neophytes which he is said to have composed.⁵ But it has been already observed that various doctrines of religion were laboriously explained, especially in the controversial works against the Nestorians, Eutychians, Pelagians, and Arians.

7. Of controversial writers a great number can be mentioned, and indeed many such were required by the numerous controversies. The worshippers of the pagan images and gods were vigorously assailed by Theodoret in his book De Curandis Græcorum Affectionibus, which displays much genius and erudition, by Orientius in his Commonitorium, and by Evagrius in his Disputation between Zachæus and Apollonius.⁶ To these may be added Philip of Side and Philostorgius, of whom the former wrote against Julian and the latter against Porphyry.⁷ The Jews were confuted by Basil of Seleucia,⁸ by Gregentius in his Disputation with Herbanus, and by Evagrius in his Dialogue between Theophilus and a Jew. Against all the heretics something was attempted by Voconius, an African,

"That the writers of the New Testament when they apply the prophecies of the Old Testament to Jesus Christ, follow the words rather than the sense." See also Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. p. p. 880.—Mur.

¹ Gennadius, De Scripturis Ecclesiasticis, cap. xxii. p. 14, ed. Fabric. [The work is lost, but from the account of Gennadius it was no System of Theology.—Mur. [See Professor Ramsay's account of the author whose name was Nicetas or Nicæas, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 1184.—R.

² For an account of Orientius and Evagrius see the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. pages 121, and 252. [Orientius, called also Oronius and Oresius, was bishop of Aux in France, perhaps also of Tarragona in Spain His Commonitorium written in heroic verse, was published, book i. by Delrio, Antwerp, 1600, and book ii. by Martene, in his Nova Collectio Operum Eccles. Vet. Paris, 1700. This Evagrius is not the noted Evagrius Scholasticus of the sixth century, but was a French priest and a disciple of St. Martin. His Altercatio Simonis Judæi et Theophili Christiani, is found in Martene's Anecdota; and his Consultationes, seu Deliberationes Zachari Christiani et Apollonii Philosophi, is in the Spicilegium of D'Achery, tom. x.—Schl.

³ Neither of the works here mentioned is extant.—Mur.

⁴ For some account of this Basil and of his writings, see note 2, p. 185 above.—Mur.

¹ Concerning both, see Simon, Hist. des Princip. Comment. du Nouv. Test. chap. xxi. p. 330, &c [For some account of Cyril, see note 3, p. 183, and concerning Isidore, note 1, p. 184 above.—Mur. [Further, in respect of three of these interpreters, Theodoret, Cyril, and Isidore, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics from p. 141, &c.—R.

² Facundus Hermianensis, De Tribus Capitulis, lib. iii. cap. vi; Liberatus, Breviarium, cap. xxiv.

³ Acta Concilii Constantinop. II. seu Œcumenici V. tom. iii. p. 58 of Harduin's Concilia.

⁴ One witness among others is Cosmas Indicopleustes, a writer of the sixth century, who is known to have been a Nestorian. For he says in his Topographia, lib. v. (pages 224, 225, of the Collectio nova Patrum Græcor. published by Montfaucon), "Among all the Psalms of David only four refer to Christ;" and to confirm this sentiment he does not hesitate to declare (p. 227)

by Syagrius in his tract De Fide, by Genadius of Marseilles, and, best of all by Theodoret¹ in his work De Fabulis Hæreticorum. Those who attacked only individual sects are here omitted.

8. Those who contended against the Christian sectaries followed the rules of the ancient sophists, and also (what is truly surprising) the practice of the Roman courts rather than the examples and instructions of Christ and his apostles. In the Roman courts very difficult and doubtful points were decided according to the opinions of certain ancient jurists. If these happened to disagree, that opinion was preferred which was maintained by the greatest number, or by the jurists of most learning and reputation.² It was very prejudicial to the interests of truth that this usage of the Roman courts was adopted as a rule in the controversies of Christians on subjects of religion, and followed in the deliberations of the councils of this century; for by it that was sanctioned and regarded as confirmed which had been judged true and certain by the majority, or by the most learned and distinguished of the doctors of former times. This appears from nearly all the Acts of Councils now extant. The other faults of the theological disputants may be easily inferred from what has now been stated.

9. This imitation of the practice of the Roman courts in conducting religious controversies stimulated very much the base audacity of those, who did not blush to palm their own spurious productions on the great men of former times, and even on Christ himself and his apostles; so that they might be able, in the councils and in their books, to oppose names against names and authorities against authorities. The whole Christian church of this century was overwhelmed with these disgraceful fictions. And this it is said occasioned the Roman pontiff, Gelasius, to assemble at Rome a convention of bishops from the whole western empire, and after examining the books which were professedly the works of persons of the highest authority, to draw up that famous decree by which so many apocryphal books are stripped of their false reputation. That something of this kind was actually done cannot well be denied, but men of superior learning maintain that this pretended decree of Gelasius is of no better authority than those books which it condemns; that is, they believe that it was not the production of Gelasius but of some one who abused his name.³

10. Among those who discussed the subject of morals, Eucherius, Salvian, and Nilus, stand conspicuous. The epistle of Eucherius especially, on Contempt of the World and Secular Philosophy, will recommend itself to every good man both by its style and its matter. The short pieces of Mark the hermit breathe a spirit of piety, but do not afford pleasure either by the choice of the matter, the justness of the arrangement, or the solidity of the reasoning. Fastidius composed various tracts concerning moral duties and virtues, which are all lost.⁴ The productions of Diadochus, Prosper, and Severianus in this department are interesting, with a few exceptions, for the truth and terseness of the thoughts, but they will afford little satisfaction to one fond of solid reasoning and well-digested composition. Indeed it was a fault common to nearly all the moral writers of those times, that they had no idea of a regular distribution of their subject into parts, nor of a recurrence to first principles.

11. But the candid might tolerate this fault and ascribe it to the infelicity of the times, did they not see other injuries inflicted on the cause of piety by inconsiderate men. In the first place the mystics as they are called, who pretended to be more perfect than other Christians, drew to their party many everywhere among the weak and thoughtless, and especially in the eastern provinces, who were allured by the appearance of their extraordinary and self-denying piety; and it is incredible what rigorous and severe laws they imposed on themselves, in order to appease God and deliver the celestial spirit from the bondage of this mortal body. To live among wild beasts—nay, in the manner of these beasts, to roam about like madmen in desert places and without garments, to feed their emaciated bodies with hay and grass, to shun the converse and even the sight of men, to stand motionless in certain places for many

³ Pearson, Vindicia Ignatiana, pt. 1. chap. iv. page 189, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter. page 260; Sibirius, Praef. ad Enchiridion Sexti, page 79, and others. [This decree is ascribed by most of the MSS. to Gelasius I. but by some to Damasus, and by others to Hormisdas. It is not quoted by any writer before the ninth century. It mentions some books which were not in being in the age of Gelasius; and it contains some sentiments and arguments which savour of a later age. It may be found in perhaps all the larger Collections of Councils; in Binnius, vol. ii. in Labbé, vol. iv. in Harduin, vol. ii. in Mansi, Supplem. vol. i. also in the Corpus Juris Canonici, Decret. Gratian. pt. i. Distinct. xv. cap. iiii.—Mur.]

¹ An account of Theodoret and of his writings is given in note 4, p. 183 above.—Mur.]

² See Coдекс Theodosianus, lib. i. tit. iv. De Responsis Prudentum, p. 32, ed. Ritter.

⁴ Except his tract on a Christian Life and Widowhood, addressed to a pious widow, which is preserved among the works of Augustine, tom. ix.—Mur.]

years exposed to the weather, to shut themselves up in confined cabins till life ended—this was accounted piety, this the true method of eliciting the [spark of] Deity from the secret recesses of the soul.¹ The greater part of these people were influenced not so much by arguments and assignable reasons, as either by a natural propensity to melancholy and austerity or by the example and opinions of others; for there are diseases of the mind as well as of the body which spread like a pestilence. Yet there are some who gave systematic precepts for this austere mode of living; for instance, among the Latins, Julianus Pomerius in his three books De Vita Contemplativa, and among the Syrians many whose names it would be needless to mention.

12. Among these examples of religious faculty, none acquired greater veneration and applause than those who were called Pillar-Saints [Sancti Columnares], or in Greek, Stylitæ, persons of a singular spirit and genius, who stood motionless on the tops of lofty columns during many years and to the end of life, and to the great astonishment of the ignorant multitude. The author of this institution in the present century was Simeon of Sytan, a Syrian, who was first a shepherd and then a monk, and who, in order to be nearer heaven, spent thirty-seven years in the most uncomfortable manner on the tops of five different pillars, of six, twelve, twenty-two, thirty-six, and forty cubits elevation, and in this way procured for himself immense fame and veneration.²

¹ See Moschus, Pratum Spirituale, Palladius, Historia Lausiaca, Sulpitius Severus, Dial. i. and others.

² See the Acta Sanctiorum for the month of January, tom. i. p. 261, &c. where the very reason I have mentioned for his living in this manner is expressly stated, p. 277. Theodoret also indicates the same by saying that Simeon desired gradually to increase the altitude of his pillar that he might get nearer to heaven. Tillemont, Mémoires à l'Hist. de l'Egl. tome xv. p. 347. ed. Paris. The Acta S. Simeonis Stylitæ are most fully related in Asseman's Acta Martyrum Oriental. et Occidental. vol. ii. p. 227, Rome, 1748, fol. [This Simeon we are told was born at Sisan in Syria about A.D. 390. At the age of thirteen, while tending his father's sheep, he heard a public exposition of Luke vi. 21—25 ("Blessed are ye that weep now, &c. But woe unto you that laugh now," &c.) which determined him to become a monk. Having therefore passed a novitiate for two years he removed to a monastery near Antioch, where he lived ten years. Here his abstinence and his voluntary mortifications were so excessive as to draw on him censure from the other monks. He once swathed himself from his loins to his neck with a rigid rope of palm during ten days, which caused his whole body to fester and discharge blood. Being expelled the monastery for such austerities, he retired to the adjacent mountain and let himself down into a dry cave. After five days the repenting monks sought him out, drew him forth from the cavern, and restored him to their fellowship. But not long after he retired to a little cell at the foot of a mountain near Antioch, and there immured himself three years. During this period, having caused his den to be stopped up with earth, he remained buried for forty days without eating or drinking, and when disinterred was found nearly dead. So pleased was he with

His example was afterwards followed, though not fully equalled, by many persons in Syria and Palestine, who were led to it either by their ignorance of true religion or by their love of fame; and this stupid form of religion continued in the East quite down to the twelfth century, when it was entirely abolished.³ The Latins had wisdom enough not to copy after the Syrians and orientals in this matter; and when one Wulfilaicus built himself such a pillar in the German territory of Treves, and wished to live upon it in the manner of Simeon, the neighbouring bishops pulled it down and prohibited the man from pursuing his object.⁴

13. Those who undertook to give religious instruction to the less advanced Christians, were at more pains to inculcate and recommend the external signs of religion and exercises of the body, than to promote that real holiness which has its seat in the soul. In this respect many went this experiment that he afterwards kept such a fast annually as long as he lived. He next removed to the top of the mountain, where he chained himself to a rock for several years. His fame had now become very great, and crowds of admiring visitors of all ranks and characters thronged around him. Incommoded by the pressure of the crowd, he erected a pillar on which he might stand, elevated at first six cubits, and ending with forty. The top of the pillar was three feet in diameter, and surrounded with a balustrade. Here he stood day and night and in all weathers. Through the night and till nine A.M. he was constantly in prayer, often spreading forth his hands and bowing so low that his forehead touched his toes. A by-stander once attempted to count the number of these successive prostrations, and he counted till they amounted to 1244. At nine o'clock A.M. he began to address the admiring crowd below, to hear and answer their questions, to send messages and write letters, &c. for he took concern in the welfare of all the churches, and corresponded with bishops and even with emperors. Towards evening he suspended his intercourse with this world, and betook himself again to converse with God till the following day. He generally ate but once a week, never slept, wore a long sheepskin robe and a cap of the same. His beard was very long, and his frame extremely emaciated. In this manner he is reported to have spent thirty-seven years, and at last, in his sixty-ninth year, to have expired unobserved in a praying attitude, in which no one ventured to disturb him till after three days, when Antony, his disciple and biographer, mounting the pillar found that his spirit was departed, and his holy body was emitting a delightful odour. His remains were borne in great pomp to Antioch, in order to be the safeguard of that unwallied town, and innumerable miracles were performed at his shrine. His pillar also was so venerated that it was literally enclosed with chapels and monasteries for some ages. Simeon was so averse from women that he never allowed one to come within the sacred precincts of his pillar. Even his own mother was debarred this privilege till after her death, when her corpse was brought to him, and he now restored her to life for a short time, that she might see him and converse with him a little before she ascended to heaven. Such is the story gravely told us by the greatest writers of that age, and as gravely repeated in modern times by the Catholic historians.—Mur.

³ See Siberus, Dis. de Sanctis Columnaribus, Lips. 4to, and Majell, Dis. de Stylitis, in Asseman's Acta Martyrum Oriental. et Occident. tom. ii. p. 246, where there is a copperplate of Simeon's pillar.

⁴ Gregor. Turpinus. Hist. Francor. lib. viii. cap. xv. p. 387, &c.

so far that they enjoined an extreme of austere virtue little short of the inconsiderate piety of the mystics. According to the sentiments of Salvian and others, no one can become truly and perfectly holy unless he abandons altogether his property and honours, contemns matrimony, banishes all hilarity from his mind, and subjects his body to a variety of mortifications and inconveniences. As there were few who could bear the severity of these rules, veneration for those senseless or fanatical persons, those religious maniacs to whose temperament these rules were adapted, increased marvellously, and saints sprang up like mushrooms.

14. Some few dared to strike at the roots of the growing superstition, and to recall men from vain and fictitious piety to that which is genuine. But these were soon bidden to hold their peace by others who were more numerous, in higher reputation, and possessed of greater influence.¹ An example we have in Vigilantius, a presbyter of Gallic extraction but resident in Spain, a learned and eloquent man. After a journey to Palestine and Egypt, returning home near the beginning of this century, he issued several tracts, in which he taught and inculcated many things contrary to the opinions of the age. Among other things he denied that the tombs and the bones of the martyrs were worthy of any religious worship, and therefore censured pilgrimages to places accounted sacred; he ridiculed the miracles reported as occurring in the temples consecrated to the martyrs, and condemned the practice of keeping vigils therein; he said that the custom of burning wax candles in the day-time at the sepulchres of the martyrs, was imprudently borrowed by Christians from the ancient superstition of the pagans; he maintained that prayers addressed to departed saints were fruitless; he treated with contempt the [prevailing] fasts, the celibacy of the clergy, and the monastic life; and he maintained that neither those who distributed all their goods among the poor in order to live in voluntary poverty, nor those who sent portions of their property to Jerusalem, performed an act pleasing and acceptable to God. These sentiments were not offensive to several of the Gallic and Spanish bishops. But Jerome, the most renowned monk of that age, attacked this bold religious reformer with so much acrimony, that he readily saw he must be silent if he would have his life in safety. This effort therefore to check the reigning superstition was crushed in its commencement.² The good man's name still remains in the list of heretics, recognised by those who follow not their own judgment or the decision of the holy Scriptures, but the decisions of antiquity.

15. The contests which agitated Egypt near the close of the preceding century respecting Origen, were in this century prosecuted at the court of Constantinople with little prudence or decency. Some monks of Nitria being banished from Egypt on account of Origen, took refuge at Constantinople, and were treated by John Chrysostom, the bishop of that city, with candour and kindness. As soon as this was known by Theophilus of Alexandria, he began to plot against Chrysostom; and sending the renowned Epiphanius with several other bishops to Constantinople, he endeavoured to deprive that most eloquent prelate of his office. The time was a favourable one for his purpose, for Chrysostom, by the strictness of his discipline and by the severity with which he lashed the vices of the times, and particularly those of some ladies of the court, had incurred the most violent resentment of many, and especially of Eudoxia, the wife of Arcadius the emperor. Eudoxia being enraged invited Theophilus and the Egyptian bishops to come to Constantinople, to assemble a council, and inquire into the religious sentiments, the morals, and the official conduct of Chrysostom. This council, which was held in the suburbs of Chalcedon in the year 403, and had Theophilus for its president, declared Chrysostom unworthy of the episcopal office, among other causes on account of his too great attachment to Origen and the followers of Origen, and therefore decreed his banishment. The people of Constantinople who were exceedingly attached to their bishop, became ² Bayle, Dictionnaire, Article Vigilantius; Barbeyrac, De la Morale des Pères, p. 252; Vossius, Theses Historico-Theologicae, p. 170; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. p. 57, &c. [That Vigilantius was an honest and correct theologian and that his name ought to be erased from the list of heretics, appears highly probable from a candid examination of the whole subject. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iii. pages 673—704; and Vogel, De Vigilantio Heretico Orthodoxo, Gotting. 1756.—Mur.] The history of this reformer and his controversy with Jerome have been recently subjected to an elaborate examination by the Rev. Dr. Gilly, in his learned and instructive work, Vigilantius and his Times, Lond. 1844, 8vo, which the student ought by all means to consult, in order to obtain a clear idea of the deplorable state of religion in the early part of this century. I would also refer the reader to some striking and pertinent observations on the character and position of both Jovinian (formerly mentioned) and Vigilantius, in Isaac Taylor's Introductory Essay to Williams' translation of Pfäfer's Life of Luther, Lond. 1840, p. 14, &c.—H.

¹ Augustine himself complains of this in his noted Epistle clix. ad Januarium.

tumultuous, and impeded the execution of this unjust sentence; but the tumult subsiding, the same judges the next year A.D. 404, in order to gratify their own enmity and that of Eudoxia, renewed the sentence under another pretext; and Chrysostom, surrendering himself to his enemies, went into banishment at Cucusus, a city of Cilicia, where he died three years after.¹ His departure was followed by a great insurrection of the Johannists (for so his partisans were called) which the edicts of Honorius with difficulty suppressed.² That the proceedings against Chrysostom were most unjust, no one doubts; yet it was a fault in him that he determined to avail himself of the elevation decreed to the bishops of his see by the council of Constantinople, and to assume the prerogatives of a judge in the contest between Theophilus and the monks, which greatly exasperated the Alexandrine prelate. The monks of Nitria having lost their patron, sought a reconciliation with Theophilus, but the Origenist party still continued to flourish in Egypt, Syria, and the neighbouring countries, and Jerusalem became the centre and rendezvous of the sect.³

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF CEREMONIES AND RITES.

1. To recount all the regulations made in this century respecting the mode of worship and religious rites and institutions, would require a volume of considerable size. The curious in these matters are referred to the Acts of the councils and to the works of the principal writers of those times. There were some however among those writers, who were not so corrupted by the bad examples of their age as not candidly to acknowledge that true piety in the soul was oppressed by that enormous load of ceremonies. This evil originated partly from the degeneracy and indolence of the teachers, partly from the calamities of the times which were unfavourable to mental cultivation, and partly from the innate depravity of man, which disposes him more readily to offer to God the service of his limbs and eyes than that of his heart.

2. Public worship everywhere assumed a form more calculated for show and for the gratification of the eye. Various ornaments were added to the sacerdotal garments in order to increase the veneration of the people for the clerical order. The new forms of hymns, prayers, and public fasts, are easily enumerated. In Gaul particularly were instituted the Rogations or public supplications, which precede the festal day of Christ's ascension.⁴ In some places it was appointed that the praises of God should be sung perpetually day and night, the singers succeeding each other without interruption,⁵ as if the Supreme Being took pleasure in clamour and noise, and in the flatteries of men. The magnificence of the temples had no bounds.⁶ Splendid images were placed in them, and among these, after the Nestorian contests, the image of the virgin Mary holding the infant in her arms occupied the most conspicuous place. Altars and repositories for relics made of solid silver if possible, were procured in various places, from which may easily be conjectured what must have been the splendour and the expense of the other sacred utensils.

3. On the contrary, the Agapæ or Love-feasts were abolished, because as piety diminished gradually and continually, these feasts gave to many persons occasions for sin.⁷ Among the Latins grievous offenders,

⁴ See Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. lib. v. ep. 16; and lib. vi. ep. 1.; Martene, Thesaurus Anecd. tom. v. p. 47. The three days immediately preceding Ascension-day—that is, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, it is said were first observed as days of public fasting with solemn processions and supplications, by order of Claudius Mamertus, bishop of Vienne, in a time of great public calamity. Whether this was in the year 452 or 463 or 474, writers are not agreed; but the custom was approved, imitated, and repeated, till at length it became a law in the Latin church that these days should be so observed to secure a blessing on the fruits of the earth and the temporal interests of men. The three days were called Rogation Days, and the week Rogation Week, and the Sunday preceding Rogation Sunday, from the Rogations or Litanies chanted in the processions of these days. See Baillet, Vies des Saints et l'Histoire des Fêtes, tome iv. p. 92, &c.—Mur.

⁵ Gervais, Hist. de Suger, tome i. p. 23. [This custom probably originated in the East. There, in the beginning of the fifth century, one Alexander established under the auspices of Gennadius, the patriarch of Constantinople, the Order of Acrotyros (ἀκροτύρος) or the Sleepless, who so regulated their worship that it was never interrupted by day or by night, one class of the brethren succeeding another continually. This order obtained afterwards the name of Studious, from a rich Roman counsellor of the name of Studius who went to Constantinople, and erected a cloister appropriated to this order.—Sehl.

⁶ See an example in Zacharias of Mitylene, De Opificio Mundi, pages 165, 166.

⁷ The abolition of the love-feasts was in part effected in the fourth century. The council of Laodicea, canon twenty-eight, first ordained that they should no longer be held in the churches. A similar decree was passed in the year 397 by the third council of Carthage, canon twenty [thirty]; yet the custom was too firmly established to be at once rooted out. Hence we find that in the times of Augustine, love-feasts were still kept in the churches. (Augustine contra Faustum, lib. cap. xx. xxi. Confess. lib. vi. cap. ii. and Epist. lxxv.) Yet he there informs us that all kinds of feasting had been who before had to confess their sins in public, were relieved from this unpleasant duty; for Leo the Great gave them liberty to confess their crimes privately to a priest selected for that purpose. In this way the ancient discipline, the sole defence of chastity and modesty, was removed, and the actions of men were subjected to the scrutiny of the clergy, which was greatly for their interest.¹

¹ See the authors referred to in the preceding century, to whom add the writers on the Life of Chrysostom—viz. Tillmont, Hermont, and others; and Nouv. Dict. Hist. et Crit. tome i. p. 79, 80. [See also note 3, p. 133, above; and Socrates, H. E. lib. vi. cap. ix.—xviii.; Sozomen, H. E. lib. viii. cap. xlii.—xxii.—Mur.

² See his three Laws with the notes of Gothofredus, in the Code Theodor. tom. v. pag. 83, 113, &c.

³ See Cyril's, Vita Sabe, in Coteller, Monumenta Eccles. Græcæ, tom. ii. p. 274; Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 31, &c.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS SCHISMS AND HERESIES.

1. SOME of the earlier sects acquiring new vigour, dared to disquiet the church. I will pass in silence those inauspicious names of former days, the Novatians, the Marcionites, and Manichæans, notwithstanding a numerous progeny of them appeared here and there, and will confine my remarks to those two pests of the preceding century, the Donatists and the Arians.

The Donatists had hitherto been prosperous. But near the commencement of this century the Catholic bishops of Africa, led on principally by St. Augustine of Hippo, put forth all their energies to crush and destroy this sect, which was not only very troublesome to the church, but through the Circumcelliones, who were its soldiers, pernicious also to the commonwealth. Accordingly in the year 404, the council of Carthage sent deputies to the emperor Ho-norius, petitioning that the imperial laws against heretics might be extended to embrace explicitly the Donatists, who denied that they were heretics, and also that the fury of the Circumcelliones might be restrained.² The emperor therefore first imposed a fine upon all Donatists who should refuse to return to the church, and ordered their bishops and teachers to be banished.³ The following year additional and more severe laws were enacted against the Donatists, which were usually called [edicta unitatis] Acts of Uniformity.⁴ And as the magistrates were perhaps somewhat remiss in executing these laws, the council of Carthage in the year 407, sent a new deputation to the emperor, by which they requested and obtained the appointment of special executors of these Acts of Uniformity.⁵

2. The weakened party recovered some strength and courage in the year 408, when Stilicho was put to death by order of Honorius;⁶ and still more in the year 409, when Honorius issued a law that no one should be coerced in matters of religion.⁷ But the council of Carthage in the year 410 again sent a deputation to the emperor, and obtained a repeal of this law,⁸ and likewise the appointment of Marcellinus, a tribune and a notary [or imperial secretary] to visit Africa in the year 411, with full power to bring this long and pernicious controversy to a conclusion. Accordingly Marcellinus about the feast of Easter A.D. 411, in that solemn trial which is called a conference, formally examined the cause, and after a three days' hearing of the parties gave sen-excluded from the church by Ambrose. In the Gallic churches love-feasts were prohibited by the council of Orleans, A.D. 541; and as here and there some relics of them appeared in the seventh century, the council in Trullo [A.D. 692, can. seventy-four] was induced to confirm the canon of the Laodicean council, by annexing the penalty of excommunication.—Schl.

¹ That the strictness of the ancient discipline was greatly relaxed admits no question. But that all public testimony against particular offenders, all public penances and public censures were commuted for private confession before priests and for private penances (as Moshelm seems to intimate), is contrary to the voice of history. All public offenders and all such as were proved guilty of gross crimes, were still liable to public censures. But the ancient practice of voluntary confession before the church, of private offences and secret sins, had for some time gone into desuetude. Instead of such confessions before the church, in most places both of the East and the West, these voluntary confessions were made only to a priest in private, and he directed the persons to such a course as he deemed proper. In some churches however in Campania and the vicinity, the practice was for the priests to write down these voluntary disclosures; and if the persons were directed to do penance, their confessions were also read in public. It was to correct this public disclosure of voluntary confessions that Leo I. in the year 460, wrote the epistle to the bishops of Campania, Picenum, and Samnium, to which Moshelm refers. See his works, Epist. cxxx. or in some editions Ep. lxxx. It is cited also in Baronius, Annales, Ann. 459, subfinem. See also Bower's Lives of the Popes, Leo I. vol. ii. p. 124, &c.—Mur. [And Bingham's Origin. Eccles. vol. vi. p. 487, where the substance of Pope Leo's letter is given.—R.

² The documents of this transaction may be found in Mansi, Collectio Concilior. Amplius, tom. iii. p. 1157, and in Harduin's Concilia, tom. i. in Cod. Eccles. African. can. xcii. &c. p. 915, &c. and in Du Pin, Monument. Vet. ad Donat. hist. pertin. p. 216. Compare also Augustine, Ep. xciii. and among the moderns Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iv. p. 192, &c.—Schl.

³ Even before the arrival of the deputies from the council, the emperor had determined vigorously to persecute the Donatists, and to compel them to a union with their opposers; and had issued a law by which the refractory bishops and clergy were to be banished and the laity to be fined. The character of this law may be learned from Augustine, Epist. clxxxv. sec. xxv. &c. and Epist. lxxxviii. sec. vii. The law itself is probably lost. The edict which was issued after the petition of the council is in the Codex Theodos. De Hæret. lib. xxxviii.—Schl.

⁴ These Edicts of Uniformity are mentioned in the Codex Theodos. lib. ii. De Religione, and in the Decree of the council of Carthage A.D. 407, in Cod. Eccles. African. can. xcix. and by Du Pin, p. 220. Gothofredus and Tillemont suppose the before mentioned law (lib. xxxviii. De Hæret.) and lib. iii. Ne bapt. iterand. were included among them.—Schl.

⁵ The documents are found in Du Pin, and the laws in the Codex Theodos. lib. xli. and xliii. De Hæret.—Schl.

⁶ See Augustine, Ep. xcvi. sec. ii. &c. Ep. c. sec. ii. Ep. cv. sec. vi.—Schl.

⁷ This law is in the Codex Theodos. lib. i. De Hæret. and in Du Pin, Monument. p. 224.—Schl.

⁸ See Noris, Hist. Donatist. p. 523.—Schl.

tence in favour of the Catholics.¹ Before this court two hundred and eighty-six Catholic bishops and two hundred and seventy-nine Donatist bishops were assembled. The vanquished Donatists appealed indeed to the emperor, but in vain. The principal actor in all these scenes was the celebrated Augustine, who by his writings, his counsels, and his admonitions, controlled nearly the whole African church and the leading men of the country.²

3. By the conference at Carthage the Donatist party lost a large part of its strength; nor could it ever recover from the shock, notwithstanding the revolutions of the country. Through fear of punishment very many submitted to the will of the emperor and returned to the church. On the contumacious the severest penalties were inflicted, such as fines, banishment, confiscation of goods, and even death upon the more obstinate and seditious.³ Some escaped these penalties by flight, others by concealing themselves, and some by a voluntary death; for the Donatists were much inclined to practice suicide. The Circumcelliones escaped by travelling up and down the province with arms and violence, everywhere venting their rage. To the Donatists their former liberties and repose were indeed restored by the Vandals, who under Genseric their king, invaded Africa in the year 427, and wrested this province from the Romans. But the edicts of the emperors had inflicted such a wound on the sect, that though it revived and grew a little under the Vandals, it could never recover the influence it formerly possessed.⁴

4. The Arians, oppressed and persecuted by the imperial edicts, took refuge among those barbarous nations who gradually overturned the Roman empire in the West, and found among the Goths, Heruli, Suevi, Vandals, and Burgundians, a fixed residence and a quiet retreat. Being now safe they treated the Catholics with the same violence which the Catholics had employed against them and other heretics, and had no hesitation about persecuting the adherents of the Nicene doctrines in a variety of ways. The Vandals who had established their kingdom in Africa surpassed all the rest in cruelty and injustice. At first Genseric their king and then Huneric his son demolished the temples of such Christians as maintained the divinity of the Saviour, sent their bishops into exile, mutilated many of the more firm and decided, and tortured them in various ways;⁵ and they expressly stated that they were authorized to do so by the example of the emperors, who had enacted similar laws against the Donatists in Africa, the Arians, and others who dissented from them in religion.⁶ During this African persecution God himself is said to have confuted the Arians by a great miracle, causing by his almighty power the persons whose tongues had been cut out by order of the tyrants to speak distinctly notwithstanding, and to proclaim the glory and the praises of Christ. The fact itself no one can well deny, for it rests on powerful testimony; but whether there was anything supernatural in it may be questioned.⁷

¹ See Baldwin (who was a lawyer), Hist. Collationis Carthag. subjoined to Optatus Milevitanus, ed. Du Pin, p. 337.—This meeting called by Marcellinus is improperly denominated a conference, or a free discussion; for the Donatists and Catholics did not enter into a disputation in which each party endeavoured to vanquish the other by arguments. It was truly and properly a legal trial, in which Marcellinus as the judge of this ecclesiastical cause appointed by the emperor, after a three days' hearing of the parties, pronounced sentence authoritatively. It appears therefore that no one then once thought of any supreme judge in the church appointed by Christ. These bishops of Africa made application solely to the emperor in this contest.—[For an account of this Conference, the reader may consult with advantage Walsh's Hist. der Ketzer vol. iv. p. 198, &c. As to the sources of knowledge concerning it, see the Gesta Collationis Carthaginæ habit. published in Du Pin's Monumenta apud Hist. Donat. p. 226, &c. in Harduin's Concilii, tom. i. p. 1043, &c.; also Augustine, Breviculus Collationis cum Donatistis, in his Opp. tom. ix. p. 371, &c.—Schl.

² His writings against the Donatists fill the whole ninth volume of his works, according to the Amsterdam impression of the Benedictine edition. His recommendations in the Donatist contest were not always the best. In his epistles to Vincentius and to Boniface he speaks in such a manner about punishing heretics, that he must be regarded as the man whose writings afforded most support to that spirit of persecution, which laid waste the church in after ages more than in his own times. In the contests with the Donatists he seemed often to show himself on the side of those who would pursue mild measures, for he himself made representations to the imperial court against punishing the Donatists with death. Yet these representations are founded, not on correct views respecting toleration, but on the current principle that it is unseemly for Christians to bear a part in the execution of criminals.—Schl.

³ By virtue of the law (Codex Theodos. De Hæreticis, lib. iiii.) all Donatists without distinction and their married women, if they would not unite with the orthodox, were to be fined according to the wealth of each individual. Such as would not be reclaimed by this means were to forfeit all their goods, and such as protected them were liable to the same penalties. Servants and country tenants were to undergo corporeal punishments by their masters and lords, or on the other hand suffer the same pecuniary mulcts. The bishops and all the clergy were to be banished to different places, yet always beyond the province, and all Donatist churches were transferred to the opposite party.—Schl.

⁴ See Witsius, Hist. Donat. cap. viii. sec. ix.—Schl.

⁵ See Victor Vitensis, De Persecutione Vandalicæ, published by Kuhnart in connexion with his own Hist. Persecutionis Vandali. Paris, 1698, 8vo, [and reprinted, Venice, 1732.—Mur.]

⁶ See the edict of king Huneric in Victor Vitensis, lib. iv. cap. ii. p. 64, where much is said on this subject.

⁷ See Kuhnart, Hist. Persecut. Vandali, pt. ii. cap. vii. p. 462, &c. and the recent and acute discussions of some Englishmen respecting this miracle. Bibliothèque Britannique, tome iii. pt. ii. p. 339, &c. tome v. pt. i. p. 171, &c. [Maclean has here a long note in review of the discussions respecting this alleged miracle, by Abadie, Berriman, Chapman, and Dodwell, who defend

5. A new sect, which was the source of lamentable evils to the church, was formed by Nestorius, a Syrian by birth, bishop of Constantinople. He was a pupil of the the miracle; and by an anonymous writer, and Middleton, and Toll, who controvert it. The discussion turned on four points. 1st, The credibility of the testimony; 2d, The degree in which the men were mutilated; 3d, The possibility of speaking with imperfect and even with no tongues; and 4th, The probability that God would work a miracle to decide such a theological dispute. Schlegel's note is more historical, and though long, may be worth inserting entire. Himeric (he says) in the beginning of his reign was very indulgent to the orthodox, and at the request of the emperor Zeno allowed them to choose a bishop of Carthage, on condition that the Arian churches in the Roman empire should be allowed the same privilege. The orthodox did actually choose Eugenius for their bishop (Victor Vitens. De Persecut. Iudæis, lib. II. cap. vii.); but, by the instigation of the Arian bishops, Himeric afterwards changed his course. He forbade any person in a Vandal dress attending the orthodox worship, and in the year 483 he banished to the deserts a great number of their teachers with their adherents, on pretence of a violation of the royal statutes. In the year 484, in February, a formal conference of both parties was appointed, when the orthodox handed in a long confession of their faith, but without gaining a hearing from the Vandal patriarch, Cyrila. After this, Himeric forbade by a severe law all public worship among the orthodox, ordered their books to be burned, caused the 466 bishops who had been called to Carthage to be arrested and banished to different countries, and endeavoured to compel all his subjects to become Arians. At Tysanus in Mauritania most of the inhabitants fled to Spain, because Cyrila determined to force upon them an Arian bishop. Such as stayed behind refused to accept the bishop, and kept up their own separate worship. Himeric therefore caused their tongues to be cut out by the roots, and their right hands to be chopped off; they were able notwithstanding to speak distinctly. Victor expresses himself with so much assurance on this subject, that he says whoever doubts the fact need only go to Constantinople; where he will now meet with a sub-deacon named Reparatus, who although his tongue was cut out nevertheless speaks without any effort, clearly and distinctly, and is on that account in high esteem in the court of the emperor Zeno, and especially with the empress. Aneas of Gaza, a Platonic philosopher, who then lived at Constantinople and was an eyewitness, in his Dialogue on the Resurrection, entitled Theophrastus (p. 81), says he had himself seen these people, and had heard them to his amazement speak distinctly, that he would not trust his ears but ascertained the fact by oral proof, that he made them open their mouths and then found that their tongues were cut out at the roots. Procopius testifies that many of those whose tongues had been cut out, were living at Constantinople in his time, and that they spoke very distinctly. The Count Marcellinus who was chancellor to Justinian and compiled his Chronicle from the records of the judicial courts, says, se vidisse multum quendam, ita natum, post abscisum linguam statim loquentem, refutasse Arianorum hæresin et de fide Christiana verus vocis emississe. Isidorus in his Chronicle testifies also to the fact, as does Evagrius in his Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. iv. See Valerius on these passages, and Sagittarius, De Cruciat. Martyr. p. 296, and Schmidt, Dis. de Elinguatis Mysterium Trinitatis Prædicantibus, in his Decas. Dissert. Hist. Theol. No. vii. Even Justinian himself (Codex Justin. lib. I. tit. xxvii. De Officio Præfecti Pretorio Africae) says, "We have seen venerable men with their tongues cut out from the roots, lamentably describing their sufferings." One must therefore carry historical scepticism quite too far if he would question the reality of the fact. But whether it be not possible that a man should speak distinctly without a tongue, and also whether that which took place in Africa during the persecution was a real miracle or not, are more properly physical than historical questions.—Mur. [See Gibbon's Decline and Fall, cap. xxxvii. and Newman's Essay on the Eccles. Miracles prefixed to his translation of Fleury, p. 200.—R.

celebrated Theodorus of Mopsuestia, a man of eloquence and not without learning, but arrogant and indiscreet. That Christ was truly God and at the same time truly man had been placed beyond all controversy by the decrees of former councils; but as to the mode and the effects of the union of these two natures in Christ, hitherto there had been no discussion among Christians, and nothing had been decided by the councils. The Christian doctors were therefore accustomed to express themselves differently respecting this mystery. Some used expressions which seemed to separate the Son of God from the Son of man too much, and to make out two persons in Christ. Others seemed to confound the Son of God with the Son of man, and to make the divine and human natures in Christ coalesce, and constitute one compound nature. The Syrian and oriental doctors differed in this matter from those of Alexandria and Egypt after the rise of the sect of Apollinaris, who taught that the man Christ was without a proper human soul, and that the divine nature in Christ supplied the place of a rational soul, whence sprang a confounding of the natures. The Syrians therefore, in order to oppose the followers of Apollinaris, carefully distinguished the man from the God in Christ, and used phraseology which might lead to the supposition that they divided the person of Christ into two persons. On the contrary, the Alexandrians and the Egyptians were accustomed to adopt modes of expression which might be charged with favouring Apollinarism, and which seemed to imply a confusion of the two natures. Nestorius being bred in the Syrian schools, and extremely anxious for the extermination of all the sects, and especially that of the Apollinarists, discoursed of the two natures in Christ after the manner of his instructors, and directed his hearers to make a distinction between the Son of God and the Son of man, and carefully to discriminate the actions and sensations of the one from those of the other.¹

¹ A History of Nestorianism was written in French by the Jesuit Doucin, Paris, 1716, 4to. But it is such a one as might be expected from a person who was obliged to rank Cyril among the saints and Nestorius among the heretics. [A better account is given by Walch in his Hist. der Ketz. vol. v. p. 289, &c. to the end of the volume.] The ancient writers on both sides are mentioned by Budeus, Isagoge in Theologiam, tom. II. p. 1084, &c. In what manner the oriental writers relate the matter is stated by Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexand. p. 108, and by Asseman, Biblio. Orient. Vatic. tom. III. pt. II. p. 67, &c. [For the sources of knowledge and a list of the writers on this controversy, see Walch, ubi supra, p. 304, &c.—For testimony to the persecuting spirit of Nestorius, see Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxix. where we are told that on the very day of his installation he thus publicly addressed the emperor: "Give me a country purged of heretics and I will recompense you with

6. The occasion for this controversy was given by Anastasius, a presbyter and the intimate friend of Nestorius. In a public discourse delivered A.D. 428, Anastasius opposed the use of the word Θεοτόκος or mother of God, which was now more frequently applied to the mother of Christ in discussions with the Arians than formerly, and to which the Apollinarists were exceedingly attached; alleging that the holy virgin could only be called Χριστοτόκος, mother of Christ, because God could neither be born nor die, so that only the Son of man was born of Mary. Nestorius approved this discourse of his friend, and in several addresses explained and defended it.¹ Some monks at Constantinople made opposition, maintaining that the son of Mary was God incarnate, and they excited the populace against Nestorius. But some persons were pleased with his discourses, and when they were carried to the monks of Egypt, these were so moved by his arguments that they embraced his opinions, and ceased to denominate Mary the mother of God.²

7. Cyril, a man of a most restless and arrogant spirit, was then bishop of Alexandria, and of course jealous of the increasing power and authority of the Constantinopolitan prelate. On hearing of this controversy he first reprimanded both the monks and Nestorius; but as the latter would not retract, after advising with Celestine the bishop of Rome, Cyril resolved on war, and calling a council at Alexandria A.D. 430, he hurled twelve anathemas at the head of Nestorius, who, finding himself accused of blasphemy against Christ, returned as many anathemas against Cyril, accusing him of the same crime and of Apollinarianism, and of confounding the two natures of Christ.³ This contest between two bishops of the highest rank, and originating rather from the depraved passions of the mind than from a sincere love of truth, was the parent and cause of immense evils.

8. The feelings of the parties being so heaven; aid me to conquer the heretics, and I will aid you to conquer the Persians." And five days after he commenced his work by demolishing the Arian house of worship, and proceeded to persecute the Novatians, the Quartodecimani, and the Macedonians. He was undoubtedly a rash zealot, yet a person of some talents, sincere, and by no means inclined to be a heresiarch. See a general account of him in note 5, p. 185 above. — Mur.

¹ See these discourses of Nestorius in the works of Marius Mercator, tom. ii. p. 5, &c. accompanied with the observations of Garnier. [See also Socrates, Hist. Eccles. lib. vii. cap. xxxii. — Mur.

² Cyril, against Nestorius, lib. i. and in his Epistle to the monks, to Nestorius, and to Celestine. — Schl.

³ See Harduin, Concilia, tom. i. p. 2190. Other anathemas different from the published ones are set forth by Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tome iii. pt. ii. p. 199, &c. See Walch's Hist. der Ketz. vol. v. p. 700, &c. — Von Ein.

exasperated by their reciprocal excommunications and letters that there was no prospect of an amicable termination of the controversy, the emperor, Theodosius II. assembled a council at Ephesus in the year 431, which is accounted the third general council. Cyril, the adversary of Nestorius, presided, and he wished to have the cause examined and decided before John, the bishop of Antioch, and the other bishops of the East should arrive. Nestorius maintained that both circumstances were contrary to equity, and therefore when summoned to trial he refused to appear; but Cyril, pressing the business forward, without a hearing of the cause, and a great part of the bishops being absent, Nestorius, whom the council compare with Judas the betrayer of the Saviour, was condemned as guilty of blasphemy, deprived of his office, and sent into banishment, where he closed his days.⁴ That base artifices and intrigues were very influential in this council, and that Cyril was guided more by his passions than by justice and piety, no wise and good man will readily deny; but the doctrine established by the council, that Christ consists of one divine person, yet of two natures most closely united but not mixed and confounded, has been approved and acknowledged by the great body of Christians.

⁴ Concerning this council the principal work to be consulted is the Variorum Patrum Epistolæ ad Concilium Ephesinum pertinentes, which Chr. Lupus published from some MSS. at Cassino and in the Vatican, Louvain, 1682, 4to. Nestorius was transported to Petra in Arabia, then to Oasis a desert place in Egypt, where he probably died in the year 435 [or rather after A.D. 430]. The accounts of his lamentable death given by Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. i. cap. vii. and by Theodorus Lecter, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. p. 565, are undoubtedly fables deserving no credit. — [On the council of Ephesus, see Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversamm. p. 275, &c.; and Hist. der Ketz. vol. v. p. 452, &c. from which the following account is taken. — The emperor called the council, Nestorius was one of the first who arrived. With him came two imperial ministers of state, one of whom was accompanied by soldiers to protect the council, and was commanded by the emperor to remain with the council. Cyril of Alexandria appeared also attended by a number of Egyptian bishops, who with Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, were of his party. From the western provinces appeared only three deputies from the see of Rome, and one deacon deputed by the bishop of Carthage. Cyril presided, though a party. Nestorius, with the imperial commissioners, made the reasonable request that the opening of the council might be deferred till the arrival of John of Antioch and the other eastern bishops, and also of the Italian and Sicilian members. But neither prayers nor tears nor commands in the name of the emperor, could move the fiery Cyril to delay, although it was affirmed that John and the other eastern bishops were within five days' travel of Ephesus. The council was opened June 22. The imperial commissioner gave his public protest against the proceeding, and then retired. Nestorius was cited three times to appear, but he refused to stand before a court thus illegally sitting, and from which he had so little reason to expect justice. He was therefore on the same day pronounced a heretic by an irregular outcry. The condemnation was not founded on the holy Scriptures but on the writings of the fathers. The next day the decision was communicated to Nestorius, and an account of it was sent to Constantinople, with a letter recommending the immediate choice of a new bishop. Candidianus the imperial commissioner and Nestorius transmitted an account of the whole procedure to the emperor, and the former endeavoured, though in vain, to arrest the irregular proceedings at Ephesus. The arrival of John and the eastern bishops on the 27th of June, made the state of things worse rather than better. They were offended with the council for not waiting for their arrival, and united themselves with a considerable part of the council who opposed the violent measures against Nestorius, and who accused Cyril of many errors. Whether the two parties had afterwards any communication with each other is uncertain. John presided over the dis-

9. To pass by the minor errors which were attributed to Nestorius, he is said to have divided Christ into two persons, and to have held that the divine nature joined itself to the full formed man, and only aided him during his life. But Nestorius himself as long as he lived professed himself utterly opposed to such sentiments,¹ which were never directly stated by him, but only inferred by his adversaries from his rejection of the epithet mother of God, and from some incautious and ambiguous terms which he used. Hence very many, both among the ancients and the moderns, think that he held the same sentiments that the Ephesine fathers did, though he expressed himself in a different manner; and they cast the whole blame of this most destructive contest upon the restless spirit of Cyril, and his malignant disposition towards Nestorius.² Allowing senting party, who met in the house where he lodged, and who in their precipitancy declared Cyril and Memnon to be deposed and to be banished. From this time there were two councils sitting at Ephesus, the one under Cyril and the other under John, as the presidents. The latter was supported by the imperial commissioner. But both committed such extravagances as show that the spirit of meekness did not rest upon these fathers. These intemperate proceedings threatened to kindle a flame in the church, and even to disturb the public peace. The emperor therefore thought it necessary to bring the matter before his court, and to proceed rather upon principles of good policy than of strict justice. He confirmed the decisions of both parties against each other, in regard to Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon, and sent another of his ministers to Ephesus, to expel these three bishops from the city, and to admonish the others to unite and act together. In the mean time the bishops of Cyril's party had held no less than six sessions; in the first three of which the arrival and formal accession of the delegates from Rome to all the proceedings of Cyril against Nestorius, and the making out of an account of this to be sent to the emperor, were the principal transactions. The three subsequent sessions tended farther to widen the breach, as the eastern bishops were publicly excommunicated by the party of Cyril, and a new confession of faith was framed by them. The imperial minister now arrived and put Cyril and Memnon under arrest; but he laboured in vain to unite the fiercely contending parties. Both concluded to send their respective deputies to the court then at Chalcedon. Historians tell us the court people were friendly to Nestorius: If so, it will be difficult to assign the cause of the unexpected revocation by the emperor of his former decree, which deprived Cyril and Memnon of their offices, while he still condemned Nestorius to banishment. The party of Cyril indeed when they found things not proceeding according to their wishes at Ephesus, made every effort to meet the investigation of the case before the imperial court. And their movements were not unsuccessful. The outcry of the more worthless clergy and the monks against Nestorius may have made considerable impression, producing fear of an insurrection if Cyril were punished. Besides, Nestorius fell under the displeasure of Pulcheria, the emperor's sister, who had vast influence over him. And Cyril co-operated by means—always very efficacious in courts—the bribery of the ministers. It is strange that the subsequent ages should have regarded the Ephesine assembly as ranking among councils of the highest order, since in regard to the principal points it decided nothing happily, and what was done was in reality done by the emperor.—Schlegel's abridgment of Walch corrected by the original.—Mus.

¹ See Marius Mercator, Opp. tom. ii. p. 286, ed. Garnier; and fragments of the epistles of Nestorius written a little before his death, in Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. ii. pag. 40, 41.

² Among the moderns Luther first held such sentiments and invighed bitterly against Cyril, De Conciliis, in his Opp. tom. vii. ed. Altenb. pag. 265, 266, 273, &c. He was followed by innumerable others, as Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. [and iv.] article. Nestorius and Rodon; Salig. De Eutychnismo ante Eutychem. p. 200; Schütz, De Vita Chytrici, lib. ii. sec. xxix. pag. 190, 191; Voigt, Biblioth. Historie Hæresiol. tom. i. pt. ii. p. 457; Jablonski, Exercit. de Nestorianismo, Berl. 1720, 8vo. [republished, with two other dissertations on Nestorianism, in To Water's edition of his Opuscula, vol. iv. pages 149—330.—R.]; Thesaurus Epistolicus Crozianus, tom. i. p. 184, &c. tom. iii. p. 175; Jordan, Vie de M. la Croze, p. 231, and many others. What may be alleged against Nestorius is carefully collected by Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic. tom. iii. pt. ii. p. 210, &c. [Walch (Hist. der Ketzer, vol. v. p. 778, &c.) after a careful investigation states the sentiments of Nestorius in the following propositions:—1. The doctrine of three persons in the one divine essence, as stated in the Nicene Creed, is true and certain. 2. In particular, the second Person, the divine Word, is true God, eternally begotten of the Father and of the same essence with him. 3. Yet Christ is not only true God but likewise a complete man—that is, he had a body and a rational soul just as we have. 4. His body he derived from the virgin Mary and in her womb. 5. Nothing therefore is more certain than that Christ possessed two natures, a divine and a human. 6. Yet there are not on this account two persons, two Sons, two Christs, two Lords; but he is one person, one Christ, one Son, one Lord. 7. There was therefore a union between the perfect God, the Word, and the perfect man; and this union may be expressed by various terms, among which συνάφεια [connexion] is the best, but ἔνωσις [union] is not to be rejected. 8. To the question, "What was united?" Nestorius answered, "God and man, the divinity and humanity, the two natures or two substances and hypostases, but not two persons." 9. This union did not consist in this, that the natures ceased to possess their peculiar properties, for the essential difference of the two natures remained without the least change or commixtion. 10. Yet the union was inseparable, so that the Word was never afterwards without the assumed man, nor the man without the Word. 11. The union of the two natures commenced with the existence of the human nature, when he was conceived in the womb of his mother. 12. It is therefore correctly said, the Word became man and was made flesh. 13. It is also correctly said, the Son of God took upon him man. 14. It is easy to state what kind of union Nestorius did not admit, but it cannot be proved that he distinctly believed as bishop John states. 15. To explain the connexion of the two natures of Christ as united in one person, Nestorius said: The Son of God dwells in the man, and the flesh is the temple of God. Yet he explained himself by saying that he did not understand such an indwelling, as the indwelling of God in the faithful and in the prophets. 16. Nestorius called the human nature an instrument by which the Son of God worked, and a garment with which he was clad, and said God carried and bare the man. 17. He also admitted a communion or intercourse of the two natures. 18. And at the same time maintained the so-called personal properties. 19. In respect to the communication of attributes, Nestorius held that in the Scriptures, names are used in reference to our Saviour which indicate the union of the two natures, but not one nature as distinct from the other—names with which we must connect the idea of the entire Christ, e.g.

these to judge correctly, still Nestorius must be pronounced guilty of two faults; first, that he was disposed rashly and with offence to many, to abolish the use of a harmless term¹ which had been long cur-

Immanuel, Christ, Jesus, Son, Only begotten, Lord &c. Nestorius admitted that the Scriptures attribute to Christ both divine and human attributes and acts; and he states this rule for interpreting them: Every attribute and act which the Scriptures ascribe to Christ, must be understood indeed of the one person, yet not of both his natures; but the sublime and God-befitting must be referred to the divine nature, and the inferior to the human nature. 21. In the writings of Nestorius important passages occur relating to expressions which denote the participation or communication of attributes and which are indicative of his real sentiments on the subject. They may be divided into two classes. To the first class belong the expressions by which the properties and changes of the human nature are referred to Christ in his divine nature, or (according to the customary phraseology of those times) to the Word that was God. The first expression is that of being born. It is undeniable that Nestorius (though not likewise his friends, a few only excepted) rejected the use of the term, mother of God, as also the expression, Mary bore the Deity, or what was born of Mary was God. Yet it is equally undeniable that Nestorius did not reject the term, mother of God, nor indeed the other expressions utterly and perseveringly, except under the limitation being so and so understood; otherwise he acknowledged and professed the correctness and harmlessness of them. 22. The next expression is, the sufferings, the death and burial of Christ. Nestorius did not deny that it was God, or man in union with God, i.e. one Christ, that was crucified, suffered, died, and was buried. But he did deny that Christ, in so far as he was God, was the subject of these changes, because he was in his divine nature unchangeable, and incapable of suffering and dying. 23. The third expression is resurrection. On this, his views were the same as on the preceding. As he had borrowed the word temple from John ii. 19, &c. he insisted that Christ there distinguishes the temple from him who raises it up. Yet this distinction he would understand, to imply not a division of persons, but only a difference of natures. 24. To the second class belong such as relate to the doctrine of a communication of the properties of the divine nature to the human. And here Nestorius did not deny that the man Christ possessed divine properties, but only that he possessed them of himself and not by virtue of the union. 25. He conceded that to Christ as to his human nature, the divine names and titles were pertinent, but with the limitation again, not of himself, but on account of the union. 26. He admitted that to the man Christ divine worship belonged; but again, not for his own sake, but on account of the union. 27. The species of communication of attributes which our theologians call apotelesmatic (attributing the mediatorial acts of the Redeemer in his official capacity, either to the complex person or to either of his natures indiscriminately) Nestorius fully recognised; and it is not true that he regarded the work of redemption as the work solely of the human nature. 28. Hence it follows that Nestorius understood well and expressed distinctly, the unity of the person of Christ, and also the diversity and union of the two natures, with its consequences; yet that he was always anxious for excluding the use of such expressions as obscured and rendered undiscernible the distinction of the two natures. Hence, when he spoke of Christ, he preferred using a name expressive of his complex person. Thus he would rather say Χριστὸς Θεός, mother of Christ, than say Θεός, mother of God; or if the latter could not be avoided, he would add something to qualify it, as mother of the God-Man.—Walch is one who thinks the whole controversy between Nestorius and his accusers was a mere dispute about words and phrases. But Hofmann, in a dispute at Wittenberg, A.D. 1725, maintained that the Nestorian controversy was not mere logomachy.—Schl.

¹ The title, mother of God, applied to the virgin Mary, is not perhaps so innocent as Mosheim takes it rent; and secondly, that he presumed to express and explain, by unsuitable phrases and comparisons, a mystery which exceeds all human comprehension. If to these faults he added the excessive vanity and impetuosity of the man, it will be difficult to determine which was the principal cause of this great contest, Cyril or Nestorius.

10. The council of Ephesus was so far from putting an end to these contentions that it rather extinguished all hope of the restoration of harmony. John, bishop of Antioch, and the other eastern prelates whose arrival Cyril would not wait for, assembled at Ephesus, and they issued against Cyril and his friend Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, as severe a sentence as they had issued against Nestorius. Hence a violent and troublesome controversy arose between Cyril and the oriental bishops, who took John of Antioch for their leader. It was indeed partially adjusted in the year 433, when Cyril acceded to a formula of faith prescribed by John, and rejected the use of certain suspicious phrases. Yet the commotions it produced continued long in the East,² and no means could prevent the friends and disciples of Nestorius from spreading his doctrines through various provinces of the East, and everywhere gathering churches which rejected the Ephesine decrees.³ The Persians in particular were averse from any reconciliation with Cyril, and persevered in maintaining that Nestorius was rashly condemned at Ephesus, and that Cyril subverted the distinction between the two natures of Christ. The propagation of the Nestorian doctrines was still more successful after the introduction of those doctrines into the celebrated Persian school, which had for some time flourished at Edessa; for the teachers in this school not only taught Nestorian principles to their pupils, but likewise translated from Greek into Syriac the writings of Nestorius and his master, Theodorus of Mopsuestia, as well as of Diodorus of Tarsus; and spread them throughout Assyria and Persia.⁴

to be. To the judicious and learned it can present no idea at all, and to the ignorant and unwary it may present the most absurd and monstrous notions. The invention and use of such mysterious terms as have no place in Scripture, are undoubtedly pernicious to true religion.—Mact.

² See Salig, De Eutychnismo ante Eutychem, p. 243, &c. [and Walch's Hist. der Ketzer, vol. v. p. 619, &c.—Schl.]

³ The Roman provinces in which Nestorianism most prevailed were the two Syrias, the two Cilicias, Bithynia, Mesia, Thessaly, Isauria, and the second Cappadocia.—Mur.

⁴ See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic., tom. i. p. 351, &c. tom. iii. pt. ii. p. 69; from which with other passages we should correct the account of the early history of Nestorianism given by Renaudot (Liturg. Oriental., tom. ii. p. 99, &c.) and by others.

11. To no one of all its friends is the Nestorian faith more indebted than it is to Barsumas. Ejected from the school of Edessa with his associates, and created in the year 435 bishop of Nisibis, he laboured from the year 440 to the year 485 with incredible assiduity and dexterity, to procure for Nestorianism a permanent establishment in Persia. Maanes, bishop of Ardaschir, was his principal coadjutor. His measures were so successful that all the Nestorians in Chaldea, Persia, Assyria, and the neighbouring countries, deservedly venerate him to this day as their only parent and founder. He persuaded the Persian monarch Pherozes to expel the Christians who adhered to the opinions of the Greek fathers, and not only to admit Nestorians in their place, but to allow them to make the first cities in Persia, Seleucia, and Ctesiphon, their primary seat, which their patriarch or Catholic has occupied down to our times. He also erected the famous school at Nisibis, from which issued those who, in this and the following century, carried the Nestorian doctrines into Egypt, Syria, Arabia, India, Tartary, and even to China.¹

See also Theodorus Lector, Hist. Eccles. lib. II. p. 558. [Some additional materials have been furnished by the researches of Cardinal Mai, towards enabling us to form more correct ideas of the history of this sect. In the tenth and last volume of his valuable collection, he has given in Latin and Syriac the canons of the Nestorian churches, as compiled by Ebediesu, metropolitan of Nisibis and Armenia in the commencement of the 14th century; and at the end of the same volume he has printed, also in Syriac and Latin, the same bishop's Liber Margarite which appears to be a defence of the Nestorian tenets.—R.]

1 All these transactions are well illustrated by the before mentioned Asseman, Biblio. Orient. Clement. tom. iii. pt. II. p. 77, &c. [The Nestorians are not called by this name in the East (for they regard their doctrines as apostolic, and they never had any connexion with the person of Nestorius) but are generally called Chaldaic Christians (because their principal or head church is in the ancient Chaldea), and in some part of the East Indies, St. Thomas Christians, because they suppose they received Christianity from the apostle Thomas.—They constitute a large Christian community which has no connexion with others, have their own forms of worship, their own bishops, and their own ecclesiastical councils. Their church extends through all Asia and exists partly in the Persian, partly in the Turkish, and partly in the Mogul empires. The patriarch resides in a monastery not far from Mosul, and has a great many bishops under him. The enmity of the Persians and afterwards of the Muhammedans and Saracens against the Romans, contributed much to further the spread of this sect; for they received all refugees from the Roman empire, and extended full protection to such Christians as were not tolerated in the Roman provinces, and whom of course they could not suspect of any understanding with the Romans. Ibas, bishop of Edessa, was one of the greatest defenders of Nestorius among the orientals; and on that account his epistle to Marlin, the Persian bishop of Ardaschir, was rejected by some councils; but the chief persons among them were Barsumas and his assistant Maanes. After the death of Barsumas, the archbishop of Seleucia, Babacus became the head of the party, and from this time onward the patriarchs (catholici or jacehici) resided at Seleucia, until under the caliphs Bagdat and Mosul were selected for that purpose. This Babacus held a council in the year 499, in which not only

12. Before this sect became fully formed and established, there was some difference of opinion in it. Some said that the manner in which the two natures in Christ were combined was wholly unknown, but others denied any other connexion than that of will, operation, and dignity.² But this disagreement wholly disappeared from the time that the Nestorian community became duly consolidated; for it was decreed by synods assembled at Seleucia that there were in the Saviour of mankind two persons or ὑποστάσεις, namely a divine, that of the Word, and a human, that of Jesus; yet that both persons constituted but one Aspect, or as they (following Nestorius) expressed it, one Barsopa, that is, πρόσωπον; that this union of the Son of God with the Son of man took place at the moment of conception and would never end, but that it was not a union of natures or persons, but only of will and affection; Christ therefore must be carefully distinguished from God, who dwelt in Christ as in his temple (as Nestorius had said), and that Mary should never be called the mother of God, but only the mother of Christ. They reverence Nestorius as a holy man, and worthy of everlasting remembrance; but they maintain that his doctrine was much more ancient than he, being de-

the whole Persian church professed itself to belong to the Nestorian community, but regulations were also made that all bishops and priests must be married, and second marriages of the clergy were not merely permitted but declared to be necessary. (See Asseman, Biblio. Orient. tom. iii. pt. II. p. 177.) The Nestorians differ from other Christians in the following particulars; that they will not call Mary the mother of God, and wholly reject the expressions, God was crucified and died; that they admit no natural and personal, but only a friendly union of the Word that was God (for so they speak) with the man Jesus; that they teach there are in Christ two natures and two substances, each of which has its own personality; that they reject the council of Ephesus, execrate Cyril as being a wicked wretch, and venerate Nestorius and Theodorus of Mopsuestia as being saints; that they worship no images, and perform their worship, which is very simple, in the Syriac language. Together with baptism, which they generally administer on the fortieth day after the birth, and the Lord's supper, in which they use leavened bread, they make the consecration of priests to be a sacrament. They also practise anointing with oil as a ceremony of worship, and likewise in slight diseases and even in commencing journeys, as a sort of consecration. See Baumgarten's Geschichte der Religionspartheyen, p. 586.—Schl. [Much valuable information on the present condition of the Nestorians in the East, is given in Wolff's Journal; in Grant's Nestorian Christians settled in Ooroomin, Koordistan, &c. Lond. 1841; in Perkins' Residence of Eight Years in Persia among the Nestorian Christians, Andover (U. S.), 1843, 8vo, a very interesting work by an American missionary; and in Wingard's Review of the Present State of the Church of Christ, translated from the Swedish, Lond. 1845, 12mo, p. 56. Since these works were written, the Nestorians have suffered much from the Kurds; and in 1846 numbers are reported to have been massacred in the mountains of Kurdistan.—R.]

² Leontius Byzantinus, Ado. Nestorianos et Eutychnianos; in Canisius, Lectioes Antiq. tom. I. 537, and Basnage, Prolegom. ad Canisium, tom. I. cap. II. p. 19, &c.

rived from the earliest ages of the church, and therefore they do not wish to be called Nestorians. And it appears in fact that Barsumas and his associates did not inculcate on their followers the precise doctrines taught by Nestorius, but they in some measure polished his imperfect system, enlarged it, and connected with it other doctrines which Nestorius never embraced.¹

13. While avoiding the fault of Nestorius many ran into the opposite extreme. The most noted of these was Eutyches, abbot of a certain convent of monks at Constantinople, from whom originated another sect directly opposite to that of Nestorius, but equally troublesome and mischievous to the interests of Christianity; and which, like that, spread with great rapidity throughout the East, and acquired such strength in its progress that it gave immense trouble both to the Nestorians and to the Greeks, and became a great and powerful community. In the year 448 Eutyches now far advanced in years, in order more effectually to put down Nestorius, to whom he was a violent foe, explained the doctrine concerning the person of Christ in the phraseology of the Egyptians, maintaining that there was only one nature in Christ, namely, that of the Word, who became incarnate.² Hence he was supposed to deny the humanity of Jesus Christ, and was accused by Eusebius of Doryleum before a council called by Flavianus perhaps in this very year at Constantinople. And as Eutyches refused to give up his opinions at the bidding of this council, he was cast out of the church and deprived of his office; and not acquiescing in this decree, he appealed to a general council of the whole church.³

14. The emperor Theodosius therefore convoked at Ephesus in the year 449 such a council as Eutyches had requested, and placed at the head of it Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, a man as ambitious and restless as Cyril, and as hostile to the bishop of Constantinople. In this council the business was conducted with the same kind of fairness and justice as by Cyril in the council of Ephesus against Nestorius; for Dioscorus, in whose church nearly the same things were taught as Eutyches had advanced, so artfully managed and controlled the whole of the proceedings, that the doctrine of one nature incarnate was triumphant, and Eutyches was acquitted of all error. On the contrary, Flavianus was severely scourged and banished to Epipa, a city of Lydia, where he soon after died.⁴

¹ On the whole of this Nestorian controversy the student would do well to consult the section (section 88) devoted to this subject, with its valuable references and extracts, in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Davidson's Transl. vol. i. p. 389, &c. He should also compare with it the Roman Catholic view of the same controversy and of the respective tenets of Nestorius and Cyril, as given by a recent historian of that church, Dollinger, History of the Church translated by Cox, vol. ii. p. 148, &c. &c.

² That Cyril had so expressed himself, and had appealed to the authority of Athanasius to justify the phraseology, is beyond controversy. But whether Athanasius actually used such language is doubtful, for many think the book in which it occurs was not a production of Athanasius. See Le Quien, Dic. ii. in Damascenum, p. 31, &c. and Salig, De Eutychianismo ante Eutychen, p. 112, &c. That the Syrians used the same phraseology before Eutyches' times and without offence, is shown by Assemani, Biblia. Orient. tom. i. p. 219.—We are yet in want of a solid and accurate history of the Eutychian troubles, which however Salig left in manuscript. [This has not yet been published, but Walch has given a very elaborate and full history of the Eutychian and Monophysite sects, filling the whole sixth, seventh, and eighth volumes of his Hist. der Ketz. Lips. 1773, 76–78, 8vo, and Schroeckh has treated the subject well in his Kirchengesch. vol. xviii. pages 433–636, Lips. 1793, 8vo.—The points in controversy between Eutyches and his friends on the one part and their antagonists on the other, during the first period of the contest or till the council of Chalcedon in 451, according to Walch (ubi supra, vol. vi. pages 611–619) were in amount as follows. Both held alike—1., the perfect correctness of the Nicene Creed. And of course, 2, both held the doctrine of a trinity of persons in the Godhead; 3, that God, the Word, was made flesh; 4, that Christ was truly God and truly man united; and 5, that after the union of the two natures he was one person. But Eutyches maintained, 6, that the two natures of Christ after the union did not remain two distinct natures, but constituted one nature; and therefore, 7, that it was correct to say Christ was constituted of or from two natures, but not that he existed in two natures. For 8, the union of the two natures was such that, although neither of them was lost or was essentially changed, yet together they constituted one nature, of which compound nature and not of either of the original natures alone, must thenceforth be predicated each and every property of both natures. He accordingly denied, 9, that it is correct to say of Christ that, as to his human nature, he was ὁμοιωτός (of the same nature) with us. It is to be remembered that Eutyches was solicitous chiefly to confute Nestorius, who kept the two natures almost entirely distinct, and seemed to deny any other union than that of purpose and co-operation; and in particular he disliked all phrases which predicated the acts and sufferings of the human nature, of the divine nature; and to enable him to overturn this error he so blended the two natures that they could not afterwards be distinguished.—Mur.

³ This was an occasional council assembled for other purposes, before which Eusebius appeared and accused Eutyches. The council peremptorily required him to give up his opinions, and on his refusal proceeded at once to excommunicate him. See the Acts of this council in Harduin's Concilia, tom. ii. p. 70, &c. See also Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. vi. pages 108–158.—Mur.

⁴ See Harduin, Concilia, tom. i. p. 82, &c.; Libellatus, Breviarium, cap. xii. p. 76; Leo Magn. Epist. xlii. p. 625; Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. lib. xiv. cap. xlvii. p. 550, &c. [Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversamm. p. 301, &c. and Hist. der Ketz. vol. vi. pages 175–264; Bower's Lives of the Popes (Leo), vol. ii. pages 42–48, 4to.] The aged emperor Theodosius II. was managed by the Eutychians, and therefore he called such a council as would accomplish their wishes. In the council, Eutyches offered a confession of faith which did not touch the point in debate, and this was accepted without allowing his accusers to be heard. His acclamation the doctrine of two natures in the incarnate Word was condemned. Dioscorus then proposed to condemn Flavianus and Eusebius. Here opposition was made, and Dioscorus called on the imperial commissioners, who threw open the doors of the church; a band of soldiers and an armed mob rushed in. The terrified bishops no longer resisted. Every member (in

The Greeks call this Ephesine council σύνδοον ληστερικὴν, an Assembly of robbers, to signify that everything was carried in it by fraud and violence. This name indeed would be equally applicable to many councils of this and the subsequent times.

15. But the scene changed soon after. Flavianus and his adherents engaged Leo the Great, the Roman pontiff, on their side—a course which was commonly taken in that age by those who were foiled by their enemies—and also represented to the emperor that an affair of such magnitude demanded a general council to settle it. Theodosius however could not be persuaded to grant the request of Leo, and call such a council; but on his death Marcian, his successor, summoned a new council at Chalcedon in the year 451, which is called the fourth general council.¹ In this very numerous assembly the legates of Leo the Great (who had already publicly condemned the doctrine of Eutyches, in his famous Epistle to Flavianus) were exceedingly active and influential. Dioscorus therefore was condemned, deposed, and banished to Paphlagonia, the Acts of the Ephesine council were rescinded, the Epistle of Leo was received as a rule of faith, Eutyches, who had already been divested of his clerical dignity and exiled by the emperor, was condemned though absent, and not to mention the other decrees of the council, all Christians were required to believe, what most to this day do believe, that in Jesus Christ there is but one person yet two distinct natures no way confounded or mixed.²

16. This remedy, which was intended to heal the wounds of the church, was worse than the disease; for a great part of the Oriental and Egyptian doctors, though holding various sentiments in other respects, agreed in a vigorous opposition to this council of Chalcedon and to the Epistle of Leo the Great, which the council had adopted, and contended earnestly for one nature in Christ. Hence arose most deplorable discords and civil wars almost exceeding credibility. In Egypt the excited populace, after the death of the emperor Marcian [A.D. 457] murdered Proterius, the successor of Dioscorus, and appointed in his place Timotheus Ælurus, a defender of the doctrine of one incarnate nature. And although Ælurus was expelled from his office by the emperor Leo, yet under the [second succeeding] emperor, Basiliscus, he recovered it. After his death [A.D. 476] the friends of the council of Chalcedon elected Timotheus, surnamed Salophaciolus, and the advocates for one nature chose Peter Moggus. But Salophaciolus being dead, in the year 482 Moggus, by order of the emperor Zeno and by the influence of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, obtained full possession of the see of Alexandria, and John Talaia, whom the Chalcedonians had elected, was removed.³

all one hundred and forty-nine) signed the decrees. Flavianus was deposed and banished. Eusebius of Doryleum, Theodoret of Cyrrus, Domnus of Antioch, and several others were also deposed. The decisions of this council were ratified by the emperor, and ordered to be everywhere enforced.—Mur.

¹ This is the last of the four great œcumenical councils, whose determinations on the fundamental doctrines of the Trinity and the person of Christ are universally received, not merely by the Greek and Roman churches, but by Protestant churches, on the ground of their being consonant with Scripture. Hooker in his Eccles. Polity (book v. sec. 54) has made the following pithy observations on these councils, which distinctly set forth the purport of their respective decisions:—"There are but four things which concur to make complete the whole state of our Lord Jesus Christ—his deity, his manhood, the conjunction of both, and the distinction of the one from the other being joined in one. Four principal heresies there are which have in those things withstood the truth: Arians, by bending themselves against the deity of Christ; Apollinarians, by maiming and misinterpreting that which belongeth to his human nature; Nestorians, by rending Christ asunder and dividing him into two persons; the followers of Eutyches, by confounding in his person those natures which they should distinguish. Against these there have been four most famous ancient general councils: the council of Nice [325], to define against Arians; against Apollinarians, the council of Constantinople [381]; the council of Ephesus [431], against Nestorians; against Eutychians, the Chalcedon council [451]. In four words—ἀληθώς, τελέως, ἀδιαίρετως, ἀσυγχύτως, truly, perfectly, indivisibly, distinctly; the first applied to his being God; and the second to his being man; the third to his being of both, one; and the fourth to his still continuing in that one, both."
—R.

² See the Acts of this council in all the Collections of Councils; e.g. Harduin, tom. ii. p. 1, &c. See also Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. ii. iv.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. pages 482–487; Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversamm. pages 307–314; and Hist. der Ketzerei vol. vi. pages 293–489; Bower, Lives of the Popes (Leo I.), vol. ii. pages 56–100, 4to; Münscher, Dogmengesch. iv. 96; Gieseler's Text-book by Cunningham i. 240. The exposition of faith in the 5th action of this council, was designed to guard against both Eutychian and Nestorian errors. After recognising the Nicene and Constantinopolitan creeds, with Leo's letter to Flavianus, &c. they say:—"Following therefore these holy fathers, we unitedly declare that one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, is to be acknowledged as being perfect in his Godhead and perfect in his humanity; truly God and truly man with a rational soul and body, of like essence (ὁμοούσιος) with the Father as to his Godhead, and of like essence (ὁμοούσιος) with us as to his manhood; in all things like us, sin excepted; begotten (γεννηθεῖς) of the Father from all eternity as to his Godhead; and of Mary the mother of God (θεοτόκος) in these last days, for us and for our salvation as to his manhood; recognised as one Christ, Son, Lord, Only-begotten; of two natures, unconfounded, unchanged, undivided, inseparable (ἀσυνχύτως, ἀρίστως, ἀδιαίρετως, ἀχωρίστως); the distinction of natures not all done away by the union, but rather the peculiarity (ἰδιώτης) of each nature preserved, and combining (συντηρυμένης) into one substance (ὑπόστασις); not separated or divided into two persons (πρόσωπα), but one Son, Only-begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ; as the prophets before [taught] concerning him, so be the Lord Jesus Christ hath taught us, and the creed of the fathers hath transmitted to us."—Mur.

³ See Liberatus, Breviarium Hist. cap. xvi. xviii.; Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. viii. lib. iii. cap. iii.; Le Quion, Oriens Christ. tom. ii. p. 410, &c.

17. In Syria the abbot Barsumas (a different person from Barsumas of Nisibis, who established the Nestorian sect) having been condemned by the council of Chalcedon, went about propagating the doctrine of Eutyches. He also spread this doctrine among the neighbouring Armenians about the year 460 by means of his disciple Samuel; yet the Syrians are commonly represented as afterwards giving up this harsher form of the Eutychian doctrine, under the guidance of Zenaïas or Philoxenus, the bishop of Mabug [or Hierapolis], and the famous Peter [the Fuller] Gnapheus in Greek and Fullo in Latin; for these men denied what Eutyches is said to have taught, that the human nature of Christ was absorbed in the divine, and simply inculcated that Christ possessed one nature, which yet was a twofold or compound one. Still, as this doctrine was equally inconsistent with the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, the believers in it most stedfastly rejected that council.¹

18. Peter, who was surnamed the Fuller, because while a monk he pursued the trade of a fuller, got possession of the see of Antioch; and although he was often ejected and condemned on account of his opposition to the council of Chalcedon, yet in the year 482 he obtained a full establishment in it by authority of the emperor Zeno, through the influence of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople.² This man, who was formed to promote discord and controversy, occasioned new contests, and was thought to aim at establishing a new sect called the Theopaschites, because he recommended to the eastern churches an addition to the hymn called Trisagium, by inserting after the words O Holy God, Holy Almighty, Holy Eternal, the clause—who wast crucified for us. He undoubtedly made this addition with sectarian views, intending to establish men more firmly in his favourite doctrine, that of but one nature in Christ. But his adversaries, especially Felix of Rome and others, perverted his meaning, and maintained that he intended to teach that all the three persons in the Godhead were crucified, and therefore such as approved this form of the hymn were called Theopaschites. The consequence of this dispute was, that the western Christians rejected this form of the hymn, which they understood to refer to the whole Trinity, but the oriental Christians continued to use it constantly, even down to modern times, without offence, because they refer the hymn to Christ only, or to but one person in the Trinity.³

19. To settle these manifold dissensions, which exceedingly disquieted both church and state, the emperor Zeno, in the year 482, by the advice of Acacius the bishop of Constantinople, offered to the contending parties that formula of concord which is commonly called his Henoticon. This formula repeated and confirmed all that had been decreed in the councils of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, against the Arians, Nestorians, and Eutychians, but it made no mention of the council of Chalcedon;⁴ for Zeno had been led by Acacius to believe that the opposition of the disaffected was, not to the doctrine of the council of Chalcedon but to the council itself. This formula of concord was subscribed by the leaders of the Monophysite party, Peter Moggus, bishop of Alexandria, and Peter Fullo, bishop of Antioch. It was likewise approved by Acacius of Constanti-

³ See Norris, De uno ex Trinitate carne passo, in his Opp. tom. iii. Diss. i. cap. iii. p. 782; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. i. p. 518, &c. tom. ii. p. 36, 180, &c. [and Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. vii. p. 237, &c. 329, 339, &c.—Mur.]

⁴ Evagrius, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. xiv; Liberatus, Breviarium Hist. cap. xviii. [In both of which the Henoticon is given. Mosheim's description of this famous decree is very imperfect. In it the emperor explicitly recognises the creed of the Nicene and Constantinopolitan councils, as the only established and allowed creed of the church, and declares every person an alien from the true church who would introduce any other. This creed he says was received by that council of Ephesus which condemned Nestorius, whom with Eutyches the emperor pronounces to be heretics. He also acknowledges the twelve chapters of Cyril of Alexandria to be sound and orthodox, and declares Mary to be the mother of God and Jesus Christ to possess two natures, in one of which he was ὁμοούσιος of like substance with the Father, and in the other, ὁμοούσιος with us. Thus he fully recognised the doctrines of the council of Chalcedon, without alluding at all to that body, and affirming that these doctrines were embraced by all members of the true church, he calls upon all Christians to unite on this sole basis, and "anathematizes every person who has thought or thinks otherwise, either now or at any other time, whether at Chalcedon or in any other synod whatever, but more especially the aforesaid persons, Nestorius and Eutyches, and such as embrace their sentiments," and concludes with renewed exhortations to a union on this basis. This formula of union was happily calculated to unite the more moderate of both parties. It required indeed some sacrifice of principle on the part of the Monophysites, or at least of their favourite phraseology; but it also required the dominant party to give up the advantage over their foe which they had obtained by the general council of Chalcedon. In Egypt, the Henoticon was extensively embraced, but the bishops of Rome were opposed to it, and were able to render it generally inefficient.—Mur.] [See a dissertation on this subject, De Henotico Zenonis in Jablonski, Opuscula, Ed. Te Water, vol. iv. p. 332. See also Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, vol. viii. p. 315, &c.—A.]

¹ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 1—10, and his Diss. De Monophysitis prefixed to this volume, p. 2, &c. [According to Walch, the parties were continually coming nearer together in doctrine, so that the theological dispute was sinking fast into a mere logomachy. But several questions of facts or acts of the parties became the subjects of lasting dispute and contention. See Walch's Hist. der Ketz. vol. vi. p. 796, &c. 825—832.—Mur.]

² Valesius, Diss. de Petro Fullone et de Synodo adversus eum collecta, annexed to his Scriptores Histor. Eccles. tom. iii. p. 173, &c.

nople and by all the more moderate of both parties; but the violent on both sides resisted it, and complained that this Henoticon did injustice to the council of Chalcedon.¹ Hence arose new controversies as troublesome as those which preceded.

20. A considerable part of the Monophysites or Eutychians considered Peter Moggus as having committed a great crime by acceding to the Henoticon, and therefore they united in a new party, which was called that of the Acephali, because they were deprived of their head or leader.² Afterwards this sect became divided into three parties, the Anthropomorphites, the Barsanuphites, and the Esianists; and these sects were succeeded in the next age by others, of which the ancients make frequent mention.³ Yet the inquirer into the subject must be informed that some of these Eutychian sects are altogether imaginary, that others differed not in reality but only in terms, and that some were distinguished, not by their sentiments but by some external rites and other outward circumstances. And they were likewise of temporary duration; for in the next century they all became extinct, through the influence especially of Jacobus Baradaeus.⁴

21. The Roman pontiff, Felix III. with his friends attacked Acacius, the bishop of Constantinople, who had favoured the Henoticon, as a betrayer of the truth, and excluded him from church communion. To justify this hostility Felix and his successors taxed Acacius with favouring the Monophysites and their leaders, Peter Moggus and Peter Fullo, with contempt for the council of Chalcedon, and with some other things. But in reality, as many facts demonstrate, Acacius became thus odious to the Roman pontiffs, because he denied by his actions the supremacy of the Roman see, and was extremely eager to extend the jurisdiction and advance the honour of the see of Constantinople. The Greeks defended the character and memory of their bishop against the aspersions of the Romans. This contest was protracted till the following century, when the pertinacity of the Romans triumphed, and caused the names of Acacius and Peter Fullo to be struck out of the sacred registers, and consigned as it were to perpetual infamy.⁵

22. The cause of so great a series of evils appears to be a very small matter. It is said that Eutyches believed that the divine nature of Christ absorbed his human nature, so that Christ consisted of but one nature, and that the divine; yet whether this was the fact or not is not sufficiently clear. This sentiment however together with Eutyches, was abandoned and rejected by the opposers of the council of Chalcedon, who were guided by Xenias and Peter Fullo, and therefore they are more properly called Monophysites than Eutychians; for all who are designated by this name hold that the divine and human natures of Christ were so united as to constitute but one nature, yet without any conversion, confusion, or commixture; and that this doctrine may not be understood differently from their real meaning, they often say there is but one nature in Christ, yet it is twofold and compound.⁶ With Eutyches they disclaimed all connexion, but they venerate Dioscorus, Barsumas, Xenias, and Peter Fullo, as pillars of their sect, and reject the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, together with the epistle of Leo the Great. The doctrine of the Monophysites, if we may judge from the language they used, appears to differ from the doctrine established by the council of Chalcedon, not substantially, but only in the mode of stating it; yet if we attend carefully to the metaphysical arguments

¹ See Facundus Hermianensis, Defensio trium Capitulum, lib. xii. cap. iv.

² Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xiii.; Leontius Byrant, De Sectis, in Canisius, Lectio. Antiq. tom. i. p. 537; Timotheus Presbyter, in Coteller's Museum Eccles. Græc. tom. iii. p. 409. [From the time of the council of Chalcedon the Eutychians gradually receded from the peculiar views of Eutyches, and therefore discarded the name of Eutychians and assumed the more appropriate one of Monophysites, which indicated their distinguishing tenet, that the two natures of Christ were so united as to constitute but one nature. The whole party therefore having long renounced Eutyches as their leader, when some of them also renounced Peter Moggus, they were indeed Acephali, without a head. Yet all the branches of this sect continued to bear the name of Monophysites till late in the sixth century, when Jacobus Baradaeus raised them up from extreme depression through persecution, and they assumed the name of Jacobites, a name which they bear to this day.—Mur.]

³ These sects are enumerated by Basnage, Prolegom. ad Camisii Lektion. Antiq. cap. iii. and Asseman, Diss. de Monophysitis, p. 7, &c.

⁴ For an account of Jacobus Baradaeus and his labours in resuscitating the fallen sect of the Monophysites, see Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. viii. pages 481—491.—Mur.

⁵ Valesius, Diss. de Synodis Romanis in quibus damnatus est Acacius, subjoined to the third volume of his Scriptores Hist. Eccles. p. 179, &c.; Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. p. 301, 380, 381, &c.; Nouveau Diction. Hist. Crit. tome i. art. Acacius, p. 75, &c.; Blondell, De la Primauté d'ont l'Eglise, p. 279, &c.; Acta Synodorum, tom. iii. Februario, p. 502, &c. [Bower's Lives of the Popes (Felix III.) vol. ii. p. 198, &c. 4to.—Mur.]

⁶ See the quotations from works of Monophysites, by that excellent and at times sufficiently ingenious writer, Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 25, 26, 29, 34, 117, 133, 135, 277, 297, &c.

⁷ Many learned men consider this controversy as a mere strife about words. Among the Monophysites Gregory Abulpharajus, the most learned of the sect, was of this opinion. Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 291. Add the Biblioth. Itaque, tom. xvii. p. 285; La Croze, Hist. du Christianisme des Indes, p. 23; and Hist. du Christ. d'Ethiopie, p. 14, &c. Even Asseman (ubi supra, p. 297), though living at Rome, came near to avowing this opinion.

and subtleties by which they supported their views,¹ perhaps we shall conclude that their controversy with the Chalcedonians was not wholly a strife about words.

23. Other troubles from the West invaded the church in this century, and continued down through subsequent ages. Pelagius² and Cælestius,³ the former a Briton and the latter an Irishman, both monks living at Rome and in high reputation for their virtues and piety, conceived that the doctrines of Christians concerning the innate depravity of man and the necessity of internal divine grace in order to the illumination and renovation of the soul, tended to discourage human efforts, and were a great impediment to the progress of holiness, and of course ought to be rooted out of the church. They therefore taught that what was commonly inculcated and believed, respecting a corruption of the human nature derived to us from our first parents, was not true; that the parents of the human race sinned only for themselves and not for their posterity; that men are now born as pure and innocent as Adam was when God created him; that men therefore can, by their natural power, renovate themselves and reach the highest degree of holiness; and that external grace is indeed needful to excite men to efforts, but that they have no need of any internal divine grace.⁴ These

¹ See the subtle disputation of Abulpharajus in Asseman, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 288.

² Pelagius, the heresiarch, was probably a Welchman whose real name it is said was Morgan or Marigena, which was translated Ηελεγιος, Pelagius. He was a British monk, went to Rome about the year 400, imbibed the opinions of Origen, and began to publish his heretical sentiments concerning original sin and free grace about A.D. 405. In the year 408, when the Goths were laying waste Italy, he and Cælestius retired to Sicily, and in 411 to Africa. Cælestius remained there, but Pelagius proceeded on to Egypt to visit the monks of that country. In 415 he removed to Palestine, where he enjoyed the protection of John, bishop of Jerusalem. Orosius (now in the East) impeached him, but he so far purged himself before the council of Diospolis in 417, as to be acquitted. But the next year he was condemned by the councils of Carthage and Milevi, as well as by the popes Innocent and Zosimus, and the emperor Honorius ordered him and his adherents to be expelled from Rome. Theodotus of Antioch now held a council which condemned him. His subsequent history is unknown.—He was a man of distinguished genius, learning, and sanctity, yet he was accused of dissembling as to his real sentiments. He wrote Commentaries on Paul's Epistles (perhaps the work published among those of Jerome and ascribed to that father); also an Epistle to Demetrius, De Virginitate, A.D. 413 (falsely ascribed both to Jerome and to Augustine, and published as theirs); a Confession of his Faith, addressed to Innocent, bishop of Rome A.D. 417. His last works are De Fide Trinitatis, Liber eulogionum sive Testimoniorum (Collections from Scripture in support of some doctrines); De Libero Arbitrio, De Natura, and several Epistles. See Cave's Hist. Liter. l. p. 381, &c.—Mur. [See Wiggers, Versuch einer pragmatischen Darstellung des August. und Pelagian. Berlin, 1821, translated with additions by Professor Emerson, Andover (U. S.), 1840.—R.]

³ Cælestius, of honourable birth, was a student at Rome when Pelagius arrived there. Embracing the views of his fellow islander, he accompanied him to Sicily in 408, and to Africa in 411, where he remained some years. In 412 he was accused before the bishop of Carthage for heresy, and condemned by a council there. He appealed to the bishop of Rome, but went to Ephesus, where he became a presbyter. He now disseminated his errors widely in Asia and the islands. In 416 he went to Constantinople, and the next year to Rome, when he so far satisfied Zosimus as to obtain from him a recommendation to the bishops of Africa to restore him. But in 418 he was condemned by a synod at Rome, and was banished from the empire by the emperor. He now concealed himself in the East. In 429 the emperor forbade his coming to Constantinople. In 430 a synod at Rome condemned him, and also the council of Ephesus in 431. From that time we hear no more of him. He wrote a confession of his faith, several Epistles, and some short pieces; but none of his works have reached us entire, except his Confession of faith and perhaps some Epistles among those of Jerome. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 384, &c. Mur. [That Cælestius was an Irishman is evident from Jerome (Prolog. ad lib. prim. et tert. Comment. in Jerem.) who calls him a Scot, which in the language of that century means a native of Ireland. This is also the opinion of Ussher (Brit. Ecc. Primordia, p. 208, 786) Norris (Hist. Pelag. lib. i. cap. iii.) and Jerome's editor, Martianay (Note ubi supra).—R.]

⁴ According to Walch (Hist. der Ketzler, vol. iv. p. 735, &c.) as abridged by Schlegel, the system of Pelagius was as follows. 1. Men as they now come into the world are, in respect to their powers and abilities, in the same state in which Adam was created. 2. Adam sinned, but his sinning harmed no one but himself. 3. Human nature therefore is not changed by the fall, and death is not a punishment for sin; but Adam would have died had he not apostatized. For death is inseparable from our nature, and the same is true of the pains of child-birth, diseases, and outward evils, particularly in children. 4. Much less is the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to his offspring, for God would be unjust if he imputed to us the actions of others. 5. Such imputation cannot be proved by the fact that Christ has redeemed infants; for this redemption is to be understood of their heirship to the kingdom of heaven, from which an heirship to another's guilt will not follow. 6. Neither does the baptism of infants prove such an imputation: for they thereby obtain the kingdom of heaven, which Christ has promised only to baptized persons. 7. When children die without baptism they are not therefore damned. They are indeed excluded from the kingdom of heaven, but not from eternal blessedness. For the Pelagians held to a threefold state after death; damnation for sinners, the kingdom of heaven for baptized Christians who live a holy life and for baptized children, and eternal life for unbaptized children and for unbaptized adults who live virtuous lives. 8. Much less is human nature depraved in consequence of the fall of Adam. There is therefore no hereditary sin. 9. For though it may be granted that Adam is so far the author of sin, as he was the first that sinned and by his example has seduced others, yet this is not to be understood of a propagation of sin by generation. 10. This supposed propagation of sin is the less admissible, because it would imply a propagation of souls, which is not true. 11. Neither can such a propagation be maintained without impeaching the justice of God, introducing unconditional necessity, and destroying our freedom. 12. It is true there are in men sinful propensities, in particular the propensity for sexual intercourse, but these are not sins. 13. If sin was propagated by natural generation, and every motion of the sinful propensities and every desire therefore were sinful, then the marriage state would be sinful. 14. As man has ability to sin, so has he also not only ability to discern what is good, but likewise power to desire it and to perform it. And this is the freedom of the will, which is so essential to man that he cannot lose it. 15. The grace which the Scriptures represent as the source of morally good actions in man, Pelagius understood to denote various things. For he understood the word (a) of the whole constitution of our nature and especially of the endowment of free will; (b) of the promulgation of the divine law; (c) of the forgiveness of past sins without any influence on the future conduct; (d) of the doctrines and those connected with them the above-mentioned monks secretly disseminated at Rome; but in the year 410, on account of the invasion of the Goths, they retired from Rome, and going first to Sicily and thence to Africa they more openly advanced their opinions. From Africa Pelagius went to Egypt, but Cælestius continued at Carthage, and solicited a place among the presbyters of that city; but his novel opinions being detected, he was condemned in a council at Carthage A.D. 412, and leaving the country he went to Asia. From this time Augustine, the famous bishop of Hippo, began to assail with his pen the doctrines of Pelagius and Cælestius, and to him chiefly belongs the praise of suppressing this sect at its very birth.¹

example of Christ's holy life, which he called the grace of Christ; (c) of the internal change in the understanding whereby the truth is recognised, which he called grace and also the assistance of the Holy Spirit; (f) and sometimes grace with him was equivalent to baptism and blessedness. 16. Man is as capable of securing salvation by the proper use of his powers, as of drawing on himself damnation by the misuse of them. 17. And therefore God has given men a law, and this law prescribes nothing impossible. 18. God requires from men a perfect personal obedience to his law. 19. Actions originating from ignorance or forgetfulness are not sinful. 20. So also natural propensities or the craving of things sinful is not of itself sinful. 21. Therefore perfect personal obedience to the law on the part of men is practicable, through the uncorruptness of the powers of nature. 22. And by grace (consisting in external divine aids, the right use of which depends on men's free will) good works are performed. They did not deny all internal change in men by grace, but they confined it solely to the understanding, and converted all internal change of the will. They also limited the necessity of this grace by maintaining that it was not indispensable to all men, and that it only facilitated the keeping of God's commandments. 23. This possibility of performing good works by the free use of our natural powers they endeavoured to prove, by the existence of virtuous persons among the pagans; and likewise—24. From the saints mentioned in the Old Testament, whom they divided into two classes—the first from Adam to Moses, who like the pagans had only natural grace; the second, from Moses to Christ who had the grace of the law. Some of the saints who had the law were all their lifetime without sin, others sinned indeed, but being converted they ceased to sin and yielded a perfect obedience to the law. 25. The grace whereby perfect obedience becomes possible, is a consequence of precedent good works; 26, and such obedience is absolutely necessary to salvation. 27. Sins originating from a misuse of human freedom and continued by imitation and by custom were forgiven, under the Old Testament solely on account of good works, and under the New Testament through the grace of Christ. 28. Their idea of the way of salvation then was this: A man who has sinned converts himself—that is, he leaves off sinning and this by his own powers. He believes on Christ—that is, he embraces his doctrines. He is now baptized, and on account of this baptism all his previous sins are forgiven him, and he is without sin. He has the instructions and the example of Christ, whereby he is placed in a condition to render perfect obedience to the divine law. This he can do if he will, and he can either withstand all temptations or fall from grace. 29. Moreover they admitted conditional decrees, the condition of which was either foreseen good works or foreseen sin.—Mur.

¹ The history of the Pelagians has been written by many persons; as by Abp. Ussher, in his Ecclesiastical Britan. Primordia; Joh. a Laet, a Netherlander; Vossius; Noris; Garnier, in his Supplement to the works of Theodoret; Jansen, in his Augustinus, and others.

24. Pelagius was more fortunate in the East; for under the patronage of John, bishop of Jerusalem, who considered the doctrines of Pelagius as concurring with the opinions of Origen, to which John was attached, Pelagius freely professed his sentiments and gathered disciples. And although he was impeached in the year 415 by Orosius, a Spanish presbyter, whom Augustine had sent into Palestine, yet a convention of bishops at Jerusalem dismissed him without censure, and a little after, in a council held at Diospolis in Palestine, he was entirely acquitted of crime and error.²

The French Jesuit De Longueval left a MS. Historia Pelagiana. See his Preface to the ninth vol. of his History of the Gallican Church, p. iv. But among so many writers, no one yet has exhausted the whole subject or shown himself free from undue partiality. [This partiality is to be attributed to the renewal of these controversies. In all ages there have been some in the Christian church who coincided either wholly or partially with Pelagius, and who opposed the doctrine of Augustine. On the other hand, the scholastics adopted the greatest part of Augustine's sentiments, and these two parties have never been at rest. The affair with Gottschalms and the contests between the Thomists and the Scotists kept up these dissimilitudes; and in the times of the reformation, the commotions were increased when Luther and Erasmus came upon the Arena, and the council of Trent made a considerable part of the Pelagian system to be articles of faith. From that period onward the Protestants have maintained that the Catholic church holds, not what Augustine taught but what Pelagius, or at least the semi-Pelagians inculcated; and the Catholic doctors endeavour to maintain the contrary. The Dominicans and the Jesuits and also the Jesuits and Jansenists, have likewise stirred up controversies within their own church respecting Pelagianism and the opinions of Augustine; and among the Protestants, the charge of Pelagianism has been brought against the Arminians and against various individual doctors. No wonder therefore if all these learned writers of the Pelagian history are often betrayed into errors by the prejudices of their party.—Schl.] [Walsh's account is full and candid, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. iv. pages 510—546, and for the semi-Pelagians, vol. v. pages 3—328. Minscher's statement of the opinions of the different parties is lucid and well vouched, Dogmengeschichte, vol. iv. pages 122—262.—Mur.] [The following works ought also to be carefully consulted in reference to this important controversy:—Milner's Hist. of the Church, cent. v. chap. liii. and iv.; Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. the whole of the section 87 with its accompanying notes and quotations; Davidson's Transl. vol. i. p. 373, &c.; Hagenbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmengeschichte, Buchs transl. (in Clark's For. Theol. Libr.) vol. i. p. 295, &c.; and more especially Wiggner's Veruch einer pragmatischen Darstellung d. August. u. Pelagian. translated by Prof. Emerson, which may be said to exhaust the subject. The same learned German published in 1823 a similar work on semi-Pelagianism, which has not yet been translated into English.—R.]

² See Daniel, Hist. du Concile de Diospolis among the shorter works of this eloquent and learned Jesuit, published, Paris, 1724, 3 vols. 4to in tom. i. pages 635—671. [Our whole information respecting these councils is derived from the opposers of Pelagius, Orosius, Augustine, &c. The first was held at Jerusalem in the month of July, 415. It was merely an assemblage of presbyters, with bishop John for president. Pelagius and the council spoke Greek, but Orosius the accuser, Latin only. This gave great advantage to Pelagius. Orosius stated what had been done in Africa; Pelagius said he had no concern with those councils. Orosius was called upon to make his charges specific against Pelagius. He then stated that he had heard Pelagius affirm, that a man may become sinless if he will, and that it is an easy thing to obey the law of God perfectly. Pelagius explained that he meant it should be under-

The controversy being removed to Rome, Zosimus (who was made pontiff in the year 417), misled partly by the ambiguous and apparently sound confession of faith which Cœlestius, then residing at Rome offered, and partly by the flattering and insidious letters and protestations of Pelagius, pronounced sentence in favour of these monks, and decided that wrong had been done to these men of correct sentiments by their adversaries.¹ But the Africans, led on by Augustine, continued perseveringly to assail them with councils, books, and letters. Zosimus therefore being better informed changed his opinion, and severely condemned those whom he had before extolled. Afterwards, that Ephesine council which hurled its thunders against Nestorius also condemned them; and now the Gauls, the Britons, and the Palestinians, by their councils, and the emperors, by their laws and penalties, crushed the sect in its commencement.²

25. These unhappy contests produced, as is often the case, other dissensions equally hurtful. As Augustine did not at first state with sufficient uniformity and clearness his opinions respecting the divine grace necessary to salvation, and the decrees of God in regard to the future condition of individual men, he gave occasion to certain monks of Adrumetum and to some persons in Gaul to believe, that God had predestinated the wicked not only to suffer eternal punishment, but also to commit sin and incur the guilt which will merit that punishment, and of course to believe, that both the good and the sinful actions of men were, from all eternity, divinely predetermined and fixed by an inevitable necessity. These persons were called Predestinarians. Yet this doctrine did not spread far, for Augustine more clearly explained his views, and the councils of Arles and Lyons publicly rejected it.³ There are, however, very learned men who deny that such a sect of Predestinarians ever had existence, and who maintain that the followers of Augustine inculcated his doctrines truly and correctly, and were slanderously reproached by the semi-Pelagians with such serious errors as these.⁴

³ See Sirmond, Hist. Prædestinatio, tom. iv. of his Opp. p. 271, &c.; Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome ii. liv. xii. chap. ii. p. 698; Petavius, Dogmat. Theol. tom. vi. p. 168, 174, &c. [According to Mûnscher, Dogmengeschichte, vol. iv. p. 164, &c. 215, &c. all the fathers before Augustine taught a conditional election, that is, an election founded on the foreseen good works of men. So Basil the Great, Gregory Nyssen, Chrysostom, Hilary of Poitiers, Ambrose, Jerome. They likewise held that Christ died for all men, and were strangers to the idea of an atonement made only for the elect. So Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nyssen, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Jerome. They also held that the saints may and do fall from grace and perish. So Cyril of Jerusalem, Athanasius, and Hilary. Even Augustine himself, in the earlier part of his ministry, held election to be conditional. But as early as the year 397, he discovered that such an election was inconsistent with man's entire dependence on grace for ability to perform good works, a doctrine which he held most firmly. He therefore advanced the new theory that God's electing some to everlasting life, depended upon his mere good pleasure in view of reasons known only to himself; that God from eternity predestinated some to repentance, faith, good works, and ultimately to salvation, while others he left to go on in sin and perish everlastingly; that the number of the elect is fixed unalterably and for ever; that this election of some to salvation through grace, while others are left without grace and perish in their sins, is no injustice on the part of God, because all men deserve to be left in their sins. He denied that God really wills the salvation of all men, and he justified preaching the Gospel to all, on the ground that we know not who are elected and who are not. When this theory was advanced by Augustine it met with opposition, and it was not always stated as guardedly by those who embraced it as it was by its author. Hence those opposed to it drew the frightful picture of it, which has been called Predestinarianism. This system as stated by Mûnscher (ubi supra, p. 257) embraced the following positions—namely, that the wicked are predestinated not only to punishment but also to commit sin, that baptism does not remove all sin, that the godliness of the righteous does not profit them, nor will the wicked be damned on account of their sins, that in general God will not judge men according to their deeds, that it is useless to address exhortations either to saints or sinners. Mûnscher subjoins: All these were consequences drawn from the doctrine of unconditional decrees taught by Augustine, but they were consequences which he expressly rejected.—Mur.

⁴ See Mauguin, Fabula Prædestinatio Confutata, which he subjoined to his Collect. var. Scripturum. qui Sec. ix. de prædestinatione et gratia scripserunt, tom. ii. p. 447, &c. Paris, 1650, 4to. [Mauguin was a French statesman, who with much theological and historical learning maintained with the Jansenists against the Jesuits, that there never were any Predestinarians.—Schl.] Spanheim, Introduc. ad Hist. Eccles. in his Opp. tom. i. p. 993; Basnage, Adnot. ad Prosperi Chronicon, and Præfat. ad Faustum Regiensem; Canisius, Lectio. Antig. tom. i. p. 315, 348. The author of the Life of Launoi in his Works, tom. iv. pa. ii. p. 343—namely, Granet, informs us that Sirmond encouraged Launoi to undertake a refutation of Mauguin; but Launoi having examined the subject fell in with the opinions of Mauguin. [Father Sirmond was a champion against the Jesuits, who were charged by the Jansenists with departing from the opinions of Augustine; and he hoped to confute this charge if he could only demonstrate, incontrovertibly, that there really was a sect of Predestinarians existing in the times of Augustine. Sirmond had published an ancient book stopped, with the aids of divine grace. The council were satisfied with this explanation. The second council which sat at Diospolis or Lydda in December 415, was composed of fourteen bishops. The accusers were two Gallic bishops, Heros and Lazarus, but neither of them present. They sent in a long list of errors, which they said Pelagius and his followers had taught. Pelagius replied that these were not his opinions, that he anatomized them, and that he believed what the Catholic church had always held. With this the council were satisfied. But the sentence of the Africans still remained in force, and therefore Pelagius and Cœlestius both sought the interference of the bishop of Rome.—Mur.

¹ See Frick, Zosimus in Clemente XI. redivivus, Ulm, 1719, 4to [and Bower, Lives of the Popes (Zosimus), vol. i. p. 334, &c. 4to.—Mur.

² See Vossius, Hist. Pelagiana, lib. i. cap. iv. p. 133. There are also some learned remarks on this controversy in the Bibliothèque Italique, tome v. p. 74, &c. The writers on both sides are enumerated by Buddeus, Jaçoge ad Theol. tom. ii. p. 1071. Wall has likewise given a neat and learned though imperfect history of the Pelagian contest, in his History of Infant Baptism, vol. i. chap. xiii. [pages 192—282, ed. Lond. 1705] which his learned translator [into Latin, J. L. Schlosser] has enriched with excellent remarks.

26. On the other hand, John Cassianus, a monk who came to Marseilles in France from the East and established a monastery there, and certain others about the year 430, endeavoured to modify in some measure the system of Augustine.¹ Many persons falling in with their views, a sect arose, which its adversaries have called that of the semi-Pelagians. The sentiments of the semi-Pelagians are represented differently by those who oppose them. The greater part however represent them as holding that men do not need internal, preventing grace, but that every man by his natural powers can commence the renovation of his soul, and can have and exercise faith in Christ and a purpose of living a holy life; yet that no man can persevere in the course thus commenced unless he is constantly supported by divine assistance and grace. The disciples of S. Augustine in Gaul contended warmly with this class of men, but they could not vanquish them;²

at Paris, 1643, bearing the title Prædestinatus sine Prædestinatorum Hæresi, et libri S. Augustini temera adscripti refutatio. The work consists of three books. The first contains a list of heresies, of which that of the Predestinarians is the nineteenth. The second book bears the superscription, Liber secundus, sub nomine Augustini confectus, novagesimum hæresin continens, quæ assertit, Dei prædestinatione peccata committi. The third book contains a refutation of the supposed tract of Augustine. This work is certainly ancient, and most probably to be ascribed to the younger Arnobius. But the credibility of its statements is much impaired by the fact, that its author was a semi-Pelagian and wrote more as a polemic than as a historian. — Schl.] This petty dispute, whether there was in ancient times a sect of Predestinarians, when thoroughly examined will perhaps turn out to be a contest about terms. [To the question, whether there existed in the fifth and sixth centuries a sect of Predestinarians, some of the learned have answered yes, and others no. Those who answer in the latter manner believe the sect of Predestinarians was a fiction of the semi-Pelagians, who used this name in order to bring odium on Augustine and his followers. This opinion was embraced by the Jansenists, the Reformed, and among the Lutherans by Semler in his History of religious doctrines, prefixed to the third volume of Baungarten's Polemic Theology. Those who answer the question affirmatively are divisible into two classes. They admit directly that there were Predestinarians, who were condemned by the orthodox church; yet they deny that Augustine taught what they admit to have been the errors of this sect. Of this opinion were the Jesuits and the early Lutheran divines.] Others while they admit all this, add that the opposers of the sect were principally semi-Pelagians, who aimed at bringing contempt on Augustinian doctrine. They hold that only a few individual persons, as a few monks of Adrumetum and Lucidus fell into these errors; and therefore they never constituted a distinct sect or heretical community. This opinion has been defended by Noris and Graveson among the Catholics, by the two Basnages among the Reformed, and in the Lutheran church by Pfaff, Budeus, the elder Walch, and Bernhold in a disputation at Altdorf, 1737; and it is admitted by the younger Walch in his Hist. der Ketzer. vol. v. p. 280, &c. Among those who regard the whole question respecting the existence of a Predestinarian sect as a contest about words, besides Mosheim, may be reckoned Weismann, in his Memorabil. Hist. Eccl. tom. i. p. 410, &c. And in fact there is something like a contest about words, in the dispute whether there was really a Predestinarian sect. For very much depends on the definition of the word sect or heresy. If the term is used to denote a society of persons who have a particular mode of worship, then a Predestinarian sect never had existence. But if the term denote a set of religious opinions, embraced and defended by individual persons here and there, but who never separated from the general church; then it may be said there was a sect of Predestinarians. When we view the controversy in all its extent, we can by no means regard it as a controversy about words. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. v. pages 218—288. — Schl.

¹ The views of Cassian are exhibited in his Collatio xlii. Patrum, Opp. p. 491, &c. and are well abridged by Mûnscher (Dogmengesch. vol. 4v. p. 246, &c.) as follows. As Cassian is the only writer of those times who has exhibited a connected view of the doctrines of the so-called Massilians, from his works alone can the deviations of these teachers from the opinions of Augustine be derived. His primary object was to exhibit the true worth and the necessity of divine grace, but without overthrowing the freedom of the human will. Man, said he, needs at all times divine aid, and he can do nothing to secure his salvation without it. But he must not be inactive on his part. All men have indeed original sin, and are subject to death, but a knowledge of God and their free will they have not lost. It can neither be maintained that the commencement of what is good in us always originates from God, nor that it always originates from ourselves. Sometimes it is of God, who first excites good thoughts and purposes in us. But sometimes it is the man who takes the first step, and whom God then meets with his assistance. In either case, it is God who, when he sees the spark of goodness glimmering in the soul, or has himself lighted it up by his own working, cherishes and sustains this spark. God's unchangeable will is that all men may be saved, and when any one is lost, it is contrary to his designs. At all times therefore the grace of God is co-operating with our will, and strengthens and defends it, yet so that he sometimes waits for, or requires from us some efforts to choose what is good, that he may not seem to confer his gifts on the indolent and inactive. The grace of God however is always unmerited, as it bestows on the weak and worthless efforts of men such valuable favours and such unfading glory. The ways in which God brings men to possess goodness are manifold and incomprehensible; but he always treats each individual according to his character and desert. Yet this is not to be understood as if grace was imparted to each one according to his merits. On the contrary, the grace of God far transcends all human deserts and sometimes transcends the unbelief of men (i.e. brings the unbelieving to have faith). From these propositions (which are arranged differently from what they are by the author but are expressed in almost his own words) it appears that Cassian rejected unconditional election, the inability of man to do good, irresistible grace, and the Augustinian idea of the saints' perseverance. Mûnscher adds that the principal point in which the Massilians departed from Augustine's adherents lay in this, that man has in his freedom of will some power to do good, by exerting which he does not indeed merit the grace of God, yet he makes himself fit to receive it; and that God in view of these human efforts has determined to bestow his grace and eternal bliss. The evidence by which the Massilians supported their opinions was various. Their chief argument was this, that in the Scriptures faith and virtue are sometimes required of men, and sometimes represented as the gift of God; and these different passages cannot be reconciled unless it be allowed that faith and virtue come principally from God, and yet that free will has some part in them. This doctrine moreover they said coincided with the standing belief of the church; while the opposite doctrine was new and also objectionable, because it annihilated human freedom, introduced an unavoidable necessity in human actions, and by holding up the idea that a man's own efforts were of no avail, encouraged men to remain inactive. — Mur.

² Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome ii. liv. xii. chap. i.; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome ii. pref. p. ix. &c.; Vossius, Hist. Pelagiana, lib. vi. p. 538, &c.; Irenæus Veronensis, i.e. Scipio Maffei, De Hæresi Semipelagiana, in the Opusculi Scientifici of Angelo Calogera, tom. xxix. p. 399, &c. [As soon as Augustine was informed by Prosper and Hilary of the existence of

for as their doctrines coincided with the modes of thinking of the majority of people, and particularly of the monks, and were approved by the most respectable authors, especially among the Greeks; and as Augustine himself and his friends did not venture utterly to reject and condemn them as pernicious and impious, no efforts could prevent them from spreading far and wide.

27. From this time therefore commenced those knotty controversies concerning the nature and the mode of that divine agency or grace which men need in order to salvation, which have unhappily divided Christians in every subsequent age, and which are still protracted to the grief of all pious and good men. Many in all ages have followed the system of Augustine, who ascribed everything to the grace of God, and nothing to human sufficiency; yet they differed in the manner in which they explained this system. But a still greater number have agreed with Cassian, whose system, though differently explained, has spread from the schools of the Gallic monks over all the nations of Europe. The Greeks and the other orientals held the same views with Cassian, nor have they departed from them to this day. The opinions of Pelagius appeared to most persons too bold and loose, and therefore were never openly avowed by large numbers. Yet in every age some may be found who ascribed to man, as it is said Pelagius did, full power by his own strength to keep the whole law of God.

these opposers of his system at Marseilles, he wrote his two pieces designed to confute them, De Prædestinatione Sanctorum, and De Dono Perseverantie, both addressed to Prosper and Hilary. Soon afterwards A.D. 430 Augustine died, and Prosper and Hilary carried on the controversy. In 431 they visited Rome and obtained the patronage of Celestine the pontiff; but not succeeding by means of councils and popes, Prosper applied himself to writing against the errorists. His strictures on Cassian's 13th Collation is a valuable performance. The work De Vocazione Gentium (i.e. on the universality of the call to embrace the Gospel salvation), seems not to be his, for it does not come up fully to his views as expressed in his reply to Cassian. Though it concedes more to the semi-Pelagians than Augustine and Prosper did, still it was on the same side. The majority in France as well as nearly all the Greeks were in sentiment with the semi-Pelagians. About the year 472 one Lucidus, a presbyter, having avowed pure Augustinianism, Faustus, bishop of Reiz in Gaul, wrote him a letter, and afterwards accused him before the council of Arles, A.D. 475. The council disapproved the sentiments of Lucidus, who retracted; and they encouraged Faustus to write his two books, De Libero Arbitrio, in opposition to Augustine's views. A few months after, a synod at Lyons also decided in favour of semi-Pelagian sentiments. But early in the following century Caesarius of Arles came out a zealous Augustinian, and with the aid of some Scythian monks and some others, he caused that doctrine to spread and to gain the ascendancy. The synods of Orange and Valence, A.D. 529, declared in favour of it. The opposers of Augustinianism were in that age denominated Pelagians, from their leaning towards the sentiments of Pelagius; also Massilians, from the residence of their principal writers at (Massilia) Marseilles. It was the school-men of after ages who denominated them semi-Pelagians. According to Walch, they admitted original sin, but probably confined its effects to our liability to temporal death. They supposed all the posterity of Adam have ability to discern what is right, and freedom of will to choose it; yet that none can be saved but by grace through Christ, by means of his blood and a Christian baptism; that Christ died for all men; that God wills the salvation of all, and therefore proffers his grace to all, so that all men may be saved if they will. The way of salvation they suppose is to believe, to practise virtue, and to persevere in it to the end. Faith is believing that God has determined to save all that obey the gospel. This faith originates altogether from our free will. From the same source, and from the use of our natural powers, originate the beginnings of a right temper, the desiring, seeking, and knocking. Yet neither this faith nor these beginnings of a right temper are good works, that is, they have no proper efficacy to merit the assistance of God, or that grace which is necessary to the performance of good works, and yet they may induce God to impart his grace. Thus it is God who gives the grace by which faith is strengthened and good works performed, yet its due influence must be allowed to free will, and not everything be ascribed to grace. The connexion and co-operation of both are very necessary, for grace only helps or assists. True faith may be lost, its retention depends solely on man's free will, and it is not true that divine grace imparts to man a special gift of perseverance in goodness. God has a twofold decree respecting man's salvation; first, his general desire that all may be saved, and secondly, his design actually to save those who shall persevere in holiness to the end. Augustine's doctrine of predestination is very objectionable; it wholly subverts man's freedom, makes God the author of sin, and renders it vain to exhort sinners to repent or salute to persevere in religion. Election to salvation is conditional, depending on the foreseen conduct of men in regard to obedience to the divine commands. To the puzzling question of their opposers, what becomes of so many baptized children who die before they are competent to exert their free will, and of so many adults who never were favoured with a knowledge of the Gospel; they replied, first, that baptized children dying in infancy are saved, on the ground that God foresaw they would persevere in religion if their lives had been prolonged; and secondly, that so many children as die without baptism are deprived of that ordinance, and so many adults as are deprived of a knowledge of the Gospel (both being doomed to damnation) suffer these privations, because God foresaw that the former would not live virtuously, and that the latter would not embrace the Gospel if they had an opportunity. See Walch's ample account of this religious party in his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. v. pages 3-218.—Mur.

CENTURY SIXTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. It is evident from the historical records of the Greek empire, that several barbarous tribes, particularly some residing near the Black Sea, were converted to Christianity by the efforts of the Greek emperors and the bishops of Constantinople. Among these were the Abasgi, a barbarous nation inhabiting the shores of the Euxine Sea and as far as Mount Caucasus, who embraced Christianity under the emperor Justinian.¹ The Heruli who dwelt along the other side of the Ister [or Danube], became Christians under the same reign;² also the Alani, the Lazi, and the Zani, and some other tribes, whose residence is not definitely known at the present day.³ But there is abundant evidence that nothing was required of these nations except externally to profess Christ, cease from offering victims to their gods, and learn to repeat certain forms like a charm; the imbuing of their minds with religion and piety was not even thought of. It is certain that after their conversion they retained their rude and savage manners, and were famous for rapines, murders, and every species of iniquity. In most provinces of the Greek empire and even in the city of Constantinople, many idolaters were still lurking in concealment. A great multitude of these were baptized during the reign of Justin, by John, bishop of Asia.⁴

¹ Procopius, De Bello Gothico, lib. iv. cap. iii. „Le Quien, Orient Christianus, tom. i. p. 1351, &c. [Their adoration (like that of the ancient Germans) had been previously given to forests and lofty trees. The emperor Justinian sent priests among them, and erected a church for them dedicated to the Virgin Mary; and he rendered the people more inclined to become Christians, by prohibiting their king from carrying on a shameful traffic in eunuchs. See Procopius, ubi supra, Neander, Kirchengesch., vol. ii. part i. p. 247.—Mur.

² Procopius, ubi supra, lib. ii. cap. xiv.

³ See Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xx. xxii. xxiii. All these conversions took place near the commencement of the reign of Justinian, about A.D. 430.—Mur.

2. In the West, Remigius bishop of Rheims, who has been called the Apostle of the Gauls, laboured with great zeal to convert idolaters to Christ; and not without success, especially after Clovis, the king of the Franks, had embraced Christianity.⁵ In Britain, Ethelbert king of Kent, the most distinguished of the seven Anglo-Saxon kings among whom the island was then divided, married near the close of this century a Christian wife named Bertha, the daughter of Cherebert, king of Paris; and she, partly by her own influence and partly by that of the ministers of religion whom she brought with her, impressed her husband favourably towards Christianity. The king being thus prepared, Gregory the Great, at the suggestion undoubtedly of the queen, sent forty Benedictine monks, with one Augustine at their head, into Britain in the year 596, to complete the work which the queen had begun. This Augustine, with the queen's assistance, converted the king and the greatest part of the inhabitants of Kent to Christian worship, and laid the foundation of the modern British church.⁶ Among the Picts and

⁴ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. tom. ii. p. 85.

⁵ Ibid. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 155, &c.

⁶ Bede, Hist. Eccles. Gentis Anglor. lib. i. cap. xxiii. p. 55, &c. ed. Chiffet.; Rapin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome i. p. 222, &c. Acta Sanctor. tom. iii. Februar. p. 470, where is an account of Ethelbert, king of Kent. [The marriage of Bertha is said to have been consummated A.D. 579. It had been stipulated that she should enjoy her own religion and worship. She therefore had her private chaplain and a small church. Gregory the Great, before he was made pope, was so captivated with the beauty of some English youth offered for sale at Rome as slaves, that he wished to go himself as a missionary to England; but the Roman people restrained him. He was created pontiff in 590; and in 596, persuaded Augustine, abbot of St. Andrews at Rome, to undertake the conversion of the English nation. Augustine with a small retinue of monks set forward; but he scarcely reached France before the courage of the whole party failed, and Augustine returned to obtain leave to abandon the enterprise. Gregory however would not give it up; he exhorted Augustine to proceed, assigned him more assistants, gave him letters of introduction to bishops and princes on the way, and dismissed him. Augustine now proceeded through France, crossed the Channel, and landed with his forty monks on the Isle of Thanet in Kent. There king Ethelbert met him, learned his object, gave him access to the country, promised him protection and sustenance, but refused to embrace the new religion till after further examination. Augustine and twelve monks marched to Canterbury the capital, with a waving banner and a silver crucifix, chanting: "O Lord, we beseech thee, in thy great mercy, to remove thy fury and thy wrath from this city, and from thine house, for we have sinned: hallelujah." For a considerable time Augustine and his monks worshipped in the queen's chapel; and fasted and prayed, and chanted hymns almost constantly. The next year, A.D. 597, the king had his mind made up, was baptized, and allowed, but did not compel any of his subjects to follow his example. In a short time however all Kent was nominally Christian. Having been so successful, Augustine this year went to Gaul, and was ordained archbishop of Canterbury and primate of all England; and returned with a fresh accession of monks. In the year 598, he sent two monks, Laurentius and Peter, to Rome, to inform Gregory of the prosperous state of the mission. Gregory exulted in its success, and sent back the messengers with additional labourers, the pall for the new archbishop, numerous presents for the cathedral, including holy relics, letters to the king and queen, &c. He confirmed Augustine's jurisdiction over all England, exhorted him to proceed with his work, advised him not to demolish the pagan temples, but to convert them into churches, purifying them with holy water; for the pagans would love to worship in the places long held sacred, yet the idols must be destroyed. He also advised that the people be allowed on festival days to assemble around the churches, erect booths, and there feast themselves, much as during their pagan state; yet without sacrificing to their idols. Gregory likewise answered several questions of Augustine, advising him and his associates to continue to live in monasteries, to use such a liturgy as should seem best suited to the country, and instructing him how thieves should be treated, how many bishops must concur in the ordination of a bishop, how he must demean himself among the Gallic bishops, and what was to be thought of some ceremonial impurities. In 602, Augustine built his cathedral at Canterbury, and he erected a monastery in which to train men for the ministry. In the year 604, he attempted to bring under his jurisdiction and to a conformity with his churches, all the clergy and churches of the ancient Britons, whom the Saxons had conquered and driven chiefly into Wales. A council was held for the purpose. But as Augustine was quite bigotted and somewhat overbearing, nothing was effected. In the mean time, the conversion of the Saxons beyond the kingdom of Kent proceeded successfully; and several bishops were ordained, particularly a bishop for London and another for Rochester. St. Paul's church in London was now founded, and the next year the West monastery (Westminster), adjoining London. In the year 607, Augustine died, and was succeeded in the see of Canterbury by Laurentius. See Bede, Hist. Eccles. Brit. lib. i. cap. xxiii. &c. and lib. ii. cap. iii. Mabillon, Annal. Benedict. tom. i. ann. 596—607. The legendary history of Augustine both in a larger and a smaller form by Goscelin, a monk of the eleventh century, may be found in Mabillon, Acta. Sanctior. Ord. Bened. tom. i. p. 485—543. —Mur. [In addition to the earlier church histories of Stillingfleet, (Origin. Britan. 1685, fol.) and Collier (Eccles. Hist. of Great Britain, 1708—14, 2 vols. fol.) and the general histories of England, the modern works on the introduction of Christianity among the Anglo-Saxons are, Lingard's Hist. and Antiq. of the Anglo-Saxon Church, Newcastle, 1806, third ed. Lond. 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, presenting the Roman Catholic view; and Soames's Anglo-Saxon Church, Lond. 1835, furnishing the Church of England view of this event. More important than either is Lappenberg's account in his excellent work translated and enlarged by Mr. Thorpe, entitled Hist. of England under the Anglo-Saxon kings, Lond. 1845, 2 vols. 8vo, vol. i. p. 131, &c. The student would do well to read attentively Milner's account of the same transactions, taken from a different point of view than any of the preceding, in his Hist. of the Church of Christ, century vi. chap. vii. in vol. iii. p. 69.—R.

Scots, Columba, an Irish monk, began the

work of administering Christian baptism.¹ In Germany, the Bohemians, the Thuringians, and Bavarians, are said to have received Christianity;² which to many however appears extremely doubtful. Of these holy enterprises among the heathen, no one will form a high opinion, when he shall have learned from the writers of this and the following centuries, that these nations still retained a great part of their former paganism, and they so worshipped Christ as to reject his instructions by their lives, their deeds, and their allowed practices.³

¹ Bede, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. iv. p. 134. [Some rays of light had penetrated the southernmost counties of Scotland at an earlier period. Ninian was bishop of Whithorn [or Candida Casa], on the borders of Scotland, in the year 400; and his successors sometimes extended their labours as far north as Glasgow. Indeed Kentigern is said to have actually removed his chair from Whithorn to Glasgow before the arrival of Columba, and to have invited this Irish missionary to visit him there. It was in the year 563, that Columba, with twelve other monks, removed from the north of Ireland to Iona, Illi, I. or I-colunkill, an islet on the outer shore of Mull, one of the larger of the Hebrides or Western Isles. The Scottish king of Argyle, Brude, or Brìde, favoured his enterprise; and Aidan, a successor of Brude, paid him the highest reverence. Columba had the sole jurisdiction of his little island, which became covered with cloisters and churches, and was the residence of a numerous and learned body of monks. For several centuries Iona was the centre of the Scottish church, and the place where most of her clergy were educated. There also the Scottish kings for many generations were interred. Columba died in the year 597. His memorable acts were recorded by Cummenius Albus (abbot of Iona from 657 to 669), and may be seen in Mabillon, Acta Sanctior. Ord. Benedict. tom. i. p. 342, &c. and his life at large, was written by Adamnanus, who presided at Iona from 679 to 704. See Ussher, Britan. Eccles. Primordia, cap. xv. p. 687—709.—Mur. [For the best account of the introduction of Christianity into Scotland, see Chalmers's Caledonia, v. i. p. 314, &c. Columba, the apostle of the Northern Picts, must not be confounded with Columbanus, another Irish monk of the latter part of the sixth century, the founder of the celebrated monastery of Bobbio in the Apennines, mentioned in part ii. chap. ii. page 221, below. The lives of Columba, referred to in the preceding part of this note, are quite worthless in a historical point of view; they contain nothing but a provoking detail of alleged prophecies and miracles which none but the most credulous can receive as true. Other lives of this devoted missionary are given by Colgan in his Trias Thaumaturga, 1647, and a digest of these has been given by the late Dr. Smith of Campbellton in his Life of St. Columba, Edin. 1788, 8vo. No work of Columba is extant, if we except a few hymns in Latin and Irish preserved by Colgan, two or three of which are translated in Smith's Life. But it is very singular that there are still preserved in Ireland, a copy of the Gospels and another of the Psalms said to be in his own hand-writing. The former is known by the name of the book of Durrow in the library of Trinity College, Dublin; and the latter is called the Cattach, in the possession of the Royal Irish Academy. The copy of the gospels called the book of Kells, is believed by some to be also in the hand-writing of Columba.—R.

² Canisius, Lectiones Antiquae, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 208. Aventinus, Annal. Boiorum, and others.

³ As to the Franks, the Benedictine monks express themselves ingeniously, Histoire Littéraire de la France, tome iii. introd. p. 8, ii. 13. As to the Anglo-Saxons, see what Gregory the Great himself allowed of, Epistol. lib. ix. ep. 76. Opp. tom. ii. p. 1176, ed. Benedict. Among other things, he permitted the people on festival days to offer to the saints such victims as they had before offered to their gods. Wilkins, Concilii Magna Britan. tom. i. p. 18, &c.

3. A great many Jews in various places undoubtedly made a profession of Christianity. In the East, Justinian persuaded the Jews resident at Borium, a city of Libya, to acknowledge Christ.¹ In the West, many Jews yielded to the zeal and efforts of the kings of Gaul and Spain, and to those of Gregory the Great and Avitus [bishop of Clermont]. But it should be added, that far more were induced to make an external profession of Christianity by the rewards offered by the princes, and by the fear of punishment, than by the force of argument. In Gaul, during the reign of Childeric, the Jews were compelled to receive baptism; and the same thing was done in Spain.² But Gregory the Great wished this practice to be discontinued.³

4. If full credit could be given to the writers of this age, this conversion of barbarous nations to Christianity must be ascribed principally to prodigies and miracles. But a knowledge of the converted nations will forbid our believing these statements; for had these nations seen so many wonderful deeds with their own eyes, they would have had a stronger faith in Christianity, and would have more religiously obeyed its precepts. With the majority, the example and influence of their kings presented the chief argument for changing their religion. Nor were more solid reasons much needed; for the first preachers of Christianity among them required of them nothing very difficult, or very repugnant to their inclinations; they were only to worship the images of Christ and of holy men, instead of those of their gods, and for the most part with the same ceremonies; and to commit to memory certain Christian formulas. Some preachers moreover, as might easily be proved, deemed it lawful and right to delude the senses of the ignorant people, and to palm on them natural events for divine interpositions.

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSE EVENTS AND OCCURRENCES.

1. ALTHOUGH the imperial laws ordained that no public office should be held by any one who would not abjure paganism, yet there were many learned and respectable men who followed the old religion in the midst of the Christians. The illustrious compiler of the Civil Law, Tribonianus,⁴ is thought by some to have been averse from the Christian religion. Of Procopius,⁵ the celebrated and intelligent historian, the same suspicion is entertained by not a few. And it is still more certain, that Agathias⁶ of Smyrna, an advocate at the bar and also a historian, was an idolator. Indeed, as is commonly the case everywhere, the rigour of the laws fell only on those who had neither birth, nor wealth, nor the favour of the great to protect them.

2. It is still more strange that the Platonists, who were universally known to be hostile to Christianity, should have been allowed publicly to instil their principles, which were totally inconsistent with our

⁴ Tribonianus was a native of Side in Pamphylia, flourished about A.D. 530, and died about A.D. 546. Richly furnished with Greek and Roman literature, he applied himself especially to the study of law. He was advanced to various civil offices, and was in high favour with Justinian, on account of his eminent talents and his obsequiousness. The Codex Justinianus was the joint work of Tribonianus and others; but the compilation of the Pandects and Institutes was committed to him as chief, with others to assist him. Tribonianus was avaricious and irreligious. He had been accused of atheism and paganism. The truth probably was, that he had no fixed religious principles. See Hermann, Hist. Juris Romani et Justiniani, lib. ii. cap. i. sec. 27, &c. and Gibbon, Decline and Fall, chap. xlv. — Mur. [Vol. viii. p. 42, &c. Milman's Edition. — R.]

⁵ Procopius of Cæsarea (different from Procopius of Gaza), was a rhetorician, senator, and historian. He was secretary to the famous general Belisarius from 533 to 542, during his campaigns in Asia, Africa, and Italy; and afterwards being made a Roman senator, resided at Constantinople, and devoted himself to writing the civil history of his own times; viz. De Bello Persico, De Bello Fandatico, and De Bello Gothico. His narration is elaborate and exact, and the style not unacceptable. He also wrote De Edificiis Justiniani, in which he displays the munificence and greatness of that emperor; likewise, Anecdota sive Historia Arcana, in which he describes the vices and crimes of Justinian and his empress Theodora. Procopius was alive in the year 562. Some accuse him of leaning towards paganism. He was probably a man of no religion, but externally a conformist to Christianity. His works were published, Greek and Latin, by Maitre, Paris, 1662. 2 vols. fol. See Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 510. — Mur.

⁶ Agathias, an advocate at Smyrna, continued the history of Procopius from the year 553 to A.D. 559, written in an essay but florid style. He also wrote eighty epigrams. His works were published, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1660, fol. His history and that of Procopius are both in the Corpus Historia Byzantina Scriptorum. See Lardner, Works, vol. ix. p. 85. — Mur. [See his life in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. i. p. 62. The writer considers him a Christian. — R.]

¹ Procopius, de Edificiis Justiniani, lib. vi. cap. 2.

² Gregory of Tours, Hist. Francorum, lib. vi. cap. xviii. Launoi, de Feteri More Baptizandi Judeos et Infideles, cap. i. in his Opp. tom. ii. par. ii. p. 700, 704. [All these Jewish conversions were a victory of the Christians which did them little credit. Avitus, for instance, the bishop of Clermont, baptized five hundred Jews. But the circumstances were these: a Jew, having voluntarily received baptism, was proceeding home in the customary white robe, when meeting with some Jews, one of them poured some fetid oil on his white robe. The people soon kindled into a rage, and pulled down the synagogue; and the bishop sent word to the Jews, that they must all submit to be baptized or must quit the place. In this dilemma, five hundred preferred receiving baptism, and the rest removed to Marseilles. See Gregory of Tours, Hist. Francor. lib. v. chap. xi. — Schl.

³ See his Epistles, lib. i. ep. xlvii. in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 541, ed. Benedict. [for the extract from it in Baronius, Innal. ed. ann. 591, tom. viii. pag. 26, 27, ed. Antw. 1600. Gregory commends the intentions of the Gallic bishops, but thinks that as such converts seldom persevered, and therefore exposed themselves to a heavier punishment in the other world than if they had never been baptized, charity to them required that they should not be compelled to receive baptism. — Mur.

religion, into the minds of the youth both in Greece and Egypt. This class of men affected indeed a high degree of moderation, and for the most part so qualified their expressions as to make the pagan idolatry appear not very remote from Christianity. This is evident from the examples of Chalcedius¹ and Alexander of Lycopolis.² Yet there were some among them who did not hesitate openly to attack the Christian religion. Damascius in his life of his master Isidore and elsewhere, casts many reproaches on the Christians.³ Simplicius in his Expositions of Aristotle not obscurely carps at the Christian faith.⁴ The Epicheiremata xviii. contra Christianos, written by Proclus,⁵ were in everybody's hands, and therefore received a confutation from John Philoponus.⁶ So much licence would not have been allowed to these men, had there not been among the magistrates many who were Christians in name and outward appearance, rather than in reality.

3. The Christians in some places had occasion even in this century, to complain of the barbarity and cruelty of their enemies. During the greater part of it the Anglo-Saxons, who had seized upon Britain, brought every kind of calamity and suffering upon the former inhabitants of the country who were Christians.⁷ The Huns having made an irruption into Thrace, Greece, and other provinces, during the reign of Justinian treated the Christians with cruelty;⁸ yet they appear to have been influenced not so much by a hatred of Christianity, as by hostility to the Greek empire. A great change in the state of Italy took place about the middle of this century under Justinian I. This emperor by Narses his general overturned the kingdom of the Ostrogoths in that country, after it had stood ninety years, and annexed Italy to his empire. But under the emperor Justin the Lombards, a very warlike German tribe under their King Alboin, and accompanied by some other German people, broke into Italy from Pannonia in the year 568; and having possessed themselves of the whole country, except Rome and Ravenna, founded a new kingdom at Pavia. Under these new lords, who were not only barbarians but averse from Christianity, the Italian Christians for a time endured immense evils and calamities. But their first rage gradually subsided and the Lombards became more civilized. Autharis, their third king, made a profession of Christianity in the year 587, but he embraced the Arian creed. His successor Agilulph, however, was induced by his queen, Theodelinda, to

¹ Concerning the religion of Chalcedius I have spoken in my notes on Cudworth's Intellectual Syst. vol. i. p. 732. [Chalcedius flourished about A. D. 330 and wrote his Latin translation of Plato's Timæus with a Commentary, at the suggestion (as is reported) of Hosius of Corduba. Some make him to have been archdeacon of Carthage. See above, cent. iv. pt. i. chap. i. sec. 18. with note 7, p. 123; and Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 199.—Mur. [This is a brief notice of him by Professor Ramsay in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 679. The question of his being a Christian has been keenly discussed, and learned men have taken different sides. The best account of the controversy may be seen in Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. p. 472–485.—R.]

² The treatise of this philosopher contra Manichæos in Greek, was published by Cornbeis, Auctarium Nonis. Biblioth. Patrum, tom. ii. Concerning his religion, Beausobre has given a critical dissertation, Histoire de Manichée et du Manichéisme, pt. ii. Discours. Prélim. sec. 13, p. 236, &c. [Alexander of Lycopolis in Thebais in Egypt flourished probably about A. D. 350. Fabricius supposes (Biblioth. Gr. tom. v. p. 290), that he was first a pagan and a Manichee, and afterwards a catholic Christian. Cave is of the same opinion (Hist. Lit. tom. ii. de Scriptor. incerta aetate). Beausobre (ubi supra) thinks he was a mere pagan. Lardner (Works, vol. iii. p. 384; vol. vii. p. 349, &c.) thinks he was a Gentile but well acquainted with the Manichees and other Christians; that he had some knowledge of the Old and New Testaments to which he occasionally refers. He speaks with respect of Christ and the Christian philosophy, and appears to have been a learned and candid man.—Mur.]

³ Photius, Bibliotheca, cod. cexlii. p. 1027. [Damascius was a native of Damascus, but studied and taught philosophy both at Athens and Alexandria. From the latter he fled to Persia during the persecution of the pagan philosophers by the emperor Justinian, about the year 530. His subsequent history is unknown. He wrote the lives of Isidorus and others, Commentaries on Plato, and four books on extraordinary events, all of which are lost. Photius calls him ἐκ ἀπορ. διασφύνης, superlatively irreligious (Codex clxxxi.), and gives an epitome of his life of Isidore, Cod. cexlii.—Mur.]

⁴ Simplicius, a native of Cilicia, a disciple of Damascius and an eclectic philosopher, was one of those who fled into Persia about the year 530. He returned a few years after, and wrote commentaries on some of the philosophical and physical works of Aristotle; also a Commentary on the Encheiridion of Epictetus, both edited, Greek and Latin, by Wolf, Leyden, 1640, 4to.—Mur.]

⁵ Proclus was born at Constantinople A. D. 410, studied at Alexandria and at Athens, and became head of the philosophical school in the latter place in the year 450. He died A. D. 485. He was a man of much philosophical reading, a great enthusiast, a bold and whimsical speculator, and a most voluminous writer. His eighteen Arguments against the Christians are so many proofs that the world was eternal. This work with the confutation of John Philoponus was published in Greek, Venice, 1535, fol.; and in Latin, Lyons, 1557, fol.—Mur.]

⁶ See Fabricius, Biblioth. Græ. vol. iii. p. 522, &c. [and Brucker, Historia Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 491, with Hammerger's Zuerlassige Nachrichten, tom. iii. p. 391.—Schl.]

⁷ Ussher, Index Chronolog. Antiq. Eccles. Britan. ad ann. 508, p. 1123 [and still more to the purpose, ad ann. 511, p. 1125, and ad ann. 597, p. 1151, &c. At the beginning of this century the Saxons held only Kent and Sussex, embracing about three counties in the south-east part of England; all the rest of the country was inhabited by Christian Britons. But during this century the Saxons gradually extended their conquests; and before the century closed the Britons were shut up among the mountains of Wales and Cornwall, except a few in Cumberland on the borders of Scotland, or were driven to take refuge beyond seas. Over all the rest of England paganism reigned; the churches were demolished or converted into idolatrous temples, and the public worship of the true God had ceased.—Mur.] [See the works referred to in note 6, p. 214, above.—R.]

⁸ Procopius, de Bello Persico, lib. ii. cap. iv.

abandon the Arian sect, and join the Catholics of the Nicene creed.¹ Chosroes, the king of Persia, exceeded all others in barbarity, for he publicly declared that he would make war, not upon Justinian, but upon the God of the Christians; and he cut off an immense number of Christians by various modes of execution.²

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. EVERY one knows that the irruption of the fierce and barbarous nations into most of the provinces of the west, was extremely prejudicial to literature and to every species of learning. All the liberal arts and sciences would have become wholly extinct, had they not found some feeble protection among the bishops and monks. To most of those churches which are called cathedrals, schools were annexed, in which either the bishop himself or some one appointed by him instructed the youth in the seven liberal arts, as a preparation for the study of the sacred books.³ The monks and nuns were nearly all required by the founders of their houses, to devote some portion of every day to the reading of the works of the ancient fathers of the church, who were supposed to have exhausted the fountains of sacred knowledge.⁴ It was therefore necessary that libraries should be formed in the monasteries, and that books should be multiplied by being transcribed. This labour of transcribing books was generally assigned to the more feeble-bodied monks, who were unable to encounter severe labour. To these establishments we owe the preservation of all the ancient authors which have come down to us, both sacred and profane. Moreover in most of the monasteries schools were opened, in which the abbot or some one of the monks instructed the children and youth who were devoted to a monastic life.⁵

2. But not to mention that many of the bishops and others who had control over the monks were inattentive to their duty, and that others had strong prejudices against learning and science, which they apprehended to be hazardous to piety—a fault commonly attributed to Gregory the Great, bishop of Rome, who it is said wished to have many of the ancient authors committed to the flames⁶—not to mention also that some of the bishops, of set purpose, cultivated ignorance and barbarism, which they confounded with Christian simplicity;⁷ to pass over these considerations, it remains to be stated, that the branches of learning taught in these schools were confined within lon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. i. p. 314, &c. [And yet it is certain that these monkish schools kept aloof from the sources of real learning—I mean the ancient classic authors; and that the best interpreters of Scripture among the fathers, such as Origen and Theodorus of Mopsuestia, were left to moulder in the dust. On the contrary the young monks were occupied with reading and transcribing the most silly fables and legends, by which their understandings and their imaginations were injured past recovery. In the Rule of Isidore it is expressly stated: Libros gratulicam, hæreticorum, legere nefas.—Schl.

⁶ Liron, Singularitatis Histor. et Littér. tome i. p. 166, &c. [That Gregory was opposed to all secular learning appears incontrovertibly from his conduct towards Desiderius, bishop of Vienne. This bishop was a man of great merit, virtues, and learning. But he instructed some of his friends in grammar and the fine arts, and read with them the pagan poets. Gregory looked upon all this as horrible wickedness; and therefore hesitated about sending him the pall, and reproved him very sharply in an epistle which is still extant. (Gregory, Epist. lib. ix. ep. xlviii.) “Because (says the honest pope who esteemed it no wrong to praise extravagantly the greatest villains and the cruellest murderers) the praises of Christ and those of Jupiter cannot have place in the same mouth. And consider how enormous a crime it is for a bishop to sing! which would be unbecoming even in a religious layman. The more horrible this is in a priest, the more earnestly and faithfully should it be inquired into. If it should hereafter appear clearly that the reports which have reached me are false, and that you do not study vanities and secular literature (nec vos nugis et secularibus literis studere); I shall praise God who has not permitted your heart to be defiled with the blasphemous praises of the horrible ones.” But whether it be true, as John of Salisbury states (De Nugis Curialium, lib. ii. cap. xxvi.; and lib. viii. cap. xix.) that he caused the Palatine or Capitoline library to be burned, or as Antoninus of Florence tells us (see Vossius, De Historicis Latinis, p. 98) that he committed to the flames Livy's History must be considered uncertain, as the witnesses are so modern. Yet it would not be improbable in a man of such flaming zeal against the pagan writers.—Schl.

⁷ Mabillon, Pref. ad Seculum I. [Acta Sanct. Ord. Benedicti], p. xlv.

¹ Paulus Diaconus, De Gestis Longobardorum, lib. ii. cap. ii.; and cap. xxvii. p. 219, 231, ed. Lindenbrog; Muratori, Antiq. Italiae, tom. i. p. 14; tom. ii. p. 297, &c.; and Annales Italici. Giannone, Hist. de Naples, [liv. iv. chap. iii.] tom. i. p. 292, &c.

² Procopius, de Bello Persico, lib. ii. cap. xxvi.

³ Fleury, Discours sur l'Hist. Ecclési. depuis l'an. 600, &c.; sec. 21, &c. in his Hist. Ecclési. tome xlii. p. 56; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. Intro. sec. 32, p. 12, &c.; Oenringius, Antiquit. Acad.-micæ, pages 66—167, ed. Heumann. [Gregory of Tours, lib. vi. cap. xxxvi.—Schl.]

⁴ Benedict of Aniane, Concordia Regularum, lib. ii. p. 55, 64, 75, 77, 80, 100, lib. iii. p. 16—41, &c. ed. Menard; Mabillon, Pref. ad Secul. i. Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. p. 44, &c.

⁵ Benedict, Concordia Regular. lib. ii. p. 232; Mabillon, very narrow limits,¹ and that the teachers were ignorant and incompetent. Greek literature was almost everywhere neglected; and those who professed to cultivate Latin, consumed their time on grammatical subtleties and niceties, as is manifest from the examples of Isidorus and Cassiodorus. Eloquence had degenerated into rhetorical blustering, made up of motley and frigid figures and barbarous phrasology, as is shown by those who composed with most elegance, such as Boëthius, Cassiodorus, Ennodius, and others. The other liberal arts, as they were called, contained nothing elevated and liberal, but consisted of only a few precepts, and those very dry.

3. Philosophy was wholly excluded from the schools which were under the direction of the clergy; for nearly all supposed that religious persons could do very well without it, or rather ought never to meddle with it. The most eminent, and indeed almost the only Latin philosopher of this age, was the celebrated Boëthius, privy counsellor to Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy. He embraced the Platonic system;² but like most of the younger Platonists, approved also the precepts of Aristotle, and illustrated them by his writings. He is therefore not improperly regarded as the man whose labours brought the Aristotelian philosophy into higher repute among the Latins, than it had hitherto been.

4. Among the Greeks, the liberal arts were cultivated with more zeal in several places; and some of the emperors encouraged all branches of learning with honours and rewards;³ yet the number of the men of genius is much smaller than in the preceding century. When this century commenced, the younger Platonism was flourishing in full splendour. The schools of Alexandria and Athens were under masters of high credit, Damascius, Isidore,⁴ Simplicius, Eulamius, Ilermias, Priscian, and others. But when the emperor Justinian, by an express law, forbade the teaching of philosophy at Athens⁵ (which is undoubtedly to be understood of this species of philosophy), and manifested peculiar displeasure against those who would not renounce idolatry, all these philosophers took up their residence among the Persians, the enemies of the Romans.⁶ They returned indeed in the year 533, on the restoration of peace between the Persians and the Romans;⁷ but they were never able to recover their former credit, and they gradually ceased to keep up their schools. Such was the termination of this sect, which had been a most troublesome one to the church for many centuries. On the contrary, the Aristotelian philosophy gradually emerged from its obscurity, and received explanations, particularly from the commentaries of John Philoponus. And it became necessary for the Greeks to acquaint themselves with it, because the Monophysites and the Nestorians endeavoured to confute the adherents to the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, by arguments suggested by this philosophy.

5. For the Nestorians as well as the Monophysites, who lived in the East, kept their eye upon Aristotle; and to enable their adherents to be good disputants, translated his principal works out of Greek into their vernacular tongues. Into the Syriac language, Sergius Rasainensis, a Monophysite and a philosopher, translated the writings of Aristotle.⁸ In Persia, one Uranius, a Syrian, propagated his doctrines, and even instilled them into the mind of Chosroes, the king, who was studious of such matters.⁹ Another, who was doubtless of the Nestorian sect (for no other in this age prevailed in Persia, the Greeks being excluded), pre-

¹ See M. Aurelius Cassiodorus, Liber de septem Disciplinis among his Opera.

² This will be evident to any one who with some knowledge of the views of the younger Platonists, takes up his books De Consolatione Philosophicæ. See also Vallinus, Notes, pages 10, 50. Holstenius, De Vita Porphyrii, p. 7, ed. Cantab.; likewise, Mascov, Hist. Germanorum, tom. ii. p. 102, &c. [Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. p. 524, &c.; and Hamburger's Zweytlänge Nachrichten, vol. iii. p. 317, &c.—Schl. [See also his life in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 495, where the question of his being a Christian is carefully considered.—R.

³ See the Codex Theodos. tom. ii. lib. vi. p. 113, &c. Conringius, De Studiis urbis Romæ et Constantinop. annexed to his Dis. de Antiquit. Academicis.

⁴ See Brucker's account of Isidore, in his Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. ii. p. 341. Isidore was called Gazæus from his native place, Gaza in Palestine; and this discriminated him from Isidore Mercator, Hispanensis, and Pelusiotæ.—Schl.

⁵ Johannes Malala, Historia Chronica, par. ii. p. 187, ed. Oxon. Another testimony to the same point derived from I know not what unpublished Chronicon, is adduced by Alemannus, Ad Procopii Historiam Arcanam, cap. xxvi. p. 377, ed. Venetæ. [Also Agathias, cap. ii. and Suidas, art. νεοπλάτων, tom. iii. p. 171, seem to refer to this event by saying: Damascius, Simplicius, Eulalius, Priscianus, Ilermias, Diogenes, and Isidorus, retired to Persia, because they could not live according to their inclinations.—Schl.

⁶ Agathias, De Rebus Justinianis, lib. ii.; Corpus Byzant. tom. iii. p. 49, ed. Venetæ.

⁷ Consult the excellent Wesselingus, Observat. Varior. lib. i. cap. xviii. p. 117.

⁸ Abulpharajus, Historia Dynastiæ, pages 94, 172, ed. of Pocock.

⁹ Agathias, De Rebus Justinianis, lib. ii. p. 48. That this Uranius accommodated the precepts of Aristotle to the Eutychian controversies appears from this, that Agathias represents him as disputing about the possibility and immiscibility of God, καὶ τὸ παῦρον καὶ ἀεὶ ὄντων. [Uranius was in so high esteem with King Chosroes, that he had him constantly at his table. He wished to be accounted a sceptic, but may more justly be ranked among the Nestorians than among the proper philosophers.—Schl.

sented the same king with a Persian translation of Aristotle.¹ Yet there were among these Christians some who, rejecting both Plato and Aristotle, chose to philosophize or speculate according as their own genius led them. Such was the Nestorian Cosmas, called Indicopleustes, whose opinions were quite peculiar, and more consentaneous with those of the orientals than with those of the Greeks.² Such also was the writer, from whose Exposition of the Octateuch, Photius has preserved some extracts.³

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS IN THE CHURCH.

1. IN the constitution of the Christian church there was no important change. But the two prelates who considered themselves and were regarded by others as standing at the head of the whole church, the bishops of Rome and Constantinople, were incessantly contending for priority and about the extent of their territories and jurisdiction. The bishop of Constantinople not only claimed the primacy in the eastern churches, but maintained that his see was in no respect inferior to that of Rome. The pontiffs of Rome were exceedingly disturbed at this, and contended that their see held a rank and pre-eminence above that of Constantinople. In particular the Roman pontiff, Gregory the Great, did so in the year 587; when John of Constantinople, surnamed the Faster on account of the austerity of his life, had by his own authority assembled a council of eastern bishops at Constantinople, to decide on charges brought against Peter [Gregory] bishop of Antioch; and on this occasion had arrogated to himself the title of œcumenical or universal bishop.⁴ For although the bishops of Constantinople had long used this title, which was capable of a harmless interpretation, yet Gregory concluded from the time and the occasion on which it was now used, that John was aiming at a supremacy over all Christian churches; and he therefore wrote letters to the emperor and to others, in which he vehemently inveighed against this title. But he could effect nothing, and the bishops of Constantinople continued to assume it, though not in the sense which Gregory supposed.⁵

2. The bishop of Rome persevering in his opposition excited commotion everywhere, in order to bring the Christian world under his own control. And he was in some degree successful, especially in the west; but in the east scarcely any would listen to him, unless actuated by hostility to the bishop of Constantinople, who was always in a condition to oppose his ambitious designs in that quarter. How greatly the ideas of many had advanced respecting the powers of the bishop of Rome, cannot better be shown than by the example of Eudodius, the insane flatterer of Symmachus, who, among other extravagant expressions, said the pontiff judges in the place of God.⁶ But on the other hand, there are numerous proofs that the emperors, as well as some

Mauricius; and the emperor (not the patriarch John) called a council or appointed a court of Commissioners at Constantinople in 587, composed of patriarchs (or their delegates), Roman senators, and metropolitans, to hear and decide the case. (See Evagrius, Hist. Ecclæ, lib. vi. cap. vii. Evagrius was Gregory's counsellor at the trial, and has given us nearly all the information which has reached us respecting this council.) On this occasion it is said John, the patriarch of Constantinople, was honoured with the title of universal bishop—a title which had for some time been used by the bishops of that see. The decisions of this council being sent to Pelagius II. (not to Gregory the Great) bishop of Rome, Pelagius confirmed the acquittal of Gregory of Antioch, but remonstrated strongly against the title given to John. His letters on the occasion are lost, but they are mentioned by his successor. In the year 590 Pelagius died, and was succeeded by Gregory the Great; and he finding that John continued to use this title, took up the business in earnest about the year 595, and for some years laboured by entreaties and threats, and continued applications to the emperors and to the other eastern patriarchs, to divest the Constantinopolitan patriarchs of a title which he maintained to be profane, anti-christian, and infernal, by whomsoever assumed. See Gregory the Great, Epistol. lib. iv. ep. xxxvi. xxxviii. and lib. vi. ep. xxxix. &c. Bower's Lines of the Popes (Pelagius II.), vol. ii. p. 450, and (Gregory) vol. ii. pages 505, 511, 517; Natalis Alexander, Hist. Ecclæ, sæcul. vi. cap. li. art. xii. xiii. tom. x. p. 18, 25, &c. ed. Paris, 1743.—Mur.

⁵ Gregory the Great, Epistol. lib. iv. v. vi. All the passages in these epistles relating to this important subject are collected and illustrated by Launoi, Auertio in Privilegium S. Medardi, Opp. tom. iii. pt. ii. p. 266, &c. See le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 67, &c. Pfaff, Diss. de Titulo Œcumenici; in the Tempe Helvetica, tom. iv. p. 99, and the authors there mentioned. [The full title of Pfaff's dissertation is, De titulo Patriarchæ Œcumenicæ, nomen eridit inter Græcæ et Latinæ ecclesiæ; it is very necessary to be consulted in studying this contest.—R.

⁶ See his Apologeticum pro Synodo, in the Biblioth. Mag. Patr. tom. xv. p. 248, ed. Paris.

¹ Agathias, De Rebus Justiniani, lib. ii. p. 48, ed. Venetæ.

² Montfaucon, Præf. ad Cosman, p. 10, &c. in his Collectio Nov. Patr. Græcorum. [This Cosmas was an Egyptian monk. In early life he was a merchant, and trafficked through the whole length of the Red Sea and quite to India; whence he got the name of Indicopleustes, an Indian Navigator. After many years spent in this manner he took up his residence in a monastery in Egypt, and devoted himself to composing books. His chief work is Topographia Christiana sive Christianorum opinio de mundo. It is his great aim to prove the earth not spherical but a vast oblong plain; the length, east and west, being double the breadth. He argues from Scripture, reason, testimony, and the authority of the fathers. But while pressing his main point he introduces much valuable geographical information, which he had collected in his voyages. He flourished and probably wrote about A.D. 535. The best edition is that of Montfaucon, Greek and Latin, in Collect. Nov. Patr. Gr. tom. ii. Paris, 1706. See Cave's Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 515, &c.—Mur.

³ Photius, Biblioth. cod. xxxvi. pages 22, 23.

⁴ Moshem he confounds dates, names, and transactions. Gregory (not Peter) bishop of Antioch, being accused of incest and other crimes appealed from the tribunal of the governor of the East to the Emperor

whole nations, would not patiently bear this new yoke.¹ The Gothic kings in Italy would not allow the bishop of Rome to domineer excessively there; nor would they allow any one to be considered as pontiff whom they had not approved, and they wished to have his election controlled by their decisions.² These kings also enacted laws relative to religious matters, arraigned the clergy before their tribunals, and summoned ecclesiastical councils.³ And the pontiffs themselves paid homage to these sovereigns and afterwards to the emperors in a submissive manner; for they had not yet become so lost to all shame as to look upon temporal sovereigns as their vassals.⁴

3. The clergy were previously in possession of high privileges and great wealth, and the superstition of this century added considerably to both. For it was supposed that sins might be expiated by munificence to churches and to monks; and that the prayers of departed saints, which were most efficacious with God, might be purchased by presents offered to them, and by temples dedicated to their names.⁵ This increase of wealth and privileges was accompanied with an equal increase of the vices usually attendant on affluence, in the clergy of all ranks from the highest to the lowest;⁶ as is manifest even from the laws enacted by councils and by the emperors to regulate the lives and morals of the clergy.⁷ For what need was there of guarding the morals of these men with such ramparts of laws, if they manifested some degree of love for virtue and piety? Yet the efficacy of these laws was slight; for so great was the reverence for the clergy, that their most atrocious offences were visited with the gentlest chastisements; and this emboldened them to perpetrate any iniquity.

4. What sort of men the bishops of Rome were, who wished to be thought the chiefs and fathers of the whole Christian church, and also the body of the clergy under them at Rome, best appears from the long and violent contest between Symmachus and Laurentius; which broke out in the year 498, and was at length settled by the Gothic king Theodoric. Each maintained that he himself was the regularly constituted pontiff, and each accused the other of the most abominable crimes, and not without an appearance of truth. Three councils assembled at Rome were not able to terminate the fierce quarrel; in the fourth, Theodoric having taken up the business, soon after the commencement of the century, Symmachus was at length pronounced innocent. But the adverse party continued to deny that justice had been done them by this decision; and this led Ennodius of Pavia to write his Apology for the Council and for Symmachus.⁸ From this treatise, which

¹ See particularly respecting Spain, Mich. Geddes, On the Papal Supremacy, chiefly with relation to the ancient Spanish church; published among his Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. ii. p. 1, &c.

² See Mascov, Hist. Germanorum, tom. ii. note, p. 113.

³ Basnage, Hist. des Eglises Réformées, tome i. p. 381, &c. [Thus, e. g. Theodoric assembled the Italian bishops at Rome, to settle the contested election of Symmachus to the papal chair. (Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversam. p. 347.) The council of Orleans in 511 was held by order of Clovis (ibid. p. 351); another at Orleans in 533 by order of Childbert (ibid. p. 367); and in the year 549 (ibid. p. 375); and at Clermont by order of Theudebert (ibid. 368).—Schl.

⁴ See the collections from Gregory the Great, by Launo, De Regia Potestate in Matrimon. Opp. tom. i. par. ii. p. 691, &c. and Assertio in Privilegium S. Medardi, Opp. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 275; Giannone, Histoire de Naples, tome ii. p. 282, &c.; and livr. iii. chap. vi. sec. 6.—Mur.

⁵ Thus, e. g. Gregory (in cap. xv. Jobl. lib. xii. cap. xlii.) says: "Whenever, after committing a crime we give alms, we do as it were compensate for our wicked actions." So also in his epistles (lib. ix. ep. xxxviii.): "The intercessions in heaven of him whose body you have covered on earth will protect you from all sins," &c.—Schl.

⁶ Theophanes (on the second year of Justinian's reign) states that Easlas, bishop of Rhodes, and Alexander, bishop of Diospolis in Thrace, were for the crime of sodomy deprived of their offices, and castrated by order of the emperor; and then carried about as a show with a herald proclaiming: "All ye bishops beware of disgracing your venerable office." So in the epistles of Gregory the Great many proofs occur of impure conduct among the clergy: e. g. lib. viii. ep. xi.; lib. iii. ep. xxvi. and ix.; lib. i. ep. xviii. xlii.—Schl.

⁷ Thus, e. g. in the council of Agde in Gaul (can. 41), it was enacted, that a clergyman who should get drunk, should be excluded the church for thirty days, or undergo corporal punishment; and (can. 42) the clergy were forbidden to exercise the art of fortune-telling. Harduin, Concilia, tom. ii. p. 1002. Other laws forlorn simony, concubinage, perjury, usury, and gaudy dress, in the clergy. In Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 529, mention is made of many nuns, at the head of whom were two princesses, Chrotildis and Basine, who broke from the nunnery at Poitiers, and a part of whom were found pregnant, and also committed the most shameful acts of violence. And in page 531, he mentions one Egidius, bishop of Rheims, who used forged documents before the council of Metz; and for treasonable practices was removed from office. See Fleury, Hist. Ecclesiast. liv. xxxv. sections 5—8.—Schl.

⁸ This apology is extant in the Biblioth. Magn. Patr. tom. xv. p. 248, &c. [And in most of the Collections of Councils.—This contest may be worth describing more fully.—On the death of the pontiff Athanasius, in the year 498, not only the clergy but the people and the senate of Rome, were divided about a successor. Symmachus, a deacon, and Laurentius, the archpresbyter, were both chosen on the same day by their respective partisans; and so eager were both parties to carry their point, that the whole city was in an uproar, and many battles and much bloodshed took place in the streets and in the public places. To end the dire contest, the leading men on both sides agreed to refer the contested point to the decision of Theodoric, the Arian king, resident at Ravenna. He decided, that the one who should be found to have had most votes, and to have been elected at the earliest hour, should be considered the legal pontiff. This secured the election of Symmachus. The king likewise ordered the bishops to make regulations for the election of future popes, which should prevent the recurrence of similar difficulties. This was done in the year 499. But the party of Laurentius were not yet quiet. In the year 500 they accused Symmachus of several heinous crimes before the king; and the tumults and civil wars of Rome were renewed with increased violence. Some senators in-abounds in rhetorical colouring, we may clearly learn that the foundations of that exorbitant power which the pontiffs afterwards obtained, were already laid; but not that Symmachus had been inconsiderately and unjustly accused.

5. The progress of monkery was very great both in the East and in the West. In the East, whole armies of monks might have been enrolled, without any sensible diminution of the number anywhere. In the West, this mode of life found patrons and followers almost without number in all the provinces; which is apparent from the various rules drawn up by different individuals for regulating the lives of monks and nuns.¹ In Great Britain, one Congal is said to have persuaded an immense number to abandon active life and spend their days in solitude, according to a rule which he prescribed.² His disciples filled Ireland, Gaul, Germany, Switzerland, and other countries with convents of monks. The most famous of them was Columbanus, who has left us a rule of his own, distinguished for its simplicity and brevity.³ The whole monastic order abounded with fanatics and profligates. In the eastern monasteries there were more fanatics than knaves. In the western there were more knaves than fanatics.

6. A new order of monks, which in time absorbed all the others in the West, was established at mount Cassino, in the year 529, by Benedict of Nursia, a devout and a distinguished man according to the standard of that age. His Rule is still extant, and it shows that it was not his aim to bring all monks under his regulations, but rather to found a new society, more stable, of better morals, and living under milder rules than the other monks; the members of which should lead a retired and holy life spent in prayers, reading, manual labour, and the instruction of youth.⁴ But his followers formed the king of the state of Rome, and requested him to send a visitor thither, with full power to settle all the difficulties. Peter, bishop of Altino, was appointed.

He repaired to Rome, and at once suspended Symmachus, and took the goods of the church into his own hands. This enraged the partisans of Symmachus to madness, and prostrated all order and subordination. Being apprised of the state of things, the king now repaired to Rome in person, and spent six months in tranquillizing that distracted city. He ordered all the bishops of Italy to meet in council, and decide on the charges against Symmachus. The council held several meetings in that and the following years. Symmachus, when sent for, set out to go to the council attended by a mob; a battle ensued in the streets, several were killed, Symmachus himself was wounded, turned back, and refused to appear before the council. The council, after some delay, proceeded in his absence; decreed that the witnesses, being slaves, were incompetent to prove anything; and therefore dismissed the complaint. The friends of Laurentius protested against the decision. The council met again, and adopted as their own the apology for them drawn up by Ennodius. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, (Symmachus) vol. ii. pages 214—261. Harduin, Concilia, tom. ii. p. 961, &c. 975, &c. 989. — Mur.

¹ Most of these rules are extant in Holstenius, Codex Regularum, par. ii. published at Rome, 1661, in 3 vols. 4to. Add Martene and Durand, Thesaurus novus Anecdotorum, tom. i. p. 4.

² Usher, Primor. Eccles. Britan. pages 132, 441, 911. [Congallus or Congellus was an Irish monk who founded several monasteries; the most important of which was that of Bauehor or Bangor (on the south shore of Carrickfergus, bay in the north-easterly part of Ireland), erected about A.D. 530. Congal is said to have ruled over three thousand monks living in different monasteries and cells. See Usher, ubi supra. — Mur. See also Lanigan's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, 2d edition, Dub. 1820, vol. ii. p. 62, &c. — R.

³ Usher, Sylloge Antiq. Epist. Hibernic. pages 5—15; Holstenius, Codex Regular. tom. ii. p. 48, &c.; Mabillon, Præf. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. Sæcul. ii. p. iv. [St. Columbanus (a different person from Columba, the apostle of Scotland, mentioned p. 214, above) was born in Leinster, Ireland, about the year 559. After a good education in the literature of that age, he became a monk in the monastery of Bangor, under Congal. In the year 589, with twelve companions, he passed through England into Gaul; and settled in Burgundy, where he built the monastery of Luxeuil, or Luxovium; and there he spent about twenty years with great reputation. But in the year 610, having offended Theodoric the king by reproving his vices, he was banished that territory; and after wandering a few years in different parts of Gaul and Germany along the Rhine, and spending three years near Bregentz in Helvetia, he went into Italy, was received kindly by Agilolph the Lombard king, built the monastery of Bobbio near Pavia, presided over it one year, and then died about A.D. 615. He was a man of superior genius and possessed vast influence. His works yet remaining are his monastic rule, his monastic discipline, some poems and epistles, and seventeen discourses, which were published at Louvain in 1667 by Patrick Fleming, an Irish monk. His life, written by Jonas, an abbot of Bobbio, while several contemporaries of Columbanus were yet living, is extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 2—26. — Mur. [See a full account of this Columbanus in Lanigan's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 63, &c.; and a brief notice of him and his works in Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 464. Fleming's work is exceedingly rare; it is entitled, Collectanea Sacra, seu S. Columbanus, &c. Acta et Opuscula; but its contents are republished with additions, in Gallandius, Biblio. Vet. Patrum, vol. xii. p. 319, &c. At this ancient monastery at Bobbio one of the most valuable of the mediæval libraries was early collected. We have a curious catalogue of its contents as they stood in the 10th century (though imperfect), preserved by Muratori in his Antiq. Italica, vol. iii. Diss. 43, p. 818; and another compiled in the year 1461, which is printed entire in the Appendix to Amad. Peyron, M. T. Cicero's Frogm. Juedita, Stat. &c. 1824, 4to. To this work is prefixed a very interesting dissertation, De Biblio. Bobiensis, a collection of books or rather manuscripts which, dispersed as it now is among the libraries of Milan, Turin, Parma, and the Vatican, has yielded some important additions both to classical and theological learning. In it were preserved, in addition to the Fragments above referred to, Cicero De Republica, the Epistles of Fronto, and other works published by Cardinal Mal.—R.

⁴ See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i. and Annales Ord. Benedict. tom. i.: Helyot [Histoire des Ordres monastiques, religieux et militaires, &c. in 8 vols. 4to, Paris, 1714—19], and the other historians of the monastic orders. [Benedict was born of reputable parents at Nursia in Italy, A.D. 480. At the age of fourteen he was sent to Rome for education; but disgusted with the dissolutions of the city and the school, he soon ran away and concealed himself three years in a cave at Sublacum [Subiaco], about forty miles from Rome. At length he was discovered and his cell became much frequented. He was now chosen abbot of a monastery in the vicinity; but the rigour of his discipline gave offence, and he relinquished the office and returned to Sublacum, where he continued till about the year 523. Many monks here joined him, and he departed widely from the principles of their founder; for after they had acquired immense riches from the liberality of princes and pious individuals, they gave themselves up to luxury, idleness, and every vice; became involved in civil affairs and the cabals of courts; were intent on multiplying vain and superstitious rites, and most eager to advance the authority and power of the had twelve cells each containing twelve monks under his jurisdiction. Many of the first Roman families placed their sons under his instruction, and his reputation for piety and for miracles procured him almost unbounded respect. But his fame excited the envy of some clergymen, and led to plots against his life. After twenty-five years spent at Sublacum he retired to mount Cassino, about fifty miles south of Sublacum and about as far from Naples. Here he converted a body of pagan mountaineers and turned their temple into a monastery, in which he spent the remainder of his days in quietude and honour. He died about A.D. 543. His life was written by Pope Gregory the Great, and constitutes the second book of his Dialogues; it is also inserted in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Ben. tom. i. p. 1-25. According to the Rule of Benedict the monks were to rise at 2 A.M. in winter (and in summer at such hours as the abbot might direct), repair to the place of worship for vigils, and then spend the remainder of the night in committing psalms, private meditation, and reading. At sunrise they assembled for matins, then spent four hours in labour, then two hours in reading, then dined and read in private till half-past two P.M. when they met again for worship; and afterwards laboured till their vespers. In their vigils and matins twenty-four Psalms were to be chanted each day, so as to complete the Psalter every week. Besides their social worship, seven hours each day were devoted to labour, two at least to private study, one to private meditation, and the rest to meals, sleep, and refreshment. The labour was agriculture, gardening, and various mechanical trades, and each one was put to such labour as his superior saw fit; for they all renounced wholly every species of personal liberty. They ate twice a day at a common table, first about noon, and then at evening. Both the quantity and the quality of their food were limited. To each was allowed one pound of bread per day and a small quantity of wine. On the public table no meat was allowed, but always two kinds of porridge. To the sick flesh was allowed. While at table all conversation was prohibited, and some one read aloud the whole time. They all served as cooks and waiters by turns of a week each. Their clothing was coarse and simple, and regulated at the discretion of the abbot. Each was provided with two suits, a knife, a needle, and all other necessities. They slept in common dormitories of ten or twenty, in separate beds, without undressing, and had a light burning and an inspector sleeping in each dormitory. They were allowed no conversation after they retired, nor at any time were they permitted to jest or to talk for mere amusement. No one could receive a present of any kind, not even from a parent, nor have any correspondence with persons without the monastery, except by its passing under the inspection of the abbot. A porter always sat at the gate which was kept locked day and night, and no stranger was admitted without leave from the abbot, and no monk could go out unless he had permission from the same source. The school for the children of the neighbourhood was kept without the walls. The whole establishment was under an abbot whose power was despotic. His under-officers were a prior or deputy, a steward, a superintendent of the sick and the hospital, an attendant on visitors, a porter, &c. with the necessary assistants, and a number of deans or inspectors over tens, who attended the monks at all times. The abbot was elected by the common suffrage of the brotherhood; and when inaugurated, he appointed and removed his under-officers at pleasure. On great emergencies he summoned the whole brotherhood to meet in council, and on more common occasions only the seniors; but in either case after hearing what each one was pleased to say, the decision rested wholly with himself. For

Roman pontiffs. None of these things were enjoined or permitted by St. Benedict, whose Rule, though still highly extolled, has for many ages ceased to be observed.¹ Yet the institution of Benedict changed the state of monkery in the West in various respects, not the least important of which was, that the profession and engagement made by the monks bound them for ever to observe his rules; whereas previously, the monks changed the rule and regulations of their founders at pleasure.²

admission to the society a probation of twelve months was required, during which the applicant was fed and clothed, and employed in the meaner offices of the monks, and closely watched. At the end of his probation if approved, he took solemn and irrevocable vows of perfect chastity, absolute poverty, and implicit obedience to his superiors in everything. If he had property he must give it all away, either to his friends or the poor or the monastery; and never after must possess the least particle of private property nor claim any personal rights or liberties. For lighter offences a reprimand was to be administered by some under-officer. For greater offences after two admonitions, a person was debarred his privileges, not allowed to read in his turn, or to sit at table, or enjoy his modicum of comforts. If still refractory he was expelled the monastery, yet might be restored on repentance. See the Rule at large in Hospiuin, Opp. tom. iv. (De Monachis, libri vii.) p. 202-222, ed. Genev. 1669, fol. and as abridged by Fleury, Hist. Ecclès. liv. xxvii. sec. 14-19. Yet it is questionable whether the rule, as there laid down, was precisely what Benedict prescribed.—Mur. [On this rule of Benedict see also Bähr, Gesch. der Königs. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 424.—R.]

¹ The modern Benedictines are themselves obliged to admit that the Rule of their founder is no longer fully obeyed. But they resort to a convenient distinction. The Rule, say they, has its essential and its accidental parts. That the monks should labour, earn their own bread, and live frugally, belongs to the accidental part. The essential parts are the vows, which we observe religiously, a few faults excepted. We admit freely that the order is richer than in the days of its founder. Father Benedict would be amazed should he rise out of his grave, and instead of the miserable huts which he erected on mount Cassino, find there a palace in which kings and princes might reside; and see the abbot transformed into a prince of the empire, with a multitude of subjects and an income of five or six hundred thousand ducats.—Schl.

² See Mabillon, Prof. ad Secul. iv. par. i. (Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. v.) p. xviii. &c. Benedict changed the state of monkery, especially by restraining the instability of the monks and rendering their vows irrevocable. It was not strange that the order spread far and wide. His Rule was better calculated for Europeans than any other; and the first Benedictines were virtuous, upright, and useful people. Wherever they came they converted the wilderness into a cultivated country; they pursued the breeding of cattle and agriculture, laboured with their own hands, drained morasses, and cleared away forests. These monks—taking the word Benedictines in its largest extent, as embracing the ramifications of the order, the Carthusians, Cistercians, Premonstratensians, Camaldulensians, &c.—were of great advantage to all Europe and particularly to Germany. By them Germany was cultivated and rendered a fruitful country. They preserved for us all the books of antiquity, all the sciences and learning of the ancients. For they were obliged to have libraries in their monasteries, because their rule required them to read a portion of each day. Some individuals were occupied in transcribing the books of the ancients, and hence came the manuscripts which still exist here and there in the libraries of monasteries. The sciences were cultivated nowhere but in their cloisters. They kept up schools there for the monks, and for such as were destined to be monks. And without their cloisters they had also schools, in which the people of the world were instructed. From these monasteries proceeded

7. Only a short time elapsed before this new order of monks was in a most flourishing state in all the western countries. In Gaul it was propagated by St. Maurus; in Sicily and Sardinia by Placidus and others; in England by Augustine and Mellitus; in Italy and in other parts by Gregory the Great, who is reported to have lived some time in this order.¹ In Germany Boniface afterwards caused it to be received.² This rapid progress of their order the Benedictines ascribe to the miracles of St. Benedict and his disciples, and to the holiness and superiority of the rules which he prescribed. But those who more critically examine the causes of events, have very nearly all united in the opinion, that the favour shown by the Roman pontiffs, to whose glory and exaltation this whole order was especially devoted, contributed more than all other causes to its wide extension and grandeur; men of learning who were employed in courts, as chancellors, vice-chancellors, secretaries, &c. and these again patronized the monasteries. Even the children of sovereign princes were brought up among the Benedictines, and after they came to their thrones retained attachment and reverence for the Order, to whom they were indebted for their education. The Benedictines were esteemed saints, and their prayers were supposed to be particularly efficacious. All this rendered the Order powerful and rich. But as soon as they became rich they became voluptuous and indolent, and their cloisters were haunts of vice and wickedness. In the seventeenth century this Order began to revert back to its original designs, especially in France; and it performed essential service to the republic of learning, in particular by publishing beautiful editions of the Fathers.—Schl.

¹ See Mabillon, Disc. de Vita Monastica Gregorii Magni, annexed to Valesius, Analect. Veter. tom. ii.; and Mabillon, Præf. ad Sæcul. i. [Acta Sanctor. Ord.] Benedict. p. xxix. &c. Yet some deny this, as Gallonius [De Monachatu Gregorii, &c.] on whose book see Simon, Lettres Choiesies, tome iii. p. 63. [Yet the monkery of Gregory the Great after the investigations of Mabillon seems no longer liable to doubt. He established six monasteries in Sicily, and assigned them out of his great riches as much landed estate as was necessary for their support. A seventh monastery he founded at Rome in his own house, dedicated to St. Andrew, which still exists and is in the hands of the Camaldulensians. See Fleury, Hist. Ecclési. liv. xxiv. sec. 34.—Schl.

² Altessera, Origines Rei Monasticae, lib. l. cap. ix. p. 33. On the propagation of the Benedictine Rule in the various countries of Europe, Mabillon has a particular treatise, Præf. ad Sæcul. i. [Acta Sanctor. Ord.] Benedict. and Præf. ad Sæcul. iv. par. i. [Acta Sanctor. Ord.] Benedict. tom. vi. p. lxi. &c. [St. Maurus, whose name a distinguished congregation still bears, was one of the most famous disciples of Benedict, though some have questioned his existence. Placidus was an historian of this order. Of Augustine notice has already been taken. Mellitus preached to the east Saxons, and was afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, and very active in propagating the order. The great and rapid dissemination of this order was wonderful. Many particular and new orders, distinguished from each other by their dress, their caps, and forms of government, originated from it. The Carthusians, Cisterians, Celestines, Grandmontians, &c. were only branches growing out of this principal stock. The most respectable and renowned men were trained up in it. Volaterranus enumerates two hundred cardinals, sixteen hundred archbishops, four thousand bishops, and fifteen thousand seven hundred abbots and men of learning who belonged to this order.—V. Einem.

yet it was not till the ninth century that all other rules and societies became extinct, and the Benedictines alone reigned.³

8. Among the Greek and oriental Christians the most distinguished writers of this century were the following. Procopius of Gaza expounded some books of the bible not unhappily.⁴ John Maxentius, a monk of Antioch, besides some books against the sects of his times, wrote Scholia on Dionysius the Areopagite.⁵ Agapetus procured himself a place among the wise men of the age by his Scheda Regia, addressed to the emperor Justinian.⁶ Eulogius, a presbyter of Antioch, was ardent and energetic in opposing the heresies of the times.⁷ John, bishop of Constantinople, called the Faster on account of the austerity of his life, distinguished himself by some small treatises, and particularly by his Penitential.⁸ Leontius of Byzantium has left us a book against the heretics and some other writings.⁹

³ L'Enfant, Hist. du Concile de Constance, tome ii. p. 32, 33.

⁴ See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. du Pin, tome i. p. 197. [Procopius, a teacher of eloquence at Gaza in the reign of Justinian, A.D. 520, &c. has left us several Commentaries on the Scriptures, which are chiefly compilations from earlier writers, viz. on the Octateuch (extant only in Latin); on the books of Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles, Greek and Latin, Lugd. Bat. 1620, 4to; on Isaiah, Greek and Latin, Paris, 1580; on Proverbs and the twelve minor Prophets, never published. Also many neat Epistles, published by Aldus.—Mur.

⁵ John Maxentius was a Scythian monk and a presbyter of Antioch, who flourished about the year 520. Several of his epistles and tracts, defending the doctrine that one of the Trinity was crucified, and opposing the Pelagian errors, are extant in Latin in the Bibliotheca Patrum, tom. ix. His scholia on Dionysius the Areopagite are published, Greek and Latin, with that author.—Mur.

⁶ Agapetus, a deacon in the great church at Constantinople, flourished A.D. 527; in which year he composed his Instructions for a prince, addressed to the emperor Justinian then recently invested with the purple. The book contains seventy-two heads of advice, displaying good common sense but not profound. It has been often published; as Venice, 1509, and with a commentary, Franker, 1608; Frankf. 1659, 4to; Lips. 1669 and 1733, 8vo.—Mur. [It appears to have been translated into English by Th. Paynell, London, 1550, 12mo.—R.

⁷ Eulogius of Antioch was made bishop of Alexandria in the year 581. A homily of his is extant, Greek and Latin, in Combefis, Auctor. Novum, tom. 1. and large extracts from some other works of his against various parties are in Photius, Biblioth. Codex, No. clxxii, cvlii, ccxv.—Mur.

⁸ John the Faster was a native of Cappadocia, and bishop of Constantinople from 585 to 596. The title of universal bishop given him in the council of 589, involved him in trouble with Pelagius II. and Gregory I. bishops of Rome. Two of his Homilies are extant, Greek and Latin, among those of Chrysostom, and his Penitential (or rules for treating penitents), and a discourse on confessions and penitence are published, Gr. and Lat. by Morin, De Penitentia, Appendix, p. 77—92.—Mur.

⁹ Leontius of Byzantium was first an advocate, and then a monk in a monastery in Palestine, and flourished A.D. 590 and onwards. Cyril (in his life of St. Sabas, cap. lxxii.) says he was accused of Origenism. Vossius (De Hist. Gr. lib. iv. cap. viii.) thinks he was the same as Leontius bishop of Cyprus. He wrote De Scetis, Greek and Latin, in Auctarium, Biblioth. Patrum, Paris.

Evagrius Scholasticus has furnished us with an Ecclesiastical History, but it is disfigured with fabulous tales.¹ Anastasius of Sinai is generally supposed to be the author of a well-known but foolish book, entitled Hodegus contra Acephalos (a Guide against the Acephali).²

1624, tom. i. p. 493; likewise several controversial pieces extant in Latin, Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.; an Oration on the man blind from his birth, Greek and Latin, in Combefis, Auctor. Nannum, tom. i.; and some other tracts never published.—Mur. [There were several persons of this name and designation, and there is consequently much confusion in regard to the works attributed to each. See Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 756, &c.—R.]

¹ Evagrius Scholasticus was born at Epiphania in Syria, A.D. 536. At four years of age he was sent to school; after grammar he studied rhetoric, and became an advocate at the bar in Antioch. He was much esteemed, especially by Gregory, bishop of Antioch, whom he often assisted in difficult cases. The emperor Tiberius made him a quaestor, and Maurice, an honorary prefect. His only work which has reached us is his Ecclesiastical History, in six books. It is a continuation of the histories of Socrates and Sozomen, from the council of Ephesus in 431 to the year 594. Its chief fault is that of the age—credulity and an over-estimation of monkish legends and other trash. It was published, Greek and Latin, by Valesius, among the other Greek Ecclesiastical Historians, and has been translated into English, Cambridge, 1683, fol.—Mur. [The best edition of the Greek text is that contained in Reading's Greek Ecclesiastical Historians, Greek and Latin, Camb. 1720, 3 vols. fol. It is also translated in Bagster's Greek Ecclesiastical Hierarchs.—R.]

² See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclès. de M. du Pin, tome 1. p. 232, and Barst, Biblioth. Choisie, tome ii. p. 21, &c. [There were three persons called Anastasius Sinaita. The first, after being a monk in the monastery on mount Sinai, was made patriarch of Antioch, A.D. 561, but was banished in the year 570 for opposing the edict of Justinian respecting the incorruptibility of Christ's body. He was restored in 592 and died in 599. He was a learned and orthodox man, and a considerable writer. The record of this name was the immediate successor of the first in the see of Antioch, from A.D. 599 to A.D. 609, when he was murdered by the Jews. He translated the works of Gregory the Great on the Pastoral office from Latin into Greek, but the translation is lost. The third Anastasius flourished about A.D. 685. He was a mere monk of mount Sinai. He wrote a compendious account of lucreses, and of the councils which condemned them, from the earliest times to the year 680, which still exists in MS. The Oxygès, or Guide to shun the Acephali, is a rhapsody, without method and without merit. It has been ascribed to the third Anastasius, because it contains several allusions to events posterior to the times of the first two of this name. Yet as it relates to controversies in which the first Anastasius is known to have been much engaged, some have supposed it was originally composed by him or from his writings, with subsequent additions or interpolations. It was printed, Greek and Latin, by Gretser, Ingolst. 1604, 4to. The one hundred and fifty-four Questions and Answers respecting biblical subjects, ascribed to the first Anastasius, and published, Gr. and Lat. by Gretser, 1617, 4to, also bear marks of a later age. His eleven books of Contemplations on the Hexameron were published in Latin, Paris, 1609. Dr. Aili published the twelfth book, Greek and Latin, Lond. 1682, 4to. His five doctrinal Discourses (on the Trinity, Incarnation, &c.) together with all the works just enumerated are extant in Latin, Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix. Six of his homilies are extant, Greek and Latin, in Combefis, Auctor. Novum, 1641, tom. I. Another tract on the three Quadragesims is extant, Greek and Latin, in Coteler, Monum. Eccl. Gr. tom. iii. Various other tracts of his exist only in MS. and a considerable number are lost.—Mur.

The following is a catalogue of the Greek and oriental writers of this century omitted by Mosheim:—

Olympiodorus, a deacon at Alexandria, who probably flourished at the commencement of this century. He

9. Among the Latin writers, the most distinguished were the following. Gregory the Great, Roman pontiff, a man of good wrote several commentaries on the Scriptures. His short Comment on Ecclesiastes is extant, Greek and Latin, in Fronto le Due, Auctarium, tom. ii. His Comment on Lamentations, Lat. Rome, 1598, 4to; and his Commentary on Job is preserved almost entire in the Catena on Job, published, Greek and Latin, by Patr. Junius, Lond. 1637, fol.

Julian, bishop of Halicarnassus in Caria, a Eutychian, who flourished under Anastasius A.D. 510, and was active in the contests of his times. On the accession of Justin, A.D. 518, he fled to Alexandria; where he advanced the idea that Christ's body was always capable of corruption, and produced a division and a party among the Monophysites. He wrote a Commentary on Job which is often quoted in the Catena on Job, published Lond. 1637, fol.

Timotheus, bishop of Constantinople A.D. 511—517, distinguished for his hatred of his predecessor Macedonius. He wrote a book on the various heresies, extant, Gr. and Lat. in Combefis, Auctor. Novum, tom. ii. and more perfect, in Coteler, Monum. Ecclès. Gr. tom. iii. p. 377.

Severus, a leading man among the Acephali or Monophysites, was in his youth a pagan and studied in the law school at Berytus; afterwards he became a monk at Gaza, and embracing and propagating Eutychian principles, was expelled the monastery. In the year 513 on the expulsion of the orthodox Flavien, he was made by the emperor Anastasius, who favoured the Eutychians, patriarch of Antioch, subscribed the Henotonicon of Zeno, and condemned the council of Chalcedon. He persecuted the orthodox and especially the monks of Palestine, of whom he slew three hundred and fifty, and left their bodies to be consumed by beasts of prey. On the death of Anastasius and accession of Justin to the empire in 518, he was proscribed and fled to Egypt, where he became involved with Timothy patriarch of Alexandria and Gaius his deacon, by asserting that the body of Christ previously to its resurrection was corruptible. He returned to Constantinople and persuaded Anthimus the patriarch to embrace Eutychian principles; and was producing great commotions when two councils condemned him and Anthimus, A.D. 536. His subsequent history is little known. He wrote an immense number of epistles, many homilies and tracts, and extensive Commentaries on Scripture; none of which are published entire, his works having been proscribed and ordered to be burned by authority of the emperor. Yet numerous extracts are preserved, and some whole treatises are supposed to exist still in the East. The Ritual for baptism and public worship in the Syrian church which is extant, Syr. and Lat. Antw. 1572, 4to, has been attributed to him. His Commentaries are often quoted in the Catena Patrum. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 499, &c.

John of Cappadocia, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 517—520. He condemned Severus of Antioch in 518, and the next year by order of the emperor Justin became reconciled with the Roman pontiffs. Five of his Epistles are extant in the Comberia, tom. iv. and v.

Theodorus Lector, flourished at Constantinople A.D. 518. He compiled an Ecclesiastical History from Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, in two books, to which he annexed a Continuation in two additional books. Large extracts from the Continuation by Nicephorus Callistus are preserved and published, Gr. and Lat. among the Greek Ecclesiastical Historians by Valesius [and by Reading].—R.

Timotheus III. patriarch of Alexandria, A.D. 519—535, a warm Eutychian and protector of Severus and Julian, till he fell out with them respecting the corruptibility of Christ's body. He wrote numerous Sermons and theological tracts, large extracts from which are preserved by Cosmas Indicopleustes.

Epiphanius, patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 520—535. He confirmed the reconciliation between the sees of Rome and Constantinople made by John his predecessor, and approved the council of Chalcedon. Five of his Epistles to Hormisdas, bishop of Rome, are extant in the Comberia, tom. iv.

Ephraim, patriarch of Antioch, A.D. 523—546. He was a native of Syria, a civil magistrate, and count of and upright intentions for the most part, but greatly lacking in judgment, superstitious, and opposed to all learning, as his the East when made bishop. He wrote Pro Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus ex Synodo Chalcedonensi, which is lost, except copious extracts from the two first books in Photius, Biblioth. Cod. 228, 229.

Siméon Stylites, Junior. In his childhood he mounted his pillar near Antioch, which he occupied sixty-eight years A.D. 527—595. He is often mentioned by Evagrius who knew him well. His fifth Epistle to the emperor Justinian is extant, Gr. and Lat. in the translations of the second Nicene council, Actio V. Concilia, tom. vii. Some other tracts of his exist in MS. in the Vatican library.

Zacharias Scholasticus, archbishop of Mytilene. He was first a lawyer at Berytus, then a bishop, and flourished A.D. 536. While at Berytus he wrote a Dissertation or Dialogue against the philosophers who maintain that the world is eternal, extant Gr. and Lat. Lips. 1651, 4to, and in F. le Duc, Auctor. tom. i. He also wrote a disputation against the two first principles of all things held by the Manichæans, extant, Lat. in Canisius, Antiq. Lexion. tom. v. and both works in Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.

Nounosus, Justinian's ambassador to the Saracens, the Auximitæ, and the Homerites, about A.D. 540. He wrote a history of his travels, from which Photius has preserved extracts, Biblioth. Cod. 3.

Isaac, bishop of Nivea, who turned monk and travelled as far as Italy. He flourished about the year 540 and wrote eighty-seven ascetic discourses which still exist in MS. A bad Latin translation of fifty-three of them much garbled, was published in the Biblioth. Magn. Patr. tom. xi.

Arcthas, archbishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, is supposed to have lived about A.D. 540. He compiled from Andreas Cæsariensis an Exposition of the Apocalypse, extant, Gr. and Lat. annexed to Ecumenicus, Paris, 1631.

Gregentius, archbishop of Taphar, the metropolis of the Homerites in Arabia Felix, flourished A.D. 540 and died 552. An account of his dispute with Herbanus, a learned Jew, is extant, Gr. and Lat. Paris, 1586, 8vo, and in F. le Duc, Auctor. tom. i. He also compiled a code of civil laws for the Homerites, by order of Abram their king, which still exists in MS.

Barsanuphius, an anchorite of Gaza in the middle of this century, composed a large amount of ascetic writings which still exist but are not thought worth publishing.

Eutychius, a monk and bishop of Constantinople A.D. 553—565. In the year 561 he was deprived of his see and banished by Justinian, for not admitting the incorruptibility of Christ's body while he was on earth; but he was restored in the year 578 and died in 585, aged seventy-three. One epistle of his to pope Vigilius is extant among the Acts of the fifth general council, A.D. 553, Concilia, tom. v. p. 425.

Cyriel, a monk of Palestine, who flourished A.D. 557. He composed the lives of several monks as of St. John the Silentiary, of St. Euthymius, and of St. Sabas; all of which are still extant.

Paul Cyrus Florus, a poet who flourished about A.D. 555. His poetic description of the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople built by Justinian, is still extant Gr. and Lat. by Du Fresnoy, Paris 1670, subjoined to the history of Climacus.

John, surnamed Climacus from his book and Shalita from his residence, also Scholasticus, a monk of Mount Sinai, who flourished about A.D. 564. He wrote Scala Paradisi in thirty chapters, each marking a grade of virtue; also Liber ad Pastorem, both published Gr. and Lat. by Matth. Rader, Paris, 1633, fol.

John Scholasticus, a presbyter at Antioch, deputy to Constantinople and bishop there A.D. 564—578. He wrote Collectio Canonum in fifty titles, and including the eighty-five Canons of the Apostles; also Nonocanon, which besides a collection of canons contained an epitome of the civil laws concerning ecclesiastical affairs; likewise Capita Ecclesiastica. All these tracts were published, Gr. and Lat. in Justell's Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. ii. p. 499, 603, 660, ed. Paris, 1662.

Theodorus, bishop of Iconium about A.D. 564, wrote the martyrdom of Julitta and her son Chrycus only three years old, in the persecution of Diocletian; published Gr. and Lat. by Combefis, Acta Martyr. Antiq. Paris, 1660, 8vo, p. 231.

Epistles and Dialogues show.¹ Cæsarius of Arles composed some tracts on moral

Eustratius, a presbyter of the great church at Constantinople under Eutychius the patriarch about A.D. 578. He wrote a book in confutation of those who say the soul is inactive when separated from the body; published Gr. and Lat. by Leo Allatius in his historical work concerning purgatory, Rome, 1655, 8vo, pages 319—581. He also wrote the Life of Eutychius the patriarch, published Gr. and Lat. by Surlus and by Papbrochius.

Theophanes of Byzantium, flourished A.D. 580 and wrote a History of the wars of the Romans with the Persians A.D. 567—573, and some other parts of the history of his own times. Only extracts remain.

John Maro, a very prominent man among the Maronites, who flourished about A.D. 580. He wrote Commentaries on the Liturgy of St. James which are still extant in Syriac, and have been much quoted by Abr. Echellensis, Morin, Nalron, and others.

Leontius, bishop of Neapolis or Hagiopolis in Cyprus, who flourished about A.D. 600 and died about A.D. 620 or 630. He wrote an Apology for the Christians against the Jews, of which a large part is preserved in the fourth Act of the second Nicene council; Concilia, tom. vii. p. 236. He also wrote some homilies and biographies of saints. But it is not easy to distinguish his writings from those of Leontius of Byzantium.—Mur.

¹ His works were published by the French Benedictine, Denys de St. Marthe, in four splendid volumes, fol. Paris, 1705. For an account of him, see the Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Martii, p. 121, &c. [Gregory the Great of senatorian rank was born at Rome about A.D. 540. After a good education being a youth of great promise, he was early admitted to the senate and made governor of the city before he was thirty years old. The death of his father put him in possession of a vast estate, which he devoted wholly to pious and charitable uses. Renouncing public life he became a monk, built and endowed six monasteries in Sicily, and a seventh at Rome, in which he himself lived under the control of the abbot. In 579 he was drawn from his monastery, ordained a deacon, and sent as papal legate to the court of Constantinople, where he resided five years and became very popular. Returning in 584 with a rich treasure of relics, he retired to his monastery and his favourite mode of life. In 590 he was raised to the papal chair much against his will; and for thirteen years and a half was an indefatigable bishop, a zealous reformer of the clergy and the monasteries, and a strenuous defender of the prerogatives of his see. He failed in his attempt to coerce the Illyrian bishops to condemn the three chapters; but succeeded in disturbing the harmony between the Orthodox and the Donatists in Africa. He discouraged all coercive measures for the conversion of the Jews; endeavoured to confine the monks to their monasteries and to a more religious life; and attempted to eradicate the prevailing vices of the clergy, simony and dabochery. He was instrumental in converting the Arian Lombards to the orthodox faith, and in restraining the ravages of that warlike people. He interfered in the discipline of foreign churches, remonstrated against an imperial law forbidding soldiers to become monks, laboured to effect a peace between the Lombards and the emperors, and attended to every interest of the church and the people under him. Yet he claimed no civil authority, but always treated the emperors as his lords and masters. In 595 he commenced his long contest with the patriarchs of Constantinople who had assumed the honorary title of universal bishops. This title Gregory maintained to be blasphemous, antichristian, and diabolical by whosoever assumed. But he could not induce any of the orientals to join with him. In 596 he sent Augustine and other monks to convert the Anglo-Saxons, which they accomplished. In 601 he defended the use of images in churches, allowed the Saxons to retain some of their Pagan customs, and endeavoured to extend the power of Augustine over the ancient British churches. In the same year when Phocas, the usurper, murdered all the imperial family and clothed himself with the purple, Gregory obsequi-

subjects and a Rule for holy virgins.¹ Fulgentius of Ruspe, contended valiantly in numerous books against the Pelagians

and the Arians in Africa;² but his diction is harsh and uncouth, like that of most Africans. Ennodius of Pavia was not contemptible among the writers of this age, either for prose or poetry; but he was an infatuated adulator of the Roman pontiff, whom he exalted to supreme power on earth, maintaining that he was amenable to no human authority.³ Benedict of Nursia, whose name is immortalized by his Rule for a monastic life, and the numerous families of monks who have followed it.⁴ Dionysius, surnamed Exiguus on account of his lowliness of mind, has deserved well of his own age and of posterity, by his collection of ancient canons and his chronological researches.⁵ Fulgentius Ferandus, ously flattered him and submitted to his usurpation. At length worn out with cares and disease, he died in March A.D. 604, having reigned thirteen years and a half. Gregory was exceedingly active, self-denying, submissive to his superiors, and courteous, sympathetic, and benevolent to all; yet he was an enthusiast for monkery and for the honour of his see. His writings are more voluminous than those of any other Roman pontiff. His letters amount to eight hundred and forty, besides which he wrote thirty-five Books on Job, called Gregory's Morals; a Pastoral, a treatise on the duties of a pastor; twenty-two Homilies on Ezekiel; forty Homilies on the Gospels; four books of Dialogues. To him are ascribed also an Exposition of the first book of Samuel, of the seven penitential Psalms, and of the Canticles. His best works are his Pastoral and his Morals. His Dialogues is stuffed with monkish tales, and the Exposition of the penitential Psalms breathes the spirit of later times, and has been ascribed to Gregory VII. The best edition [of his works] is said to be that of St. Marthe; but that of De Sousa-ville, Paris, 1675, 3 vols. fol. is esteemed; the latest edition is that of Galluccioli, Venice, 1768-76, in 17 vols. 4to. His life by Paulus Diaconus of the ninth century, and another by John, deacon at Rome, about 880, are in Mabillon's Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i. pages 378-484. Among the moderns, besides Du Pin, Bayle, and Oudin, we have Mainbourg's Hist. du Pontificat de S. Gregoire le Grand, Paris, 1686, 4to, Dony's de St. Marthe. Hist. de S. Greg. le Gr. Romen, 1698, 4to, and in the Opp. Greg. M. tom. iv. p. 199-302. See also Bower, Lives of the Popes (Gregory I.), vol. ii. pages 463-543; and Schroech, Kirchengesch. vol. xvii. pages 243-371.—Mur. [For an ample notice of this eminent ruler and writer and of his varied works, see Bähr, Geschichte der Römischen Literatur, Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 197. For the names of many other works on his life and character, see Walch's Biblioth. Patris, cura Danz p. 93, &c.; and Saxius, Onomasticon Literarium, v. ii. p. 61. See also the view taken of his character and life by Milner in his Hist. of the Church of Christ, cent. vi. chap. v.—viii. He is much more favourable to Gregory than he deserves; and his account ought to be corrected by that given by Waddington in his Hist. of the Church, vol. i. p. 291, &c. who has more carefully and impartially estimated the faults and excellencies of this pontiff. See also Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. Milner's edit. vol. viii. p. 171, &c. Hallam's Middle Ages, 8th edit. vol. i. p. 519, &c. The only one of his works which has been translated into English is his Morals or Homilies on Job, forming Nos. 18 and 21 of the Oxford Library of the Fathers. These volumes comprise only twenty-two out of the thirty-five books, and end with the 31st chapter. A third volume will complete the work.—R.

¹ The Benedictines have recently given a learned account of Caesarius in their Histoire Littéraire de la France, tome iii. p. 192. [His life written by his pupils, Cyprinus, Messian, and Stephan, is extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanct. Ord. Benedict. tom. i. p. 636-654. He was born in Gaul A.D. 469. While a boy he ran away and entered the monastery of Lerins, where he lived many years and became the butler. His health failing he retired to Arles; of which place he was made bishop in the year 502. In the year 506 he was falsely accused of treason and banished by Alaric, king of the Visigoths, to Bourdeaux; but soon recalled. In 508 Theodoric, king of the Goths, summoned him to Ravenna to answer a similar charge. Being acquitted he visited Italy and returned to Arles. He presided at the council of Arles in 524; and at that of Valencia in 529, he triumphantly maintained the principle, that a man cannot obtain salvation without prevenient grace. He died A.D. 542, aged 73. He was zealous for monkery and a strenuous advocate for the doctrines of Augustine respecting free grace and predestination. He has left us 46 Homilies, a rule for monks, another for nuns, a treatise on the ten virgins, an exhortation to charity, an epistle, and his will. He also wrote two books on grace and free will against Faustus, which are lost. His works are printed in the Biblioth. Patr. vol. viii. and vol. xxvii. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 492.—Mur.

² See concerning Fulgentius the Acta Sanctor. tom. i. Januarii, p. 32, &c. [He was born at Carthage about A.D. 468. His father who was a senator died while he was young; but his mother gave him an excellent education. While a boy he had all Homer by rote, and could talk Greek fluently. He was early made procurator of the city. But soon weary of public life he retired to a monastery, became a monk and an abbot, changed his monastery, endured persecution from the Arians, went to Syracuse, and thence to Rome in the year 500; returned to Africa again, was elected bishop of Ruspe in 507, was banished to Sardinia by Thrasimund the Arlan king of the Vandals, recalled by Hilderic, the succeeding king, and ruled his church till his death in 533. He was one of the most learned, pious, and influential bishops of his age. He wrote a number of works on various topics, with epistles, tracts, and homilies; all of which were published, Paris, 1684, 4to. Among his lost works were seven books on grace and free will addressed to Faustus, and ten books on predestination and grace against Fabian. See Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 493.—Mur. [See what Milner has said of "Fulgentius and the state of the African churches in his time," in his Hist. of the Church of Christ, cent. ii. chap. i. vol. iii. p. 1. See a notice of his life with a critical estimate of his style and an account of his various works in Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 409.—R.

³ See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 96, &c. [Ennodius was born A.D. 473 of a pro-consular family. He married young, was afterwards deacon of Pavia, and subsequently at Rome, was twice papal legate to the emperor at Constantinople, was made bishop of Pavia in 511, and died in 521. He wrote nine books of Epistles, 297 in number unpublished and of little use to the history of his times; a Panegyric on Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths; an Apology for the Synod of Rome A.D. 503; the life of Epiphanius, his predecessor at Pavia; life of Antony, a monk of Lerins; two books of poems or epigrams; and various other little pieces; all of which were published by Sirmond, Paris, 1611, 8vo.; and in the Works of Sirmond, vol. i. Paris, 1696; also in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.—Mur. [See also Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 406.—R.

⁴ See above, p. 221, sec. 6, and note 4. He has left us nothing in writing except his monastic regulations, two epistles, and two discourses, which are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix. p. 640, &c.—Mur.

⁵ A monk of Scythian extract who flourished at Rome A.D. 533, and died before A.D. 556. He was intimate with Cassiodorus, who gives him a high character for intelligence and virtue. Being familiar with Greek he collected and translated a body of canons, including the first fifty Apostolic Canons and those of the councils of Nice, Constantinople, Chalcedon, Sardica, and some in Africa; he also made a collection of the decrees of the Roman pontiffs from Siricius to Anastasius II.; both are extant in Jusell's Biblioth. Juris Canonici, tom. i. He wrote several other works and composed a Paschal Cycle of ninety-seven years commencing A.D. 527, of which only a fragment remains.

an African, procured himself reputation by some small treatises, especially by his abridgment of the canons; but his diction has no charms.¹ Facundus of Hermiane was a strenuous defender of the three chapters, of which an account will be given hereafter.² Arator turned, with some success, the Acts of the Apostles into Latin verse.³ Primasius of Adrumetum wrote Commentaries on the Epistles of Paul, and a book on heresies, which are yet extant.⁴ Liberatus, by his Breviarium or concise history of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, merits a respectable place among the writers of these times.⁵ Fortunatus possessed a happy vein for poetry, which he employed on various subjects; and he is read not without pleasure at the present day.⁶ Gregory of Tours, the father of French history, would have been in higher esteem with the moderns, if his Annals of the Franks and his other writings did not exhibit so many marks of weakness and credulity.⁷ Gildas of Britain is not to be passed over, because he is the most ancient of the British writers, and because his little book On the Destruction of Britain, contains many things worthy of being known.⁸

In the last work he proposed that Christians should use the time of Christ's birth as their era, which proposal was soon followed universally. Hence the Christian era is called the Dionysian era. But Dionysius miscalculated the time of Christ's birth, placing it four years (as most writers suppose) too late.—Mur. [The best edition of his Paschal Cycle is by Janus, Hist. Cycli Dionysiani cum argumentis Pasch. &c. Witemb. 1714, 8vo. See Bähr, Gesch. der Jömis. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 415.—R.

¹ Fulgentius Ferrandus was a pupil of Fulgentius Ruspensis and a deacon at Carthage. He flourished A.D. 533 and onwards. His abridgment of the canons is a short digest of ecclesiastical law reduced to 232 heads; it is in Justell's Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. i. He also wrote the life of Fulgentius of Ruspe, and seven doctrinal epistles. All his works were published by Clitell, Dijon, 1649, 4to, and then in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.—Mur.

² Facundus was bishop of Hermiane in Africa, but spent many years at Constantinople as a representative of the African churches at the imperial court. It was here and in the years 516 and 547, that he composed his twelve books pro Defensione trium Capitulum, which he presented to the emperor Justinian. He also wrote a book against Mutianus Scholasticus, who had inveighed against the African churches for refusing communion with Vigilius. These together with an epistle in defence of the three chapters were published by Simond, Paris, 1629, 8vo, and annexed to Optatus of Milevi, Paris, 1674, fol. and thence in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. p. 1, 109.—Mur. [On this subject of the three chapters, see sec. 10, and Note 2, at page 232 below.—R.

³ Arator was first an advocate, then one of the court of king Athalaric, and finally a subdeacon at Rome. He flourished from A.D. 527 to 544; in which latter year he presented his poetic version of the Acts to Vigilius the Roman pontiff. He was much esteemed and honoured both by Athalaric and Vigilius. The poem was first published with a commentary at Salamanca, 1516; and afterwards in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. p. 125.—Mur.

⁴ Primasius, bishop of Adrumetum or Justinianopolis in Africa, was a delegate to the court of Constantinople A.D. 550 and 553, and defended the three chapters. His Commentary on the Epistles of Paul was compiled from Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine, and others. He likewise composed a Mystical Exposition of the Apocalypse. Both are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. He moreover wrote De Hæresibus, which is lost, unless it prove to be that published in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xxvii. the author of which has been so much disputed. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 525, &c.—Mur.

⁵ Liberatus was archdeacon of the church of Carthage. He was sent twice as a legate to Rome in 534 and 535. His Breviarium is esteemed very authentic and correct, though not elegant. It contains the history of that controversy for 125 years, or to about A.D. 553, and was the result of great research and labour. It was published by Garnier, Paris, 1675, 8vo, and in most of the Collections of Councils.—Mur.

⁶ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 464. [Venantius Honorarius Clementianus Fortunatus was born in Italy and educated at Ravenna. About the middle of the century, having been cured of his diseased eyes by St. Martin of Tours, he determined to visit the tomb of that saint. From Tours he went to Poitiers where he lived to the end of the century, wrote much, became a presbyter, and at last bishop of Poitiers. His poetic works are two books of short poems dedicated to Gregory of Tours; four books on the life of St. Martin; and several other short poems. They are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. and were published by Brower, Mentz, 1603, and 1616, 4to. His prose writings are short Explanations of the Lord's Prayer, and of the Apostles' Creed, and the lives of eight or ten Gallic saints. All these are extant either in Surius's or Mabillon's collections.—Mur. [There is a complete and accurate edition of his Opera published by Mic. Ang. Lucchi, at Rome, 1786-8, in two volumes. 4to.—R.

⁷ A particular account of him is given in the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 372. For an account of his faults, see Pagi, Diss. de Dionysio, Paris, sec. 35, p. 16, annexed to his Breviar. Pontif. Romanor. tom. iv. But many of his defects are extenuated by Launo, Opp. vol. i. par. ii. p. 131; &c. [Georgius Florentinus Gregorius was born of noble parentage, at Auvergne A.D. 544. After an education under his bishop, he went to Tours in the year 556, became deacon in 569, and bishop in 573, and died in 595, aged 52. He was much engaged in councils and in theological disputes, and at the same time a great writer. Orthodox, active, and rather indiscreet, he was frequently involved in difficulties, for he was deficient in judgment and acumen. His great work, Annales Francorum (sometimes called Chronica, Gesta, Historia, and Historia Ecclesiastica Francorum), gives a summary history of the world from the creation to the establishment of the kingdom of the Franks; and afterwards a detailed history to the year 591. He also wrote De Miraculis, containing the miracles of St. Martin, on the glory of Martyrs, and on the glory of Confessors. Besides these, he wrote De Vita Patrum (monks), De Vita et Morte vii. Dormitionum, and an Epitome of the history of the Franks, composed before he wrote his Annales. All his works collectively were best edited by Ruinart, Paris, 1699, fol. They are also in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xi.—Mur.

⁸ Concerning Gildas and Columbanus, none have treated more accurately than the Benedictines in the Hist. Littér. de la France, vol. iii. pages 279 and 505. [Gildas was surnamed the wise, and also Badonius from the battle of Badon (Bath) about the time of his birth, which was A.D. 520. By these epithets he is distinguished from Gildas Albanus, who lived a little earlier. He was well educated, became a monk of Bangor, and is said to have visited and laboured some time in Ireland. On his return he visited the monastery of Lhancarrow, lately founded by a nobleman of South Wales, whose example Gildas urged others to imitate. He spent some time in the northern part of Britain, visited France and Italy, and returned and laboured as a faithful preacher. He is supposed to have died at Bangor, A.D. 590, though some place his death twenty years earlier. His only entire work now existing, is his Epistola de Excidio Britannia, et Castigatione Ordis Ecclesiasticæ; in which he deplains and laments over the almost total ruin of his country, and the profligacy of manners then prevailing. It was first published by Polydore Virgil in 1525, but the best edition is that of Gale, in the first vol. of his Historia Britannica, Saxonica, &c. Scripturæ quædam London, 1691, fol. He also wrote several letters, and perhaps some other

Columbanus of Ireland acquired celebrity by his Rule for Monks, some poems, and uncommon zeal for the erection of monasteries.¹ Isidorus of Seville (Hispalensis), composed various grammatical, theological, and historical works; but they evince his deficiency in judgment.² The list of Latin authors in this century may well be closed by two very learned men—the illustrious Boëthius, a philosopher, orator, poet, and theologian, who was second to no one of his age for elegance and acuteness of genius;³ and M. Aurelius Cassiodorus Senator, who was indeed inferior in many respects to the former, yet no contemptible author.⁴ Both have left us various productions of their pens.⁵

pieces, of which only extracts remain. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 238, &c. [An excellent edition of his work, De Ercidio Britannia, has been lately published under the care of the English Historical Society, by Jos. Stevenson, Lond. 1838, 8vo, and it has been recently translated into English by J. A. Giles, I.L.D. Lond. 1841, 8vo. It had been translated by T. Habington, and published in London so early as 1638.—R.]

¹ For a notice of Columbanus see above, p. 221, note 3.—Mur.

² Isidorus Hispalensis, or junior, was the son of Severian, prefect of Carthage in Spain, and brother of Fulgentius, bishop of Carthage, and of Leander, whom he succeeded A.D. 595, as bishop of Seville. He presided in the council of Seville in 619, and in that of Toledo A.D. 633, and died A.D. 636. He was a voluminous writer, and has left us works on history, biography, grammar, and natural history, commentaries on books of Scripture, treatises on moral subjects and epistles. To him is falsely ascribed a collection of councils and decretals. His works were best published, Paris, 1601, fol. and Cologne, 1617, fol.—Mur. [According to Danz, the best edition of his works is that by Faust. Arovalus published at Rome, 1797–1803, in 7 vols. 4to. See Professor Ramsay's life of this very eminent father with a full account of his varied writings, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. ii. p. 627. This is the latest Latin father whose biography is given in this dictionary; yet Gregory the Great, who died in 604, is omitted. See also Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 455, &c.—R.]

³ Anicius Manlius Torquatus Severinus Boëthius, born of an illustrious family at Rome about A.D. 470, was sent in his childhood to Athens for education, where he spent eighteen years, and then returned to Rome the most learned man of the age. He was consul in the years 510 and 522. Soon after his return to Rome, he was made a patrician and admitted to the senate. When Theodoric king of the Goths entered Rome A.D. 500, Boëthius was appointed by the senate to address him. The king soon after made him one of his council and master of his palace. After faithfully serving the king and his country for more than twenty years, he was in 523 falsely accused of a treasonable correspondence, condemned on suborned testimony, and sent to Pavia, where he was kept in close confinement a year or more, and then privately put to death by order of the king. He was a voluminous writer. Besides more than forty books of translations and commentaries on Aristotle, Porphyry, and Cicero, he wrote on arithmetic, music, geometry, and several tracts against the Eutychians, Nestorians, and other errorists. But his most famous work was De Consolatione Philosophiæ, written while in prison at Pavia. This was translated into Saxon by Alfred the Great (printed Oxford, 1698); and into English by Chaucer, and by Queen Elizabeth. It was composed partly in verse and partly in prose, and has the form of a dialogue between Boëthius himself and Philosophy personified, who endeavours to console him with considerations, derived not from Christianity, but from the doctrines of Plato, Zeno, and Aristotle. The works of Boëthius were published with notes, Basil, 1570, fol. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 495, &c. and Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philos. tom. iii. Gervase, Histoire de Boèce, Paris, 1715, 2 vols. 8vo; and Schrocksch, Kirchengesch. vol. xvi. pages 99–121.—Mur. [See also Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. sec. 319, and Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 423; Le Clerc, Vie de Boèce avec la critique de ses ouvrages, in the Biblioth. Choisie, v. xvi. p. 194, and J. H. Andreæ, De Boëthio speciatim de ejus Consul. Philos. Hild. 1759, 4to. There have been numerous English translations of his Consolation of Philosophy, for instance, by Viscount Preston, 1712; by P. Kidpath, 1795, and others. The question whether he was a member of the Christian church is discussed in his life in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biog. vol. i. p. 495.—R.]

⁴ See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. du Pin, tome i. p. 211, &c. [Senator was part of the name not the title of Cassiodorus. This eminent statesman and monk was born of honourable parents at Squillace in the kingdom of Naples, probably before A.D. 470. Odoacer in 491 made him Comes rerum privatarum [and afterwards comes] sacrarum largitionum. Two years after, Theodoric became master of Italy, and made him his private secretary, and subsequently governor of Calabria; but soon recalled him to court, and made him successively quæstor of the palace, master of the officers, consul, and prætorian prefect. The death of Theodoric in 526 did not deprive Cassiodorus of his high rank; but in 539, being now about seventy years old, he retired to a monastery founded by himself near his native town in Calabria, where he lived more than twenty years in honourable retirement devoted to literature and religion. His works are voluminous; viz. Epistolæ (his official letters); Historia Eccles. Tripartita (an abridgment from the Latin translations of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, by Epiphanius Scholasticus); Chronicon ab Adamo usque ad annum 519; Computus Paschalis; De Rebus gestis Gothorum (which we have, as abridged by Jordanes, the original is supposed still to exist in MS.); Expositio in Psalmos Davidic.; Institutio ad divinas lectiones; De Orthographia; De septem Disciplinis (on the seven liberal arts, viz. the trivium, or grammar, rhetoric, and logic; and the quadrivium, or arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy); De Animæ De oratione et octo partibus Orationis; short Comments on the Acts, the Epistles, and Revelation (published separately by bishop Chandler, Lond. 1722, 8vo). Most of the other works are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xi. and all of them were well edited by the Benedictines in two vols. fol. Rouen, 1679. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tome i. p. 501, and Schrocksch, Kirchengesch. vol. xvi. p. 128–154.—Mur. [See his life by Prof. Ramsay in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. vol. i. p. 623; and on his religious writings, see Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 418.—R.]

⁵ The following are the Latin writers omitted by Mosheim:—

Paschasius, deacon of the church of Rome, who took sides with Laurentius in his contest for the pontificate in 498, and died in 512. He has left us an epistle to Eusebius, and on the Holy Spirit against Macedonius, which are in the eighth vol. of the Biblioth. Patr.

Laurentius, bishop of Novara in the north of Italy, flourished about A.D. 507. Two of his homilies on penitence and alms are in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.

Epiphanius Scholasticus, an Italian, who flourished about A.D. 510. He translated the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, into Latin that Cassiodorus might thence make out his Hist. Eccles. Tripartita. The original translations are lost.

Eusebius, abbot of a monastery near Naples about A.D. 511. He wrote the life of St. Severinus, the apostle of Noricum, published by Surius.

Hormisdas, Roman pontiff, A.D. 514–523, who made peace after a long contest between the oriental and western churches. He has left us eighty epistles and some decretals, in the Concilia, tom. iv.

Orentius or Orientius, bishop of Kilberis in Spain A.D. 516. He wrote Commonitorium fœdibus, in heroic verse, in two books. The first book is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. vii. and both, with other short poems, in Martene, Theaur. Anecd. tom. v. Paris, 1717.

Peter, a deacon, who vigorously aided the deputation of oriental monks at Rome A.D. 520, and wrote De Incarnatione et Gratia D. N. Jesu Christi, extant among the works of Fulgentius, and in Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF THEOLOGY.

1. THE barriers of the primitive simplicity and truth being once violated, the state of theology waxed worse and worse, and the amount of the impure and superstitious additions to the religion of Christ is almost indescribable. The controversialists of the East continued to darken the great doctrines of revelation, by the most subtle distinctions and with the jargon of their philosophy. Those who instructed the people made it their sole care to imbue them more and more with ignorance, superstition, reverence for the clergy, and Felix IV. Roman pontiff A.D. 526–530. Three Epistles in the Concilia, tom. iv. are ascribed to him, but the two first are spurious.

Justinian I. emperor A.D. 527–565. Besides the Corpus Juris Civilis (viz. Institutionum, lib. iv.; Pandectarum sine Digestorum, lib. i.; Codex, lib. xii. A.D. 528–535, and Novellæ, after A.D. 535) he issued six Decrees and Epistles relating to ecclesiastical affairs which are in the Concilia, tom. v.

Nicetus, of Gallie extract, a monk, abbot, and archbishop of Treves, A.D. 527–568. He was distinguished for piety and the confidence reposed in him. Two of his tracts, De Vigilis Sæpiorum Dei, and De Bonæ Conduciæ, were published by D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. iii. (ed. novæ, tom. i. p. 221, 223); and two of his letters (to the emperor Justinian and to queen Chlousinda) are in the Concilia, tom. v.

Justus, bishop of Urgel in Catalonia, Spain, flourished A.D. 529 and died about A.D. 540. His Commentary on the Canticles is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix. Two epistles of his are also extant.

Boniface II. Roman pontiff A.D. 530–532, has left us two Epistles in the Concilia, tom. iv.

Cogitosus, an Irish monk, grandson of St. Brigid and supposed to have lived about A.D. 530. He wrote Vita Sanctæ Brigide, which is published by Canisius, Surius, and Bollandus.

Montanus, archbishop of Toledo in Spain during nine years, about A.D. 531. He has left us two Epistles, extant in the Concilia, tom. iv.

John II. Roman pontiff A.D. 532–535. At the request of Justinian he solemnly sanctioned the orthodoxy of the expression—One of the Trinity suffered crucifixion. One spurious and five genuine Epistles of his are in the Concilia, tom. iv.

Marcellinus, Comes of Illyricum, flourished A.D. 531. His Chronicon (from the year 379 where Jerome's closes to the year 534) has been often published, and is in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. ix.

Agapetus, Roman pontiff A.D. 535, 536. Seven of his epistles (one of them spurious) are in the Concilia, tom. iv. and one in tom. v.

Vigilius, Roman pontiff A.D. 537–555. He obtained his see by intrigue and duplicity; conspired against his predecessor whom he brought to the grave; and when confined in his see showed himself supremely ambitious, and ready to sacrifice consistency, conscience, the truth itself, to promote his own selfish designs. He issued the most solemn declarations both for and against the three chapters. In 547 Justinian called him to Constantinople where he detained him seven years, and compelled him to condemn the three chapters, and himself also for having repeatedly defended them. We have eighteen Epistles and several of his contradictory Decretals in the Concilia, tom. v.

Gordianus, a monk of Messina, carried off by the Saracens in the year 539, when they burned and plundered that monastery. Gordian escaped from the Saracens and returned to Sicily, where he wrote the Life of Placidus, the Benedictine abbot of Messina, who with many others was slain in the capture of that monastery. It is extant in Surius, and in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, tom. i.

Victor, bishop of Capua about A.D. 545. He translated into Latin Ammonius's Harmony of the Four Gospels, falsely ascribed to Tatian, and extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. iii. p. 265.

Cyprianus, a Gaul, and pupil of Cæsarius of Arles. He flourished A.D. 546, and wrote the first book of the life and achievements of Cæsarius. Both books are in Surius, and in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, tom. i.

Mutianus Scholasticus flourished A.D. 550. At the suggestion of Cassiodorus he translated thirty-four Homilies of Chrysostom on the Epistle to the Hebrews into Latin; printed at Cologne, 1530.

Rusticus, a deacon at Rome who accompanied Pope Vigilius to Constantinople in 547, and showed more firmness than his bishop. His Dialogus sive disputatio adversus Accephalos (in which he inveighs against Vigilius), is extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x.

Junilius, an African bishop who lived about A.D. 550, has left us De Partibus Divinæ Legis in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. p. 330.

Jordanes, or Jordanus, of Gothic extract, bishop of the Goths at Ravenna. His one book De Rebus Geticis or Historia Gothorum, from the earliest times to A.D. 540, is an abridgment of the twelve books of Cassiodorus on the same subject. His book De Regnorum et Temporum successione, is transcribed from Florus. Both works are extant in Muratori, Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, tom. i. 1733.

Eugypplius, an African presbyter and abbot, who flourished about A.D. 553. He compiled from the works of St. Augustine a collection of sentences on various subjects, printed, Basil, 1542.

Victor, bishop of Tunis in Africa, a resolute defender of the three chapters in prisons and banishments, from A.D. 555–565. He wrote a Chronicon, from the creation to A.D. 566, but the last hundred and twenty-two years of all that remain; published by Scaliger with the Chronicon of Eusebius.

Germanus (St. Germain), born at Autun, France, A.D. 496; deacon, 533; presbyter, 536; and bishop of Paris, 555–576. An epistle of his to queen Brunehild, written A.D. 573, is in the Concilia, tom. v. His life, written by Venantius Fortunatus, is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum, Ord. Bened. tom. i. p. 222, &c.

Pelagius I. Roman pontiff A.D. 555–559. He was papal legate at Constantinople, A.D. 535–545, and a strenuous opposer of the three chapters. Sixteen of his Epistles are in the Concilia, tom. v.

Martin, a monk born in Pannonia. He travelled in Palestine, preached and became an abbot in Spain, and finally bishop of Braga in Portugal A.D. 563–583. He has left us Collectio Canonum (extant in the Concilia, tom. v.; and in Justell's Biblioth. Juris Canon. tom. i.) Sententie Patrum Aegyptiorum (in Roswidy, De Vita Patr.) and Formula Honestæ Vitæ, extant in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. p. 282.

Pelagius II. Roman pontiff A.D. 579–590. He had much contention with the western bishops who defended the three chapters; and after A.D. 589 with John, bishop of Constantinople, who assumed the title of universal bishop. Ten of his Epistles and six Decrees, are extant in the Concilia, tom. v.

Marius, bishop of Avenches in Switzerland for twenty years, flourished A.D. 581. He has left us a Chronicon continuing that of Prosper from 455 to 581.

Licinius, bishop of Carthage in Spain, A.D. 584. He has left us three Epistles, in De Aguirre, Collect. Max. Concil. Hispan. tom. ii.

John, a Spanish Goth, educated at Constantinople, returned to Spain A.D. 584, became an abbot, was persecuted by Leuvigild the Arian king, and died early in the seventh century. He has left a Chronicon from A.D. 565 to 590.

Leander, archbishop of Seville (Hispalensis) in Spain, flourished A.D. 583 and died 595. He was a monk, an ambassador to Constantinople, and a principal means of the conversion of the Arian Goths of Spain to the Catholic faith. A monastic Rule is all we have of him, unless he was author of the Missa Mozarabum.

Dynamius, collector of the revenues of the Romish church in Gaul. He flourished A.D. 593, and wrote the life of St. Maximus, bishop of Reiz, and the life of St. Marius, abbot of Bobbio.

Eutropius, a monk and bishop of Valencia in Spain, flourished A.D. 599. One of his Epistles is preserved by Holstenius, Codex Regular. Paris, 1663.—Mur.

admiration of empty ceremonies, and to divest them of all sense and knowledge of true piety. Nor was this strange, for the blind—that is, persons for the most part grossly ignorant and stupid—were the leaders of the blind.

2. Whoever wishes to gain more distinct information on this subject need only read what occurs, among other works, in the epistles and other writings of Gregory the Great, respecting the worshipping of images and departed saints, the fire which purifies souls after death, the efficacy of good works, that is, human prescriptions and devices for attaining salvation, the power of relics to remove defects both of soul and body, and other things of the like character. A man of sense cannot help smiling at the generosity of the good Gregory in distributing his relics; but he must feel pity for the simple, stupid people, who could be persuaded that oil taken from lamps burning at the sepulchres of the martyrs possessed uncommon virtues and efficacy, and imparted both holiness and security to its possessors.¹

3. To give directions for expounding the holy scriptures was the object of Junilius in his two books On the parts of the divine law.² The treatise consists of a few questions, neither scientifically arranged nor judiciously considered, for the author lacked the learning necessary for his undertaking. Cassiodorus likewise laid down some rules for interpretation in his two books On the divine laws. Among the Syrians, Philoxenus translated the books of the New Testament and the Psalms of David into Syriac.³ The number of interpreters was considerable. Among the Greeks, the best were Procopius of Gaza, rather a pleasing expositor,⁴ Severus of Antioch, Julianus, and some others. Among the Latins, the more prominent were Gregory the Great, Cassiodorus,⁵ Primasius,⁶ Isidorus of Seville,⁷ Bellator,⁸ and a few others.

4. All these expositors a few only excepted (and particularly the Nestorians in the East, who, following the example of Theodorus of Mopsuestia, searched for the true sense and meaning of the words) are scarcely worthy of the name of interpreters. They may be divided into two classes. Some merely collected the opinions and interpretations of the earlier doctors in works which were afterwards called Cutene (or Chains) by the Latins.⁹ Such is the Catena of Olympiodorus on Job, that of Victor of Capua on the four Gospels, and the Commentary of Primasius on the Epistle to the Romans, compiled from Augustine, Jerome, Ambrose, and others. Nor is Procopius of Gaza to be wholly excluded from this class, although he sometimes followed his own judgment. The others follow the footsteps of Origen, and neglecting wholly the literal meaning, run after allegories and moral precepts, deducing whatever they wish or desire from the sacred books by the aid of an unbridled imagination. Of this class is Anastasius Sinaita, whose Anagogical Contemplations on the Hexaëmeron expose the ignorance and credulity of the author; likewise Gregory the Great, whose Morals on Job were formerly extolled undeservedly; with Isidorus of Seville, in his Book of Allegories on Scripture; and Primasius, in his Mystic Exposition of the Apocalypse; and many others.

5. An accurate knowledge of religious doctrines, and a simple and lucid exposition of them, no one will expect from the teachers of these times. Most of them reasoned as blind men do about colours, and thought they acquitted themselves nobly when they had presented their readers with crude and indigested thoughts, and overwhelmed their opponents with mere words. Yet among the writers of this age may be clearly traced some germs and indications of that threefold manner of treating theology which still prevails both among the Greeks and the Latins; for some collected together sentences from the ancient doctors and councils, backed by citations from the Scriptures. Such among the Latins was Isidore of Seville, whose three Books of Sentences are still extant; and among the Greeks, Leontius of Cyprus, whose Loci Communes (or Common-place book), compiled from the works of the ancients have been commended. From these originated that species of theology which the Latins afterwards called Positive Theology. Others attempted to unfold the nature of religious doctrines by

¹ See the List of sacred oils which Gregory the Great sent to queen Theodelinda, in Ruinart, Acta Martyr. Sincera et Selecta, p. 619 (and in Muratori, Anecdota Latina, tom. II. p. 194.—Schl.).

² See Simon, Critique de la Bibliothe. de M. Du Pin, tome I. p. 229.

³ Assmann, Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. tom. II. p. 83.

⁴ See Simon, Lettres choisies, tome IV. p. 120, of the new edition.

⁵ On the character of Gregory and Cassiodorus as biblical expositors, see Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 157, &c.—H.

⁶ Simon, Hist. Crit. des principaux Commentateurs du Nouv. Test. chap. xxiv. p. 337, and Critique de la Biblio. de M. Du Pin, tome I. p. 226.

⁷ Simon, Critique de la Biblio. de M. Du Pin, tome I. p. 250.

⁸ Bellator was a presbyter, a friend of Cassiodorus, and flourished A.D. 550. He wrote numerous Commentaries—viz. on Esther, Tobit, Judith, the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Maccabees; all of which are now lost.—Mur.

⁹ See Le Moyne, Prolegom. ad Varia Sacra, p. 53, &c. and Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, lib. v. cap. xvii. or vol. vii. p. 727, &c.

reasoning, which was the method generally adopted by those who disputed against the Nestorians, Eutychians, and Pelagians. These may be fitly called Scholastics. Others again, who believed that all divine truth must be learned by internal feeling and by contemplation, assumed the name of Mystics. This threefold method of treating religious subjects has continued down to the present day. A proper and complete system of theology no one of this age produced, but various portions of it were occasionally illustrated.

6. To explain and inculcate piety and Christian duty, some gave precepts while others employed examples. Those who furnished precepts for a pious life endeavoured to form the Christian character, either of persons engaged in the business of active life, or of those more perfect Christians who retire from the contagious influence of the world. A Christian life in the former case they represented as consisting in certain external virtues and badges of piety, as appears from the Homilies and Exhortations of Caesarius, the Monitory Chapters of Agapetus, and especially from the Summary of a Virtuous Life by Martin of Braga.¹ In the latter case, they aimed to withdraw the soul by contemplation from the intercourse and contagion of the body, and therefore advised to macerate the body by watching, fasting, constant prayer, and singing of hymns; as is manifest from Fulgentius on Fasting, Nicetius on the Vigils of the servants of God, and on the Advantages of Psalmody. The Greeks followed for the most part as their leader in these matters, Dionysius denominated the Areopagite, on whom John of Scythopolis during this century published annotations. How exceedingly defective all these views were, is visible to every one who is acquainted with the Holy Scriptures.

7. To inculcate piety by examples was the aim of all those who wrote Lives of the Saints. The number of these writers, both among the Greeks and the Latins, was very considerable. Ennodius, Eugyppius, Cyril of Scythopolis, Dionysius Exiguus, Cogitosus, and others, are well known. Nearly all these entertain their readers with marvellous and silly fables, and propose for imitation none but delirious persons or those of perverted minds, who did violence to nature and adopted austere and fantastic rules of life. To endure hunger and thirst without repining, to go naked about the country like madmen, to immure themselves in a narrow place, to expect to behold with their eyes closed an indescribable divine light²—this was accounted holy and glorious. The less any one resembled a man of a rational and sane mind, the more confidently might he hope to obtain an honoured place among the heroes and demi-gods of the church.

8. In efforts to settle theological controversies, many were diligent but none was successful. Scarcely an individual can be named who contended against the Eutychians, Nestorians, or Pelagians, with fairness, sobriety, and decorum. Primasius and Philoponus treated of all the heresies, but time has swept away their works. A book of Leontius on the sects is extant, but it deserves little praise. Against the Jews, Isidore of Seville and Leontius of Neapolis engaged in controversy, with what dexterity may easily be conjectured by those who reflect on the circumstances of the age. It will be better therefore to proceed to a brief account of the controversies themselves which disturbed the church in this century, than to treat in detail of these miserable disputants.

9. Although Origen lay under condemnation by many public sentences and decrees, yet the attachment of many to him, especially among the monks, scorned all limitation. In the West, one Bellator translated various books of Origen into Latin.³ In the East, particularly in Syria and Palestine which were the principal seats of Origenism, the monks were exceedingly zealous, and they had the approbation of certain bishops, especially of Theodorus of Caesarea in Cappadocia, in defending the correctness and authority of Origen's sentiments.⁴ The subject was brought before the emperor Justinian, and he issued a long and full edict addressed to Mennas, the bishop of Constantinople, in which he strongly condemned Origen and his opinions, and forbade them to be taught.⁵ The contest about the three chapters commenced soon after, and Origenism not only revived in Palestine but spread and gathered strength. These commotions were brought

² Moshelm might have added—to live in the most disgusting filth—as another characteristic mark of ascetic perfection.—R.

³ This is founded on a conjecture of Huet (Origeniana, p. 252), who ascribes the Latin translation of Origen's Homilies on Matthew, in particular, to this Bellator.—Schl.

⁴ See Cyril of Scythopolis, Vita Sabae; in Cotellier, Monumenta Eccles. Graecae, p. 370, &c. and Noris, Diss. de Synodo Quinta, cap. i. li. In his Opp. tom. i. p. 554.

⁵ This decree is extant in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 243, &c. [It was first published by Baronius, Annal. Eccl. ad ann. 538, and thence passed into all the collections of councils.—Mur.

¹ See Acta Sanctorum, Martii, iii. p. 86, &c. [and Biblioth. Patr. tom. x. p. 382.—Mur.

to a termination by the fifth [general] council at Constantinople, assembled by Justinian in the year 553, when Origen and his adherents were again condemned.¹

¹ See the decree of the council, in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 283, &c. See also Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 38, and on this whole subject see Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. liv. x. chap. vi. p. 517, &c.; Fluct, Origeniana, lib. ii. p. 224; Doucin, Diss. subjoined to his Hist. Origeniana, p. 35, &c. [Schroceckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xviii. p. 40—58, but especially Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. vii. p. 618—760. This contest respecting Origen commenced among the Palestine monks about the year 520. One Nominus, with three other monks belonging to the new Laura (or cluster of cells) were discovered to hold and to be propagating the opinions of Origen. Sabas, abbot of the old Laura and supervisor of all the Palestine monks, opposed the schismatics. They were rejected from the Laura, but were restored again, and in spite of opposition and persecution they brought over many in both Lauras to their views. The commotion became violent, and expulsions, fighting, and bloodshed ensued. Still it was only a contest among a few monks living in two little societies or neighbourhoods in Palestine. Justinian's decree addressed to Mennas was probably issued about the year 540, and it has been supposed that the council of Constantinople, which anathematized fifteen errors of Origen, was an accidental council held about the year 541, and not the general council held in 553. However that may be, the death of Nominus in the year 546 caused the Origenist party among the monks to become divided, and to fall into a declining state. The fullest enumeration of errors held by the Origenists which has come down to us, is that of the fifteen anathemas by the council of Constantinople. Yet Justinian's decree or letter to Mennas is nearly as full; and it is more precise and lucid, as well as better substantiated by references to the works of Origen. In this decree after a concise introduction the emperor proceeds like a theologian, through ten folio pages, to enumerate and confute the errors of Origen. He then directs the patriarch Mennas to assemble what bishops and abbots could be found at Constantinople, and condemn the subjoined list of Origenian errors, their doings to be afterwards transmitted to all bishops and abbots for their confirmation; so that after this general consent shall be obtained, no bishop or abbot may be ordained without his condemnation of Origenism as well as the other heresies. The list of errors to be condemned is then subjoined as follows:—1. If any one says or believes that human souls pre-existed, i.e. were once mere spirits and holy; that having become weary of divine contemplation they were brought into a worse condition; and that because they ἀνοψύχιστος, i.e. cooled down as to the love of God, they were therefore called in Greek ψυχάς, that is, souls, and were sent down to inhabit bodies as a punishment; let him be anathema. 2. If any one says or believes that the soul of our Lord pre-existed, and that it was united to God the Word before his incarnation and birth of the Virgin; let him, &c. 3. If any one says or believes that the body of our Lord Jesus Christ was first formed in the womb of the blessed Virgin as those of other men are, and that afterwards God the Word and the pre-existent soul became united with it; let him, &c. 4. If any one says or believes that God the Word was made like to all the celestial Orders, that to the Cherubim he was made a Cherub and to the Seraphim a Seraph, and to all the celestial Virtues one like them; let him, &c. 5. If any one says or believes that in the resurrection the bodies of men will be raised orbicular, and does not confess that we shall be resuscitated erect; let him, &c. 6. If any one says or believes that heaven, the sun, the moon, the stars, and the waters above the heavens, are animated and are a sort of material Virtues; let him, &c. 7. If any one says or believes that Christ the Lord is to be crucified in the future world for the devils, as he was in this for men; let him, &c. 8. If any one says or believes that the power of God is limited, and that he created all things he could comprehend; let him, &c. 9. If any one says or believes that the punishment of devils and wicked men will be temporary and will have an end, or that there will be a recovery and restoration of devils and wicked men; let him, &c. 10. And Anathema to Origen who is called Adamantius, together with his nefarious, execrable, and abominable doctrine, and to every one who believes it or in any manner presumes at all to defend it at any time; in Christ Jesus our Lord, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.—Mur.

10. This controversy produced another which was much more lasting and violent, although the subject of it was far less important. The emperor Justinian burned with zeal to extirpate the more strenuous Monophysites who were called Acephali. On this subject he took counsel with Theodorus of Caesarea, who was a friend to Origenism and also a Monophysite; and he, to procure tranquillity to the Origenists by stirring a new controversy, and to fix some stigma upon the council of Chalcedon and inflict an incurable wound on the Nestorians, persuaded the emperor to believe that the Acephali would return to the church, provided the Acts of the council of Chalcedon were purged of those three passages or three Chapters, in which Theodorus of Mopsuestia, Theodoret bishop of Cyrus, and Ibas of Edessa, were acquitted of error; and provided that certain writings of these men favourable to the Nestorian errors were condemned. The emperor believed this, and in the year 544 ordered those three chapters to be expunged, but without prejudice to the authority of the council of Chalcedon.²

² This decree is extant in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 287, &c.; Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xxxviii. [It is called Justinian's Creed, and professes to define the Catholic faith as established by the first four general councils—those of Nice, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, and to condemn the opposite errors. Mosheim's description of the three Chapters would lead us to suppose that certain chapters, sections, or paragraphs, in the Acts of the council of Chalcedon, were the three things condemned by Justinian. But this was not the fact. His decree does not avowedly condemn anything contained in the Acts of that council; nor does it use the phrase three Chapters. The phrase was afterwards brought into use, and denoted three subjects (ἐπιτρία, τρεῖς ὑποκείμενα), which were condemned by the decree of Justinian:—viz. 1. The persons and writings of Theodorus, bishop of Mopsuestia, whom the decree pronounced a heretic and a Nestorian; 2. The writings of Theodoret, bishop of Cyrus, not universally but only so far as they favoured Nestorianism, or opposed Cyril of Alexandria and his twelve anathemas; and 3. An Epistle said to have been written by Ibas, bishop of Edessa, to one Maris a Persian, which censured Cyril and the first council of Ephesus and favoured the cause of Nestorius. The council of Chalcedon had passed no decree respecting Theodorus; and it had left all the three bishops in good standing, though the Epistle of Ibas and some of the writings of Theodoret received censure. Hence Justinian's decree did not openly and avowedly contravene the decisions at Chalcedon; though virtually and in effect it did so. To understand the contest about the three Chapters, it should be remembered that the Nestorians who separated the two natures of Christ too much, and the Eutychians or Monophysites who commingled them too much were the two extremes; between which the orthodox took their stand condemning both. But the orthodox themselves did not all think alike. Some in their zeal against the Nestorians came near to the Monophysite ground, and these of course felt willing to condemn the three Chapters, others zealous only against the Monophysites were not

But this edict met with opposition from the bishops of the West and of Africa; and especially from Vigilius the Roman pontiff, who maintained that great injury was done by it both to the council of Chalcedon, and to deceased worthies now in heaven.¹ Justinian summoned Vigilius to Constantinople and compelled him to condemn the three Chapters. But the African and Illyrian bishops on the other hand, compelled Vigilius to revoke that condemnation. For none of them would own him for a bishop and a brother until he had approved those three chapters. Justinian again condemned the three chapters by a new edict in the year 551.

11. After various contentions, it was thought best to refer the controversy to the decision of a general council. Justinian therefore in the year 553, assembled at Constantinople what is called the fifth general council. In this council the opinions of Origen² as well as the three Chalcedonian Chapters, according to the wishes of the emperor, were declared pernicious to the church; yet it was a decision of the Eastern bishops, for very few from the West were present. Vigilius then at Constantinople would not assent to the decrees of this council. He was therefore treated indignantly by the emperor and sent into banishment; nor was he allowed to return till he acceded to the decrees of this fifth council.³ Pelagius, his successor, and the subsequent Roman pontiffs in like manner received those decrees. But neither their authority nor that of the emperors, could prevail with the western bishops to follow their example. For many of them on this account seceded from communion with the Roman pontiff; nor could this great wound be healed except by length of time.⁴

12. Another considerable controversy broke out among the Greeks in the year 519; namely, whether it could properly be said that one of the Trinity was crucified. Many adopted this language in order to press harder upon the Nestorians, who separated the natures of Christ too much. Among these were the Scythian monks at Constantinople, who were the principal movers of this controversy. But others regarded this language as allied to the error of the Theopaschites or Eutychians, and therefore rejected it. With these, Hormisdas, bishop of Rome, when consulted by the Scythian monks, coincided; and great and pernicious altercations ensued. Afterwards the fifth council and John II. a successor of Hormisdas, by approving of this language, restored peace to the church.⁵

far from being Nestorians, and these of course defended the three Chapters; for Theodorus, Theodoret, and Ibas had been leading men of this very character. Hence the interest shown by the oriental bishops in this controversy. But in the West, where the Nestorian and Eutychian contests had been less severe, and where the persons and writings of Theodorus, Ibas, and Theodoret were little known, the three Chapters were felt to be of little consequence, except as the condemning them seemed to impair the authority of the decrees of Chalcedon and to asperse characters once held venerable in the church. It was doubtless a most rash thing in Justinian to condemn the three Chapters. But having done it he resolved to persevere in it. The church was agitated long and severely; and at length this precipitate act of the emperor, being sanctioned by the requisite authority, had the effect of shaping the creed of the Catholic church from that day to this. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. viii. p. 3-468, but especially p. 437, &c.—Mur.

¹ Noris, De Synodo Quinta, cap. x. &c. Opp. tom. i. p. 579; Bassange, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome i. liv. x. chap. vi. p. 523, &c.

² According to the acts of this council as they have come down to us, Origen was no otherwise condemned by it than by having his name inserted in the list of heretics, collectively anathematized in the eleventh anathema. The celebrated fifteen anathemas of as many Orogenian errors, said to have been decreed by this council, are found in no copy of its acts, nor are they mentioned by any ancient writer. Peter Lambecius first discovered them in the Imperial library at Vienna in an old MS. of Photius' Synagma Canonum, bearing the superscription, "Canons of the one hundred and sixty-five holy fathers of the fifth holy council at Constantinople," and published them with a Latin translation, whence Baluze first introduced them into the Collections of Councils; but Cave, Walch, Valesius, and others suppose they were framed in a council at Constantinople about A.D. 541. See note i. p. 232 above; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 553; Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. vii. p. 644-701; Valesius, notes on Evaristus, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. 38.—Mur.

³ See Peter de Marca, Diss. de Decreto Vigili pro Confirmatione Synodi Quinte, among the Diss. subjoined to his work, De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, p. 207, &c. [and Bower's Lives of the Popes (Vigilius), vol. ii. p. 382-413.—Mur.]

⁴ See, in preference to all others, Noris, De Synodo Quinta (Ecumenica), yet Noris is not free from partiality; also Lupus, notes on the fifth council, among his Adnotat. ad Concilia.

⁵ See Noris, Historia Controversiæ de uno et Trinitate passio; Opp. tom. iii. p. 771. The ancient writers who mention this controversy call the monks with whom it originated Scythians; but La Croze, Theaur. Epistolar. tom. iii. p. 189, conjectures that they were Scetian monks from Egypt and not Scythians. This conjecture has some probability. But Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. vii. p. 296, 297, says of this conjecture—"It is not only improbable, but is certainly false." And the documents relative to the controversy (of which he had there just closed the recital) do appear, as Walch affirms, "adequate to prove that these men were really from Scythia." Together with the two modes of expression relative to the Trinity which they advocated, these monks were strenuous opposers of Pelagianism. Having had disagreement with some bishops of their province, particularly with Paternus, bishop of Tomis, a deputation of them went to Constantinople with their complaint. Among these deputies, John Maxentius, Leontius, and Achilles, were the principal. The emperor rather favoured them, but the bishops of the East were not agreed. The emperor obliged the Pope's legates at the court to hear the cause; but they were not disposed to decide it, at least not as the monks wished. A part of them now repaired to Rome, where they stayed more than a year. Hormisdas disapproved their phraseology, but was not very ready to condemn it outright. While at Rome these monks wrote to the exiled African bishops in Sardinia, and by taking part in their controversy obtained their friendship. They certainly had many friends, but the ancient historians have transmitted to us only some slight notices of their history. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzer. vol. vii. p. 262-313; Bower, Lives of the Popes (Hormisdas), vol. ii. p. 306-309.—Mur.

Connected with this question was another; whether it was proper to say Christ's person was compounded, which the Scythian monks affirmed and others denied.

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES.

1. In proportion as true religion and piety from various causes declined in this century, their external manifestations, that is, rites and ceremonies, were augmented. In the East, the Nestorian and Eutychian contests occasioned the invention of various rites and forms, which might serve as marks to distinguish the contending sects. In the West Gregory the Great was wonderfully dexterous and ingenious in devising and recommending new ceremonies. Nor will this appear strange to those who are aware that he was of the opinion that the words of the Holy Scriptures were images of recondite things; for whoever can believe this, can easily bring himself to inculcate all the doctrines and precepts of religion by means of rites and signs. Yet in one respect he is to be commended, namely, that he would not obtrude his ceremonies upon others—perhaps it was because he could not.

2. This multitude of ceremonies required interpreters. Hence a new kind of science arose both in the East and in the West, the object of which was to investigate and explain the grounds and reasons of the sacred rites. But most of those who deduce these rites from scripture and reason betray their folly, and exhibit rather the creations of their own fancy than the true causes of things. If they had been acquainted with ancient opinions and customs, and had examined the pontifical laws of the Greeks and Romans, they would have taught us much more correctly from what sources many of the rites which the Christians regarded as sacred, were derived.

3. The public worship of God was still celebrated in the vernacular language of each nation; but it was everywhere amplified by the addition of various hymns and other trifling things. The new mode of administering the Lord's supper, magnificently and with a splendid apparatus, or the Canon of the Mass as it is called, was an institution of Gregory the Great; or, if it will be more satisfactory, he enlarged and altered the old Canon. But many centuries elapsed before the other Latin churches could be prevailed on to adopt this Romish form.¹ Baptism, except in cases of necessity, was conferred only on the feast-days, and those also the greater festivals, or of the highest class.² As to the Litanies to the saints as they are called,³ the various kinds of supplications, the stations of Gregory,⁴ the formulas of consecration, and other rites invented in this century to captivate the senses with a show of religion, we shall pass over them to avoid prolixity. This subject requires peculiar care and industry.

4. The temples erected in memory and to the honour of the saints, were immensely numerous both in the East and the West.⁵ There had long been houses enough erected in which the people might assemble for divine worship, but this century courted the favour of departed saints with these edifices as a kind of presents; nor did they doubt at all that these saints took under their immediate protection and care the provinces, cities, towns, and villages, in which they saw such residences prepared for them.⁶

the East differed from the West, but in both there were diversities. In Gaul the old Liturgy continued till the time of Charlemagne. In Milan, the Ambrosian Liturgy (so named from St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan), is not yet wholly abandoned. In Spain, the Mozarabic or ancient Spanish is still used occasionally in certain places, though the Roman canon was introduced partially in the 11th and more fully in the 13th and following centuries. In England, the ancient Britons had one Liturgy, and the Anglo-Saxons received another from Augustine their apostle and his companions, and this not precisely the Roman. See Krazer, De Liturgiis, sec. ii. cap. ii.—vi. Gregory the Great introduced the responsive chant, and established a school for church music which was in existence at Rome as late as the 9th century.—Mur. [On the Liturgies of France, see Mabillon, De Liturgia Gallicana, &c. Par. 1685, 4to; on those of Spain, see Pinus, Liturgia Mozarabica, &c. Rome. 1740, fol.; and on those of Britain, see L'Estrange, The Alliance of the Divine Offices, Lond. 1659, fol.; and Palmer's Origines Liturgicæ, or Antiq. of the Eng. Ritual, &c. Oxf. 1839, 3d edition, two volumes, 8vo.—R.]

² Especially Christmas, Epiphany, Easter, Whitsuntide, and St. John the Baptist; at least in Gaul. See Gregory of Tours, De Gloria Confessor, cap. lxxix. lxxvi. and Hist. Francor. lib. viii. cap. ix.—Schl.

³ The Litanies, of which there were the larger and the smaller, the common and the special, were in the previous centuries addressed only to God; but superstition now led men to address them to Mary and to the other saints.—Vun Ein.

⁴ Stations denoted in early times fasts; but afterwards the churches, chapels, cemeteries, or other places where the people assembled for worship. See Du Cange, Glossar. Med. et Infim. Latinit. sub hac voce. Gregory discriminated the different times, occasions, and places of public worship, and framed a service for each. This is the principal cause of the vast multiplication of liturgical formulas in the Romish church.—Mur.

⁵ See Procopius, De Bello Gothico, lib. iv. and v.; also De Edificiis Justiniani, where many churches erected to the Virgin Mary are mentioned.—Schl.

⁶ Thus the Lombard queen, Theodelinda, built a church for John the Baptist that he might pray for her and her people. (Paul Diacon. Hist. Longobard. lib. iv. cap. vii.) And the French king, Clothaire, built a splendid temple to St. Vincent, because he believed that saint had helped him to vanquish the Goths. (Siegbert, Chronica.) For the same reason rich presents were made to the churches. Thus Childbert after conquering Alaric gave to the church sixty cups, fifteen diadems, and twenty cases for the holy Gospels; all of the finest

¹ See Lillenthal, De Canone Missæ Gregoriano, Leyden, 1740, 8vo., and the writers on Liturgies. [Different countries had different Missals. Not only

The number of feast-days almost equalled that of the churches. In particular, the list of festivals for the whole Christian church was swelled by the consecration of the day of the purification of the holy virgin Mary, so that the people might not miss their Lupercalia, which they were accustomed to celebrate in the month of February,¹ and by the day of our Saviour's conception,² the birth-day of St. John,³ and some others.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES AND SEPARATIONS FROM THE CHURCH.

1. The ancient sects, though harassed in numberless ways, did not cease to raise dangerous commotions in various places. Among the Persians, the Manichæans are said to have become so powerful as to seduce the son of Cabades the monarch; but he avenged the crime by a great slaughter of them. They must also have been trougold and set with costly gems. (Gregory of Tours, Hist. Francor. lib. iii. cap. x.)—Schl.

¹ This was instituted in the reign of Justinian and fixed to the second day of February. The Greeks called it ὑπαπαντή or ὑπαπαντή, meeting, because then Simeon and Anna met the Saviour in the temple. The Latins call it the feast of St. Simeon, the presentation of the Lord, and Candlemass because many candles were then lighted up, as had been done on the Lupercalia, the festival of the ravishment of Proserpine, whom her mother Ceres searched for with candles. See Hospi-nian, De Festis Christ. p. 52, &c. and Baillet, Vies des Saints, tome i. Febr. p. 22, &c.—Mur.

² This feast is generally celebrated on the 25th of March, and is called by the Greeks ἡμέρα ἀπαγγελίας or εὐαγγελισμοῦ, the day of the salutation or of the annunciation, because on it the angel Gabriel announced to Mary that she should bring forth the Saviour. The Latins absurdly call it the annunciation of Mary. To avoid interrupting the Lent fast the Spaniards celebrated it on the 18th of December, and the Armenians on the 5th of January, the other churches kept it the 25th of March. It is mentioned in the 52d canon of the council in Trullo A.D. 691, as a festival then fully established and known, but at what time it was first introduced is uncertain. See Suicer, Theaur. Eccles. tom. i. p. 1234; and Baillet, ubi supra, tom. i. March, p. 318.—Mur.

³ I know not what induced Mosheim to place the introduction of this feast in this century. If the superscriptions to the homilies of Maximus of Turin (who lived A.D. 420) are correct, this feast must have been common in the fifth century; for three of these homilies are superscribed as being composed for this feast. Perhaps Mosheim had his eye on the twenty-first canon of the council held at Agde A.D. 506 (Harduin's Concilia, tom. ii. p. 1009), where the festival of St. John is mentioned among the greater feasts. Yet as it is there mentioned as one already known, it must have been in existence some years. Moreover heathenish rites were mixed with this feast. The feast of St. John and the dancing around a tree set up, were usages as well of the German and northern nations, as of the Romans. The former had their Noddyr (on which Joh. Reiske published a book, Francf. 1696, 8vo), and the latter used about this time (the 24th of June) to keep the feast of Vesta, with kindling a new fire amid dances and other sports.—Schl. [Baillet (Vies des Saints, tome ii. June, p. 296) proves from the sermons of Augustine that this festival was considered as of long standing in the church in the days of that father. Augustine himself has left us seven sermons which he preached on the festival.—Mur. On these festivals, &c. see Bingham's Orig. Eccles. book xx. Works, vol. vii. p. 1, &c.—R.

blesome in other countries, for Heraclianus of Chalcedon deemed it necessary to write a book against them.⁴ In Gaul and Africa, the contests between the semi-Pelagians and the followers of Augustine continued.

2. The Donatists were comfortably situated so long as the Vandals reigned in Africa. But they were less favoured when this kingdom was overturned in the year 534. Yet they not only kept up their church, but near the close of the century or from the year 591, they ventured to defend and propagate it with more courage. These efforts of theirs were vigorously opposed by Gregory the Great, who as appears from his Epistles⁵ endeavoured in various ways to depress the sect now raising its head again. And his measures doubtless were successful; for the Donatist church became extinct in this century; at least no mention is made of it after this time.

3. The Arians at the commencement of this century were triumphant in some parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe. Not a few of the Asiatic bishops favoured them. The Vandals in Africa, the Goths in Italy, many of the Gauls, the Suevi, the Burgundians, and the Spaniards, openly espoused their interest. The Greeks indeed who approved of the Nicene council, oppressed and persecuted them wherever they were able; but the Arians returned the like treatment, especially in Africa and Italy.⁶ Yet this prosperity of the Arians wholly terminated, when under the auspices of Justinian the Vandals were driven from Africa, and the Goths from Italy.⁷ For the other Arian kings, Sigismund king of the Burgundians, Theodimir king of the Suevi in Lusitania, and Reccared king of Spain, without violence and war suffered themselves to be led to a renunciation of the Arian doctrine, and to efforts for its extirpation among their subjects by means of legal enactments and councils. Whether reason and arguments or hope and fear, had the greater influence in the conversion of these kings, it is difficult to say.⁸ But this is certain,

⁴ See Photius, Biblioth. Cod. cxlv. p. 291.

⁵ See his Epistol. lib. iv. ep. 84, 35, p. 714, 715, and lib. vi. ep. 65, p. 841, ep. 37, p. 821, and lib. ix. ep. 53, p. 972, and lib. ii. ep. 48, p. 611, Opp. tom. ii. [The emperor Mauricius issued penal laws against them in the year 595. It is a probable conjecture of Witius (Hist. Donatist. cap. viii. sec. 9) that the conquests of the Saracens in Africa in the 7th century put an end to the Donatist contest.—Schl.

⁶ Procopius, De Bello Vandal. lib. i. cap. viii. and De Bello Gothico, lib. i. cap. li.; Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. xv. &c.

⁷ See Mascovius, Hist. German. tom. ii. on the subversion of the Vandalic kingdom, p. 76, on that of the Goths, p. 91. On the accession of the barbarians to the Nicene faith respecting God, see Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Martii, p. 275, and tom. ii. Aprilis, p. 134.

⁸ The latter is to me the most probable. The kings of these nations were very ignorant, and made war the Arian sect was from this time dispersed and could never after recover any strength.

4. The Nestorians, after they had obtained a fixed residence in Persia and had located the head of their sect at Seleucia, were as successful as they were industrious in disseminating their doctrines in the countries lying without the Roman empire. It appears from unquestionable documents still existing, that there were numerous societies in all parts of Persia, in India, Armenia, Arabia, Syria, and other countries under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Seleucia during this century.¹ The Persian kings were not indeed all equally well affected towards this sect, and they sometimes severely persecuted all Christians resident in their dominions;² yet generally they showed a marked preference for the Nestorians, rather than for those who adhered to the council of Ephesus; for they suspected the latter to be spies sent among them by the Greeks with whom they agreed as to religion.

5. The sect of the Monophysites was no less favourably situated, and it drew over to its side a great part of the East. In the first place, the emperor Anastasius [A.D. 491—518] was attached to the sect and to the dogmas of the Acephali or more rigid Monophysites;³ and he did not hesitate, on the removal of Flavianus from the chair of Antioch in 513, to elevate to that see Severus a learned monk of Palestine, who was devoted to that sect, and from whom the Monophysites had the name of Severians.⁴

rather than science their trade. Among such a people conviction of the understanding is little to be expected. Arguments of expediency would have more effect. They were surrounded by orthodox Christians, who would deprive them of their territories on the ground that they were heretics. If therefore they would enjoy peace and quietude, they must make up their minds to embrace the Nicene faith. Many of these conversions also were brought about by ladies; for instance, the conversion of Hermengild, a West Gothic prince, by his French wife Ingunda.—Schl.

¹ Cosmas Indicopleustes. Topographia Christiana, lib. ii. p. 125, in Montfaucon, Collectio Nova Patrum Græcor. of which the Preface, p. 11, &c. is worth reading.

² Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. iii. par. i. p. 109, 407, 411, 441, 449, and tom. iii. par. ii. cap. v. sec. 2, p. lxxviii, &c.

³ Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxx. xlv. &c.; Theodorus Lector, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. p. 562. A catalogue of the Works of Severus collected from MS. copies, is in Montfaucon's Biblioth. Cœlestina, p. 53, &c. [According to Evagrius, ubi supra, Anastasius was not zealous for any party, but was a great lover of peace, and determined neither to make nor to suffer any change in the ecclesiastical constitution; that is, he adhered to the Henoticon of Zeno his predecessor. This was taking the middle ground; for the more strenuous Monophysites rejected the Henoticon, and insisted on an explicit condemnation of the council of Chalcedon; while the more rigid Catholics, who also disliked the Henoticon, were for holding fast every title of the decisions of Chalcedon. See Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. vi. p. 930, 946, 947, 948.—Mur.]

⁴ See Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatican. tom. ii.

This man exerted all his powers to destroy the credit of the council of Chalcedon in the East, and to strengthen the party which professed but one nature in Christ; and his zealous efforts produced most grievous commotions.⁵ But the emperor Anastasius dying in the year 518, Severus was expelled from his see; and the sect which he had so zealously propagated, was restrained and depressed by Justin and the succeeding emperors to such a degree, that it seemed very near being ruined; yet it elected Sergius for its patriarch in place of Severus.⁶

6. When the Monophysites were nearly in despair and very few of their bishops remained, some of them being dead and others in captivity, an obscure man, Jacobus, surnamed Baradæus or Zanzalus, to distinguish him from others of the name, restored their fallen state.⁷ This indigent monk, a most indefatigable and persevering man, being ordained bishop by a few bishops confined in prison, travelled over all the East on foot, constituted a vast number of bishops and presbyters, revived everywhere the depressed spirits of the Monophysites, and was so efficient by his eloquence and his astonishing diligence, that when he died in the year 578 at Edessa, where he had been bishop, he left his sect in a very flourishing state in Syria, Mesopotamia, Armenia, Egypt, Nubia, Abyssinia, and other

p. 47, 321, &c.; Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexand. p. 127, 128, 130, 135, 138, &c. [See a notice of Severus, above, p. 224, note 2.—Mur.]

⁵ Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. lib. iii. cap. xxxiii.; Cyrillus, Vita Sabæ in Coteller, Monumenta Eccles. Græca, tom. iii. p. 312; Nouveau Diction. Histor. Critique, tome i. art. Anastasius. [There is some ambiguity in Mosheim's statement. Who was this man that exerted all his powers against the council of Chalcedon? Mac-laine understood Mosheim to refer to the emperor Anastasius; but other translators preserve the ambiguity. Historical facts show that it was Severus rather than Anastasius who persecuted the Chalcedonians. See Evagrius, ubi supra, lib. iii. cap. xxxiii.—Mur.]

⁶ See Abulpharajus, Series Patriarch. Antiochen. in Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. tom. ii. p. 323. [For a full and minute examination of the Monophysite history, see Walch's Hist. der Ketz. namely, during the reign of Anastasius, vol. vi. p. 936—1054; and Justin, vol. vii. p. 52—128; and under Justinian, ibid. p. 128—352.—Mur.]

⁷ See Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatican. tom. ii. cap. viii. p. 62, 72, 326, 331, 414, &c.; Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexand. p. 119, 133, 425, &c.; and Liturgia Oriental. tom. ii. p. 333, 342; Nairon, Euophia Fidei Catholica ex Syrorum Monumentis, par. i. p. 40, 41. [Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. viii. p. 481—490. Jacobus Baradæus was a Syrian monk and a pupil of Severus, archbishop of Antioch. His ordination is placed by some in the year 545, by others in 551. His death all place in the year 578. Some call him bishop of Edessa; others make him to have been bishop at large. The number of bishops, priests, and deacons ordained by him is reported to be 100,000. That he put an end to the divisions and contests among the Monophysites, as Mosheim asserts, is not stated in any of the authorities quoted by Walch. As the Monophysites all over the East are to this day called Jacobites from this Jacobus Baradæus, so the orthodox Greeks are called Melchites from the Syriac, Melcha, a king, as being adherents to the religion of the Imperial court.—Mur.] countries.¹ He extinguished nearly all the dissensions among the Monophysites; and as their churches were so widely dispersed in the East, that the bishop of Antioch could not well govern them all, he associated with him a Maphrian or primate of the East, whose residence was at Tagritum on the borders of Armenia.² His efforts were not a little aided in Egypt and the neighbouring regions by Theodosius of Alexandria. From this man, as the second father of the sect, all the Monophysites in the East are called Jacobites.

7. Thus the imprudence of the Greeks and their inconsiderate zeal for maintaining the truth, caused the Monophysites to become consolidated into a permanent body. From this period their whole community has been under the government of two bishops or patriarchs, one of Alexandria and the other of Antioch; who, notwithstanding the Syrians and Egyptians disagree in some particulars, are very careful to maintain communion with each other by letters and by kind offices. Under the patriarch of Alexandria is the primate or Abbuna of the Abyssinians; and under the patriarch of Antioch stands the Maphrian or primate of the East, whose residence is at Tagritum in Mesopotamia. The Armenians have their own bishop, and are distinguished from the other Monophysites by some peculiar rites and opinions.

8. Before the sect of the Monophysites had acquired this strength and consistency, various disagreements and controversies prevailed among them; and particularly at Alexandria a difficult and knotty question was moved concerning the body of Christ. Julian of Halicarnassus³ in the year 519, maintained that the divine nature had so insinuated itself into the body of Christ from the very moment of his conception, that this body changed its nature and became incorruptible. With him agreed Cajanus [or Gaianus] of Alexandria, from whom the believers in this sentiment were called Caijanists.⁴ The advocates of this doctrine became divided into three parties; two of which disagreed on the question whether Christ's body was created or uncreated; and the third maintained that Christ's body was indeed corruptible, but on account of the influence of the divine nature never became in fact corrupted. This sect was vigorously resisted by the celebrated Severus of Antioch and Damianes, who maintained that the body of Christ before his resurrection was corruptible—that is, was liable to all the changes to which human bodies in general are. Those who agreed with Julian were called Aphthartodocetæ, Docetæ, Phantasiastæ, and also Manichæans; because from their opinion it might be inferred that Christ did not really suffer, feel hungry, fall asleep, and experience the other sensations of a man; but that he only appeared to suffer, to sleep, to be hungry, thirsty, &c. Those who agreed with Severus were called Phthartolatræ, and Ktistolatræ or Creaticolæ. This controversy was agitated with great warmth in the reign of Justinian who favoured the Aphthartodocetæ; but it afterwards gradually subsided.⁵ A middle path between the two parties was taken by Xenaïas or Philoxenus of Maubug [or Hierapolis]; for he and his associates held that Christ really suffered the ordinary sensations of a man, but that in him this was not the effect of nature but of choice.⁶

9. Some of the Corrupticolæ, as they were called, particularly Themistius, a deacon of Alexandria, and Theodosius, bishop of that city, in the ardour of disputation fell upon another sentiment towards the close of this century⁷ which caused new commotions. They affirmed that while all things were known by the divine nature of Christ, to his human nature which was united with it many things were unknown. As they admitted but one nature in Christ [or were Monophysites], others put this construction upon their doctrine, that they anything. See Liberatus, Breviar. cap. xx. and Leon-tius, De Sectis, art. v.—Mur.

⁵ Timotheus, De Receptione Hæreticor. in Coteller, Monumenta Eccles. Gr. tom. iii. p. 409; Liberatus, Breviarium Controv. cap. xx.; Forbes, Instructiones Historico-theologicæ, lib. iii. cap. xviii. p. 108, &c.; Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 457. [The contests respecting the corruptibility of Christ's body, both among the Monophysites and the Orthodox, are fully examined in Walch, Hist. der Ketz. vol. vii. p. 550—644.—Mur.

⁶ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 22, and p. 168, &c.

⁷ This controversy began before the middle of the century; for Themistius was a deacon under Timotheus III. who died in the year 535. Theodosius succeeded in that year, but was removed about A.D. 537. The heat of the controversy seems to have been about A.D. 550 or 560; yet it was rife in the time of Gregory the Great, and the sect existed till some time in the seventh century.—Mur.

¹ For the Nubians and Abyssinians, see Asseman, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 330; Lobo, Voyage d'Abyssinie, tome ii. p. 36; Ludolph, Comment. ad Hist. Æthiop. p. 451, 461, 466. For the other countries see the writers of their history.

² Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 410, 414, 418; likewise his Dissert. de Monophysitis, prefixed to tom. ii. of his Bibliotheca.

³ Julian is noticed among the writers of the century, above p. 224, note 2.—Mur.

⁴ Gaianus was archdeacon of Alexandria under the patriarch Timotheus III. and on his death in the year 534 elected patriarch of Alexandria by the monks and the populace, in opposition to Theodosius, the bishop of the court party. Great commotions now existed in Alexandria, and Gaianus was soon deposed. He fled first to Carthage and then to Sardinia, and we hear little more about him. It is not known that he wrote made the divine nature to participate in this ignorance, and hence they were called Agnoëtæ.¹ But this new sect was feeble, and therefore it declined and became extinct sooner than might have been anticipated from the animated eloquence of the disputants.

10. From the controversies with the Monophysites arose the sect of the Tritheists. Its author was one John Ascunage, a Syrian philosopher and a Monophysite.² This man imagined there were in God three numerically distinct natures or subsistencies, all perfectly alike, and connected by no common vinculum of essence; from which dogma his adversaries deduced Tritheism. Among the patrons of this opinion no one was more celebrated than John Philoponus, a grammarian and philosopher of great fame at Alexandria; and hence he has by many been accounted the founder of the sect, and the members of it have been called Philoponists.³ As the sect increased it became divided into two parties, the Philoponists and the Cononites; the latter so named from its leader, Conon, bishop of Tarsus.⁴ These parties agreed respecting the doctrine of three Persons in the Godhead, but were at variance respecting the explanation of the doctrine concerning the resurrection of the body; for Philoponus maintained that both the matter and the form of all bodies were generated and corruptible, and therefore that both would be resuscitated at the resurrection; but Conon held that the matter only and not the form of bodies was corruptible and to be resuscitated.⁵ To both these stood opposed the Damianists, so named from Damianus [the Monophysite patriarch] of Alexandria. These discriminated between the divine essence and the three Persons of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. In other words, they denied that each Person, by himself and in nature, was God, but maintained that the three Persons had a common God or divinity, by an undivided participation of which each one was God. The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, they denominated Hypostases [or Persons], and what was common to them, God, substance, and nature.⁶

¹ Coteller, in the Monumenta Ecclesiæ. Gr. tom. iii. p. 641; Le Quien, on Damascenus De Hæresibus, tom. i. p. 107; Forbes, Instruct. Historico-theol. lib. iii. cap. xix. p. 119; Photius, Biblioth. Codex ccxxx. p. 882. [Walch has given a full and satisfactory account of the Agnoëtæ or Thomistiani, in his Hist. der Ketzer, vol. viii. p. 644—684. It appears that the Agnoëtæ merely denied that the human nature of Christ became omniscient by being united with the divine nature—a doctrine which few at this day will condemn. Nor did their contemporaries in general understand them to go farther. But the writers of the middle ages represent them as denying altogether the omniscience of Christ; and many of the moderns, till quite recently, had similar views of this sect. See Walch, ubi supra, p. 675—679.—Mur.]

² See Abulpharajus, in Asseman's Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. i. p. 328, &c. [This is the only ancient writer who mentions this John Ascunage; and his statement is, that this John was a disciple of Samuel Peter, a Syrian philosopher who taught philosophy twenty years at Constantinople; that John succeeded him in the school; but having advanced his new doctrine, he was banished by the emperor Justinian.—Mur.]

³ See Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. lib. v. cap. xxxvii. tom. ix. p. 358; Harduin, Concilii, tom. iii. p. 1288; Timotheus, De Receptum Hæreticor. in Coteller, Monum. Ecclesiæ. Gr. tom. iii. p. 414; John Damascenus, De Hæresibus, Opp. tom. i. p. 103, ed. Le Quien. [John Philoponus was born and probably spent his life at Alexandria. He was a literary layman, and deeply read in the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy. Yet he was a Christian and a Monophysite, as most of the Alexandrians in his day were. The time of his birth and death is unknown; but it appears that he was a writer from about A.D. 560 till several years into the 7th century. Whether his own reflections or the books of John Ascunage first led him to his Tritheism is uncertain. His works now extant are, a book on the Hexæmeron, another on Easter, one against Proclus to prove the world not eternal, a book on the Greek dialects, and Commentaries on various works of Aristotle. Many of his works are lost. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 267, and Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. viii. p. 702, &c.—Mur.

⁴ Photius, Biblioth. Codex xxiv.; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 329, &c.

⁵ For a full account of the disagreement between the Cononites and the other Philoponists respecting the resurrection of the body, see Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. viii. p. 762—778.—Mur.

⁶ Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 78, 332, &c. [The controversies respecting the Trinity in unity, which are the subject of this section, are minutely investigated by Walch, Hist. der Ketzer, vol. viii. p. 685—762. He concludes that Philoponus and his sect were really, though perhaps unconsciously, Tritheists; for Philoponus maintained a merely specific unity in God, and not a numerical unity; that is, he taught that the three Persons in the Trinity had a common nature, in the same sense that Paul and Peter had a common nature, and as all the angels have a common nature. (Walch, ubi supra, p. 728, &c.) The Damianists on the contrary rejecting the idea of a mere specific unity in God, held the three divine Persons to be numerically one, except as distinguished by certain characteristic marks; so that he was really on Sabellian ground. (Walch, ubi supra, 753—757.) See also Müllerscher's Dogmengeschichte, vol. iii. p. 512—516, ed. Marp. 1818.—Mur.]

CENTURY SEVENTH.

PART I.

THE EXTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THE CHURCH.

1. THE Christian religion was in this century diffused beyond its former bounds, both in the eastern and western countries. In the East the Nestorians, with incredible industry and perseverance, laboured to propagate it from Persia, Syria, and India, among the barbarous and savage nations inhabiting the deserts and the remotest shores of Asia; and that their zeal was not inefficient appears from numerous proofs still existing. In particular, the vast empire of China was enlightened by this zeal and industry with the light of Christianity. Those who regard as genuine and authentic that Chinese monument of Sigan, which was discovered in the seventeenth century, believe that Christianity was introduced into China in the year 636, when Jesubab of Gadala presided over the Nestorian community.¹ And those who look upon

¹ This celebrated monument has been published and explained by several persons; in particular by Kircher, China Illustrata, p. 53; Müller, in a distinct treatise, Berlin, 1672, 4to; Renaudot, Relations Anciennes des Indes et de la Chine, de deux Voyageurs Mahométans, p. 228—271, Paris, 1718, 8vo; Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Vatic. tom. iii. par. ii. cap. iv. sec. 7, p. 538, &c. A more accurate copy with notes was expected from the very learned Theoph. Sig. Bayer, much distinguished for his knowledge of Chinese literature. But his premature death frustrated the expectation. I see no reason why I should not regard this monument as genuine; nor can I conceive what advantage the Jesuits could have promised themselves from a fabrication of this sort. See Liron, Singularités Hist. et Littér. tome ii. p. 500, &c. [See also Tho. Yeatos, Indian Church History, p. 85—96, Lond. 1818, 8vo. Kircher's translation of the inscription with a comment and some notes is given in the Appendix to Moshelm's Hist. Eccles. Tartarorum, p. 2—28. The monument is said to be a marble slab ten feet long and five broad; dug up in the year 1625 at a town near Sin-gan-fu, capital of the province Shen-si. The top of the slab is a pyramidal cross. The caption to the inscription consists of nine Chinese words formed into a square, and is thus translated: "This stone was erected to the honour and eternal memory of the Law of Light and Truth brought from Ta-cin [Judea or Syria], and promulgated in China." The principal inscription is in Chinese characters, and consists of twenty-eight columns, each containing sixty-two words. It first states the fundamental principles of Christianity, and then this as a fabrication of the Jesuits may be fully satisfied by other and unexceptional proofs, that China, especially the northern part of it, contained in this century or perhaps even earlier, numerous Christians over whom presided, during several subsequent centuries, a metropolitan sent out by the patriarch of the Chaldeans or Nestorians.²

2. The attention of the Greeks was so engrossed with their intestine dissensions, that they were little solicitous about the propagation of Christianity among the heathen.³ In the West, among the Anglorecounts the arrival of missionaries in 636, their gracious reception by the king, their labours and success, and the principal events of the mission for 144 years or till A.D. 780. There were two persecutions in the years 699 and 713. Soon after the second persecution some new missionaries arrived. Then follow the date and erection of the monument in A.D. 782. On the one side of this principal inscription there is a column of Chinese characters; on the other side and at the bottom is a Syriac inscription in the Estrangelo character, containing catalogues of priests, deacons, and others, with a bishop, arranged in seven different classes.—Mur. [On this interesting monument, see also Milman's Gibbon's Decl. and Fall, &c. vol. viii. p. 347, with the editor's note in support of its authenticity.—R.

² See Renaudot, ubi supra, p. 51, 68, &c. et passim; Asseman, ubi supra, cap. ix. p. 522, &c. Bayer tells us (Præfat. ad Museum Sinicum, p. 84) that he possesses some testimonies which put the subject beyond controversy. [It is the constant tradition of the Syrian Christians that St. Thomas the apostle made an excursion to China; and the Christians of Malabar celebrate this event in their ordinary worship, and their private styled himself metropolitan of Hindoo and China when the Portuguese first knew them. See Yeatos, Indian Church Hist. p. 71—84. See also M. de Guignes, Diss. in the 30th vol. (p. 802, &c.) of the Mémoires de Littérature, tirées des Registres de l'Académie Royale des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres; which contains a defence of the genuineness of the Sigan monument, against the objections of La Croze and Beausobre. Likewise Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xix. p. 291—298.—Mur.

³ Yet Constantine Porphyrogenitus states, (de Administrando Imperio, cap. xxxi. in Bandurii's Imperium Orientale, p. 97, ed. Paris) that the Chrobatas (the Croats) who then inhabited Dalmatia, from which they had expelled the Avars, by order of Heraclius made application to that emperor for religious instructors; and that he procured priests for them from Rome, who baptized them, and one of them became their archbishop. See Semler's Selecta Cap. Hist. Eccles. tom. ii. p. 20; Lucius, De Regno Dalmatiae, lib. i. cap. xl.; Muratori, Historia Italia; and Asseman, in Calendar. Eccles. Univ. tom. i. p. 499, &c.—Schl.

Saxons, Augustine till his death in 605, and afterwards other monks sent from Rome, laboured to extend and enlarge the church. And the result of their labours and efforts was, that the other six Anglo-Saxon kings who had hitherto continued in paganism, gradually came over to the side of Christianity, and all Britain became professedly Christian.¹ Yet we need not believe that this change was wholly owing to the sermons and exhortations of these Roman monks and teachers; a great part of it is rather to be ascribed to the Christian wives of the kings and chiefs, who employed various arts to convert their husbands; and likewise to the rigorous laws enacted against the worshippers of idols;² not to mention other causes.

3. In this century many of the Britons, Scots, and Irish, eager to propagate the Christian religion, visited the Batavian, Belgic, and German tribes, and there founded new churches. It was this circumstance which led the Germans afterwards to erect so many monasteries for Scots and Irishmen, some of which are still in being.³ Columbanus, an Irishman, with a few companions, had already in the preceding century happily extirpated in Gaul and the contiguous regions the ancient idolatry, the roots of which had previously struck deep everywhere. He persevered in these labours till the year 615, in which his death is placed, and with the aid of his disciples carried the name of the Saviour to the Swabians, Bavarians, Franks, and other nations of Germany.⁴ St. Gall, one of his companions, imparted a knowledge of Christianity to the Helvetians and Swabians.⁵

St. Kilian, a Scotchman, converted a great many to Christ among the [Franconians or] eastern Franks.⁶ Near the close of the century, in the year 690, Willibrord, by birth an Anglo-Saxon, accompanied with eleven of his countrymen, namely, Suibert, Wigbert, Acca, Willibald, Unibald, Lehwinn, the two Ewalds, Werenfrid, Marcellin, and Adalbert, crossed over to Batavia lying opposite to Britain, with a view to convert the Frieslanders to Christianity. From thence they went in the year 692 to Fosteland, which most writers suppose to monastery twenty years after, St. Gall accompanied him in exile. Ascending the Rhine, they penetrated the heart of Switzerland about the year 610, and took residence among pagans at Tuggen, at the head of the lake of Zurich. Attacking idolatry St. Gall here burned the pagan temple, and cast their offerings into the lake. This enraged the people and the monks had to flee. Travelling through the Canton of St. Gall, they came to Arbon on the shores of the lake of Constance. Here Willimar, the presbyter of the place, treated them kindly and aided them to form a settlement at Bregenz, at the eastern extremity of the lake. Here the monks attempted to convert the surrounding pagans, and were not without some success. But at the end of two years the unconverted procured an order from the duke for the monks to quit the country. Columbanus and the rest now retired to Bobbio in Italy, but St. Gall was left behind sick. When recovered he retired into the wilderness with a few adherents, and erected the monastery of St. Gall, in the canton of the same name. Here he spent the remainder of his days in great reputation and honour. He refused the bishopric of Constance, which he conferred on his pupil Jolin. His monastery flourished much and spread light over the surrounding country. St. Gall died at Arbon, but was interred in his monastery at the age of ninety-five according to Mabillon. His sermon at the ordination of John at Constance and some epistles, are published by Canisius, ubi supra. His life by Strabo, from which this notice is extracted, though full of legendary tales is written in a far better style than the ordinary monkish biographies. It appears according to Strabo, that Switzerland was almost wholly pagan when first visited by Columbanus in 610; but that Christianity had then made considerable progress in Germany, from the lake of Constance all along the right bank of the Rhine.—Mur.

⁶ Vita S. Kiliani, in Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. iii. p. 171, &c.; de Ludewig, Scriptores rerum Wurtzburgensium p. 966. [See also the Life of St. Kilian in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. ii. p. 951—953, ed. Venice, 1733. According to the authorities, St. Kilian, Chilian, Cylian, Cilian, or Kyllena, was an Irishman of honourable birth and good education. In early life he had a great thirst for knowledge, and, being very pious and possessing a perfect knowledge of missionary enterprises, he planned one of his own. Taking with him Coloman, Gallon, and Arneval, presbyters, Donatus a deacon, and seven others, he penetrated into Franconia which was wholly pagan, and took up his residence at Heribopolis or Würzburg. Finding their prospects good, Kilian, Coloman, and Totnan, went to Italy, to obtain the papal sanction to their enterprise; which having readily obtained from Conon (who was pope eleven months ending Sept. 686), they returned to Würzburg, converted and baptized Gosbert, the duke, and a large number of his subjects. But afterwards, persuading the duke that it was unlawful for him to have his brother's wife, Geilan, he seized an occasional absence of her husband and murdered all the missionaries. This cruel act is placed in the year 696. But the massacre did not prevent the progress of Christianity; for the duchess became de-ranked, the assassins repented, and St. Kilian became the tutelar saint of Würzburg.—Mur. [See also Lanigan's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 115, &c. Fasti (Crit. ad Bar. ad annum) places this martyrdom in 689.—R.

¹ Bede, Hist. Eccles. gentis Anglor. lib. ii. cap. iii. p. 91, &c.; cap. xiv. p. 116; lib. iii. cap. xxi. p. 162, Ed. Chiffet; Kaplin, Hist. d'Angleterre, tome i. p. 22, &c.

² See Wilkins, Concilia Magnæ Britannie, tom. i. p. 6.

³ See Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. Februar. p. 362. [Nearly all of these monasteries have been dissolved and secularized during the wars of the French Revolution. Almost the only one remaining, because too poor to be plundered, is that of St. James, in the city of Ratisbon, founded by Irish monks in the beginning of the twelfth century, (Lanigan, Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. iv. p. 57) but now occupied by Scotch Benedictines. When I visited this monastery in 1845 there were only the prior and two monks supported out of its diminished revenues.—R.

⁴ Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedicti, tom. ii. p. 560, &c.; tom. iii. p. 72, 389, 560, and elsewhere. Adamannus, lib. iii. De S. Columbano, in Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. i. p. 674. [See a brief account of St. Columbanus above, p. 221, note 3.—Mur.]

⁵ Walafrod Strabo, Vita St. Galli, in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedicti, tom. ii. p. 228. [ed. Venice, p. 215, &c.] Canisius, Lectiones Antiquæ, tom. i. p. 783. St. Gall or St. Gallus was born in Ireland of religious parents, who early committed him to Columbanus for education. He became a monk of Bangor (near Belfast) under Columbanus, and was one of the twelve Irish monks who left Ireland with him about the year 589, travelled through England to the Continent, and erected the monastery of Luxeuil in Burgundy. When Columbanus was driven from this

be the island of Heligoland. Being driven thence by Radbod, king of the Frieslanders, who put Wigbert, one of the company, to death, they wandered over Cimbria and the adjacent parts of Denmark. Returning to Friesland in the year 693, they attacked the superstition of the country with better success. Willibrord was now created by the Roman pontiff archbishop of Wilteburg [since called Utrecht], and died at an advanced age among the Batavians. His associates spread a knowledge of Christianity among the Westphalians and neighbouring nations.¹

4. Of these and other expeditions undertaken for the extension of Christianity, an impartial man who adheres to truth will not speak in terms of indiscriminate praise. That some of these preachers were men of honest simplicity and piety no one can doubt. But most of them show manifest proofs of various sinful passions, of arrogance, avarice, and cruelty; and having received authority from the Roman pontiff to exercise their sacred functions among the barbarians, they did not so much collect holy congregations of devout Christians, as procure for themselves a people among whom they might act the part of sovereigns and lords. I cannot therefore strongly censure those who suspect that some of these monks, being desirous of ruling, concealed for a time their vicious propensities under the veil of religion, and imposed upon themselves various hardships, that they might acquire the rank and honours of bishops and archbishops.

5. Of the Jews very few, if any, voluntarily embraced Christianity. But the Christians compelled many of them in different places, by means of penalties, to make an outward profession of belief in Christ. The emperor Heraclius being incensed against them, as is reported, by the influence of Christian doctors, made havoc of the miserable nation, and ordered vast numbers of them to be dragged reluctantly to baptism.² The kings of Spain and Gaul had no hesitation to do the same, although the Roman pontiffs were opposed to it.³ Such evils resulted from ignorance of the true principles of Christianity, and from the barbarism of the age.

CHAPTER II.

ADVERSITIES OF THE CHURCH.

1. The Christians suffered less in this century than in the preceding ones. By the Persian kings they were at times persecuted, but the rage against them soon subsided. In England some of the petty kings oppressed the new converts to Christianity; but soon after these kings themselves became professed Christians. In the East, especially in Syria and Palestine, the Jews sometimes rose upon the Christians with great violence;⁴ yet so unsuccessfully as to suffer severely for their temerity. Those living among the Christians, who secretly consulted about restoring the pagan religion, were too weak to venture on any positive measures.

2. But a new and most powerful adversary of Christianity started up in Arabia. A.D. 612, in the reign of Heraclius. Mohammed was indeed an illiterate man,⁵ but

¹ Alcuin, Vita Willibrordi, in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 604, &c. 1559, &c. ed. Venice] Müller's Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 980, &c. [Bede, Hist. Eccles. lib. v. cap. xl. xli. This famous missionary was born in Northumberland about A.D. 659, of pious parents. Educated in the monastery of Ripon (Hirpenis), Yorkshire, anciently in the kingdom of Northumbria, at the age of twenty he went to Ireland, where he studied twelve years. At the age of thirty-three he commenced his mission, and sailed up the Rhine to Utrecht in the dominions of Radbod, the pagan king of the Frisians. Soon after he went to France, and by advice of King Pepin visited Italy, and obtained the sanction of Pope Sergius to his enterprise. Returning to Utrecht he in vain attempted the conversion of Radbod and his subjects. Therefore proceeding northward, he landed at an island called Fosetland, which was on the confines of Denmark and Friesland, and so sacred that its fruit, its animals, and even its waters were holy, and whoever profaned them was to be punished with death. Willibrord and his company wholly disregarded the sacredness of the place, violated the laws, were arraigned before Radbod who cast lots on their destiny, by which one was doomed to death and the others dismissed. They now penetrated into Denmark. On their return to the confines of France, Pepin, who in 693 had vanquished Radbod, sent Willibrord again to Italy to be consecrated archbishop of Utrecht. Pope Sergius now gave him the name of Clemens. Returning clothed with dignity, his friend Pepin aided him in his work; and for about fifty years from his leaving England, he laboured and with much success as the apostle of the Frieslanders. He died about the year 740 at the advanced age of 81. Thus far Alcuin's narrative goes. Of his followers it is said that the two Ewalds (the one called the white and the other the black Ewald) were put to death by a Saxon king, and their bodies cast into the Rhine; that Sulpert preached to the Bructeri near Cologne, and at last at Kaiserswerth on the Rhine, where he died A.D. 713; that Willibald became bishop of Eichstadt in Bavaria, and Marcellin, bishop of the country along the Issel.—Mar.

² Eutychius, Annales Eccles. Alexandr. tom. ii. p. 212, &c.

³ See some authorities on this subject, quoted by Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 614, sub fin. tom. viii. p. 239, &c. Ed. Antw. 1800.—Mur.

⁴ Eutychius, Annales, tom. ii. p. 236, &c. Hottinger, Hist. Orientalis, lib. i. c. lli. p. 129, &c.

⁵ Mohammed himself professed to be destitute of science and learning, and even to be unable to read and write; and his followers have deduced from this his ignorance an argument for the divinity of the religion which he taught. But it is hardly credible that he was so rude and ignorant a man. And there are some among his adherents who question the reality of the fact. See Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome iv. p. 33, 34. Indeed, when I consider that Mohammed for a long time pursued a gainful commerce in Arabia and the adjacent countries, I think he must have been able to read and write, and cast accounts; for merchants cannot dispense with this degree of knowledge. [Moshelm of noble birth, naturally eloquent, and possessing great acuteness of mind.¹ He proclaimed that he was sent by God to overthrow all polytheism; and also to purge and reform, first, the religions of the Arabs, and next, those of the Jews and the Christians; and having framed a law which is called the Koran,² after gaining some victories over his enemies he compelled an immense multitude of persons, first in Arabia and then in the neighbouring countries, to profess his doctrines. Elated with this unexpected success, he now began to think of founding an empire, and he effected his object with as much success as boldness; so that at his death, he saw himself the sovereign of all Arabia, and of several of the neighbouring countries.

3. No one can at this day form a perfect judgment of the entire character, views, and designs of Muhammed. For we cannot safely rely on the Greek writers, who made no hesitation to load their enemy with slanders and falsehoods; nor can we trust to the Arabians, who are the very worst historians, who conceal all his vices and crimes, and depict him as altogether a divine person. Besides, a very considerable part of his life, and that too from which here reasons in the very manner which he himself condemns; viz. such a thing does not occur at this day, and therefore it did not in ancient times. See the Introd. sec. 19, p. 6, above.) According to the Koran and all the Mohammedan writers, the times preceding Muhammed were times of ignorance among the Arabs. The tribe of Hamyar in Yemen had indeed for some centuries possessed a rude alphabet; but the use of it was not publicly taught nor suffered except with special permission. The Arab Jews and Christians likewise undoubtedly used letters, but all the pagan Arabs of the Ishmaelitic stock, including the tribe of Koreish, as well as of others, were without letters previously to the introduction of the Cufic character in which the Koran was first written. This alphabet was invented at Cufah in Irak, a little before the times of Muhammed, and was first taught at Mecca, as it is said, by Bashar the Kendian, just before the institution of the Mohammedan religion. See Sale's Koran, Prelim. Diss. sec. 1, p. 35. Hence the best educated men in his tribe, up to the time he appeared, were unable to read and write; and much more the camel drivers and the men in active life, such as Muhammed was. Though of noble birth he was an orphan child, whose whole patrimony was five camels and a female slave. His uncle, Abu Taleh, who brought him up, twice sent him in his caravan to Syria, first when he was thirteen, and then when about twenty years old. In the interval, he went on a military expedition against a neighbouring tribe. And this is all we know of him till the age of twenty-five when he was recommended to a rich widow of Mecca, named Cadijah, to be her factor; and she sent him in that capacity to Damascus and the adjacent parts of Syria. On his return she gave him her hand and her fortune, and he became an opulent citizen of Mecca. This was about twelve years before he assumed the character of a prophet. Now that such a man should be among the very first in Mecca to learn the use of letters is not to be expected. Much less can we infer from his occupation, that he must have been able to read and write. That he employed his son-in-law Ali as his scribe in committing the Koran to writing is the constant testimony of his followers. And that he should appeal in that look to his own ignorance of letters as proof that he did not write it cut and polish it in his closet, seems to be good evidence of such ignorance. For his intimate acquaintances must have known whether that ignorance was real or not; and as most of them were slow to admit his pretensions to a divine mission, it cannot be supposed he would jeopardize his reputation as a man of veracity and of common sense, by referring them to what they knew to be false as good evidence of his inspiration. See Sale's Koran, chap. i. vol. i. p. 192, and chap. xxix, vol. ii. p. 236. See also Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. i. note 70, vol. v. p. 147, &c. And on the other side, White's Hampton Lectures, p. 203, 204, and notes 26—38, also Bush's Life of Muhammed, p. 38, 39.—Mur.

1 The writers on his life and religion are enumerated by Fabricius, Delectus et Sylabus Argumentorum pro veritate relig. Christ. cap. i. p. 733, &c. To which may be added Count Boulainvilliers, Vie de Mahomet, Lond. 1730, 8vo, which however is rather a romance than a history; Gagnier, Vie de Mahomet, 2 vols. 12mo, Amst. 1732, commendable for the ingenuousness of the author, yet the style is dry; and George Sale, a distinguished and very judicious author, in his preliminary discourse prefixed to his version of the Koran, sec. ii. p. 45, &c. ed. Lond. 1825; Frideraux, Life of Mahomet, 1697, 8vo; Bayle, Dictionnaire, art. Mahomet, Rees's Cyclopaedia, art. Mahomet; Abulfeda, Annales Muselm. Arab. and Lat. 2 vols. 4to, Copenh. 1790; Abulfeda, de Vita et Rebus Gestis Muhammedis, Arab. and Lat. Oxon. 1723; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xix. p. 327—405.—Mur.

2 For an account of the Koran see, in preference to all others, Sale's Preliminary Discourse prefixed to his English version of that book. Add Vertot, Discours sur l'Alcoran, annexed to the third volume of his Hist. des Chevaliers de Malte; Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome ii. p. 281, new ed. The book which the Mohammedans call the Koran, is a collection of papers and discourses discovered and published after the death of Muhammed, and is not that Luce which he so highly extolled. Perhaps some parts of the true Koran are still found in the modern Koran; but that the Koran or Law which Muhammed prescribed to the Arabians differed from the present Koran, is manifest from the fact that Muhammed in our Koran appeals to and extols that other the true Koran. A book which is commended and extolled in any writing, must certainly be different from that in which it is commended. May we not conjecture that the true Koran was an Arabic poem which Muhammed recited to his adherents, and wished them to commit to memory, but which he did not write out? Such it is well known to be the laws of the Gallic Druids; and such is said to be that Indian law which the Brahmins learn and preserve in their memories. [These conjectures of Moshelm appear wholly without foundation. There is no reason to believe there ever was a Koran essentially different from that we now have; or that Muhammed declined committing his pretended revelations to writing. The only argument adduced by Moshelm is of no force at all, considering the manner in which the Koran came into existence. The book itself professes to have been composed by God in the highest heavens; and thence sent down to the lower heavens by the angel Gabriel, who communicated it by parcels to Muhammed during the twenty-three years that he claimed to be a prophet. Moreover, the parcels revealed last often revoked or modified what had been revealed before, and likewise replied to the objections of infidels against the book. See Sale's Koran, vol. i. chap. vi. p. 159, and vol. ii. chap. x. p. 31; chap. xvi. p. 107; chap. xxv. p. 213; chap. xxvii. p. 497. The Mohammedan doctors say the Koran existed together with the decrees of God, from all eternity, engraven on a table of stone hard by the throne of God, and called the Preserved Table; that God sent the angel Gabriel with a transcript of the entire Koran down to the lowest heavens, where during twenty-three years he revealed it by parcels to Muhammed; that Muhammed caused the parcels to be written down by his scribe as they were received, and published them at once to his followers; some of whom took copies, while the greater part got them by heart; that the original MSS. of the scribe when returned were thrown promiscuously into a chest, whence they were taken after the prophet's death and published collectively in their present form and order, which is wholly without regard to dates or a classification of subjects. See Sale's Prelim. Discourse, sec. iii. p. 77—95.—Mur.

the motives and secret springs of his conduct would best appear, lies concealed from us. It is very probable however, that abhorrence of the superstition in which he saw his countrymen involved, so wrought upon him as to throw him into a disordered state of mind; and that he really believed he was divinely commissioned to reform the religion of the Arabs, and reinstate among them the worship of the one true God. But it is also certain, that afterwards when he saw his attempts attended with success, he deluded the fickle and credulous multitude with impious tricks and impositions, in order to strengthen his cause; and even feigned divine revelations whenever occasion seemed to require it, or any great difficulty occurred. Nor was this fraud inconsistent with his being a fanatic; for most fanatics think deception, so far as seems necessary to their designs, to be holy and approved of God; and they of course resort to deception when they can do it safely.¹ The religion which he inculcated is not what it would have been, if his designs had not been opposed. The pertinacity with which the Arabians adhered to the opinions and customs of their ancestors, and the hope of gaining over the Jews and the Christians to his cause, undoubtedly led him to approve and tolerate many things, which he would have rejected and abrogated if he had been at liberty to pursue his own choice.

4. The causes of the rapid propagation of this new religion among so many nations, are not difficult to be discovered. In the first place, the terror of arms which Mohammed and his successors carried with great success into different countries, compelled vast multitudes to receive his law. In the next place, his law itself was admirably adapted to the natural dispositions of men, and especially to the manners, opinions, and vices prevalent among the people of the East: for it was extremely simple, proposing very few things to be believed, nor did it enjoin many and difficult duties to be performed, or such as laid severe restraints on the propensities of men.²

¹ In my judgment this is the best way of deciding the controversy which has been agitated by learned men of our age; whether Mohammed was a fanatic or an impostor? See Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome iii. article, Mahomet, note k; Ockley, Conquest of Syria, Persia, and Egypt, by the Saracens, vol. i. p. 68, Lond. 1708, 8vo; Sale, Prelim. Discourse to his translation of the Koran, sec. 2, [p. 53, &c. ed. Lond. 1825; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xix. p. 380, &c.—Mur.

² See Reland, De Religione Mahumetica, lib. ii. Utrecht, 1717, 12mo; Sale, Prelim. Dissert. to the Koran, sec. 4, 5, 6; More, Dictionary of all Religions, article, Mahometans, ed. 1817; Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xix. p. 356, &c.; Hallam's Middle Ages, vol. i. p. 475, 8th ed.—Mur.

Moreover, the consummate ignorance which characterized for the most part the Arabians, the Syrians, the Persians, and other nations of the East, gave a bold and eloquent man easy control over the minds of immense numbers. We may add, that the virulent contests among the Christians, Greeks, Nestorians, Eutychians, and Monophysites, which filled a large part of the East with carnage and horrible crimes, rendered their religion odious in the eyes of many. And further, the Monophysites and Nestorians whom the Greeks oppressed most grievously, gave assistance to the Arabians, and facilitated their conquest of certain provinces, and thus secured the preponderance of their sects in those regions.³ Other causes will readily suggest themselves to those who consider attentively the state of the world, and the character of the Mohammedan religion.

5. After the death of Mohammed in the year 632, his followers issuing forth from Arabia, with their native fortitude stimulated by a furious fanaticism, and aided as has been already observed by those Christians who were persecuted by the Greeks, extended their conquests over Syria, Persia, Egypt, and some other countries.⁴ Nor could the Greeks, harassed with intestine commotions and various wars, put forth sufficient energy to check their rapid career. The victors at first used their prosperity with moderation, and were very indulgent towards the Christians, especially to those who opposed the decrees of Ephesus and Chalcedon. But, as is common with those enjoying uninterrupted success, they insensibly swerved from this moderation into severity, and so loaded the Christians with taxes and other burdens and injuries, that their condition resembled more that of slaves than that of citizens.⁵

³ See Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexandr. p. 163, 169, [and Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c. chap. ii. where this is shown by the conduct of the Copts or Jacobites in Egypt.—Mur.] [The corrupt state of religion in the East and the prevalence of a Christianized idolatry ought also to be considered as not the least powerful among the causes of the success of Mohammedanism. Isaac Taylor has stated very forcibly this circumstance: "What Mahomet and his caliphs found in all directions 'whether their scymetars cut a path for them, was a superstition so abject, an idolatry so gross and shameless, church doctrines so arrogant, church practices so dissolute and so puerile, that the strong-minded Arabians felt themselves inspired anew as God's messengers to reprove the errors of the world, and authorized as God's avengers to punish apostate Christendom. The son of the bond-woman was let loose from his deserts to 'mock' and to chastise the son of the free-woman."—Ancient Christ, vol. i. p. 266.—R.]

⁴ See Ockley, Conquest of Syria by the Saracens, vols. i. and ii. 8vo. Also Gibbon, Decline and Fall, &c. chap. i. li.—Mur.

⁵ Mohammed framed the Koran to be the basis of civil government as well as of religion among his followers; and in all ages they have so regarded it till the present time. Church and state, religion and civil policy are so united and blended by the Koran, that

6. The civil dissensions among the Mohammedans which arose soon after the death of their prophet, were not a little injurious to the success of their enterprises. Abubeker, the father-in-law, and Ali the son-in-law, of Mohammed, contended violently about the right to the throne, which each claimed to himself; and this controversy being handed down to posterity, divided the whole race into two great parties, separated not only by a difference in opinions and practices, but also by deadly hatred. The two sects are called, the one Sunnites, and the other Shiites.¹ The former contend that Abubeker was the true Kalif; the latter, that Ali was the legitimate Kalif or successor of Mohammed. Both regard the Koran as of divine origin and the authoritative rule in religion; but the Sunnites unite with it the Sonna, a sort of oral law derived from Mohammed and serving to explain the Koran, which the Shiites wholly discard. The Turks, Tartars, Africans, and most of the Indians, are Sunnites; the Persians and Mogores are Shiites, although the Mogores seem to belong to neither sect.² Besides these two grand divisions, there are among the Muhammedans four principal sects and a great many subordinate ones,³ which contend sharply respecting various subjects in religion, yet practise mutual toleration.⁴

PART II.

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

HISTORY OF LITERATURE AND SCIENCE.

1. THE profound ignorance and barbarism of this century will hardly appear credible to those who have not personally examined its extant literary productions. What little learning and knowledge still remained, with a few exceptions, was confined to the cloisters of the monks, especially in the Latin [or western] church. The laws forbade any one to be made an abbot unless he had some learning. The monks were required to devote certain hours to reading; and that they might derive greater profit from this exercise, they were required in most monasteries to converse together at stated times on what they had read.⁵ It was their business also to educate young men destined for the sacred office. But all the institutions of this sort were of little service to the cause of learning and to the church, because very few had any just conceptions of the nature and utility of the

they cannot be separated but must stand or fall together. Hence the permanence and unchangeable character of the Mohammedan religion in all countries where it has become established. For to attempt to change the religion of a Mohammedan country, or even to convert any of its citizens, is to plot against the state, it is high treason and must be punished as such. Mohammed united in his own person the two characters of an absolute monarch and of a sovereign pontiff or high-priest; and the Koran made no provision for these two offices ever to be separated. At the same time he named no one to succeed himself, nor pointed out the manner in which this complex office should descend from one person to another. Hence his ghostly empire was in imminent danger of dissolution at his death; but the religious enthusiasm of his followers preserved and perpetuated it.—Mur. [As may be seen in the ordinary histories of Mohammedanism.—R.

¹ See Reland, De Religione Turcica, lib. i. p. 36, 70, 74, 85. Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome ii. p. 236, &c.

² The principles of the Sunnites may be learned from the tract published by Reland, De Religione Turcica, lib. i. The religion and opinions of the Shiites are clearly stated by Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome iv. passim.

³ On the Mohammedan sects, see Hottinger, Hist. Orientalis, lib. ii. cap. vi. p. 340. Ricaut, Etat de l'Empire Ottoman, liv. ii. p. 242. Chardin, Voyages en Perse, tome ii. p. 236. Sale, Prelim. Discourse, sec. 8, p. 207, &c.

⁴ There is scarcely any subject on which English literature is so defective as on that of Mohammedanism, with its cognate topics—the early or ante-Mohammedan history of the Arabs, the biography of their prophet so full of unsolved problems, the providential import and destiny of their faith, the singular revolutions of their literature, and their present intellectual and moral position among civilized nations. Though much has been done during this century in preparing the way for an accurate and philosophical and (what is so much wanted) a dispassionate investigation of the subject, by the cultivation of the oriental languages especially in France and Germany, by the publication and translation of oriental works hitherto inaccessible, and by the labours of intelligent travellers and missionaries in the East; yet no one in Britain has yet availed himself of these facilities to undertake such a work as is needed. The only modern contributions since Sale's translation of the Koran, have been Mills's History of Muhammedanism (2d edit. Lond. 1818), which is, at the best, no more than a sketch; and Forster's Malometanism unveiled (Lond. 1829, 2 vols.), which, though ingenious and free from the prejudices of earlier inquirers is framed, upon a hypothesis of prophetic interpretation which has not met with general acceptance. In Germany the subject has attracted a much greater share of attention: the student will see in Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. 4th edit. vol. i. part ii. p. 467, 468, a list of the more recent works in that country on the religious aspects of Mohammedanism, among which the more valuable are said to be those by Well, a Protestant, and Döllinger, a Roman Catholic. The missionary travels of Martyn, Dwight, Southgate, Perkins, and others, contain important contributions towards forming a just estimate of the present condition of the Mussulmans, both moral and intellectual. See the Retrospective Review, vol. iii. p. 1, and the Foreign Quarterly Review, vol. xxiv. p. 1, for very interesting articles, though not altogether free from objectionable matter, on the rise of Mohammedanism, and on the structure and contents of the Koran.—R.

⁵ Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. ii. p. 479, 513, et passim.

liberal arts and sciences, and most of them were more intent on the perusal of worthless writers and the lives of saints, than on the study of valuable authors. The better class were assiduous in perusing the works of Augustine and Gregory the Great, and scraps gathered from these fathers constitute the best productions of the Latin church in this century.

2. Kings and noblemen were attentive to everything rather than to the cause of learning. The rude and unlearned bishops suffered the schools which had been committed to their care to languish and become extinct.¹ It was very rare to find among them persons able to compose their own public discourses. Those who possessed some genius garbled from Augustine and Gregory a parcel of jejune addresses, a part of which they kept for their own use, and the rest they imparted to their more dull and stupid colleagues, that they also might have something they could deliver. This is manifest from the examples of Casarius of Arles and of Eligius of Noyon. There is also extant a Summary of Theology, which was unskillfully compiled by Tajo, bishop of Saragossa, from the writings of Augustine and Gregory; and this insipid performance was so highly esteemed, that the other bishops did not hesitate to style the author of it, the true salt of the earth and a divine luminary in the church.² Many such proofs of the ignorance of the times may be easily collected by any one disposed to examine the writers of this century. England however was in a happier state in this respect than the other countries of Europe; for Theodorus, a Cilician and bishop of Canterbury, of whom more will be said hereafter, introduced into that country some attachment to knowledge and literature.³

3. The Greeks who attempted to write either in poetry or in prose obscured very plain and simple subjects by their tumid and inflated diction. The style of the Latins, with a few exceptions, was so base and corrupt that it cannot be eulogised even for this want of taste. History was wretchedly perverted both by the Greeks and the Latins. Among the former, Moschus, Sophronius, and others, and among the latter, Braulio, Jonas an Irishman, Audoenus [or] Dado, and Adamannus, have transmitted to us biographies of several saints, which are insipid and ridiculous, and destitute alike of an air of probability and of elegance of composition. The Greeks led the way in committing to writing without discrimination whatever reports were in circulation among the vulgar in regard to more ancient times; and hence originated those medleys of fables which the Latins afterwards so eagerly embraced.

4. Philosophy among the Latins was at an end. Those who were unwilling to neglect it altogether, were satisfied with committing to memory a few words and sentences taken from Boëthius and Cassiodorus; for they were not disposed to reason on the subject, and they were unable to consult the Greeks from ignorance of their language. The Greeks abandoning Plato to certain of the monks, betook themselves to Aristotle, whose principles of reasoning were nearly indispensable in the theological contests of this century with the Monophysites, Nestorians, and Monothelites; for all these resorted to the Stagyrite for aid whenever they were called to the combat; hence James of Edessa, a Monophysite of this century, translated Aristotle's Dialectics into Syriac.⁴

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE CHURCH.

1. The contest for pre-eminence between the Roman and Constantinopolitan prelates had gained such a height in this century, that we may clearly discern the commencement of that unhappy schism which afterwards separated the Latins from the Greeks. It is commonly asserted by men of the greatest learning and best acquainted with ancient history, that the Roman pontiff, Boniface III. prevailed on that abominable tyrant, Phocas, who, after murdering the emperor Mauritius, mounted the imperial throne, to divest the bishop of Constantinople of the title of œcumenical bishop, and to confer it on the Roman pontiff. But this is stated solely on the authority of Baronius,⁵ for no ancient writer has given such testimony. Yet Phocas did something analogous to this, if we may believe Anastasius and Paul Diaconus;⁶ for whereas the

⁴ See Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. tom. i. p. 498.

⁵ Baronius, Annals, ad ann. 606, No. 2.—Schl.

⁶ Anastasius, De Vitis Pontificum (Bonifacius III.) Paulus Diaconus, De Rebus gestis Longobardorum. lib. iv. cap. xxxvii. in Muratori, Script. Rer. Italic. tom. i. par. i. p. 465. [Anastasius says that "whereas the church of Constantinople had claimed to be the first of all the churches, Boniface obtained from the emperor Phocas that the Romish church, the apostolic seat of the blessed apostle Peter, should be the head of all the churches." Paul the Deacon says:—"This emperor, Phocas, at the request of Pope Boniface, decreed that the see of the Roman and apostolic church should be bishops of Constantinople had maintained that their church was not only fully equal to that of Rome, but had precedence of all other churches, Phocas forbade this, and determined that the priority of rank and dignity should be given to the church of Rome.

¹ Hist. Littér. de la France, by the Benedictines, cent. vii. tome iii. p. 428, &c.

² Mabillon, Analeceta Veteris Ævi, tom. ii. p. 77.

³ Wilkins, Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ. tom. i. p. 42; Conringius, Antiquit. Academ. p. 277.

2. The Roman pontiffs used indeed every means to maintain and enlarge the power and dignity which they had obtained; yet the history of this period affords many proofs, not only that emperors and kings but that nations also resisted those attempts. Various proofs of the exercise of the regal power in religious matters, and even over the Pope himself, may be collected from the Byzantine history and from the Formulas of Marculfus. The Roman writers tell us that Constantine Pogonatus formally relinquished the right of confirming the election of a Roman pontiff, and they cite Anastasius as a witness who states, that Pogonatus ordered that a Roman pontiff elect should be ordained forthwith and without delay.¹ But this testimony does not reach the point to be proved. It appears however to have been the fact, that this emperor, in the time of the pontiff Agathio, remitted the customary payment to the court of a sum of money for the confirmation of a pontifical election.² The ancient Britons and Scots could not be moved for a long time, either by the threats or the promises of the papal legates, to subject themselves to the Roman decrees and laws, as is abundantly testified by Bede.³ The

the first, whereas the Constantinopolitan had before assumed to be the first of all." By being the first and the head, both the bishops of Constantinople and the usurper Phocas seem to have understood merely priority of rank; and not that supreme authority and dominion which the Roman pontiffs afterwards claimed. It was intended as a compliment, but it was construed into a grant of unlimited power. See Bower's Lives of the Popes (Boniface III.), vol. ii. p. 546, &c.—Mur.

¹ Anastasius, De Vitis Pontif. (Benedict) in Muratori, Scriptor. Rerum Italic. tom. iii. p. 146. [The words of Anastasius are: concessit, ut persona, que electa fuerit in eodem Apostolice, c. vestigio absque lachrymâ Pontifex ordinaretur. That is, it should not be necessary to write to Constantinople, but merely to obtain liberty from the emperor's vicergerent, the exarch of Ravenna, previously to the ordination. Moreover history shows that succeeding emperors did not respect this privilege.—Schl.

² Anastasius, De Vitis Pontif. (Agathio) p. 144. Compare Mascovius, Hist. Germanor. tom. ii. note, p. 121, &c. [According to Anastasius the emperor did not wholly remit but only diminish the amount of the payment; "relevata est quantitas, quæ solita est dari;" and this too with the express injunction that the ancient rule should be observed, and no ordination take place till the consent of the emperor should be obtained from court. See Bower's Lives of the Popes (Agathio) vol. iii. p. 131, &c.—Mur.

³ Bede, Hist. Eccles. lib. ii. cap. li. lib. iii. cap. xxv.—Schl. The case of Wilfrid, bishop of York, who being deposed and banished by the Saxon king in 678, appealed to Rome and returned acquitted, but was imprisoned nine months and then banished the kingdom, is a strong case in point. See Bower's Lives of the Popes (Agathio) vol. iii. p. 99–103.—Mur.

Gauls and the Spaniards, as no one can deny, attributed just so much authority to the pontiff as they supposed would be for their own advantage.⁴ Nor in Italy itself could he make the bishop of Ravenna and others bow obsequiously to his will;⁵ and of private individuals there were many who expressed openly their detestation of his vices and his greediness of power. Nor are those destitute of arguments who assert that the Waldenses even in this century had fixed their residence in the valleys of Piedmont, and inveighed freely against Roman domination.⁶

3. That the bishops of inferior rank and all who were intrusted with sacred offices, as well those in the monasteries as those without, lived in the practice of many enormities, is expressly admitted by every writer of any note in this century. Everywhere simony, avarice, pious frauds, intolerable pride, insolence to the people at large, and even vices worse than these might be seen reigning in the places consecrated to holiness and virtue.⁷ Between

⁴ It is well known that the French kings often deposed bishops, whom the popes by all their efforts were not able to restore; and that in Spain Julianus, the bishop of Toledo, freely censured Pope Benedict II. for sending into Spain his disapprobation of a synodic letter; and accused his holiness of ignorance, negligence, and jealousy. Yet this Julianus is a canonised saint. See the fifteenth council of Toledo, in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1761, &c.—Schl.

⁵ Mich. Geddes, Miscellaneous Tracts, vol. ii. p. 6, &c. [and Muratori, Hist. of Italy, vol. iv. p. 157, where is a diploma of the emperor Constantine IV. in which he releases Maurus, archbishop of Ravenna, from obedience to the pope. At his death this archbishop warned his clergy not to subject themselves to the Roman pontiff, but to apply to the emperor for a pall for the new archbishop. And to the present time, the archbishops claim a kind of independence of the Roman see. Even the abbot Columbanus defends the ancient Irish manner of keeping Easter against the popes, with great intrepidity, and likewise the subject of the three chapters; and this at the instigation of King Agilulph. He maintains that Vigilus was not watchful enough, and that the pope ought to purge the seat of St. Peter from all errors, from which it was not now free. See his five Epistles, in the Biblioth. max. Patr. Lugd. tom. xii. p. 1, &c.—Schl.

⁶ Leger, Hist. des Eglises Froidaises, livr. i. p. 15, &c. [and Spanheim, Introduct. plen. tom. ii. p. 528, &c.—Schl. This fact however is denied by all the later Romanist authorities, and by some among Protestant writers, of whom the most recent is Maitland in his Facts and Documents illustrative of the Ancient Albigenses and Waldenses, Lond. 1832—R.

⁷ Thus we read of Desiderius a nobleman, that he assumed the garb of a beggar and conducted Brunchild, who was expelled the court of Theodbert, in safety to the court of Burgundy. At her solicitation her faithful conductor was advanced to the bishopric of Auxerre (Daniel, Histoire de France, vol. i. p. 351), a worthy candidate for the episcopal office! To the simony of the clergy the national Synod of Toledo A.D. 653, Can. 3. bears testimony; to their avarice the provincial synod of Merida in Spain (Harduin, tom. iii. p. 997); to their violence the council of Braga A.D. 675, where they were forbidden to inflict blows. In the same year a council at Toledo commanded the clergy to read the Bible on pain of excommunication (Harduin, tom. iii. p. 1017), and required every new bishop to make oath that he had neither paid, nor promised to pay, money for his bishopric. Even the papal chair the monks and the bishops many pertinacious quarrels existed in different places; for the latter laid their greedy hands on the rich possessions of the monks that they might support their own luxury. And the monks feeling this very sensibly first applied to the emperors and kings; but not finding their protection adequate, resorted to the Roman pontiff.¹ He therefore readily took them under his care, and gradually exempted them from the jurisdiction of the bishops. The monks in return defended the interest of the pontiff as if it were their own; and they recommended him as a sort of god to the ignorant multitude, over whom their reputed sanctity gave them great influence. That these exemptions of the monks were the cause of many of their vices and disorders, is admitted by several of the best writers.²

4. In the mean time the monks, from the favour of the pontiff and their display of fictitious piety, were everywhere making surprising progress, especially among the Latins. Parents eagerly consecrated their children to God, with large portions of their property made over to the monasteries; that is, they devoted them to what was esteemed the highest bliss on earth—a life of solitude.³ Those who had spent their lives in guilty deeds hoped to expiate their crimes by conferring the greater part of their property on some society of monks; and immense numbers, impelled by superstition, robbed their heirs of their richest possessions, in order to render God propitious to them through the prayers of monks. Rules for monastic life were drawn up by Fructuosus, Isidorus, John Gerundinensis, Columbanus, and others, among the Latins;⁴ for the Rule prescribed by St. Benedict had not yet become the universal and the only rule.

5. Among the writers few can be named who possessed much genius or erudition. The best among the Greeks were the following:—Maximus, a monk who contended very fiercely against the Monothelites, and wrote some explanatory works on the Scriptures, was by no means destitute of natural talent; but he was a man of a violent spirit, and in that respect unfortunate.⁵ Isychius, bishop of Jerusalem, expounded some books of Scripture, and has left us a few Homilies and other minor works.⁶ Dorotheus, an abbot in Palestine, acquired fame by his Ascetic Dissertations, with which he would instruct monks how to live.⁷ Antiochus, a superstitious monk of St. Sabas in Palestine, composed a Pandect of the Holy Scriptures or Institutes of the Christian Religion, a work of no great merit.⁸ Sophronius, bishop of Jerusalem, acquired the veneration of after ages by his conflicts with those reputed in his day as heretics, especially with the Monothelites.⁹ He was evidently

⁵ Maximus was born of noble parentage at Constantinople, about A.D. 580. The emperor Heraclius made him his secretary, and intended he should write the civil history of his times. But the emperor falling into the heresy of the Monothelites, which Maximus abhorred, either disagreement between them or the propensity of Maximus to a monkish life, led him to retire from court and take up his abode in a monastery at Chrysopolis near Constantinople. Here Maximus became the abbot. Before the year 640 the prevalence of Monothelitic principles or the political dissensions of the country, led him to travel. He went to Egypt, where he had warm disputes with the principal Monothelites. In the year 645 he went to Rome, and enjoyed the intimacy of Pope Martin I. In 653 the emperor Constant II. who was a Monothelite, caused him to be arrested and brought to Constantinople to be tried for seditious conduct. He was acquitted; but refusing to promise silence in the controversy then raging with the Monothelites, he was banished to Thrace and confined in different places till the year 662, when he died in the castle of Scheunra on the confines of the Avars. His collected works, published Gr. and Lat. by Combetta, Paris, 1675, 2 vols. fol. consist of about fifty small works, answers to biblical questions, polemic and dogmatic tracts, moral and monastic pieces, and letters. Besides these he has left us Commentaries on the Canticles, on Dionysius Areopagita, and on some parts of Gregory Nyssen. He is an inelegant, obscure, metaphysical, and mystical writer, yet learned and zealous.—Mur. [The student will see a satisfactory life of this monk and a full catalogue of his numerous works, in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr. vol. II. p. 988.—R.]

⁶ See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Eccles. de M. Du Pin, tome I. p. 261. [Isychius or Eychius, first a presbyter and then bishop of Jerusalem, flourished about A.D. 601. A Commentary on Leviticus is extant in a Latin translation, about which there has been much discussion, whether it was a production of this Isychius or of some other. See Labbe, Diss. Hist. in Bellarmin, De Scriptor. Eccles. p. 227, &c. ed. Venice, 1717. The works of Isychius extant in Greek are arguments to the twelve minor prophets and Isaiah, two hundred sentences on temperance and virtue, seven Homilies, a life of St. Longinus, an Introduction to the book of Psalms, and a Comment on Ps. 77—107, and 118. He also wrote an Ecclesiastical History and some other Commentaries, which are lost. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. I. p. 571, &c.—Mur. [See also an account of his life and writings in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biogr. vol. II. p. 446.—R.]

⁷ Dorotheus probably lived about A.D. 631. He wrote twenty-four ethical and ascetic dissertations (ἐθικοκαθάρτικα, seu Doctrinae, De Vita recte et pie Institutenda) and several Epistles, which are extant, Gr. and Lat. in the Orthodoxographia, and in Fronto le Duc, Auctarium, tom. I.—Mur.

⁸ Antiochus flourished A.D. 614, and was alive in 629. His Pandectæ divinae Scripturæ, or compendium of the Christian religion and of the holy Scriptures, comprised in 180 Homilies, is extant in Fronto le Duc, Auctarium, tom. I. He also wrote De Vitiosis Cogitationibus; and De Vita S. Euphrosyni.—Mur.

⁹ See the Acta Sabas, tom. II. Martii, ad diem xl.

was not free from simony. To pious frauds must be ascribed the multitude of fables which were eagerly fabricated. A large collection of them is exhibited by Semler, Hist. Eccles. selecta Capita, tom. II. p. 55, &c. 60, &c.—Schl.

¹ See Launoi, Assertio Inquisitionis in Chartam Immunitatis S. Germani; Opp. tom. III. par. I. p. 80, &c.; Baluze, Miscellan. tom. II. p. 159, tom. IV. p. 108; Muratori, Antiquit. Italic. tom. II. p. 944, 949, &c.

² See Launoi, Examen Privilegii S. Germani; Opp. tom. III. par. I. p. 282; Wilkins, Concilia Mag. Britan. tom. I. par. 43, 44, 49, &c.

³ Gervais, Hist. de l'Abbé Suger, tome I. p. 9—16.

⁴ Holstenius, Codes Regular. tom. II. p. 225, &c.

the cause of the whole Monothelite controversy. Andreas of Crete has left us several Homilies, which are neither truly pious nor eloquent, and which some therefore suspect were falsely ascribed to him.¹ Gregory Pisides, a Constantinopolitan deacon, besides a History of Heraclius and of the Avares, composed a few poems and other short pieces.² Theodore of Raithu is author of a book against those sects, which were considered as corrupting Christianity by their doctrines concerning the person of Jesus Christ.³

p. 65. [Sophronius was a native of Damascus, and for some time a sophist or teacher of philosophy and eloquence. He afterwards became a monk in Palestine, and in this character he sat in the council of Alexandria, held by Cyrus the patriarch of that see in the year 633, for the purpose of uniting the Monothelites and the Catholics. Here Sophronius zealously opposed the seventh of the nine propositions which Cyrus wished to establish. From Alexandria he went to Constantinople to confer with Sergius, the patriarch of that see, on the subject. Soon after he was made patriarch of Jerusalem, and wrote his long Epistle or confutation of the Monothelites, addressed to Honorius the Roman pontiff and to the other patriarchs. But his country was now laid waste. The Saracens having conquered all the northern parts of Syria, laid siege to Jerusalem in 637. The city capitulated to the Kalif Omar, who entered Jerusalem, treated Sophronius with much respect, promised him and the Christians safety and the free exercise of their religion, and having given orders for erecting the mosque of Omar on the site of the temple, retired to Arabia. Sophronius died a few months after in the same year. His works are, the Epistle or Dissertation above mentioned, four Homilies, an account of the labours and travels of the apostle Paul, the Life of St. Mary an Egyptian, and a tract on the Incarnation. The best account of him and his writings is said to be that of Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 199, &c. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 519.—Mur.]

¹ Andreas was a native of Damascus, became a monk at Jerusalem, a deacon at Constantinople, and at last archbishop of Crete. His age is not certain, but he was contemporary with Sophronius of Jerusalem A.D. 635, and lived some years after. Combefis published as his works, Paris, 1644, in fol. Gr. and Lat. seventeen Homilies; nine Triodia, Canons, or church Hymns; and several shorter Hymns adapted to different festivals. He afterwards published three more Homilies and some poems, in his Auctar. Nov. tom. i. and ii. A Computus Paschalis ascribed to Andreas was published, Gr. and Lat. by Petavius, De Doctrina Temporum, tom. iii. The genuineness of some of these pieces is suspected.—Mur.

² Gregory or rather George of Pisida, was first a deacon and chartophylax of the great church of Constantinople, and then archbishop of Nicomedia. He flourished about A.D. 640, and has left us Cosmopoeia, an iambic poem on the Hexæmeron, and another poem in iambic lines on the vanity of life: both published by Morel, Paris, 1583, 4to. Three other of his poems (Eulogy of Heraclius, on his Persian wars, and the assault of the Avares on Constantinople) were promised to the public by Claud. Maltret, but have not been published. Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xix. p. 106, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter. i. p. 583.—Mur.

³ Theodorus, a presbyter in the Laura Raithu in Palestine, flourished A.D. 640, and wrote a short treatise on the incarnation of Christ, in opposition to the heresies of Manes, Apollinaris, Theodorus Mopsuest, Nestorius, Eutyches, Julian Halicarn, Severus, and others. It is extant, Gr. and Lat. in Fr. le Duc, Auctarium, tom. i. and in Latin, in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. viii.—Mur.

The following Greek writers of this century are passed over by Mosheim—namely,—

John Malala, a native of Antioch, who probably flourished about A.D. 601. He wrote Historia Chronica

6. The most distinguished among the Latin writers were the following: Ildefonsus of Toledo, to whom the Spaniards gratuitously ascribe certain treatises concerning the virgin Mary.⁴ Two books of from the creation to the death of Justinian I. A.D. 565, which was published, Gr. and Lat. by Hody, Oxon. 1691, 8vo. See Cave, Hist. Liter. i. p. 668, &c.

About the same time lived Eusebius, bishop of Thessalonica, Conon, an opposer of John Philoponus, and Themistius surnamed Calonymus, all polemic writers on the side of the Catholics. But only fragments of their essays and epistles have reached us in Photius and the Acts of Councils.

Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 608—639, a favourer of the Monothelite doctrine, and instigator of the famous Ecthesis of Honorius. He has left us three Epistles extant in the Concilium, tom. vi.

Cyrus, bishop of Phasis A.D. 620, and patriarch of Alexandria A.D. 630—640. He held a synod at Alexandria in 633, in which he proposed a Libellus satisfactorius in nine chapters, designed to unite the Theodossians or Severians to the Catholics. But his seventh chapter, or position containing the doctrine of the Monothelites, was opposed and led to fierce contests. He also wrote three Epistles to his friend Seregius of Constantinople. All these are extant in the Concilium, tom. vi.

Theophylactus Simocatta, an Egyptian, a sophist, and a prefect, who flourished A.D. 611—629. He wrote Historia Rerum a Mauritio Gestarum from the year 582—602, edited Gr. and Lat. Ingolst. 1603, 4to, and Paris, 1648, fol. also eighty-five short Epistles (in the Epistolæ Græcæ, Geneva, 1606, fol.) and Problema Physica, Gr. and Lat. Antw. 1698, 8vo.

Gregorius, an abbot in Galatia A.D. 614, wrote the life of his predecessor Theodorus, in Surian and other collectors of pious lives.

George, patriarch of Alexandria A.D. 620—630. He wrote the life of John Chrysostom, which is published with Chrysostom's works.

About the year 630 that valuable but anonymous work called the Chronicon Alexandrinum, Fastus Siculi, and Chronicon Paschale, was composed, perhaps by George Pisides or by George Patriarch of Alexandria. It extends from the creation to A.D. 628. The best edition is that of Du Fresnoy, Paris, 1689, fol.

John Moschus, Epiratus, or Eueratus, a monk of Palestine, who flourished A.D. 630, after travelling extensively wrote his monkish history, entitled Pratum Spirituale, Horitum monachum, Limonarium, and Viduarium; extant in Fronto le Duc, Auctar. tom. ii. and in Coteler, Monum. Eccl. Gr. tom. ii.

Thalassius, abbot of a monastery in Libya about A.D. 640, wrote several tracts—namely, De Sincera Charitate; Vita continentia et mentis Regimine, sententiarum. Hecontadas IV. extant in Lat. in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii. and Gr. and Lat. in Fronto le Duc, Auctar. tom. ii.

Theodorus, bishop of Pharan in Arabia near Egypt, a Eutychian and Monothelite controversial writer, from whose tracts large extracts occur in the Acts of the Lateran and sixth councils; Concilium, tom. vi.

John, archbishop of Dara in Syria, who has been placed in the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries, and perhaps lived about A.D. 650, wrote Commentaries in Syriac on the works of Dionysius Areopagita, and on the Apocalypse; extracts from which have been published by Abr. Echellens. Morin, and Nairon.

Basil, bishop of Thessalonica say some, of Casarea in Cappadocia say others, and who flourished perhaps A.D. 675, wrote Scholæ on fifteen Orations of Gregory Nazianzen.

Macarius, a Monothelite, patriarch of Antioch about A.D. 680, whose Confession of faith and extracts from other works are extant, Concilium, tom. vi.

John, archbishop of Thessalonica A.D. 680, has left us one oration, part of another, a fragment of a hymn, and parts of a dialogue between a pagan and a Christian.—Mur.

⁴ See the Acta Sanctorum. Januarii, tom. ii. p. 535. Ildefonsus was nobly born at Toledo, educated at Seville, and after being a monk and abbot at Agil, became archbishop of Toledo, A.D. 657—667. His ten spurious

Epistles by Desiderius of Cahors were edited by Canisius.¹ Eligius of Limoges has left us some Homilies and other productions.² The two books of Ecclesiastical Formulas by Marculphus, a Gallic monk, help us much to discover the wretched state of religion and learning in this age.³ The Englishman Aldhelm composed with no great success various poems on subjects relating to a Christian life.⁴ Julianus

Pomerius confuted the Jews, and has left us some other specimens of his genius, which are neither to be highly praised nor utterly contemned.⁵ To these may be added Cresconius,⁶ whose Judgment of the Canons is well known, Pomerius,⁷ and a few others.⁸

homilies and discourses, and one spurious tract concerning the virgin Mary, with one genuine tract on the same subject, were published by Reuandentius, Paris, 1576, and afterwards in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii. We have from his pen a tract on the ecclesiastical writers in continuation of Jerome, Gennadius, &c. two Epistles, and a tract De Cognitione Baptismi. Several other tracts and letters, and a continuation of Isidore's Gothic History, are lost.—Mur. [See also Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part ii. page 468.—R.

¹ Desiderius was treasurer to Clothair II. A.D. 614, and bishop of Cahors in France A.D. 629—652. His first Book of Epistles contains those which Desiderius wrote to his friends, the second contains those addressed to him. They are extant in Canisius, Lectio. Antiquæ, tom. v. and in Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. viii.—Mur.

² Eligius was born near Limoges, became a goldsmith there, and was esteemed the best workman in all France. In 635 King Dagobert sent him as ambassador to Brittany. While a layman he erected several monasteries and churches. He was bishop of Noyon A.D. 640—659, and continued to found monasteries and churches, and besides laboured to spread Christianity among the Flemings, the Frislanders, and the Swabians. He has left us a tract, De Rectitudine Catholicae Conversationis (which has been ascribed to Augustine), and an Epistle to Desiderius of Cahors. Of the sixteen Homilies ascribed to him and extant in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii. the greatest part, if not the whole, are supposed to be spurious. They are compilations from the fathers, and several of them bear marks of the 9th and 10th centuries.—Mur. [See a very brief notice of him in Bähr, ubi supra, page 467.]

³ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 565. [About the year 660, Marculphus, then seventy years old, at the request of the bishop of Paris compiled this book of formulas of different instruments and writings used in ecclesiastical courts and elsewhere, in the transaction of ecclesiastical affairs, and in the management of church property. It was published, Paris, 1665, 4to, and 1667, by Baluze, in Capitul. Regum Francor. tom. ii. p. 369.—Mur.

⁴ This prelate certainly deserved a more honourable mention than is here made of him by Mosheim. His poetical talents were by no means the most distinguishing part of his character. He was profoundly versed in the Greek, Latin, and Saxon languages. He appeared also with dignity in the Paschal controversy, which so long divided the Saxon and British churches. See Collier's Ecclesiastical Hist. vol. i. p. 121.—Macl. [Aldhelm was grandson to Ina, king of the West Goths. When young he travelled over Gaul and Italy, and pursued study with so much ardour that he became one of the most learned men of the age. Returning to England he lived first as a monk, and then for 34 years as the abbot of Malmesbury; afterwards he was bishop of Sherburne A.D. 705—709. Bede (lib. v. cap. xix.) says, he was undecunque doctissimus. While abbot he wrote, by request of an English synod, a book in confutation of the sentiments and practice of the ancient Britons and Scots in regard to Easter, which is now lost. He also wrote a tract in praise of virginity, both in prose and in verse, likewise a book on the eight principal virtues, and a thousand verses of Enigmas. These and some other poems were published at Mayence, 1608, 8vo, and in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xiii.—Mur. [His works have been recently and very carefully edited with several places hitherto unpublished, by the Rev. J. A. Giles, in that excellent series entitled, Patres Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, Oxon, 1844, 8vo. See also respecting him Turner's Hist. of the Anglo-

Saxons, vol. iii. p. 362, 400, &c.; Wright's Biogr. Britan. Liter. Anglo-Saxon period, and Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part i. p. 82.—R.

⁵ Julianus Pomerius was bishop of Toledo, A.D. 680—690. He wrote commentaries on Joshua; a demonstration that Christ has come, against the Jews; on death, the place of departed souls, the resurrection and final judgment; on the discrepancies in the Scriptures; a history of King Wamba's expedition against Paul, the rebel duke of Narbonne; and an Appendix to Ildelfonsus, De Scriptor. Ecclesiast. His works are in the 12th vol. of the Biblioth. max. Patr.—Mur.

⁶ Cresconius was an African bishop, and flourished A.D. 690. His Breviarium Canonum is a methodical index to the canons of councils and decrees of the Roman pontiffs digested under 300 heads. He afterwards wrote Concordia seu Liber Canonum which is the same thing, except that the canons and decrees are here recited at length. Both works are in Voellus, and Jus-tell's Biblioth. Juris Canon.—Mur.

⁷ Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iii. p. 506. [Fredegarius Scholasticus was a Gallic monk who flourished A.D. 640. He compiled a Chronicle from the creation to the year of Christ 641. The first three books, which reach to A.D. 561, are a compilation from Julius Africanus, Eusebius as translated by Jerome, and others. The fourth book, comprising A.D. 561—584, is an abridgment of Gregory of Tours, Hist. Francor. The fifth book, from 584 to 641, was composed by Fredegarius. The Chronicon was afterwards continued by other hands to A.D. 768. The fifth book is published among the Scriptores Rerum Franc. The other books are partly in Canisius, Lectioes Antiq. tom. ii. and partly in Gregory's Hist. Francor.—Mur. [See a notice of his historical compilations in Bähr's Geschichte der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part i. page 145.—R.

⁸ The following catalogue embraces the Latin writers omitted by Mosheim:—

Paterius, pupil of Gregory the Great and bishop of Brescia about A.D. 601. He wrote a Collection of Scripture testimonies in three books, two from the Old Test. and one from the New, published with the works of Gregory the Great.

Faustus, a monk brought up by St. Benedict and sent into Gaul with St. Maurus. He wrote A.D. 605 the life of St. Maurus, and the life of St. Severinus. Both are extant in Mabillon, Acta. Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i.

Marcus, a disciple and companion of St. Benedict and versifier of the life of Benedict by Gregory the Great, flourished A.D. 606.

Boniface IV. pope A.D. 615, has left us an Epistle to King Ethelbert of Kent, and a Synodic Decree in the Concilia, tom. v.

Bulgaranus, a Spanish Goth and count A.D. 601. Six of his Epistles still preserved have been often consulted but never published.

Sisebutus, a Gothic king in Spain A.D. 612—621. Several of his Epistles are preserved, and likewise his life and martyrdom of St. Desiderius.

Boniface V. pope A.D. 620—626. His Epistle to Justus bishop of Rochester, another to Edwin king of Northumberland, and a third to Edilburg, Edwin's queen, are extant in Baronius, Annales, a.d. ann. 618 and 625, also in the Concilia, tom. v.

Nennius, a British monk and abbot of Bangor about A.D. 620, and often confounded with the Irish Gildas. He wrote De Gentis Britonum Liber sive Breviarium, or a History of the Britons; MSS. of which are still preserved at Westminster and at Cambridge. See Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 620. [The Latin text of his History has been recently published with great care by Jos. Stevenson, Lond. 1838, 8vo, and a revised translation of it by Dr. Giles, Lond. 1841, 8vo. See Bähr, Geschichte der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part i. page 136.—R.

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND THEOLOGY.

1. DURING this century true religion lay buried under a senseless mass of superstitions, and was unable to raise her head. The earlier Christians had worshipped only

God and his Son; but those called Christians in this century worshipped the wood of a cross, the images of holy men, and bones of dubious origin.¹ The early Christians placed heaven and hell before the view of men; these latter talked only of a certain fire prepared to purge away the imper-

Honorius, pope a.d. 626–631. He was a Monothelito. Eight of his Epistles which fully prove the fact, are extant in the Concilia, tom. v. See Forbes, Instruct. Hist. Theolog. lib. v. and Schroeckh, Kirchen-gesch. vol. xx. p. 401, 442, &c. 446, &c.

Braulio, bishop of Saragossa, a.d. 627–646. He wrote the life of St. Emilian a monk, which is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i. also two Epistles to Isidore Hispalensis, and a short Eulogy of him published with the works of Isidore.

Jonas, an Irish monk and abbot of Luxeuil, flourished about a.d. 630. He wrote the Lives of St. Columbanus abbot of Bobbio, of Eustatius abbot of Luxeuil, of Attala and Bertulph abbots of Bobbio, of St. John the founder and abbot of a monastery, and of St. Fara or Burgundofara first abbot of York. Most of these lives are in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. ii.

Cummianus or Cumminius surnamed Fata or Fada, i.e. tall, son of Flucna the king of west Munster in Ireland, born a.d. 592, died 661. He was a monk, abbot, and, some add, bishop in Ireland; and wrote an Epistle to Seglenus, abbot of Ily, on the paschal controversy (in Ussher's Synloge Epistolar. Hibernicar. p. 24), and a book De Penitentiarum Mensura, which is in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii. [There were several Irish writers of this name which has led to considerable confusion.] Lanigan makes Cummin a monk the author of these works, and not Cummin Fada. See his Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 395, &c.—R.

John IV. pope, a.d. 640, 641. He wrote an Epistle to the Scottish bishops concerning the paschal controversy, another to the emperor Constantine III. in apology for Pope Honorius, and a third to Isaac, bishop of Syracuse. These are extant in the Concilia, tom. v.

Audoenus or Dado, archbishop of Rouen, a.d. 640–653. He lived to the age of 90 and wrote the life of St. Eligius of Noyon, published imperfectly by Surinus, and perfectly by D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. v. also an Epistle.

Theodorus I. pope, a.d. 642–649. He has left us two Epistles, in the Concilia, tom. v. and in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii.

Eugenius, archbishop of Toledo, a.d. 646–657. He composed some tracts in verse and prose, which are extant in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii.

Tajo or Tago, bishop of Saragossa, flourished a.d. 646. He was a great admirer of the works of Gregory the Great, went to Rome to obtain copies of them, and compiled five books of Ser. from them.

Martin I. pope, a.d. 648–655. For his opposition to a decree of the emperor Constantine, called his Typus, Martin was seized by armed force in 653, carried prisoner to Constantinople, kept in jail a long time, tried, and banished. He ended his days in exile at Cherson. Seventeen of his Epistles are extant; eleven of them, Gr. and Lat. are in the Concilia, tom. vi.

Anastasius, deacon and apocrisarius of the Romish church. He adhered to St. Maximus and shared in his fortunes. The year before his death a.d. 665, he wrote a long letter giving account of the sufferings and exile of himself, Maximus, and Anastasius patriarch of Constantinople, and defending their tenets in opposition to the Monothelites. It is in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xii. and also prefixed to the works of St. Maximus.

Fructuosus, of royal Gothic blood, bishop of Braga, a.d. 650–675. He was founder of many monasteries and, particularly that of Alcala; and drew up two Rules for monks, published by Holstenius, Codex Regular. par. ii.

Vitalianus, pope a.d. 657–671. In the year 668, he and Maurus the archbishop of Ravenna mutually excommunicated each other. Six of his Epistles are in the Concilia, tom. vi.

Syricius, bishop of Barcelona about a.d. 657. He wrote two Epistles, which are extant in D'Achery, Spicileg. tom. i. or new ed. tom. iii.

Cumineus surnamed Albus, an Irish monk and abbot of Ily, a.d. 657–669. He wrote the life of St. Columba the first abbot of Ily, which may be seen in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. i. [and in Finkerton, Vite antiq. mnc. Scot.—R.

Jonas, a disciple of St. Columbanus and an abbot somewhere. He wrote about a.d. 664 the life and miracles of St. John, abbot Reomansis. The latter book is in Mabillon, Acta, &c. tom. i.

Theodorus, a native of Tarsus in Cilicia, whom the Pope made archbishop of Canterbury a.d. 668. He was a man of learning and very efficient in action. Introducing a fine library of Greek and Latin works into England, he gave an impulse to learning among the Anglo-Saxon clergy. He also did much to bring the British and Scottish clergy to adopt the Roman method of keeping Easter. His only work, except an epistle, is his Penitentiale or directory for dealing with offenders in the church [mentioned in chap. iii. sect. 5. below.—R.

Agatho, Pope a.d. 680, 681, has left us three Epistles which are in the Concilia, tom. vi.

Adamannus or Adamannus, a Scots-Irish monk and abbot of Ily, a.d. 679–794. He was very active in bringing the Scottish and Irish to adopt the Roman practice respecting Easter. His life of St. Columba is given by Canisius and Surinus; and his topographical description of Jerusalem and other sacred places, as he learned them from Areuphus a Gallic bishop and traveller, was published by Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. secul. iii. par. ii. or tom. iv. p. 456–472. [See more of him in Lanigan's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 12, &c.—R.

Ceolfride, abbot of Weremuth or Wiremuth in England about a.d. 680, and preceptor to Bede. He visited Rome, obtained of Pope Sergius privileges for his monastery, and brought home books for the use of his monks. A long Epistle of his to Naiton, king of the Picts, in defence of the Roman method of keeping Easter, is extant in Bede, lib. v. cap. xxii. and in the Concilia, tom. vi.

Aphonius, very little known, but supposed to have lived about a.d. 680, wrote a Commentary on the Canticles, which is extant in the Biblioth. max. Patr. tom. xiv.

Valerius, a Spanish monk and abbot in Galicia about a.d. 680. His life of St. Fructuosus is extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. Some other lives and treatises exist in MS.

Leo II. Pope a.d. 682–684. Five Epistles ascribed to him are extant in the Concilia, tom. vi. But Baronius and others think them spurious, because they represent Pope Honorius to have been a Monothelite.

Benedict II. Pope a.d. 684–686. He has two Epistles in the Concilia, tom. vi.

Hobolenus, a monk and presbyter, who probably lived about a.d. 690. He wrote the life of St. Germanus, first abbot Grandvallensis in the bishopric of Basil, who was slain about a.d. 666; extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ii.—Mur.

I will here quote a passage well calculated to illustrate the piety of this age, taken from the life of St. Eligius, bishop of Noyon, in D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 92. "The Lord conferred upon this most holy man among other miraculous gifts that, while searching and praying after them with the most ardent faith, the bodies of the holy martyrs which had lain concealed for so many ages were discovered." This most successful carcass-hunter of saints discovered the bodies of Quintin, Plato, Crispin, Crispinian, Lucian, and many others, as his biographer minutely narrates. Such ability to find the concealed bones of saints and martyrs, was claimed by most of the bishops who wished to be esteemed by the people and to amass riches.

fections of the soul. The former taught that Christ had made expiation for the sins of men, by his death and blood; the latter seemed to inculcate that the gates of heaven would be closed against none who should enrich the clergy or the church with their donations.¹ The former were studious to maintain a holy simplicity and to follow a pure and chaste piety; the latter placed the substance of religion in external rites and bodily exercises. Did any one hesitate to believe? Two irrefragable arguments were at hand, the authority of the church and miracles; for the working of which in these times of ignorance but a moderate share of dexterity was requisite.

¹ St. Eligius, a great man of this age, says (In D'Achery's Spicilegium, tom. ii. p. 96). "He is a good Christian, who comes often to church and brings his offering to be laid on the altar of God, who does not taste of his produce till he has first offered some of it to God; who as often as the holy solemnities return keeps himself for some days previously pure even from his own wife, so that he may come to the altar of God with a safe conscience; and who finally has committed to memory the Creed or the Lord's Prayer.—Redeem your souls from punishment while ye have the means in your power:—present oblations and tithes to the churches; bring candles to the holy places according to your wealth.—and come often to the church and beg suppliantly for the intercession of the saints.—If ye do these things ye may come with confidence before the tribunal of the eternal God in the day of judgment, and say: "Give, Lord, for we have given." [We see here a large and ample description of the character of a good Christian, in which there is not the least mention of the love of God, resignation to his will, obedience to his laws, or justice, benevolence, and charity towards men; and in which the whole of religion is made to consist in coming often to the church, bringing offerings to the altar, lighting candles in consecrated places, and such like vain services.—Macl. [Mosheim made the preceding extracts from a discourse of Eligius simply to prove his statement in the text, namely, that Christian teachers in this century "seemed to inculcate that the gates of heaven would be closed against none who should enrich the clergy or the church with their donations." That he professed to give only extracts was also plain from the way in which these are printed in the original note, with blanks intimating large omissions. But Maclaine evidently considered that they constituted one uninterrupted statement; and without ever consulting the original work, though so accurately pointed out by Mosheim, he described the passage as presenting "a large and ample description of the character of a good Christian." Those writers, accordingly, who consulted only Maclaine's translation were led to look upon these extracts as representing (which was by no means Mosheim's intention) the whole of the practical teaching of Eligius. In particular, Principal Robertson, in note xi. of the Introductory Volume of his History of Charles V. quotes this passage as if nothing had been omitted, and says, very carelessly, that he was indebted for it to Maclaine, whereas it is Mosheim himself who gives it in a note. Lingard, in his Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church (vol. ii. note n. 1st edit.) so early as the year 1806 corrected Robertson, and pointed out the true character of the discourse of Eligius; but, at the same time, he fell into Robertson's error of representing Maclaine as having appended the extracts to Mosheim. Several other historians have subsequently referred to this episode in the history of misrepresentation, and have visited on Mosheim the mistake of his careless annotator. Dr. Waddington (Hist. of the Church, vol. i. p. 304, note) has also censured Mosheim severely for the extracts which he gives; alleging that the historian "presented them as a fair specimen of the compositions of that age, and of the sort of piety inculcated by the hierarchy;" which was very far from being the object of Mosheim. These censures roused the late Dr. Arnold's sense of justice into violent exercise, and in his Lectures on Mod. Hist. (lect. i. p. 79, 3d edit.) he joined, without further inquiry, in this indiscriminate condemnation of Mosheim. He thus violated his own rule, by relying on a secondary source, namely, Maclaine's translation and note, instead of having recourse to Mosheim's original work. Since the preceding observations were written, I have met with Maitland's remarks on this hackneyed subject, in his Dark Ages, Lond. 1844, p. 102, &c. Many of his observations are well founded; though they would have had more weight if they had not been accompanied with that undue depreciation of

2. Few either of the Greeks or Latins applied themselves to the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures. There remain some commentaries of Isychius of Jerusalem on certain books of the Old Testament, and on the epistle to the Hebrews. Maximus composed sixty-five Questions on the Holy Scriptures, and some other works of like character. Julianus Pomerius showed his wish and his inability to reconcile passages of Scripture between which there is apparent contradiction, and also to explain the prophecy of Nahum. Compared with these writers, the worst of modern interpreters are manifestly to be preferred. The Greeks, especially those who would be thought adepts in mystic theology, ran after fantastic allegories; as may be seen by the Questions of Maximus above mentioned. The Latins had too little self-confidence even to venture on such a course, and therefore only culled flowers from the works of Gregory and Augustine; as is manifest, among other works, from the Explanations of the Old and New Testament collected by Paterius from the works of Gregory the Great.² Thomas of Heraclea gave to the Syrians a new translation of the New Testament.

3. As among the Latins philosophy was nearly extinct, and among the Greeks only certain points of theology were brought under discussion, no one thought of reducing the doctrines of religion to a regular the learning of others, and that overweening confidence in his own research and accuracy, which run through his writings, otherwise so valuable. Yet he is not himself proof against occasional mistakes. For example, in this very matter I find him in the note to p. 104 of his Dark Ages, referring to a note in Mosheim's work (it is note 1, at the foot of the previous page in this edition) as if it had been written by Maclaine, and pronouncing it with a sneer to be sufficient to "settle" Maclaine's "character," and to "afford matter highly illustrative not only of his learning and judgment, but even of his taste." Nay, he seems surprised it should be retained by Dr. Murdock in his new edition; yet he might have seen, had he looked into the original work or attentively examined either of the translations, that this obnoxious note was not written by Maclaine, but entirely by Mosheim himself. Quis tulerit Græcorum, &c.—It.

² This useless performance has been usually printed with the works of Gregory the Great; and therefore the Benedictine monks inserted it in their recent and splendid edition of Gregory's Works, vol. iv. part ii. but with no advantage to the public.

³ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatican. tom. ii. p. 93, 94.

system, and of stating them philosophically. Yet one Antiochus, a monk of Palestine, composed a short summary of religious doctrines, which he called the Pandect of the Holy Scriptures. But the rank and influence due to this author may be inferred from the mournful verses subjoined to this work; in which the author deplores in sorrowful strains the loss of the wood of the [true] cross, which the Persians were said to have carried away. A more neat and judicious summary of the Latin theology of this age has not come down to us, than that in Ildefonsus' book De Cognitione Baptismi, lately brought to light by Baluze—a work indeed which we do not need, but one that contains some valuable testimonies for truths which were afterwards discarded.¹ Tajo or Tago, bishop of Saragossa, compiled five Books of Sentences, which are a dry and insipid body of theoretical and practical divinity, taken from Gregory the Great, though Augustine is sometimes taxed for contributions; yet that age esteemed it an admirable performance and deserving immortality.² On certain parts of Christianity, a few individuals employed their pens; as Maximus, who wrote on theology and on the manifestation of the Son in the flesh, and likewise on the two natures in Christ; and Theodore of Raithu, who wrote on the incarnation of Christ. But those acquainted with the character of that age will easily conjecture what sort of doctors these were.

4. The lamentable state of practical theology is manifest from every writer on the subject in this century. The best of them were Dorotheus in his Ascetic Disquisitions, Maximus and Aldhelm in some tracts, Isychius and Thalasius in their Sentences, and a few others. But in these how many and how great are the imperfections! how numerous the marks of superstition! what constant indications of a mind vacillating and unable to grasp the subject! The laity, as they were called, had no cause to tax their teachers with excessive severity. For it was customary to confine the obligations of men to a very few virtues, as is manifest from Aldhelm's tract on the eight principal vices. And those who disregarded these few duties, were to incur no very formidable punishment for their neglect. A life of solitude as practised by the monks, though adorned by no marks of true piety, was esteemed sufficient of itself to atone for all kinds of guilt; and it was therefore called by the Latins a second Baptism.³ This one fact is sufficient to show how little the precepts of Christ were understood in this age. Among the swarms of Greek and oriental monks, very many laboured to attain perfection by means of contemplation; and these endeavoured to transfuse into their own souls the spirit of Dionysius, that father of the mystics.

5. Theodore the Cilician, a Grecian monk, restored among the Latins the discipline of penance as it is called, which had fallen into neglect, and enforced it by strict rules borrowed from the Grecian ecclesiastical jurisprudence. This man being unexpectedly raised to the see of Canterbury in England, A.D. 668, among many other laudable deeds, reduced to a regular system that part of ecclesiastical law which is called disciplina penitentiaria. For by publishing his Penitential, a kind of work such as the Latin world had never before seen, he taught the priests to discriminate between more heinous and more venial sins, and between such as were secret and such as were open; and likewise to measure and estimate them according to the circumstances of time, place, the character and disposition of the sinner, his sorrow, &c. He also pointed out the punishment due to the several kinds of sins and faults, the proper modes of consoling, admonishing, and absolving; and, in short, marked out the whole duty of those who hear confessions.⁴ This new discipline of penance, though it was of Grecian origin, was very acceptable to the Latins; and in a short time it was diffused from Britain over the

³ See Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1771, where, in the Capitula of Theodore of Canterbury, we read: At the ordination of monks the abbot ought to say mass and utter three prayers over his head, and the monk should veil his head with a cowl seven days, and on the seventh day the abbot should remove the veil from the monk's head. As in baptism the presbyter removes the infant's veil on the seventh day, so should the abbot do to the monk: for it is a second Baptism according to the decision of the fathers, and all sins are forgiven as in Baptism.—Scht.

⁴ The Penitential of Theodore is still extant though mutilated, published by Petit, Paris, 1679, 4to, with learned dissertations and notes. We have also the one hundred and twenty Capitula Ecclesiastica of the same Theodore, in D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. ix. Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1771, and elsewhere. [The Penitential and the Capitula Ecclesiastica have been republished with great care and accuracy in the Ancient laws and institutes of England, Lond. 1840, folio, edited by Mr. Thorpe, under the superintendence of the Record Commissioners.—H.]

¹ See Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. vi. p. 1, &c. From this book it clearly appears, among other things, that the doctrine of transubstantiation, as it is called, was unknown to the Latins in the seventh century (cap. cxxvii. p. 99); that the sacred volume was read by all Christians (cap. lxxx. p. 59); and other facts of the like nature. Ildefonsus carefully excludes philosophy and reason as authorities in religion; and teaches that there are two sources of theology, namely, the holy scriptures and the writings of the ancient doctors, or as he expresses himself (p. 14, 22), divinae institutionis auctoritatem, et sacrae paternitatis antiquitatem.

² See Mabillon, Analecta Veteris Lævi, tom. ii. p. 68, &c.

whole Latin world, and enforced by other Penitentials drawn up after the pattern of the original one by Theodore. Yet it gradually declined again in the eighth century, and by the new system of what are called indulgences was at length wholly subverted.

6. Those who wrote against the religious sects which departed from the common faith are scarcely worthy of being named; and they would not be worth reading, were it not that they serve to elucidate the history of their times. Against the pagans, Nicias composed two books;¹ and Photius mentions a person unknown to us, who he says contended against them with a great array of arguments drawn from the fathers.² Against the Jews contended Julianus Pomerius. All the heresies are described and assailed in the little work of Timothy, on the Reception of Heretics. Of the theological contests among the orthodox themselves, little can be said. In this century were scattered the seeds of those grievous contests which afterwards severed the Greeks from the Latins; nor were they merely scattered, they also took root in the minds of the Greeks, to whom the Roman domination appeared altogether insufferable. In Britain, the ancient Christians of that country contended with the new or Romish Christians of the Saxon race, whom Augustine had converted to Christ. They contended respecting various things; as baptism and the tonsure, but especially about the time for celebrating the feast of Easter.³ But these controversies did not relate to religion itself; and they were settled and determined in the eighth century, by the Benedictine monks and in accordance with the views of the Romans.⁴

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. IN the council which is called Quinisextum, the Greeks made various enactments respecting religious rites and forms of worship, in which there were several deviations from the Roman usage. These canons were publicly received in all the churches within the territories of the Greek emperors; and likewise by all churches which accorded in doctrine and worship with the Greeks, though situated in the dominions of barbarian kings.⁵ Nearly all the Roman pontiffs likewise added something new to the ancient ceremonies; as if they had supposed that no one could teach Christianity with success, unless he could delight a Christian assembly with strange shows and mummary. These rites and usages were in the time of Charlemagne propagated from Rome among the other Latin churches; for the arrogance of the pontiffs would not suffer any of them to deviate from the Roman usage.

2. A few specimens may serve for examples. The number of festivals, which was already oppressively great, was increased by the addition of a day consecrated to the wood of the cross on which the Saviour hung;⁶ and another to the commemoration of his ascent to heaven. Boniface V. in-

⁵ This council was held at Constantinople A. D. 692, and was composed chiefly of oriental bishops, of whom more than two hundred were assembled. The place of the sessions was a hall in the imperial palace called Trullus; whence the council was denominated Concilium Trullanum and Concilium in Trullo. It was properly the seventh General council, and supplied canons for the church which the fifth and sixth had neglected to make. Being thus a kind of supplement to the fifth and sixth general councils, it was called Concilium Quinisextum. See chap. v. sec. 12, below.—Mur.

⁶ This festival was instituted by the emperor Heraclius in the year 631, after he had vanquished the Persians and recovered from them the supposed real cross, which Cosroe their king had carried off fourteen years before. The festival was established by Pope Honorius, and was introduced into the West in this century. For the Roman pontiffs were then under the dominion of the Greek emperors, and were beginning gradually to withdraw themselves from their jurisdiction. The earliest mention of this festival, which the Greeks call σταυροπάθεια [and the Latins, exaltatio crucis, kept Sept. 14; see Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 628.—Mur.] occurs in the Collatio of St. Maximus with Theodosius, bishop of Caesarea, A. D. 650. See Baumgarten, Erläuterung der Christl. Alterthümer, p. 310.—Schl.

⁷ It is to be wished that Mosheim had here given his authority for placing the origin of the feast of Ascension in this century. Among the fifty days next following Easter, this festival had been observed by the Christians with peculiar solemnity, ever since the fourth century; as may be inferred from Augustine, Epist. 118, ad Januar. Chrysostom, Hom. 2. 62, tom. vii. and Homil. 35, tom. v. Constitutiones Apostol. lib. viii. cap. xxxiii.; lib. v. cap. xix.; and especially from the Council Agathense, A. D. 506, where the 21st Canon says: Pascha, Natale Domini, Epiphania, Ascensionem Domini, Pentecosten et natalem S. Johannis Baptiste, vel si qui maximi dies in festiuitatibus habentur, non nisi in civitatibus aut in parochiis teneant. (Harduin, tom. ii. p. 1000.) Instead of this festival might be mentioned the Fest of all Saints, as originating in this century under Pope Boniface. In the eastern churches it had indeed been observed ever since the fourth century on the eighth day after Whitsunday, and was called the Feast of all the Martyrs. But in the western churches it had the following origin. Boniface in the year 610 obtained by gift the Pantheon at Rome, and consecrated it to the honour of the virgin Mary and all the martyrs; as it had before been sacred to all the gods, and particularly to Cybele. On this occasion he ordered the feast of all the apostles to be kept on the 1st of May, which was afterwards assigned only to Philip and James; and the feast of all the martyrs on the 12th of May. But this last feast being frequented by a large concourse of people, Gregory IV. in the year 834 transferred it to a season of the year when provisions were more easily obtained, that is, to the first day of November; and also consecrated it to all Saints. See Baumgarten, Christl. Alterthümer, p. 313.

¹ Of this man, nothing more is known than that he was a monk, and that he wrote a book against the seven chapters of Philoponus.—Schl.

² Photius, Biblioth. Codex clxx. p. 379.

³ Cummianus' Epistle, in Ussher's Synloge Epistol. Hibernic. p. 24, &c.; Bede, Hist. Eccl. lib. iii. cap. xxv.; Wilkins, Concilium Mag. Britan. tom. i. p. 37, 42; Acta Sanctor. Februarii, tom. iii. p. 21, 84.

⁴ Mabillon, Præf. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 2, &c.

vested the churches with those rights of asylum, which afforded to all villains a license to commit crimes without much danger.¹ The art of ornamenting churches magnificently was perfected with great diligence by Honorius.² For as neither Christ nor his apostles had enjoined anything on this subject, it was but reasonable that their vicar should confer this favour on mankind. Of the sacerdotal garments and the rest of the apparatus, which was deemed necessary for the celebration of the Lord's supper, and for giving dignity and grandeur to the assemblies for public worship, I shall say nothing.

CHAPTER V.

HISTORY OF HERESIES.

1. THE Greeks during this century, and especially in the reigns of Constans, Constantine Pogonatus, and Justinian II. were engaged in fierce combat with the Paulicians, whom they considered as a branch of the Manichæans, and who lived in Armenia and the adjacent countries. The Greeks assailed them, not so much with arguments as with military force and with legal enactments and penalties; for one Constantine, during the reign of Constans, had resuscitated this sect, then exhausted and ready to become extinct, and had propagated its doctrines with great success.³ But the history of this sect, which is said to have originated from two brothers, Paul and John, will be stated more explicitly under the ninth century, at which time its conflicts with the Greeks came to an open and bloody war.

—Schl. [And Gieseler's Text-book, by Cunningham, vol. II. p. 60, note 11.—Mur.

¹ Temples were anciently, even among pagans, places of safety for valuable goods, and for men in times of war and oppression. Among the Christians at first only the altar and the choir enjoyed this privilege. Afterwards the nave of the church, and finally the whole inclosure participated in it. All persons under prosecution, whether in civil or criminal causes, might there be secure till their case was investigated. But public debtors, Jews, runaway slaves, robbers, murderers, banditti, and adulterers, were prohibited by law from this right of sanctuary. Yet in the western churches this right of asylum degenerated into a source of the most shocking disorders; and to them this regulation of Boniface especially gave the occasion. Anastasius Bibliothecarius says of him: "He ordained that no person, who had taken refuge in a church, should be delivered up."—Schl.

² See Anastasius in his life of this pontiff. He says of him, among other things, that "he covered the Confessional of St. Peter with pure silver, which weighed 187 pounds. He overlaid the great doors at the entrance of the church, which were called Mediana, with silver weighing 975 pounds. He also made two large silver candlesticks of equal dimensions, weighing each 62 pounds. He likewise made for the church of St. Andrew a silver table before the Confessional as above, which weighed 73 pounds." &c.—Schl.

³ Photius, Contra Manichæos, lib. I. p. 61. Petrus Siculus, Hist. Manichæorum, p. 41, &c. Codrenus, Compend. Histor. p. 431, ed. Voynice.

2. In Italy the Lombards preferred the opinions of the Arians to the doctrines of the Nicene council. In Gaul and in England the Pelagian and semi-Pelagian controversies still produced some disquietude. In the East the ancient sects, which the imperial laws had repressed but had by no means subdued and extinguished, raised their heads in several places, and were able to secure adherents. Fear of the laws and of punishment induced these sects to seek a temporary concealment; but when the power of their foes was somewhat abridged, they again resumed courage.

3. The condition of the Nestorians and Monophysites under those new lords of the East, the Saracens, was far happier than before that conquest; indeed, while the [orthodox] Greeks were oppressed and banished, both these sects were everywhere preferred before them. Jesujabus, the sovereign pontiff of the Nestorians, concluded a treaty first with Mohammed and afterwards with Omar, and obtained many advantages for his sect.⁴ There is likewise extant an injunction or Testament, as it is commonly called, that is, a diploma of Mohammed himself, in which he promises full security to all Christians living under his dominion; and though some learned men doubt the authenticity of this instrument, yet the Mohammedans do not call it in question.⁵ The successors of Mohammed

⁴ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. II. p. 94, &c.

⁵ This famous Testament of Mohammed was brought into Europe from the East in the seventeenth century, by Pacificus Scaliger, a Capuchin monk; and first published, Arabic and Latin, by Gabriel Sionita, Paris, 1630; and afterwards the Lutherans, John Fabricius, A.D. 1638, and Hinckelmann, A.D. 1690, published it in Latin. See Hottinger, Hist. Orient. lib. II. cap. xx. p. 237; Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vaticana, tom. iii. par. II. p. 95; Renaudot, Histor. Patriar. Alexandr. p. 168. Those who with Grotius reject this Testament, suppose it was fabricated by the monks living in Syria and Arabia, to circumvent their hard masters, the Mohammedans. Nor is the supposition incredible. For the monks of Mount Sinai formerly showed a similar edict of Mohammed, which they said he drew up while a private man; an edict exceedingly favourable to them, and beyond all controversy fraudulently drawn up by themselves. The fraud was sufficiently manifest; yet the Mohammedans, a people destitute of all erudition, believed it was a genuine ordinance of their prophet, and they believe so still. This imposition is treated of by Cantuier, Hist. de l'Empire Ottoman, tome II. p. 269, &c. The argument therefore which Renaudot and others draw in favour of the Testament in question, from the acknowledgment of its authenticity by the Mohammedans, is of little weight; because in things of this nature, no people could be more easily imposed upon than the rude and illiterate Mohammedans. Nor is the argument of more force which the opposers of the Testament draw from the difference of its style from that of the Koran. For it is not necessary to suppose that Mohammed himself composed this Testament; he might have employed his secretary. But however dubious the Testament itself may be, the subject matter of it is not doubtful. For learned men have proved by powerful arguments, that Mohammed originally would allow no injury to be offered to the Christians, and especially to the Nestorians. [This Testament is a formal compact between in Persia employed the Nestorians in the most important affairs and business both of the court and of the provinces; nor would they suffer any patriarch, except the one who governed this sect, to reside in the kingdom of Babylon.¹ The Monophysites in Egypt and Syria were equally fortunate. In Egypt, Amru having taken Alexandria in the year 644, directed Benjamin, the Monophysite pontiff, to occupy the see of Alexandria, and from that time for nearly a century, the Melchites or those who followed the opinions of the Greek church, had no prelate.²

4. Among the Greeks, who were otherwise greatly distracted, there arose a new sect in the year 630, during the reign of Heraclius, which soon produced such commotions that both the East and the West united to put it down. An ill-timed effort at peace produced war. The emperor Heraclius, considering the immense evils resulting to the Greek empire from the revolt of the Nestorians to the Persians, was exceedingly desirous of reconciling the Monophysites to the Greek church, lest the empire should receive a new wound by their separation from it. He therefore during his war with the Persians, first had a conference in the year 622 with one Paul, a principal man among the Armenian Monophysites; and afterwards in the year 629 at Hicropolis, with Anastasius, the Catholicos or patriarch of the Monophysites, respecting the means of restoring harmony. Both of them suggested to the emperor, that the believers in one nature of Christ might be induced to receive the decrees of the council of Chalcedon, and be reconciled to the Greeks, provided the Greeks would admit and profess that in Jesus Christ, after the union of the two natures, there was but one will and one voluntary operation. Heraclius stated what he had learned from these men to Sergius the patriarch of Constantinople, who was a native of Syria and descended from parents who were Monophysites. This prelate gave it as his opinion that it might be held and inculcated without prejudice to the truth or to the authority of the council of Chalcedon, that after the union of the two natures in Christ there was but one will and one operation of will. Heraclius therefore, in order to terminate the discord both in church and state, issued a decree in the year 630 that this faith should be received and taught.³

5. At first the affair seemed to go on well; for although some refused to comply with the imperial edict, yet the two patriarchs of the East, Cyrus of Alexandria and Athanasius of Antioch, did not hesitate to obey the will of the emperor, and the see of Jerusalem was then vacant.⁴ The consent of the Latin patriarch or of the Roman pontiff was perhaps not deemed necessary, in an affair which related so exclusively to the oriental church. Cyrus, whom the emperor had promoted from the see of Phasis to that of Alexandria, held a council, by the seventh decree of which the doctrine of Monotheletism, which the emperor wished to have introduced, was solemnly confirmed.⁵ And this modification of the decree of Chalcedon was so influential with the Monothelites in Egypt, Armenia, and other provinces, that a great part of them returned to the church. They seem however to have explained the doctrine of one will in Christ, which was certainly equivocal, according to their own views, and not according to the general sentiments of their sect.

6. But this fair prospect of peace and harmony was blasted, and a formidable contest excited by a single monk of Palestine named Sophronius. He being present at the council of Alexandria, held by Cyrus in the year 633, strenuously resisted the article which related to one will in Christ; and the next year 634, being made patriarch of Jerusalem, he assembled a council, in which he condemned the Monothelites, and maintained that, by their doctrine, the

³ The writers who give account of this sect are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Græca, vol. x. p. 204. The account which I have given in the text is derived from the original sources, and rests on the most explicit testimony. [The most important of the ancient documents are found in the Acts of the council of the Lateran, A.D. 649, and in those of the sixth general council held at Constantinople A.D. 681, 682. Among the modern writers the most full and candid is Walch, Hist. der Ketzler, vol. ix. p. 3—667. See also Schröckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xx. p. 346—453, and Bower's Lives of the Popes, from Honorius to the end of this century. —Mur.

⁴ See Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 264.

⁵ The documents of this council are in Harduin, Conciliorum, tom. iii. p. 1327, &c. The intention of Cyrus was good. He wished to gain over the Severians and the Theodosians, who composed a large part of the Christians of Alexandria; and he considered the doctrine of one will and one operation as the best means for this end. He therefore in several canons spoke of one single theandric operation in Christ (ἓν θεανδρικὴν ἐνέργειαν καὶ ἀνθρώπινα μὴ θεανδρικὴν ἐνέργεια) yet for the sake of peace he refrained from affirming either one or two wills and operations. This step, though taken with the best intentions, gave occasion afterwards to the most violent theological contests. —Schli.

Mohammed on the one part, and the Nestorians and Monophysites on the other. He promises to them his protection, and they promise to him loyalty and obedience. He promises them entire religious freedom; and they promise him support against his enemies. Mohammed might have deemed it sound policy to conclude such a treaty with these sectaries; that by their aid he might subdue the countries of Asia subject to the Greek emperors. —Schli.

¹ Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vaticana, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 97, &c. Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexandr. p. 163, 169.

² Renaudot, ubi supra, p. 168.

Eutychian error respecting the amalgamation and confusion of natures in Christ, was revived and brought into the church. He drew over many, particularly among the monks, to his sentiments, and he made special efforts to gain over Honorius the Roman pontiff to his side.¹ But Sergius of Constantinople wrote a long and discreet letter to Honorius, which induced him to decide, that those held sound doctrine who taught that there was one will and one operation in Christ.² Hence arose severe contests,

¹ Sophronius was most sincere and decorous in his opposition to the doctrine of Monothelism. In the council of Alexandria, he fell down before Cyrus and intreated him not to sanction such a doctrine. But he was alone in his opposition. Cyrus treated him tenderly, advised him to confor with Sergius the patriarch of Constantinople on the subject, and wrote a letter to Sergius for Sophronius to carry. When arrived at Constantinople, Sergius endeavoured to soothe him, represented the point as unessential, agreed to write to Cyrus not to allow any controversy on the subject, but to leave every one at full liberty to speculate as he pleased about it. Sophronius now agreed to keep silence. But when made patriarch of Jerusalem, his conscience would not let him rest. Whether he assembled a provincial synod as Mosheim asserts, is questionable. But his circular epistle to the other patriarchs on occasion of his consecration contained an elaborate discussion of the subject, and a host of quotations from the fathers in proof that the doctrine of two wills and two operations was the only true doctrine. See the letter in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1257.—Mur.

² The adherents to the Roman pontiffs have taken the utmost pains to disprove this, lest one of the pontiffs should seem to have erred in a matter of such moment. See among many others, Harduin, De Sacramentis Altaris, in his Opp. Selecta, p. 255, &c. And indeed it is not difficult either to accuse or excuse the man. For he appears not to have known what he did think on the subject, and to have annexed no very definite ideas to the words which he used. Yet he did say that there was but one will and one operation of will in Christ. And for this he was condemned in the council of Constantinople. He was therefore a heretic beyond all controversy, if it be true that universal councils cannot err. See Bossuet, De Fœderis Declarationis quam Clerus Gallicanus, anno 1682, de Potestate Ecclesiastica sentit, par. II. lib. xii. cap. xxi. &c. p. 182, &c. Add Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tome I. p. 391, &c. [Honorius was made acquainted by Sergius, in the above mentioned letter, with the origin and whole progress of the controversy; and he was so impressed that in his answer to Sergius (which is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1319, &c.), he so far agreed with Sergius, that he would not have either one or two operations and divine wills affirmed; yet he did very clearly maintain but one will in Christ, expressed his disapprobation of Sophronius, and declared the whole controversy to be unimportant and mere logomachy. There is extant also (ibid. p. 1351) an extract from a second letter of Honorius to Sergius, in which he still farther confirms his opinion. The friends of the Romish church have taken great pains to justify this mistake of Honorius. The Acts of the sixth general council, say they, are corrupted and the name of Honorius has been wickedly foisted into them. Honorius was not condemned for heresy but for his forbearance. He meant to deny only that there were two opposite wills in Christ. He wrote only as a private person and not as a bishop, and also when ill-informed by Sergius; and moreover retracted afterwards his opinion. But even Catholic writers have confuted these subterfuges—e.g. Richer, Hist. Concil. General. p. 296, &c.; Du Pin, Biblioth. tom. vi. p. 67, &c. Honorius was condemned not only in the sixth general council, but also in the seventh and eighth and in that in Trullo, and likewise by his own successors (Agatho, Leo II. Hadrian, &c.) and is named in several Rituals, and particularly in the Bre-which divided the commonwealth as well as the church into two parties.

7. To quiet these great commotions, Heraclius published in the year 639, an Ecthesis, that is, a formula of faith, drawn up by Sergius, in which, while he forbade all discussion of the question, whether there were only one or a twofold action or operation in Christ, he clearly stated that there was but one will in Christ.³ This new law was approved by not a few in the East, and first of all by Pyrrhus of Constantinople, who on the death of Sergius succeeded to that see in the year 639.⁴ But the Roman pontiff, John IV. in a council held this year at Rome, rejected the Ecthesis and condemned the Monothelites.⁵ As the controversy still continued, the emperor Constans in the year 648, with the consent of Paul of Constantinople, published a new edict called the Typus, by which the Ecthesis was annulled and silence enjoined on both the contending parties, as well with regard to one will, as with regard to one operation of will in Christ.⁶ But by the excited monks silence was viewed as a crime, and by their instigation Martin, the bishop of Rome, in a council of one hundred and five bishops in the year 649, anathematized both the Ecthesis and the Typus (but without naming the emperors) and likewise all patrons of the Monothelites.⁷

viary and in the festival of Leo II. together with Sergius and Cyrus, as a person damnatæ memoriæ. This is manifest proof that no one then even thought of an infallibility in the Romish popes, notwithstanding in modern times the name of Honorius has been erased from the Breviaries.—Schl. [See Bower's Lives of the Popes (Agatho), vol. iii. and Gieseler's Test-book by Cunningham, vol. I. p. 359, note 17.—Mur.

³ This Ecthesis is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 791, &c.—Schl.

⁴ Previously to this, Sergius assembled the clergy at Constantinople, and not only established the new Concordat, but ordained that all clergymen who should not adopt it should be liable to deposition, and all monks and laymen be liable to excommunication. Extracts from the Acts of this council are given in the Acts of the Lateran council (A.D. 649) in Harduin, tom. iii. p. 795, &c. Pyrrhus, the successor of Sergius, likewise received this formula in an assembly of the clergy A.D. 640, and commanded all bishops, whether present or absent, to subscribe to it. See the extracts from the Acts of this council in Harduin, tom. iii. p. 797.—Schl.

⁵ Heraclius transmitted the Ecthesis to Pope Severinus at Rome by the exarch Isaacius. (Harduin, tom. iii. p. 803.) Whether Severinus submitted to it is uncertain. But that his envoys sent to Constantinople to obtain the confirmation of his election, could not succeed till they had engaged he should receive it, is certain. His successor, John IV. rejected it soon after his elevation to office, in a Romish council of which we have only very dubious accounts. On the side of this pope stood the island of Cyprus, and Numidia, Byzicene, the Provincia Proconularis, and Mauritania; from all of which provinces synodal epistles are still extant, which show that the bishops there passed resolutions against the Ecthesis. They are in Harduin, tom. iii. p. 727, &c.—Schl.

⁶ This Typus is in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 823, &c.—Schl.

⁷ This council was held in the church of St. John of

8. The audacity of Martin in anathematizing the imperial edicts provoked Constans to issue orders for the arrest of the pontiff by the exarch Calliopas, and for his transportation in the year 650 to the island of Naxia. Maximus, the ringleader of the seditious monks, was banished to Bityca, and others not less factious were punished in different ways.¹ The succeeding Roman pontiffs, Eugenius and Vitalian, were more discreet and moderate, especially the latter, who received Constans, upon his arrival at Rome in the year 663, with the highest honours, and adopted measures to prevent the controversy from being rekindled.² It therefore slept in silence for several years; but as it was only a concealed fire which burned in secret, and as new commotions hazardous to the public peace were constantly to be feared, Constantine Pogonatus, the son of Constans, having advised with the Roman pontiff Agatho, summoned a general council in the year 680, which is called the sixth of the œcumenical councils; and here he permitted the Monothelites and the Roman pontiff Honorius to be condemned, in the presence of Agatho's legates, and he confirmed the decrees of the council with the sanction of penal laws.³

9. It is very difficult to define the real sentiments of the Monothelites, or what it was their adversaries condemned; for neither party is uniform in its statements, and both disclaim the errors imputed to them. I. The Monothelites disclaimed all connexion with the Eutychians and the Monophysites, and confessed that there were in Christ the Saviour two natures, so united without mixture or confusion, as to constitute but one person. II. They admitted that the human soul of Christ was endowed with a will, or the faculty of willing and choosing, and that it did not lose this power of willing and choosing in consequence of its union with the divine nature; for they held and taught that Christ was perfect man as well as perfect God, and of course that his human soul had the power of willing and choosing. III. They denied that this power of willing and choosing in the human soul of Christ was inactive or inoperative; on the contrary, they conceded that it operated together with the divine will. IV. They therefore in reality admitted two wills in Christ, and that both were active and operative wills.⁴ Yet, V. They maintained the Lateran, and thence called the Lateran Council. The Acts of it are in Harduin, tom. iii. p. 626—946. The year before, Pope Theodore had held a council at Rome, in which he condemned Pyrrhus who had lost the patriarchate of Constantinople, in consequence of his taking part in the civil commotions of that city at the election of a new emperor, together with his successor Paul; and had mingled some of the sacramental wine with the ink with which he signed their condemnation. See Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversam. p. 419. The Emperor Constans hoped by means of his Typus, to put an end to all these commotions; and he would undoubtedly have succeeded, if he had had only candid and reasonable men to deal with. But at Rome a determined spirit of self-justification prevailed, and unfortunately Pope Martin was a man who sought to gain a reputation for learning by metaphysical wrangling. He condemned in this council the opinions of an Arabian bishop, Theodorus of Pharan, a zealous Monophysite, but touched so lightly on the doctrines of Honorius as not even to mention his name.—Schl.

¹ To give the preceding a less exceptional aspect, Pope Martin was accused of various crimes. He was charged with being a partisan of the rebel exarch Olympius, with sending supplies of money to the Saracens, &c. From Naxia he was brought to Constantinople, and there subjected to a judicial trial. He would certainly have lost his head as a traitor, had not the dying patriarch Paul moved the emperor to commute his punishment into banishment to Cherson, where he soon after died in great distress. See his fourteenth and following Epistles, in Labbé, Concilia, tom. vi.; and Concilia Regia, tom. xv.; and Muratori, History of Italy, vol. iv. p. 125, &c.—Schl. [Also Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii.—Mur.]

² Vitalian, as soon as he was elected, dispatched his envoys to Constantinople, and by them sent the customary confession of his faith to the patriarch. The discreet procedure of the Pope and the political circumstances of the times caused his envoys to be well received, and to be sent back to Rome by Constantine with splendid presents. The patriarch of Constantinople also, in his letter of reply, expressed warm desires for union and harmony. When the emperor Constans in the year 663 came to Rome, in his campaign against the Lombards, the Pope showed him more honour than it became his papal character to show to one who had murdered his own brother; for the emperor a few years before had put to death his own brother, the deacon Theodosius. The Pope, with all his clergy, went out to meet him two miles from Rome, and escorted him into the city. But all the honours he showed to the emperor did not prevent the latter from carrying off to Constantinople all the brass which ornamented the city, and even the plates which covered the roof of the Pantheon. See Anastasius, De Vita Vitaliani; and Paulus Diaconus, Hist. Longobar. lib. v. cap. vi. vii.—Schl.

³ This council was called by the emperor, who presided in it in person. The number of bishops was small at first, but increased to near two hundred. There were eighteen sessions from the 7th Nov. 680 to the 16th Sept. 681. No one of the ancient councils was conducted with more decorum and fairness; yet not the bible but the decrees of former councils and the writings of the fathers were the authority relied upon. All the great patriarchs were present, either personally or by their representatives. At first the two parties were nearly balanced. But in the eighth session March 7th, George, the patriarch of Constantinople, went over to the side of the orthodox, and was followed by all the clergy of his diocese. Macarius, the patriarch of Antioch, who stood firm at the head of the Monothelites, was now outvoted, condemned, and deprived of his office. The Monothelites as soon as they were adjudged to be heretics, lost their seats; and therefore the decrees of the council were finally carried by a unanimous vote. Theodorus of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Sergius, Pyrrhus and Paul of Constantinople, Honorius of Rome, Macarius of Antioch, and some others, were condemned as heretics; and the doctrine of two wills, a human and divine, and two kinds of voluntary acts in Christ, defined and established. The Acts of this council, Gr. and Lat. are in Harduin's Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1043—1644; and they are not fastidiously as some Catholics formerly asserted. See Combes, Diss. Apolog. pro Actis vi. Synodi, in his Auctor. Biblioth. Patr. nov. tom. ii. p. 65; Forbes, Instructio Hist. Theol. lib. v. cap. x.; Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auteurs Ecclés. tome vi. p. 61; Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i. p. 605; Bower, Lives of the Popes (Agatho), vol. iii.—Mur.

⁴ They admitted two faculties or voluntary powers, a human and a divine; but maintained that when brought that, in a certain sense, there was but one will and one operation of will in Christ.

10. But these positions were not explained in precisely the same manner by all who were called Monothelites. Some of them, as may be fully proved, intended no more than that the two wills in Christ, the human and the divine, were always harmonious, and in this sense one; or that the human will always accorded with the divine will, and was therefore always holy, upright, and good. And in this opinion there is nothing censurable.¹ But others, approaching nearer to the Monophysites, supposed that the two wills in Christ, that is, the two powers of willing, in consequence of the personal union (as it is called) of the two natures, were amalgamated and became one will; yet they still admitted that the two wills could be, and should be, discriminated in our conceptions. The greatest part of the sect and those possessing the greatest acumen, supposed that the will of Christ's human soul was the instrument of his divine will, yet when moved and prompted to act, it operated and put forth volitions in connexion with the divine will.² From this supposition, the position so obstinately maintained by the Monothelites was unavoidable, that in Christ there was but one will and one operation of will; for the operation of an instrument and of him who uses it, is not twofold but one. Setting aside therefore the suspicion of Eutychianism and other things connected with that question, the point in controversy was, whether the human will of Christ sometimes acted from its own impulse, or whether it was always moved by the instigation of the divine nature. This controversy is a striking illustration of the fallacious and hazardous nature of every religious peace which is made to rest on ambiguous phraseology. The friends of the council of Chalcedon endeavoured to ensnare the Monophysites by means of a proposition of dubious interpretation; and they thus imprudently involved the church and the state in long protracted controversies.

into action they operated as if they were but one. By the expression one will therefore, they seem to have intended one volition or act of the will, and by one operation they intended one mode of acting. See Walch, Hist. der Ketzerr. vol. ix. p. 584, &c.—Mur.

¹ See Walch, Hist. der Ketzerr. vol. ix. p. 592, &c. where he names (in Ann. l. p. 593) Sergius, Honorius, and the Echtheit, as giving these views.—Mur.

² According to Walch, Hist. der Ketzerr. vol. ix. p. 594, &c. the subordination of the human will to the divine in Christ was explained by some to be altogether voluntary, or a consequence of the pious resignation and the faith of the man Christ Jesus; but others supposed that it resulted from the nature of the union by which the human nature became the instrument by which the divine nature worked; and they illustrated the subject by the subjection of man's bodily members to the empire of his mind or soul.—Mur.

11. The doctrine of the Monothelites, thus condemned and exploded by the council of Constantinople, found a place of refuge among the Mardaites, a people who inhabited the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus; and who about the conclusion of this century received from John Maro, their first bishop, the name of Maronites which they still retain. No one of the ancients indeed has mentioned this man as the person who brought the Libaniots to embrace Monothelism; but there are strong reasons for believing that it was this John, whose surname of Maro passed over to the people of whom he was bishop.³ This however is demonstrable from the testimony of William of Tyre and of other unexceptionable witnesses,⁴ that the Maronites were for a long time Monothelites in sentiment, and that it was not till the twelfth century, when they became reconciled with the Romish church in the year 1182, that they abandoned the error of one will in Christ. The most learned of the modern Maronites have very studiously endeavoured to wipe off this reproach from their nation, and have advanced many arguments to prove that their ancestors were always obedient to the see of Rome, and never embraced the sentiments either of the Monophysites or of the Monothelites. But they cannot persuade the learned to believe so; for these

³ The surname of Maro was given to this monk because he had lived in the celebrated monastery of St. Maro on the river Orontes, before he took up his residence among the Mardaites on Mount Lebanon. A particular account is given of him by Asseman, Biblioth. Oriental. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. p. 496. [Gabriel Slonita, De Urbibus et Moribus Oriental. cap. vii. derives the name of Maronites from an abbot Maron, whom he extols for his holiness and his virtues; but he will acknowledge no heretical Maro.—Schl. [Gieseler in his Test-book by Cunningham, vol. i. p. 373, note 5, thinks the history of the Maronites has been obscured by identifying that people with the Mardaites; and refers us to Duperron, Recherches sur les migrations des Mardes in the Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscript. tome i. p. 1, "showing that the Mardaites or Mards, a warlike nation of Armenia, were placed as a garrison on Mount Libanus by Constantine Pogonatus, A.D. 676 (Theophanes p. 295), but withdrawn A.D. 685 by Justinian II. (ibid. p. 302)."—Mur.

⁴ The passage of William of Tyre is in his Hist. rerum in partibus Transmar. gestar. lib. xxxii. cap. viii. and is this:—"A Syrian nation in the province of Phenicia, inhabiting the cliffs of Lebanon near the city Biblos, while enjoying temporal peace, experienced a great change in its state. For having followed the errors of one Maro, a heresiarch, for nearly 500 years, and so as to be called after him Maronites, and to be separated from the church of the faithful and maintain a separate worship, through divine influence returning now to a sound mind they put on resolution and joined themselves to Alimericus, the patriarch of Antioch."—The Alexandrian patriarch Eutychius, whose Annals Pocock has translated from the Arabic, likewise mentions a monk Marun, "who asserted that Christ our Lord had two natures and one will, one operation and person, and corrupted the faith of men; and whose followers, holding the same sentiments with him, were called Maronites, deriving their name from his name Maro.—Schl.

maintain that their testimonies are fictitious and of no validity.¹

12. Neither the sixth [general] council, which condemned the Monothelites, nor the fifth, which had been held in the preceding century, enacted any canons concerning discipline and rites; therefore a new assembly of bishops was held by order of Justinian II. in the year 692, at Constantinople, in a tower of the palace which was called Trullus. This council, from the place of meeting, was called Concilium Trullanum, and from another circumstance, Quinisextum, because the Greeks considered its decrees as necessary to the perfection of the acts of the fifth and sixth councils. We have one hundred and two canons sanctioned by this assembly, on various subjects pertaining to the external part of worship, the government of the church, and the conduct of Christians. But as six of these canons are opposed to the Romish opinions and customs, therefore the Roman pontiff refused to approve the council as a whole or to rank it among the general councils, although they have deemed the greatest part of its canons to be excellent.²

and others in behalf of the Maronites, is without weight or authority. See Morin, De Ordinac. Sacra, p. 320, &c.; Simon, Histoire Critique des Chrétiens Orientaux, chap. xlii. p. 146; Renaudot, Hist. Patriar. Alexand. p. 149, and Præfat. ad Liturgias Orientales; Le Brun, Explication de la Messe, tome ii. p. 626, &c. Paris, 1726, 8vo. The arguments on both sides are stated, and the reader is left to form his own judgment, by Le Quen, Oriens Christianus, tom. iii. p. 10, &c. [See also Walch, Hist. der Ketzner, vol. ix. p. 474—488.—Mur.]

² See Pagl, Breviarium Pontific. Roman. tom. i. p. 486; Lupus, Dis. de Concilio Trullano, in his Notes and Dissertations on Councils, Opp. tom. iii. p. 168, &c. The Romans reject the fifth canon which approves of the eighty-five Apostolic Canons commonly attributed to Clement—the thirteenth canon, which allows priests to live in wedlock—the fifty-fifth canon, which condemns fasting on Saturdays, a custom allowed of in the Latin church—the sixty-seventh canon, which earnestly enjoins abstinence from blood and from things strangled—the eighty-second canon, which prohibits the painting of Christ in the image of a lamb—and the eighty-sixth canon, concerning the equality of the bishops of Rome and Constantinople. [The eastern patriarchs of Constantinople, Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Justiniana, with more than 200 bishops, attended this council. The Roman pontiff had no proper legate there. Yet his ordinary representatives at the imperial court sat in the council, and subscribed its decisions; and Basil, the archbishop of Crete, says in his subscription that he represented the patriarch of Rome and all the bishops under him. The emperor attended the council in person and subscribed its decrees. In the original, a space was left for the subscription of the Roman pontiff; but when it was sent to Rome by the emperor, and Pope Sergius was called on to subscribe, he showed such a refractory spirit as nearly cost him his liberty. The reason was, he found the above mentioned canons to be contrary to the principles and usages of his church. For the same reason the admirers of the Romish bishop to this day, are not agreed whether the whole council, or only the canons which have the misfortune to displease them, should be rejected; notwithstanding at an early period Pope Adrian approved of it. On the other hand this council was recognised by the Greeks as a valid one, and classed among the general councils. See Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversam. p. 441.—Schl.]

¹ The cause of the Maronites has been pleaded by Abrah. Echelenis, Gabriel Slouita, and others of the Maronite nation; but by none of them more fully than by Nalron, both in his Dissert. de Origine, Nomine et Religione Maronitarum, Rome, 1679, 8vo; and in his Euangelio fidei Catholice ex Syrorum et Chaldaeorum Monumentis, Rome, 1694, 8vo. Yet Nalron induced none to believe his positions except Pagl (in his Critica Baroniana, ad ann. 694), and De la Rocque, in whose Voyage de Syrie et de Montliban, tome ii. p. 28—128, there is a long Dissertation concerning the origin of the Maronites. Even Asseman, who being a Maronite spared no pains to vindicate the character of his nation (Biblioth. Orient. Clement. Vatic. tom. i. p. 496) yet does not deny that much of what has been written by Nalron

BOOK III.

FROM CHARLEMAGNE TO THE REFORMATION

BY LUTHER.

CENTURY EIGHTH.

PART I.

HISTORY OF THE OUTWARD STATE OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE PROSPEROUS EVENTS OF THIS CENTURY.

1. WHILE the Mohammedans were falling upon and subjugating the fairest provinces of Asia, and diminishing everywhere the lustre and reputation of Christianity, the Nestorians of Chaldea were blessing with the knowledge of heavenly truth those barbarous nations, called Scythians by the ancients and by the moderns Tartars, living on this side Mount Imaus and not subject to the Saracens. It is now ascertained that Timotheus the Nestorian pontiff, who attained that dignity A.D. 778, imbued with a knowledge of Christianity by the ministry of Subchal Jesu whom he created a bishop, first the Gelæ and Dallamites, nations of Hyrcania, and afterwards by other missionaries, the rest of the nations of Hyrcania, Bactria, Margiana, and Sogdiana.¹ It is also certain that Christianity was firmly and permanently established in those countries for several centuries, although it was sometimes disturbed by the Mohammedans; and that the bishops of these countries were always subject to the authority of the Nestorian pontiff.

2. In Europe most of the German nations were still involved in the darkness of superstition; the only exception being the tribes on the Rhine—namely, the Bavarians, who are known to have received a knowledge of Christianity under Theodoric, the son of Clovis the Great, and the Eastern Franks [or Franconians] with a few others. Attempts had been often made to enlighten the Germans, both by the kings and princes, for whose interest it was that those warlike tribes should become civilised, and also by some pious and holy men; but the attempts had met with little or no success. But in this century, Winifrid, an English Benedictine monk of noble birth who afterwards bore the name of Boniface, attempted this object with better success. In the year 715 he left his native country with two companions, and first attempted in vain to disseminate Christian doctrines among the Frieslanders who were subjects of King Radbod. Afterwards in the year 719, having received a solemn commission from the Roman pontiff, Gregory II. he more successfully performed the functions of a Christian teacher among the Thuringians, the Frieslanders, and the Hessians.²

¹ Thomas Margensis, Hist. Monast. lib. iii. In Asseman, Biblio. Orient. Vatic. tom. iii. par. i. p. 491. See also Ibid. tom. iii. par. ii. cap. ix. sec. 5, p. 478. [Moshelm in his Hist. Tartarorum Eccles. p. 13, &c. relying chiefly on the preceding authorities, states that Timotheus, who was patriarch of the Nestorians from A.D. 777 to A.D. 820, planned the mission to these nations inhabiting the shores of the Caspian sea; and selected for its execution one Subchal Jesu, a learned monk of the Nestorian monastery of Beth-Aben in Assyria, well skilled in the Syriac, Arabic, and Persian languages; ordained him bishop and sent him forth. Subchal made numerous converts among the Gelæ and Dallamites, formed them into churches, and ordained elders over them. This active missionary also travelled farther East, and spread the Gospel extensively in Tartary, Chathai, and China; but on his return from his mission to visit Timotheus and the monks of his convent, he was murdered by the Barbarians. Timotheus now ordained Kardagus and Jabalaha, two other monks of Beth-Aben, and sent them with fifteen assistant monks into the same countries. These also were successful missionaries; and with the consent of Timotheus, the two bishops ordained seven of their companions to be bishops of the East, namely, Thomas who went into India, David metropolitan of China, and Zachæus, Semus, Ephraim, Simeon, and Ananias. Thomas Margensis relates that Timotheus directed the two ordaining bishops first to ordain a third, and to supply the place of a third bishop at his ordination, by placing a copy of the Gospels on the seat near the right hand. Afterwards they would have the canonical number of three bishops to ordain the others. These new bishops dispersed themselves widely over the countries of the East, and founded many churches in India, Chathai, and China. But after the death of Timotheus, A.D. 820, we learn nothing more respecting these churches till A.D. 1000, when the famous Christian prince, called Presbyter John, came upon the stage.—Mur.

² All that could be said of this celebrated man has been collected by Gudenius, in his Dis. de S. Bonifacio Germanorum Apostolo, Helmst. 1722, 4to. Yet we may add Fabricius, Biblio. Lat. mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 709; Histoire Litt. de la France, tome iv. p. 92 Mabilon, Annales Benedictini, and others. [The church histories of Fleury, Schroeckh, and Gel mild, gave ample accounts of Boniface. Milner (Church

3. In the year 723, being ordained a bishop by Gregory II. at Rome and being supported by the authority and the aid of Charles Martel, the mayor of the palace to Hist. cent. viii. chap. iv.) is an admirer of Boniface. The best among the original biographers of this famous man are Willibald, one of his disciples, and a German monk named Othlon who lived in the eleventh century, and collected various letters of Boniface which he has inserted in his narrative. Both these biographies with valuable notes are contained in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iv. p. 1—84, ed. Venet. 1734. According to these writers, Boniface was born at Kirton [Crediton] in Devonshire about A.D. 680. When but four or five years old he showed a strong inclination for a monastic life, which his father first endeavoured to eradicate but afterwards favoured. He first entered a monastery at Exeter, whence he removed to the monastery of Nuscelle in Hants, as a better place for study. At the age of thirty he was ordained a presbyter. About A.D. 715, he undertook a voluntary mission to Friesland with two monks for companions. But Radbod, the pagan king of the country, being at war with the Franks and hostile to the Christians, gave him no encouragement; and he returned again to his monastery. The abbacy of Nuscelle was now offered him, but he refused it because he preferred a more active employment. Soon after, having projected a mission to the pagans in Germany, he set out for Rome to obtain the papal sanction and support to his enterprise. Having obtained this he now visited Germany, preached in Bavaria and Thuringia, and learning that Radbod was dead he went to Friesland, and for three years assisted Willibrord, the aged bishop of Utrecht, in spreading the Gospel and erecting churches among the neighbouring pagans. He now visited Rome a second time in the year 723, was closely examined by the pope, as to his faith and his adherence to the see of Rome; and upon his swearing perpetual allegiance to the pope, he was created a bishop and had his name changed from Winifrid to Boniface. With numerous letters of recommendation to princes, bishops, and others, and a good stock of holy relics, Boniface returned through France, where Charles Martel received him cordially, and furnished him with a safe-conduct throughout the empire. He first went among the Hessians, where he suppressed the remains of idolatry, and intrepidly cut down the consecrated oak of Jupiter, which broke into four equal parts in its fall. This prodigy allayed all objections, and out of the wood of this tree a chapel was built dedicated to St. Peter. From Hesse he went to Thuringia, where he effected a similar reform. On the accession of Gregory III. to the papal chair A.D. 731, Boniface sent an embassy to Rome giving account of his proceedings, and proposing several questions respecting ecclesiastical law, for solution. The pope answered his inquiries, sent him a fresh supply of relics, and also the archiepiscopal pallium, with instructions when and how to wear it. In the year 738 he visited Rome a third time attended by a large retinue of priests and monks, and was graciously received by the pope. On his return through Bavaria as papal legate, he divided that country into four bishoprics, and placed bishops over them, at Saltzburg, Freisingen, Regensburg [Ratisbon], and Passau. In the year 741 he erected four more bishoprics in Germany, namely, those of Würzburg, Eichstadt, Buraburg, and Erfurth. Hitherto Boniface had been archbishop of no particular place; but in the year 745 he procured the deposition of Gevileb, archbishop of Mentz, charging him in a provincial council with having slain in single combat the man who had slain his own father in battle, and with having kept dogs and birds for sport. This council decreed the vacant see of Mentz to Boniface. As archbishop of Mentz, Boniface claimed jurisdiction over the bishop of Utrecht, which claim was contested by the archbishop of Cologne. Boniface, as archbishop and as papal legate, presided in several councils in France and Germany, and was very active in enforcing uniformity of rites, and rigid adherence to the canons of the church of Rome. In the year 754, being far advanced in life, he left his bishopric at Mentz under the care of Lullus, whom he ordained his colleague and successor, and undertook a mission among the Frieslanders, who were but partially converted to Christianity. With the aid of several clergymen and monks, he had brought many persons of both sexes to submit to baptism; and having appointed the 5th of June for a general meeting of the converts to receive the right of confirmation at Dockum on the Borden between East and West Friesland, on the morning of the day appointed a party of pagan Frieslanders assaulted his camp. His young men began to prepare for battle, but Boniface forbade it and exhorted all to resign themselves up to die as martyrs. He and his fifty-two companions were all murdered, and their camp was plundered. The remains of Boniface were carried to Mentz and thence to Fulda. Boniface left behind him forty-two epistles, thirty-six ecclesiastical rules, fifteen discourses, and a part of a work on penance.—Mur.

4. On account of his vast labours in propagating Christianity among the Germans, Boniface has gained the title of the Apostle of Germany; and a candid estimate of the magnitude of his achievements will show him to be not altogether unworthy of this title.¹ Yet as an apostle, he was widely different from that pattern which the first and genuine apostles have left us. For not to mention that the honour and tially converted to Christianity. With the aid of several clergymen and monks, he had brought many persons of both sexes to submit to baptism; and having appointed the 5th of June for a general meeting of the converts to receive the right of confirmation at Dockum on the Borden between East and West Friesland, on the morning of the day appointed a party of pagan Frieslanders assaulted his camp. His young men began to prepare for battle, but Boniface forbade it and exhorted all to resign themselves up to die as martyrs. He and his fifty-two companions were all murdered, and their camp was plundered. The remains of Boniface were carried to Mentz and thence to Fulda. Boniface left behind him forty-two epistles, thirty-six ecclesiastical rules, fifteen discourses, and a part of a work on penance.—Mur.

1 If the man deserves the title of an Apostle, who goes among the heathen, preaches to them the Gospel according to his best knowledge of it, encounters many hardships, makes some inroad upon idolatry, gathers churches, erects houses of worship, founds monasteries, and spends his life in this business, then Boniface justly merits this title. But if that man only can be called an Apostle, who is in all respects like to Peter and Paul, who in all his efforts looks only to the honour of Christ and the dissemination of truth and virtue, and for attaining these ends employs no means but such as the first Apostles of Christ used, then manifestly Boniface was wholly unworthy of this name. He was rather an Apostle of the pope than of Jesus Christ; he had but one eye directed towards Christ, the other was fixed on the pope of Rome, and on his own fame which depended on him.—Schli.

majesty of the Roman pontiff whose minister and legate he was, were equally his care—nay more so than the glory of Christ and his religion;¹ he did not oppose superstition with the weapons which the ancient apostles used, but he often coerced the minds of the people by violence and terrors, and at other times caught them by artifices and fraud.² His epistles also betray here and there an ambitious and arrogant spirit, a crafty and insidious disposition, an immoderate eagerness to increase the honours and extend the prerogatives of the clergy.³

¹ The French Benedictine monks ingenuously acknowledge that Boniface was a sycophant of the Roman pontiff, and showed him more deference than was fit and proper. See Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 106. "Il exprime son dévouement pour le S. Siège quelquefois en des termes qui ne sont pas assez proportionnés à la dignité du caractère Episcopal." [We need only to read his epistles to be satisfied on this point. He says (Ep. xci. p. 126, ed. Serrav.), that all he had done for six-and-thirty years while legate of the holy see, was intended for the advantage of the church at Rome; to the judgment of which so far as he had erred in word or deed, he submitted himself with all humility. Cringing enough for an archbishop of the German church! In a letter to Pope Zacharias (Ep. Bonif. cxxiii. p. 181) he writes, that he wished to maintain the general faith and union with the church of Rome, and would not cease to urge and persuade all his pupils who were about him to be obedient to the see of Rome. In another letter addressed to Stephen III. (Ep. xlvii. p. 132) upon occasion of his contest with the bishop of Cologne respecting the bishopric of Utrecht, he represents the bishop of Cologne as wishing exclusively to make the bishop who should preach to the Frislanders, independent of the see of Rome; whereas he (Boniface) was exerting all his powers to make the bishopric of Utrecht entirely dependent on the see of Rome.—Schl.]

² It is unquestionable that this apostle of the Germans marched into Thuringia at the head of an army, and that at the time he was murdered by the Frislanders, he had soldiers with him as his body-guard; and so in all his enterprises he had the support of the civil arm afforded to him by Charles Martel, Carloman, and Pepin. His arguments also may have been not the best if he followed the directions of Daniel, bishop of Winchester; for whom as his epistles show he had a high respect. (See Ep. Bonif. lii. p. 5, and that of Daniel to him, Ep. lxvii. p. 79, &c.) For here Daniel advises him to ask the pagans, how they can believe that the gods reward the righteous and punish the wicked in this life, since they see the Christians, who have destroyed their images and prostrated their worship all over the world, remain unpunished? And how comes it to pass that the Christians possess the fruitful countries which produce wine and oil in abundance, while the pagans inhabit the cold and barren corners of the earth? He must also represent to the pagans that the Christians now ruled the whole world, whereas the pagans were few in number and powerless; and this great change in their condition had taken place since the coming of Christ, for before that event the pagans had vast dominion. It is likewise undeniable that Boniface gloried in fictitious miracles and wonders.—Schl.

³ Consider only his conduct towards those bishops and presbyters, who had before received ordination and refused to receive it again from him according to the Roman rites, and would not in general submit themselves to Roman supremacy and Roman forms of worship. These must be regarded as false brethren, heretics, blasphemers, servants of the devil, and forerunners of Antichrist. They must be excommunicated, be cast into prisons, and receive corporal punishments. See with what violence he breaks out against Adelbert, Clemens, Sampson, Gottschalk, Ehrenwolf, Virgilius, and others, in his epistles; how bitterly he accuses them before the popes, and in presence of councils, &c.—Schl.

and a great degree of ignorance not only of many things which an apostle ought to know, but in particular of the true character of the Christian religion.⁴

5. Besides Boniface, others also attempted to rescue the unevangelized nations of Germany from the thralldom of superstition. Such was Corbinian, a French Benedictine monk, who after various labours for the instruction of the Bavarians and other nations, became bishop of Freisingen.⁵ Such also was Pirmin, a French monk, nearly contemporary with Boniface, who taught

⁴ A large part of the questions which Boniface submitted to the consideration of the popes, betray his ignorance. But still more so does his decision of the case of conscience, when a Bavarian priest who did not understand Latin had baptized with these words: Baptizo te in nomine patris et filii et spiritus sancti, which baptism he pronounced to be null and void; and likewise his persecution of the priest Virgilius in Bavaria, who maintained that the earth is globular and consequently habitable on the other side of it, and there enlightened by the sun and moon. Boniface looked upon this as a gross heresy; and he accused the man before the pope who actually excommunicated him for a heretic. See the tenth Epistle of Zacharias in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1912.—Schl. [In this and the preceding notes Schlegel has laboured with the zeal of a prosecutor to substantiate the heavy charges of Moshelm against Boniface. I have carefully read the original lives of this missionary, and also a considerable part of his correspondence; and I must say, I think Moshelm and his annotator Schlegel have not done impartial justice to this eminent man. He appears to me to have been one of the most sincere and honest men of his age; though he partook largely in the common faults of his time—an excessive attachment to monkery, and a superstitious regard for the canons of the church and the externals of religion. With all his imperfections he deserves to be classed with those who followed Christ according to the best light they had, and who did much to advance true religion among men.—Mur.]

⁵ Baronius, Annales, tom. viii. ad ann. 716, sec. 10, &c.; Meichelbeck, Hist. Frisingensis, tom. i. [The life of Saint Corbinian was written by one of his pupils and successors, Aribio; and may be seen in Mabillon, Acta Sanctorum Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 470–485, and in Meichelbeck, Hist. Frising. tom. i. par. ii. p. 3–21. Corbinian was born at Chartres, near Paris about A.D. 680. He early devoted himself to a monastic life, and to escape from society and enjoy solitude, he travelled into Italy about the year 717, and begged the pope to assign him some obscure retreat. But the pope ordained him a bishop, and sent him back to France. His miracles and his marvellous sanctity now drew such crowds around him, that after seven years he determined to go to Rome, and beg the pope to divest him of the episcopal dignity. The pope however would not release him from the episcopacy, and he returned by the way he came as far as Freisingen in Bavaria, where Grimoald, the reigning prince, detained him for the benefit of himself and subjects. After six years' labours at Freisingen, he died, as alleged, in a very extraordinary manner. He foresaw his death, and having made arrangements for it he arose in the morning in perfect health, bathed, dressed himself in his pontificals, performed public service, returned and placed himself upon his bed, drank a cup of wine, and immediately expired. His biographer makes no mention of his efforts to enlighten his flock, or to spread the knowledge of the Gospel. He was a most bigoted monk and exceedingly irascible. Prince Grimoald once invited him to dine. Corbinian said grace before dinner and made the sign of the cross over the food. While they were eating Grimoald threw some of the food to his dog. Corbinian in a rage kicked over the table and left the room, declaring to the prince that he deserved no blessings who had given food which was blessed to his dog.—Mur.]

Christianity amidst various sufferings in Helvetia, Alsace, and Bavaria, and presided over several monasteries.¹ Such likewise was Lebwini, an Englishman, who laboured with earnestness and zeal, though with little success, to persuade the warlike Saxon nation, the Frieslanders, the Belgæ, and other nations, to embrace Christianity.² Others of less notoriety are omitted.³ Neither shall I mention Willibrord and others, who commenced their missionary labours in the preceding century, and continued them with great zeal in this.

6. In the year 772 Charlemagne, king of the Franks, undertook to civilize and to convert from idolatry the extensive nation of the Saxons who occupied a large portion of Germany, and were almost perpetually at war with the Franks respecting their boundaries and other things; for he hoped, if their minds should become imbued with the Christian doctrines, they would gradually lay aside their ferocity and learn to yield submission to the empire of the Franks. The first attack upon their heathenism produced little effect, being made not with force and arms, but by some bishops and monks whom the victor had left for that purpose among the vanquished nation. But much better success attended the subsequent wars which Charlemagne undertook in the years 775, 776, and 780, against that heroic people, so fond of liberty and so impatient especially of sacerdotal domination.⁴ For these people who were attached to the superstitions of their ancestors were so effectually assailed not only with rewards but with the sword and punishments, that they reluctantly ceased to resist, and suffered themselves to be baptized by the teachers whom Charlemagne sent among them.⁵

¹ Bruschi, Chronologia Monaster. German. p. 30; Pagi, Critica in Annal. Baron. tom. ii. ad ann. 759, sec. 9, &c.; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 124. [The life of St. Pirmin written by Warmann, bishop of Constance at the beginning of the 11th century, may be seen in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedict. tom. iv. p. 124—130. According to this biography, Pirmin was first the bishop of either Meaux or Metz in France, where he was a devout and zealous pastor. Sintlax, a Saxon prince, procured his removal to the neighbourhood of Constance, where there was great need of an active and exemplary preacher. He established the monastery of Reichenau in an island near Constance, and afterwards nine or ten other monasteries in Swabia, Alsatia, and Switzerland; and was very active in promoting monastic piety in those countries. He is supposed to have died about A.D. 758.—Mur.

² Huethaldus, Vita S. Lehwini, in Surius, Vita Sanctorum, die 12 Novem. p. 277; Möller's Cimbria Literata, tom. ii. p. 461. [Lebwini was an English Benedictine monk and presbyter of Ripon in Yorkshire, about A.D. 690. With twelve companions he went over to West Friesland on the borders of the pagan Saxons, and for several years travelled and preached in that region and in Helioland. At length he settled down at Deventer in Overysseel, where he preached with considerable success till his death, about A.D. 740. See Möllerus, ubi supra.—Mur.

³ Among these were the following. 1. Othmar, a German monk, founder of the monastery of St. Gall in Switzerland. At the close of a long and exemplary life, he was maliciously accused of unchastity by some noblemen who had robbed his monastery, and was thrown into prison, where he languished four years and then died. Numerous miracles were wrought at his tomb. His life written by Walafrid Strabo is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. vol. iv. p. 139, &c. 2. Willibald, bishop of Eichstätt, was an Anglo-Saxon monk of honourable birth, educated in a monastery near Winchester. When arrived at manhood he and his younger brother Wundelald left England, travelled through France and Italy, sailed to Asia Minor, and the Holy Land, where they spent seven years. Returning to Italy they resided in the monastery of Mons Cassinus, during ten years or till A.D. 739. The pope then sent them into Germany to assist Boniface. Willibald was placed at Eichstätt, ordained priest A.D. 740, and bishop the year following. His death is placed A.D. 786. His life written by a kinswoman, a contemporary nun of Heidenheim, is extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iv. p. 330—354. 3. Alto, a Scotch monk, who travelled into Bavaria and there established the monastery called from him Altomünster. The monastery was endowed by King Pepin, and dedicated by Boniface. The life of Alto is in Mabillon, ubi supra, p. 196, &c. 4. Sturmli, a native of Noricum and follower of Boniface. Under the direction of that archbishop he erected and presided over the monastery of Fulda from A.D. 744 till his death A.D. 779, except one year which he spent in Italy, to learn more perfectly the rules of St. Benedict; and two other years in which Pepin king of the Franks held him prisoner, under false accusations of disloyalty. In the last years of his life he aided Charlemagne in compelling the Saxons to embrace Christianity. His life well written by Eligil, his pupil and successor, is extant in Mabillon, ubi supra, p. 242—259. 5. Virgilius, whom Boniface accused of heresy for believing the world to be globular, was an Irishman of good education and talents. He went to France in the reign of Pepin, who patronised him and in the year 766 procured for him the bishopric of Salzburg, which he held till his death, A.D. 780. While at Salzburg he did much to extend Christianity to the eastward of him, among the Slavonians and Huns. His life is in Mabillon, ubi supra, p. 279, &c.—Mur. [See more of him in Lanigan's Eccles. Hist. of Ireland, vol. iii. p. 179, &c.—R.

⁴ I cannot dispense with quoting a passage from a very credible author, Aleuin, which shows what it was especially that rendered the Saxons averse from Christianity, and how preposterously the missionaries sent among them conducted themselves. Aleuin, Ep. civ. in his Opp. p. 1647, says:—"Had the easy yoke of Christ with his light burthen been preached to the stubborn Saxons, with as much earnestness as the payment of tithes and legal satisfaction for the very smallest faults were exacted, perhaps they would not have abominated the sacrament of baptism. Let the Christian teachers learn from the example of the Apostles. Let them be preachers, not plunderers." Look at this portrait of the apostles who lived in this century! Yet they are said to have wrought great miracles.

⁵ Aleuin, as cited by William of Malmesbury, De Gestis Regum Anglorum, lib. i. cap. iv. published in the Scriptores Francæ, 1601, fol. uses this language:—"The ancient Saxons and all the Frieslanders, being urged to it by King Charles, who plied some of them with rewards and others with threats, were converted to the Christian faith." See also the Capitularia Regum Francorum, tom. i. p. 246, and p. 252. From the first of these passages, it appears that the Saxons who would renounce idolatry were restored to their ancient freedom forfeited by conquest, and were freed from all tribute to the king. The last of these passages contains this law: "If any person of the Saxon race shall contemptuously refuse to come to baptism, and shall resolve to continue a pagan, let him be put to death. By such penalties and rewards the whole world might be constrained to profess Christianity without miracles. But what sort of Christians the Saxons so converted must have been, need not be told. See Lau-
næi, De Veteri More baptizandi Judæos et Infideles, cap. v. vi. p. 703, &c. Opp. tom. ii. par. ii. where he Widekind and Albion indeed, who were two of the most valiant Saxon chiefs, renewed their former insurrections, and attempted to prostrate once more by violence and war that Christianity which had been set up by violence. But the martial courage and the liberality of Charlemagne at length brought them, in the year 785, solemnly to declare that they were Christians, and would continue to be so.¹ That the Saxons might not apostatize from the religion which they unwillingly professed, bishops were established, schools in various parts of their country set up, and monasteries erected. The Huns inhabiting Pannonia were treated in the same way as the Saxons; for Charlemagne so exhausted and humbled them by successive wars, as to compel them to prefer becoming Christians to being slaves.²

7. For these achievements of Charlemagne in behalf of Christianity the gratitude of posterity decreed him the honours of a saint; and in the twelfth century the emperor of the Romans, Frederic I. desired Paschal III. whom he had created sovereign pontiff, to enrol him among the tutelary saints of the church.³ He undoubtedly merited this honour, according to the views which prevailed in what are called the middle ages; when a man was accounted a saint who had enriched the priesthood with goods and possessions,⁴ and had extended by whatever means the boundaries of the church. But to those who estimate sanctity according to the views of Christ, Charlemagne must appear to be anything rather than a saint and a devout man. For not to mention his other vices which were certainly not inferior to his virtues, it is evident that in compelling the Huns, Saxons, and Frieslanders to profess Christianity, he did it more for the sake of gaining subjects to himself than to Jesus Christ. And therefore he did not hesitate to cultivate friendship with the Saracens, those enemies of the Christian name, when he could hope to obtain from them some aid to weaken the empire of the Greeks who were Christians.⁵

8. The numerous miracles which the Christian missionaries to the pagans are reported to have wrought in this century, have now wholly lost the credit which they once had. The corrupt moral principles of the times allowed the use of what are improperly called pious frauds; and those heralds of Christianity thought it no sin to terrify or beguile, with fictitious miracles, those whom they were unable to convince by reasoning. Yet I do not suppose that all who acquired fame by these miracles practised imposition. For not only were the nations so rude and ignorant as to mistake almost anything for a miracle; but their instructors also were so unlearned and so unacquainted with the laws of nature, as to look upon mere natural events, if unusual and unexpected, as special interpositions of divine power. This will be manifest to one who will read with candour and without superstitious emotions, the (Acta Sanctorum) Legends of the saints of this and the subsequent centuries.⁶

CHAPTER II.

THE ADVERSITIES OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH.

1. THE Byzantine empire experienced so many bloody revolutions and so many intestine calamities, as necessarily produced a great diminution of its energies. No emperor there reigned securely. Three of them were hurled from the throne, treated with various contumelies, and sent into exile. Under Leo III. the Isaurian, and his son Constantine Copronymus, the pernicious controversy respecting images and the worship of them, brought immense evils

⁶ Many of the miracles of this age are altogether ridiculous. Take the following as specimens. In the life of St. Winnoek (in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 195) it is stated as a miracle that his hand-mill, when he left it to say his prayers, would turn itself. And when an inquisitive monk looked through a crevice to see the wonder, he was struck blind for his presumption. The biographer of St. Pardulphus (ibid. p. 541, sec. 18) makes a child's cradle to rock day after day without hands; while if touched it would stop and remain immovable. In the life of St. Guthlack of Croyland (ibid. p. 263, sec. 19) while the saint was praying at his vigils, a vast number of devils entered his cell, rising out of the ground and issuing through crevices, "of direful aspect, terrible in form, with huge heads, long necks, pale faces, sickly countenances, squalid beards, bristly ears, wrinkled foreheads, malicious eyes, filthy mouths, horses' teeth, fire-emitting throats, lantern jaws, broad lips, terrific voices, singed hair, high cheek bones, prominent breasts, scaly thighs, knotty knees, crooked legs, swollen ankles, inverted feet, and opened mouths, hoarsely clamorous." These bound the saint fast, dragged him through hedges and briars, lifted him up from the earth, and carried him to the mouth of hell, where he saw all the torments of the damned. But while they were threatening to confine him there, St. Bartholomew appeared in glory to him, the devils were affrighted, and he was conducted back to his cell by his celestial deliverer. These are only a few, among scores of others which might be adduced.—Mur.

tells us that the Roman pontiff, Hadrian I. approved of this mode of converting the Saxons to Christianity.

¹ Eginhard, De Vita Caroli Magni Adamus Bremensis. lib. 1. cap. viii. p. 3, &c. and all the historians of the achievements of Charlemagne, who are enumerated by Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 959, &c.

² Life of St. Rudbert, in Canisius, Lectio. Antiq. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 340, &c.; Paulus Debreceus, Hist. Eccles. Reformat. in Hungar. et Transylvania, a Lampio edita, par. i. cap. li. p. 10, &c.

³ Canisius, Lectioes Antiq. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 207; Walch, De Caroli Mag. canonizatione.

⁴ See the last will of Charlemagne in Baluze, Capitularia Regum Francor. tom. i. p. 487.

⁵ See Basnage, Hist. des Juifs, tome ix. chap. ii. p. 40, &c.

upon the community and weakened incalculably the resources of the empire. Hence the Saracens were able to roam freely through Asia and Africa, to subdue the fairest portions of the country, and everywhere to depress and in various places wholly to exterminate the Christian faith. Moreover about the middle of the century, a new enemy appeared still more savage—namely, the Turks; a tribe and progeny of the Tartars, a rough and uncivilized race which, issuing from the narrow passes of Mount Caucasus and from inaccessible regions, burst upon Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, and then proceeding to Armenia first subdued the Saracens and afterwards the Greeks.¹

2. In the year 714 these Saracens, having crossed the sea which separates Spain from Africa and Count Julian acting the traitor, routed the army of Roderic, the king of the Spanish Goths, and subdued the greater part of that country.² Thus was the kingdom of the West Goths in Spain, after it had stood more than three centuries, wholly obliterated by this cruel and ferocious people. Moreover all the sea-coast of Gaul, from the Pyrenean mountains to the Rhone, was seized by these Saracens, who afterwards frequently laid waste the neighbouring provinces with fire and sword. Charles Martel indeed upon their invasion of Gaul in the year 732, gained a great victory over them at Poitiers;³ but the vanquished soon after recovered their strength and courage. Therefore Charlemagne in the year 778 marched a large army into Spain with a design to rescue that country from them. But though he met with considerable success, he did not fully accomplish his wishes.⁴ From this warlike people not even Italy was safe; for they reduced the island of Sardinia to subjection, and miserably wasted Sicily. In Spain therefore and in Sardinia under these masters, the Christian religion suffered a great defeat. In Germany and the adjacent countries, the nations who retained their former superstitions, inflicted vast evils and calamities upon the others who embraced Christianity.⁵ Hence in several places castles and fortresses were erected to restrain the incursions of the barbarians.

PART II

THE INTERNAL HISTORY OF THE CHURCH.

CHAPTER I.

THE STATE OF SCIENCE AND LITERATURE.

1. Among the Greeks, there were here and there individuals both able and willing to retard the downfall of learning, had they been supported; but in the perpetual commotions which threatened the extinction of both church and state they were unpatronised. Hence scarcely any can be named among the Greeks who distinguished themselves, either by the graces of diction and genius, or by richness of thought and erudition, or acuteness of investigation. Frigid discourses to the people, insipid narratives of the lives of reputed saints, useless discussions of unimportant subjects, vehement declamations against the Latins and the friends or the enemies of images, and histories composed without judgment; such were the monuments which the learned among the Greeks erected for their fame.

2. Yet the Aristotelian method of philosophising made great progress everywhere, and was taught in all the schools. For after the many public condemnations of the sentiments of Origen, and the rise of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies, Plato was nearly banished from the schools to the retreats of the monks.⁶ John Damascenus distinguished himself beyond

¹ See the historians of the Turkish empire, especially De Guignes, Hist. générale des Huns, des Turcs, des Mogols, &c. 5 vols. 4to. 1756.—Schl.

² Mariana, Reverum Hispanicarum. lib. vi. cap. xxi. &c.; Renaudot, Hist. Patriarch. Alexand. p. 253; Ferreras, Hist. de l'Espagne, tome ii. p. 425, &c. [Semler in his Hist. Eccles. Selecta Capita, tom. ii. p. 127, &c. conjectures that the popes contributed to the invasion of Spain by the Saracens. And it appears from Baronius (Annales ad ann. 701, No. 11, &c.) that the Spanish king and clergy were in some collision with his holiness. Still I can see no evidence that the popes had any concern with the Mohammedan invasion of Spain. Count Julian, a disaffected nobleman, was probably the sole cause of this calamity to his country.—Mur.

³ Paulus Diaconus, De Gestis Longobard. lib. vi. cap. xli. et liii.; Mariana, Reverum Hispanicarum. lib. vii. cap. liii.; Bayle, Dictionnaire Historique, article Abderam, tome i. p. 11; Ferreras, Histoire de l'Espagne, tome ii. p. 463, &c. [Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Rom. Emp. chap. lii.—Mur.

⁴ De Bünaü, Teutsche Kayser-u. Reichs-Hist. [afterwards quoted under its Latin title, Hist. Imperii Romano Germanici.—R.] vol. ii. p. 392, &c.; Ferreras, Hist. de l'Espagne, tom. ii. p. 506, &c.

⁵ Servatus Lupus, Vita Wifberti, p. 304, and others. —Schl.

⁶ See Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosoph. tom. iii. p. 533.

others in promoting Aristotelianism. He attempted to collect and to illustrate the dogmas of Aristotle, in several tracts designed for the less informed; and these led many persons in Greece and Syria more readily to embrace those dogmas. The Nestorians and Jacobites were equally diligent in giving currency to the principles of Aristotle, which enabled them to dispute more confidently with the Greeks respecting the natures and the person of Christ.

3. The history of the Latins abounds with so many examples of extreme ignorance as may well surprise us.¹ Yet the fact will be readily admitted by those who survey the state of Europe in this century. In Rome and in some of the cities of Italy, there remained some faint traces of learning and science;² but with this exception, what learning there was had abandoned the continent, and retired beyond sea among the Britons and Irish.³ Those therefore among the Latins who distinguished themselves at all by works of genius, with the exception of some few Franks and Italians, were nearly all Britons, or Scots that is Irish; such as Aleuin, Bede, Egbert, Clemens, Dungal, Acca, and others. Prompted by Aleuin, Charlemagne, who was himself a man of letters, attempted to dispel this ignorance. For he invited to his court grammarians and other learned men first out of Italy, and afterwards from Britain and Ireland; and he laboured to rouse especially the clergy, or the bishops, priests, and monks (whose patrimony in this century seemed to be learning), and by means of his own example the nobility also and their sons, to the cultivation of science and learning, both human and divine.

4. By his authority and requisition most of the bishops connected with their respective primary churches what were called cathedral schools, in which children and youth devoted to the church were taught the sciences. The more discerning abbots or rulers of the monasteries likewise opened schools, in which some of the fraternity taught the Latin language, and other things deemed useful and necessary for a monk or a preacher.⁴ It was formerly supposed that

Charlemagne was the patron and founder of the university of Paris, but all impartial inquirers into the history of those times deny him this honour; yet it is ascertained that he laid a foundation upon which this celebrated school was afterwards erected.⁵ To purge his court of ignorance he established in it the famous school called the Palatine school, in which the children of Charlemagne and of his nobles were instructed by masters of great reputation.⁶

5. But the youth left these schools not much better or more learned than when they entered them. The ability of the teachers was small, and what they taught was so meagre and dry that it could not be very ornamental or useful to any man. The whole circle of knowledge was included in what they called the seven liberal arts; namely, grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy,⁷ of which the first three were called the Trivium, and the last four the Quadrivium. How miserably these sciences were taught may be learned from the little work of Aleuin upon them,⁸ or from the tracts of Augustine, which were considered to be of the very first order. In most of the schools the teachers did not venture to go beyond the Trivium; and an individual who had

⁴ Baluze, Capitul. Regum Francor. tom. i. p. 101, &c.; Sirmond, Concilia Gallie, tom. ii. p. 121; Bulaus, Diss. de Scholis Claustralibus et Episcopalibus, in his Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 79; Launoï, De Scholis a Carolo M. per Occident. Institutis; Conringius, Antiquit. Academ. p. 81, 315; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 6, &c. and others. [In the year 787 Charlemagne addressed an injunction to the bishops and abbots requiring them to set up schools, which were not intended for little children but for monks, who were to be taught the interpretation of Scripture and the learning requisite for this purpose. He likewise often permitted monks to come to his palatine school. His commands and the example he exhibited in this court school were very efficient; and soon after the famous school of Fulda was founded, the reputation of which spread over civilised Europe and allured numerous foreigners to it. Next to Fulda, Hirschau, Corvey, Prüm, Weissenburg, St. Gall, and Reichenau, became famous for their good schools, which might be called the high schools of that age and were the resort of monks, designed for teachers in the inferior and poorer monasteries. Charlemagne also exercised the wits of the bishops, by proposing to them all sorts of learned questions for them to answer either in writing or orally.—Schl.]

⁵ The arguments to prove Charlemagne the founder of the university of Paris, are nowhere more fully stated than in Bulzeus, Hist. Acad. Par. tom. i. p. 91, &c. But several learned Frenchmen, Mabillon (Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. Præf. sec. 181, 182), Launoï, Claude Joly (De Scholis), and many others, have confuted those arguments.

⁶ Bulzeus, Hist. Acad. Paris. tom. i. p. 281; Mabillon, ubi supra, sec. 179, and others.

⁷ Conringius, Antiquit. Academ. Diss. iii. p. 80, &c.; Thomastus, Programmata, p. 368; Observationes Halesenses, tom. vi. Observ. xiv. p. 118, &c. [See also on this Palatine school of Charlemagne, Bähr, Gesch. der Rom. Liter. Suppl. vol. part iii. p. 19; and on the other schools which he encouraged, ibid. p. 21.—R.]

⁸ Aleuin, Opp. par. ii. p. 1245, ed. Quercetani. This little work is not only imperfect, but is almost entirely transcribed from Cassiodorus.

¹ See the annotations of Baluze on Regino Prumensis, p. 540. [Learning which appears to have been confined much to the clergy, began to be rare even among them. The clergy understood little or nothing of human science or of languages, and the popes confirmed them in this state. For they required nothing more of them at their ordination than to be able to read, to sing, and to repeat the Lord's prayer, the creed, and Psalter, and to ascertain the feast-days. The ignorance shown by Boniface and even by Pope Zacharias, in the controversy respecting antipodes and the figure of the earth, has already been noticed.—Schl.] mastered both the Trivium and the Quadrivium, and wished to attempt something still higher, was directed to study Cassiodorus and Boëthius.

² Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Med. Ævi, tom. iii. p. 811.

³ Ussher, Praefatio ad Syllogem Epistol. Hibernic.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF THE TEACHERS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE CHURCH.

1. THAT those who in this age had the care of the church both in the East and in the West were of very corrupt morals, is abundantly testified. The oriental bishops and doctors wasted their lives in various controversies and quarrels; and disregarding the cause of religion and piety, they disquieted the state with their senseless clamours and seditious. Nor did they hesitate to imbrue their hands in the blood of their dissenting brethren. Those in the West who pretended to be luminaries, gave themselves up wholly to various kinds of profligacy, to gluttony, hunting, lust, sensuality, and war.¹ Nor could they in any way be reclaimed, although Carloman, Pepin, and especially Charlemagne, enacted various laws against their vices.²

2. Although these vices of persons who ought to have been examples to others were exceedingly offensive to all, and gave occasion to various complaints; yet they did not prevent the persons defiled with them from being everywhere held in the highest honour, and being adored by the vulgar as if they were deities. The veneration and submission paid to bishops and to all the clergy was however far greater in the West than in the East. The cause of this will be obvious to every one, who considers the state and the customs of the nations at this time bearing sway in Europe, anterior to their reception of Christianity; for all these nations before they became Christian were under the power of their priests, and dared not attempt anything important, either of a civil or military nature, without their concurrence.³ When they became Christian, they transferred the high prerogatives of their ancient priests to the bishops and ministers of the new religion; and the Christian prelates and clergy craftily and eagerly seized and arrogated to themselves these rights. Hence originated that monstrous authority of the priesthood in the European churches.

3. To the honours and prerogatives enjoyed by the bishops and priests, with the concurrence of the people in the West, were added during this period immense wealth and riches. The churches, monasteries, and bishops, had before been well supplied with goods and revenues; but in this century there arose a new and most convenient method of acquiring for them far greater riches, and of amplifying them for ever. Suddenly—by whose instigation is not known—the idea became universally prevalent, that the punishments for sin which God threatens to inflict may be bought off by liberal gifts to God, to the saints, to the temples, and to the ministers of God and of glorified saints. This opinion being everywhere admitted, the rich and prosperous whose lives were now most flagitious, conferred their wealth (which they had received by inheritance, or wrested from others by violence and war, according to the customs of the age) most bountifully upon the glorified saints, their ministers, and the guardians of their temples, for religious uses, in order to avoid the very irksome penances which were enjoined upon them by the priests,⁴ and yet be secure against the evils

³ Caesar (De Bello Gallico, lib. vi. cap. xii. xlii.) says:—"The Druids are in great honour among them, for they determine almost all controversies public and private; and if any crime is perpetrated, if a murder is committed, if there is a contest about an inheritance or territories, they decide and determine the rewards or punishments. If any one, whether a private or a public character, will not submit to their decision, they debar him from the sacrifices—The Druids are not accustomed to be present in battle, nor do they pay tribute with the other citizens, but are exempt from military service and from all other burdens. Allured by such privileges and from inclination, many embrace their discipline and are sent to it by their parents and friends." Tacitus (De Moribus Germanorum, cap. vii. p. 384, ed. Gronov.) says:—"Moreover to judge, to imprison, and to scourge, is allowable for none but the priests; and this, not under the idea of punishment or by order of the prince, but as if God commanded it." Chap. xi. p. 251. "Silence [in the public councils] is enjoined by the priests who there have coercive power." Helmold, Chron. Slavorum, lib. i. cap. xxxvi. p. 90, says of the Russians:—"Greater is their respect for a priest than for the king." Idem, De Sclavis, lib. ii. cap. xii. p. 235. "With them, a king is in moderate estimation compared with a priest. For the latter asks for responses—the king and the people depend on his will." Those ancient customs the people of Germany, Gaul, and of all Europe, retained after their conversion to Christianity; and it is therefore easy to answer the question, Whence originated that vast power of the priesthood in Europe, of which the Christian religion has no knowledge?

⁴ Such as long and severe fasts, tortures of the body, frequent and long-continued prayers, pilgrimages to which threatened to overtake them after death. This was the principal source of those immense treasures which from this century onward, through all the subsequent ages, flowed in upon the clergy, the churches, and the monasteries.¹

¹ Baluze, ad Regim. Præmonstr., p. 563; Wilkins, Concilia Mag. Britan. tom. i. p. 90, &c.

² Baluze, Capitul. Regum. Francor. tom. i. p. 189, 208, 275, 493, &c. (Harduin, Concilia, tom. iii. p. 1919, &c. where the clergy are forbidden to bear arms in war and to practise hunting; and severe laws are enacted against the impurities of the clergy, monks, and nuns. These laws were enacted under Carloman, A.D. 742. Among the Capitularia of Charlemagne cited by Harduin, are laws against clergymen's lending money at twelve per cent. interest (Harduin, vol. v. p. 827, cap. v.), against their haunting taverns (p. 830, cap. xiv.), against their practising magic (831, cap. xviii.), against their receiving bribes to ordain improper persons (p. 831, cap. xxxi.), bishops, abbots, and abbesses are forbidden to keep packs of hounds or hawks and falcons. (p. 846, cap. xv.) Laws were also enacted against clerical drunkenness (p. 958, cap. xiv.), concubinage (ibid. cap. xv.), tavern-haunting (p. 959, cap. xix.), and profane swearing (ibid. cap. xx.)—Mur.

4. The gifts moreover by which princes and noblemen endeavoured to satisfy the priests and to expiate their past sins were not merely private possessions, which common citizens might own, and with which the churches and monasteries had often before been endowed; but they were also public property, or such as may properly belong only to princes and to nations, royal domains (regalia) as they are called; for emperors, kings, and princes transferred to bishops, churches, and monasteries whole provinces, cities, and castles, with all the rights of sovereignty over them. Thus the persons whose business it was to teach contempt for the world, both by precept and example, unexpectedly became Dukes, Counts, Marquises, Judges, Legislators, sovereign Lords, and not only administered justice to citizens, but even marched out to war at the head of their own armies. This was the origin of those great calamities which afterwards afflicted Europe in the lamentable wars and contests about investitures and royal prerogatives.

5. Of this extraordinary liberality, which was never heard of out of Europe, not the vestige of an example can be found anterior to this century. There can therefore be no doubt that it grew out of the customs of the Europeans, and the form of government most common among these warlike nations; for the sovereigns of these nations used to bind their friends and clients to their interests, by presenting to them large tracts of country, with towns and castles in full sovereignty, reserving to themselves only the rights of supremacy and a claim to military services. Princes also might think they were obeying a rule of political wisdom in thus enriching the priests and bishops, as it is not probable that superstition was the sole cause of these extensive grants; for they might expect that men who were the tombs of the saints, and the like. These were the penances imposed by the priests on persons who confessed to them their sins; and they would be the most irksome to such as had spent their lives without restraint, amidst pleasures and indulgences, and who wished to continue to live in the same way. Hence the opulent most eagerly embraced this new method of shunning, by the sacrifice of a part of their estates, penalties so irksome.

¹ Hence the well-known phraseology used by those who made offerings to the churches and the priests, that they made the offering for the redemption of their souls. The property given was likewise often called the price of sin. See Muratori, Dis. de Redemptione Peccator. in his Antiquit. Ital. Med. Ævi, tom. v. p. 712, &c.

under the bonds of religion and consecrated to God would be more faithful to them than civil chieftains and military men accustomed to rapine and slaughter; and moreover they might hope to restrain their turbulent subjects, and keep them to their duty, by means of bishops, whose denunciations inspired so great terror.²

6. This great aggrandizement of clergymen in the countries of Europe commenced with their head, the Roman pontiff, and thence extended to inferior bishops, priests, and monkish fraternities; for the barbarous nations of Europe, on their conversion to Christianity, looked upon the Romish bishop as succeeding to the place of the supreme head or pontiff of their Druids or pagan priests; and as the latter had possessed immense influence in secular matters and was exceedingly feared, they supposed the former was to be revered and honoured in the same manner.³ And what those nations spontaneously gave, the bishop of Rome willingly received; and lest perchance on a change of circumstances he might be despoiled of it, he supported his claims by arguments drawn from ancient history and from Christianity. This was the origin of that vast pre-eminence acquired by the Roman pontiffs in this century, and of their great power in regard to civil affairs. Thus too that most pernicious opinion, the cause of so many wars and slaughters, and which established and increased surprisingly the power of the pontiff, namely, the belief that whoever is excluded from communion by him and his bishops loses all his rights and privileges, not only as a citizen but as a man, was derived to the Christian church from the ancient Druidic superstition, to the vast detriment of Europe.¹

² I will here quote a remarkable passage from William of Malmesbury in his fifth book De Gestis Regum Angliæ, p. 166, among the Scriptores Rer. Anglic. post Bedam, Francf. 1601, fol. He there gives the reason for those great donations to the bishops. "Charlemagne in order to curb the ferocity of those nations bestowed nearly all the lands on the churches, wisely considering that men of the sacred order would not be so likely as laymen to renounce subjection to their sovereign; and moreover if the laity should be rebellious, the clergy would be able to hold them in check by the terrors of excommunication and the severities of their discipline." I doubt not that here is stated the true reason why Charlemagne, a prince by no means superstitious or a slave of priests, heaped upon the Roman pontiff and upon the bishops of Germany, Italy, and other countries which he subdued, so many estates, territories, and riches. That is, he enlarged immoderately the power and resources of the clergy, that he might by means of the bishops restrain and keep in subjection his dukes, counts, and knights. For instance from the dukes of Beneventum, Spoleto, Capua, and others in Italy, much was to be feared after the extinction of the Lombard monarchy; and hence he conferred a large portion of Italy upon the Roman pontiff, so that by his authority, power, and menaces, he might deter those powerful and indelictive princes from sedition, or overcome them if they dared rebel. That other kings and princes in Europe reasoned in the same manner as Charles did, will not be questioned by one who considers well the political constitutions and forms of government of that age. That aggrandisement therefore of bishops and priests which we should naturally ascribe wholly to superstition, was also the result of civil prudence or state policy. On the subject of excommunications mentioned by Malmesbury above, we shall have something to say hereafter.

³ Cæsar, De Bello Gallico, lib. vi. cap. xlii. His autem omnibus Druidibus præest unus, qui summum inter eos (Celtas) habet auctoritatem. Hoc mortuo, si qui ex reliquis excellit dignitate, succedit. At si plures pares, suffragio Druidum adlegitur; nonnumquam etiam armis de principatu contendunt.

7. A striking example of the immense authority of the pontiffs in this age is found in the history of the French nation. Pepin, the viceroy or mayor of the palace to Childeric, king of the Franks, and who already possessed the entire powers of the king, formed the design of divesting his sovereign of the title and the honours of royalty; and the French nobles being assembled in council A.D. 751, to deliberate on the subject, demanded, that first of all the pontiff should be consulted whether it would be lawful and right to do what Pepin desired. Pepin therefore despatched envoys to Zacharias, who then presided over the church at Rome, with this inquiry—Whether a valiant and warlike nation might not dethrone an indolent and incompetent king, and substitute in his place one more worthy and who had already done great services to the nation, without breuking the divine law? Zacharias at that time needed the aid of Pepin and the Franks against the Greeks and the Lombards, who were troublesome to him, and he answered the question according to the wishes of those who consulted him. This response being known in France no one resisted; the unhappy Childeric was divested of his royal dignity, and Pepin mounted the throne of his king and lord. Let the friends of the pontiff consider how they can justify this decision of the vicar of Jesus Christ, which is so manifestly repugnant to the commands of the Saviour.² Zacharias' successor, Stephen II. took a journey to France A.D. 754, and not only confirmed what was done but also freed Pepin, who had now reigned three years, from his oath of allegiance to his sovereign, and anointed or crowned him, together with his wife and his two sons.³

8. This marked attention of the Roman pontiffs to the Franks was of great advantage to the church over which they presided; for great commotions and insurrections having arisen in that part of Italy which was still subject to the Greeks, in consequence of the decrees of Leo the Isaurian and Constantine Copronymus against images, the Lombard kings so managed those commotions by their counsel and arms as gradually to get possession of the Grecian provinces in Italy, hitherto under the exarch stationed at Ravenna. Aistulphus, the king of the Lombards, elated by this success, endeavoured also to get possession of Rome and its territory, and affected the empire of all Italy. The pressure of these circumstances induced the pontiff, Stephen II. to apply for assistance to his great patron, Pepin, king of the Franks. In the year 754 that king marched an army over the Alps, and induced Aistulphus to promise, by a solemn oath, to restore the exarchate of Ravenna, Pentapolis,⁴ and all

¹ Though excommunication, from the time of Constantine the Great, had among Christians everywhere great influence, yet it had nowhere so great power or was so terrific and so distressing as in Europe. And the difference between European excommunication and that of other Christians from the eighth century onward, was immense. Those excluded from the sacred rites or excommunicated, were indeed everywhere viewed as odious to God and to men; yet they did not forfeit their rights as men and as citizens; and much less were kings and princes supposed to lose their authority to rule, by being pronounced by bishops to be unworthy of communion in sacred rites. But in Europe from this century onward, a person excluded from the church by a bishop and especially by the prince of bishops, was no longer regarded as a king, or a lord, nor as a citizen, a husband, a father, or even as a man, but was considered as a brute. What was the cause of this? Undoubtedly the following is the true cause. Those new and ignorant proselytes confounded Christian excommunication with the old Gentile excommunication practised by the pagan priests, or they supposed the former to have the same nature and effects with the latter; and the pontiffs and bishops did all they could to cherish and confirm this error which was so useful to them. Read the following extract from Cæsar, De Bello Gallico, lib. vi. cap. xiii. and then judge whether I have mistaken the origin of European and papal excommunication:—"Si qui aut privatus aut publicus Druidum decreto non stetit, sacrificiis interdicunt. Hæc poena apud eos est gravissima. Quibus ita est interdictum, li numero Impiorum ac sceleratorum habentur, his omnes decedunt, auditum eorum sermonemque defugiunt, ne quid ex contagione incommodi accipiant; neque his petentibus quis redditur, neque honos ullus communicatur."

² See on this momentous transaction Le Cointe, Annales Eccl. Francie; and Mezeray, Daniel, and the other historians of France and Germany, but especially Bossuet, Defensio declarationis Cleri Gallicani, par. i. p. 225; Rival, Dissert. Histor. et Critiques sur divers sujets, Diss. ii. p. 70, Diss. iii. p. 156, Lond. 1726, 8vo, and the illustrious Bünau, Hist. Imp. Romano-German. tom. ii. p. 288. Yet the transaction is not stated in the same manner by all the writers, and by the sycophants of the Romish bishops it is generally misrepresented; for they make Zacharias by his pontifical power to have deposed Childeric, and to have raised Pepin to the throne. This the French deny, and on good grounds. Yet were it true, it would only make the pope's crime greater than it was. [See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. p. 331, &c.—Mur.]

³ Among many writers see the illustrious Bünau, Hist. Imp. Romano-German. tom. ii. p. 301, 366 [and Bower, Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. p. 352.—Mur.]

⁴ This territory lay along the Gulf of Venice from the Po southward as far as Permo, and extended back to the Apennines. According to Sigonius, the Exarchate included the cities of Ravenna, Bologna, Imola, Faenza, Forlimpopoli, Forlì, Cesena, Bobbio, Ferrara, Comacchio, Adria, Cervia, and Secchia. The Pentapolis, now the Marca d'Ancona, comprehended Rimini, Pesaro, Conca, Fano, Sinigaglia, Ancona, Osimo, Umana, Jesi, Fossombrone, Montefeltro, Urbino, Cagli, Luccole, and Fugubio. The whole territory might be 150 miles long, and from 60 to 80 miles broad.—Mur

that he had plundered. But the next year the Lombard king having violated his promise and laid siege to Rome, Pepin again marched an army into Italy, compelled him to observe his promise, and with unparalleled liberality bestowed on St. Peter and his church the Grecian provinces, namely, the Exarchate and the Pentapolis, which he had wrested from the grasp of Aistulphus.¹

9. After the death of Pepin, Desiderius, the king of the Lombards, again boldly invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, namely, the territories given by the Franks to the Roman church. Hadrian I. who was then pontiff, had recourse to Charles, afterwards called the Great [Charlemagne] the son of Pepin. He crossed the Alps with a powerful army in the year 774, overturned the empire of the Lombards in Italy which had stood more than two centuries, transported King Desiderius into France, and proclaimed himself king of the Lombards. In this expedition when Charlemagne arrived at Rome, he not only confirmed the donations of his father to St. Peter, but went further; for he delivered over to the pontiffs to be possessed and governed by them, some cities and provinces of Italy which were not included in the grant of Pepin. But what portions of Italy Charlemagne thus annexed to the donation of his father, it is very difficult at this day to ascertain.²

¹ See Sigonius, De Regno Italico, lib. iii. p. 202, &c. Opp. tom. ii. Bünaui, Hist. Imp. Romano-German. tom. ii. p. 301, 366; Muratori, Annal. tom. iv. p. 310, &c. and many others. But the exact boundaries of this exarchate thus disposed of by Pepin, have been much controverted, and been investigated with much industry in the present age. The Roman pontiffs extend the exarchate given to them as far as possible; others contract it to the narrowest limits they can. See Muratori, Droits de l'Empire sur l'Etat Ecclesiastique, chap. i. li. and Antiq. Italicoe Mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 64—68, 986, 987. But he is more cautious in tom. v. p. 790. This controversy cannot easily be settled except by recurrence to the deed of gift. Fontanini, Domino della S. Sede sopra Comacchio, Diss. i. cap. c. p. 346, cap. 67, p. 242, represents the deed of gift as still in existence, and he quotes some words from it. The fact is scarcely credible; yet if it be true, it is unquestionably not for the interest of the Roman church to have this important ancient document brought to light. Nor could those who defended the interests of the pontiff against the emperor Joseph, in the controversy respecting the fortress of Comacchio on our time, be persuaded to bring it forward though challenged to do it by the emperor's advocates. Bianchini however in his Prolegomena ad Anastasium de Vitis Pontificum Rom. p. 55, has given us a specimen of this grant, which bears the marks of antiquity. The motive which led Pepin to this great liberality, was, as appears from numerous testimonies, to make expiation for his sins, and especially the great sin he had committed against his master Childeric. [It appears however from more recent researches that Pepin, while he reserved to himself the superiority over Rome, only made the pope a kind of exarch in nominal subjection to the Greek emperor. See Savigny, Geschichte d. Röm. Rechts, &c.; Cathcart's translation, vol. i. p. 340, &c.—R.]

² See Sigonius, De Regno Italico, lib. iii. p. 223, &c. Opp. tom. ii. Bünaui, Hist. Imp. Romano-German. tom. ii. p. 368, &c. De Marca, De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. i. cap. xli. p. 67, &c. Muratori,

10. By this munificence, whether politic or impolitic I leave to others to determine, Charlemagne opened his way to the empire of the West, or rather to the title of emperor of the West, and to supreme dominion over the city of Rome and its territory, on which the empire of the West was thought to depend.³ He had doubtless long had this object in view; and perhaps his father Pepin had also contemplated the same thing. But the circumstances of the times required procrastination in an affair of such moment. The power of the Greeks, however, being embarrassed after the death of Leo IV. and his son Constantine, and the impious Irene, who was very odious to Charlemagne, having grasped the sceptre in the year 800, he did not hesitate to carry his designs into execution. For Charlemagne coming to Rome this year, the pontiff, Leo III. knowing his wishes persuaded the Roman people, who were then supposed to be free and to have the right of electing an em-

Droits de l'Empire sur l'Etat Ecclesi. chap. ii. p. 147, &c. Conringius, De Imperio Romano-German. cap. vi. [Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. Life of Hadrian I.] and numerous others. Concerning the extent of Charlemagne's new donation to the popes, there is the same warm contest between the patrons of the papacy and those of the empire, as there is respecting Pepin's donation. The advocates for the pontiffs maintain that Corsica, Sardinia, Sicily, the territory of Sabino, the duchy of Spokto, besides many other tracts of country, were presented by the very pious Charlemagne to St. Peter. But the advocates for the claims of the emperors diminish as far as they can the munificence of Charlemagne, and confine this new grant within narrow limits. On this subject the reader may consult the writers of the present age who have published works on the claims of the emperors and the popes to the cities of Comacchio and Florence, and the duchies of Parma and Piacenza; but especially the very learned treatise of Heret entitled Diss. Chorographica de Italia Mediæ ævi, p. 33, &c. The partialities of writers, if I mistake not, have prevented them from discerning in all cases the real facts; and it is easy to fall into mistakes on subjects so long involved in obscurity. Adrian affirms that the object of Charlemagne in this new donation was to atone for his sins; for he thus writes to the Emperor in the ninety-second Epistle of the Codex Carolinus, in Muratori, Scriptor. Rer. Italicar. tom. iii. par. ii. p. 265:—"Venientes ad nos de Capua, quam Beato Petro, Apostolorum Principi, pro mercede animæ vestre atque sempiterna memoria, cum cæteris civitatibus christianis." I have no doubt that Charlemagne, who wished to be accounted pious according to the estimates of that age, expressed this design in his transfer or deed of gift. But a person acquainted with him and with the history of those times will not readily believe that this was his only motive. By that donation Charlemagne aimed to prepare the way for obtaining the empire of the West, which he was endeavouring to secure (for he was most ambitious of glory and dominion); but he could not honourably obtain his object in the existing state of things, without the concurrence and aid of the Roman pontiff. Besides this, he aimed to secure and establish his new empire in Italy, by increasing the possessions of the holy see. On this point I have already touched in a preceding note; and I think whoever carefully considers all the circumstances of the case will coincide with me in judgment.

³ In reality Charlemagne was already emperor of the West, that is, the most powerful of the kings in Europe. He therefore only lacked the title of emperor, and sovereign power over the city of Rome and the adjacent country; both of which he easily obtained by the aid of Leo III.

percr. to proclaim and constitute him emperor of the West.

11. Charlemagne being made emperor and sovereign of Rome and its territory, reserved indeed to himself the supreme power and the prerogatives of sovereignty; but the beneficial dominion, as it is called, and subordinate authority over the city and its territory, he seems to have conferred on the Romish church.² This plan was undoubtedly suggested to him by the Roman pontiff; who persuaded the emperor, perhaps by showing him some ancient though forged papers and documents, that Constantine the Great (to whose place and authority Charlemagne now succeeded), when he removed the seat of empire to Constantinople committed the old seat of empire, Rome and the adjacent territories or the Roman dukedom, to the possession and government of the church, reserving however his imperial prerogatives over it; and that, from this arrangement and ordinance of Constantine, Charlemagne could not depart without incurring the wrath of God and St. Peter.³

¹ See the historians of those times, and especially the best of them all, Büna, Hist. Imp. Romano-Germ. tom. ii. p. 537, &c. The advocates of the Roman pontiffs tell us that Leo III. by virtue of the supreme power with which he was divinely clothed, conferred the empire of the West, after it was taken from the Greeks, upon the nation of the Franks and upon Charlemagne their king; and hence they infer that the Roman pontiff, as the Vicar of Christ, is the sovereign lord of the whole earth as well as of the Roman empire; and that all emperors reign by his authority. The absurdity of this reasoning is learnedly exposed by Spanheim, De Ficta Translatione Imperii in Carolum M. per Lotharem III. in his Opp. tom. ii. p. 557. [See also Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. Life of Leo III.] Other writers need not be named.

² That Charlemagne retained the supreme power over the city of Rome and its territory—that he administered justice there by his judges and inflicted punishments on malefactors—and that he exercised all the prerogatives of sovereignty, learned men have demonstrated by the most unexceptionable testimony. See only Muratori, Droits de l'Empire sur l'Etat Eccles. chap. vi. p. 77, &c. Indeed they only shroud the light in darkness who maintain with Fontanini (Dominio della S. Sede sopra Comacchio, Diss. i. c. 95, 96, &c.), and the other advocates of the Roman pontiffs, that Charlemagne sustained at Rome not the character of a sovereign but that of patriarch of the Romish church, relinquishing the entire sovereignty to the pontiffs. And yet to declare the whole truth it is clear that the power of the Roman pontiff in the city and territory of Rome was great, and that he decreed and performed many things according to his pleasure and as a sovereign. But the limits of his power and the foundations of it are little known and much controverted. Muratori (Droits de l'Empire, p. 102) maintains that the pontiff performed the functions of an exarch or vicar of the emperor. But this opinion was very offensive to Clement XI. nor do I regard it as correct. After considering all the circumstances, I suppose the Roman pontiff held the Roman province and city by the same tenure as he did the exarchate and the other territories given him by Charlemagne, that is as a fief; yet with less circumscribed powers than ordinary feudal tenures, on account of the dignity of the city, which was once the capital or the seat of empire. This opinion receives much confirmation from the statements which will be made in the following note; and it reconciles the jarring testimonies of the ancient writers and other documents.

³ Most writers are of opinion that Constantine's pre-

12. Amidst these various accessions to their power and influence, the Roman pon-tended grant was posterior to this period, and that it was forged perhaps in the tenth century; but I believe it existed in this century, and that Hadrian and his successor Leo III. made use of it to persuade Charlemagne to convey feudal power over the city of Rome and its territory to the Romish church. For this opinion we have the good authority of the Roman pontiff himself, Hadrian I. in his Epistle to Charlemagne, which is the forty-ninth in the Codex Carolinus, published in Muratori's Herum Italicar. Scriptores, tom. iii. par. ii. p. 194, and which well deserves a perusal. Hadrian there exhorts Charlemagne, who was not yet emperor, to order the restitution of all the grants which had formerly been made to St. Peter and the church of Rome. And he very clearly distinguishes the grant of Constantine from the donations of the other emperors and princes; and what deserves particular notice, he distinguishes it from the donation of Pepin, which embraced the exarchate, and from the additions made to his father's grants by Charlemagne; whence it follows legitimately that Hadrian understood Constantine's grant to embrace the city of Rome and the territory dependent on it. He first mentions the grant of Constantine the Great, thus:—"Deprecamur vestram excellentiam—ut Dei amore et ipsius clavigeri regni celorum—ut secundum promissionem, quam polliciti estis eidem Dei Apostolo, pro animæ vestra mercede et stabilitate regni vestri, omnia nostris temporibus adimplere jubeatis.—Et sicut temporibus Beati Silvestri Romani Pontificis, a sanctæ recordationis plissimo Constantino Magno, Imperatore, per ejus largitatem (vide ipsam Constantini donationem) sancta Dei catholica et apostolica Romana ecclesia elevata atque exaltata est, et potestatem in his Illesperie partibus largiri dignatus est: ita et in his vestris felicissimis temporibus atque nostris, sancta Dei ecclesia germinet—et amplius atque amplius exaltata permaneat.—Quia ecce novus Christianissimus Dei Constantinus Imperator (N.B. Here the pontiff denominates Charles, who was then only a king, an emperor, and compares him with Constantine) his temporibus surrexit, per quem omnia Deus sanctæ suæ ecclesiæ—largiri dignatus est. (Thus far he speaks of Constantine's donation. Next the pontiff notices the other donations, which he clearly discriminates from this.) Sed et cuncta alia, quæ per diversos Imperatores, Patricios, etiam et alios Deum timentes, pro eorum animæ mercede et venia peccatorum, in partibus Tuscie, Spoletis seu Benevento, atque Corsica, simul et Pavensini patrimonio, Beato Petro Apostolo,—concessa sunt, et per nefandum gentem Longobardorum per annorum spatia abstracta atque ablata sunt, vestris temporibus restituantur.—(The pontiff adds in the close that all those grants were preserved in the archives of the Lateran, and that he had sent them by his ambassadors to Charlemagne.) Unde et plures donationes in sacro nostro scrinio Lateranensi reconditas habemus; tamen et pro satisfactione Christianissimæ regni vestri, per jam factos viros, ad demonstrandum eas vobis, direximus; et pro hoc petimus eximiam Precellentiam vestram, ut in integro ipsa patrimonia Beato Petro et nobis restituere jubeatis."—By this it appears that Constantine's grant was then in the Lateran archives of the popes, and was sent with the others to Charlemagne. [Of this pretended Donatio Constantini there are four texts in Greek and one only in Latin in the Pseudo-Isidorian Collection, under the title of Edictum Dom. Constantini Imper. extracts from which are in the Decret. Gratiani. Dist. xvi. c. 13. (See Fabricius, Bibliæ Græcæ, tom. vi. p. 4-7.) That there never was any such grant is acknowledged by Otho III. in 999; though this acknowledgment is declared spurious by Baronius, Gretzer, Pagi, and others, but defended by Muratori and adopted by the French Benedictines. It is also pronounced to be a "mendacium et fabula heretica," by Pope Eugenius in a letter of his in 1152, in Martene et Durand, Amplius. Collect. &c. tom. ii. p. 553. In the fifteenth century this is demonstrated to be the case by Nic. Cusanus, De concord. Cath. about the year 1432, and especially by Laur. Valla, De falso credita et ementita Const. donatio. Since that period the document is universally allowed to be spurious, but the donation itself is still asserted by Baronius, Gretzer, Blanchini, Mamachi, and others. Gieseler's Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's translation, vol. ii. p. 62, 83, 187.—R.

tiffs experienced from the Greek emperors no inconsiderable loss of revenue and dignity. For Leo the Isaurian and his son Constantine Copronymus, being exceedingly offended with Gregory II. and III. on account of their zeal for sacred images, not only took from them the estates possessed by the Romish church in Sicily, Calabria, and Apulia; but also exempted the bishops of those territories and all the provinces of Illyricum from the dominion of the Roman pontiffs, and placed them under the protection of the bishop of Constantinople. Nor could the pontiffs afterwards, either by threats or supplications, induce the Greek emperors to restore these valuable portions of St. Peter's patrimony.¹ This was the first origin and the principal cause of that great contest between the bishops of Rome and of Constantinople, which in the next century severed the Greeks from the Latins, to the great detriment of Christianity. Yet there was an additional cause existing in this century, namely, the dispute concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit, of which we shall treat in its proper place. But this perhaps might have been easily adjusted, if the bishops of Rome and Constantinople had not become involved in a contest respecting the limits of their jurisdiction.

13. Monastic discipline, as all the writers of that age testify, was entirely prostrate both in the East and the West. The best of the oriental monks were those who lived an austere life, remote from the intercourse of men in the deserts of Egypt, Syria, and Mesopotamia; and yet among them not only gross ignorance, but also fanatical stupidity and abject superstition often reigned. The other monks in the neighbourhood of the cities not unfrequently disquieted the state; and Constantine Copronymus and other emperors were obliged to restrain them repeatedly by severe edicts. Most of the western monks now followed the rule of St. Benedict; yet there were monasteries in various places in which other rules were preferred.² But when their wealth became increased they scarcely observed any rule, and they gave themselves up to gluttony, voluptuousness, idleness, and other vices.³ Charlemagne attempted to cure these evils by statutes, but he effected very little.⁴

14. This great corruption of the whole sacred order produced in the West a new species of priests, who were an intermediate class between the monks or the regular clergy as they were called, and the secular priests. These adopted in part the discipline and mode of life of monks; that is, they dwelt together, ate at a common table, and joined in united prayer at certain hours; yet they did not take any vows upon them like the monks, and they performed ministerial functions in certain churches. They were at first called the Lord's brethren (fratres Domini); but afterwards took the name of canons (canonici).⁵ The common opinion attributes the institution of this order to Chrodegang, bishop of Metz; nor is it wholly without foundation.⁶ For although there were, anterior to this century, in Italy, Africa, and other provinces, convents of priests who lived in the manner of canons; yet Chrodegang, about the middle of this century, subjected the priests of his church at Metz to this mode of living, requiring them to sing hymns to God at certain hours and perhaps to observe other rites; and by his example, first the Franks and then the Italians, the English and the Germans,

⁴ See the Capitularia of Charlemagne, published by Baluze, tom. i. p. 148, 157, 237, 255, 366, &c. 375, 503, and in various other places. These numerous laws so often repeated prove the extreme perverseness of the monks. [See also the 20th, 21st, and 22d canons of the council of Cloveshoo, in England, A.D. 747. Monasteria—non sint ludicrarum artium receptacula, hoc est, poetarum, citharistarum, muscorum, scurrarum—Non sint sanctimonialium domicilia, turpium confabulationum, comessionationum, ebrietatum, luxuriantiumque cubilia. Monasteriales sive ecclesiastici, ebrietatis malum non sectentur aut expetant—sed neque alios cogant intemperanter bibere; sed pura et sobria sint eorum convivia, non luxuriosa, neque deliciis vel scurrilitatibus mixta, &c.—Mur.

⁵ See Le Beuf, Mémoires sur l'Hist. d'Auxerre, tome i. p. 174, Paris, 1743, 4to.

⁶ For an account of Chrodegang see the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 128; Calmet, Hist. de Lorraine, tome i. p. 513, &c.; Acta Sanctor. tom. i. Martii, p. 452. The rule which he prescribed to his canons may be seen in Le Coite's Annales Francor. Eccles. tome v. ad. ann. 757, sec. 33, &c. and in Labbe, Concilia, tom. vii. p. 1444. [In Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1181, &c.—Mur.] The rule as published by D'Achery, Spicilegium, tom. i. p. 565, &c. under the name of Chrodegang was the work of another person. A neat summary of the rule is given by Longueval, Hist. de l'Eglise Gallicane, tome iv. p. 435. [See also Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Liter. Suppl. vol. part. iii. p. 296. Cardinal Mai published a small tract, De Officiis Clericorum, which he believed to have been a work of this writer. See his Script. 1. et. nova collect. tom. vi. par. ii. p. 127.—R.

⁷ See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Evi, tom. v. p. 185, &c. also Thomassin's, De Disciplina Ecclesie vet. ac novæ, par. i. lib. iii. cap. iv. &c. The design of this institution was truly excellent. For its authors, pained with the vices and defects of the clergy, hoped that this mode of living would abstract the consecrated men from worldly cares and business. But the event has shown how much the hopes of these good men were disappointed.

¹ See Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 96, &c. The Greek writers also, as Theophanes and others, acknowledge the fact, but differ a little in respect to the cause.

² See Mabillon. Præf. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Benedicti, sec. 1, p. 24; and sec. 4, par. i. p. 26, &c.

³ Mabillon treats ingeniously of this corruption of the monks and of its causes, in Utu above work, Præf. ad Secul. iv. par. i. p. 64, &c.

were led to introduce this mode of living in numerous places, and to found convents of canons.

15. Supreme power over the whole sacred order and over all the possessions of the churches, was both in the East and in the West vested in the emperors and kings. Of the power of the Greek emperors over the church and its goods and possessions, no one entertains a doubt.¹ The prerogatives of the Latin emperors and kings, though the flatterers of the popes labour to cloak them, are too manifest and clear to be concealed, as the wiser part of the Roman community themselves confess. Hadrian I. in a council at Rome, conferred on Charlemagne and his successors the right of appointing and creating the Roman pontiffs.² And although Charlemagne and his son Louis declined exercising this power, yet they reserved to themselves the right of accepting and confirming the election made by the Roman people and clergy; nor could the consecration of a pope take place unless the emperor's ambassadors were present.³ The Roman pontiffs obeyed the laws of the emperors, and accounted all their decisions definitive.⁴ The emperors and kings of the Franks, by their extraordinary judges whom they called Missi, that is, Legates, inquired into the lives and conduct of all the clergy, the superior as well as the inferior, and decided causes and controversies among them; they enacted laws respecting the modes and forms of worship; and punished every species of crime in the priests, just as in the other citizens.⁵ The property belonging to churches and monasteries, unless exempted by the special indulgence of the sovereign, was taxed like other property for the common uses of the state.⁶

¹ For the authority of the Greek emperors in religious matters see Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, tom. i. p. 136.

² Anastasius makes mention of this decree, which is preserved both by Ivo and Gratian. The same subject has been discussed by very many. [The existence of this council and of such a grant to Charlemagne is very uncertain. The earliest mention of the council is in Siebert's Chronicon (ad ann. 773), written about A.D. 1111. But the passage is not in all the copies. From this questionable authority Gratian transcribed his account of it (Distinct. lxiii. cap. xxii. xxiii.), and also Ivo and the others. See De Marca, De Concordia, &c. lib. viii. cap. xiii. Pagi, Critica in Baron. ad ann. 774. Mansi, Concl. Suppl. tom. i. p. 721; and Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversamml. p. 473.—Mur.

³ See Mabillon, Commentar. in Ordinem Romanum; Musaeum Ital. tom. ii. p. 113, &c. Muratori, Droits de l'Empire sur l'Eglise, p. 87, &c.

⁴ This has been amply demonstrated by Baluze, Pref. ad Capitularia Regum Francor. sec. 21, &c.

⁵ See Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Evi, tom. i. diss. ix. p. 470; De Roye, De Micis Dominicis, cap. x. p. 44; cap. viii. p. 118, 124, 168, 195, &c.

⁶ See especially Muratori, Antiq. Ital. Medii Evi, tom. i. diss. xvii. p. 926. Also the Collection of various pieces in the contest of Louis XV., king of France, re-

16. That the preservation of religion and the decision of controversies respecting doctrines, belonged to the Roman pontiff and to the ecclesiastical councils, was not denied by the Latin [or Western] emperors and kings.⁷ But this power of the pontiff was confined within narrow limits. For he was not able to decide by his sole authority, but was obliged to assemble a council. Nor did the provinces wait for his decisions, but held conventions or councils at their pleasure, in which the bishops freely expressed their opinions, and gave decisions which did not accord with the views of the pontiffs; as is manifest from the French and German councils in the controversy respecting images. Moreover the emperors and kings had the right of calling the councils and of presiding in them; nor could the decrees of a council have the force of laws, unless they were confirmed and ratified by the reigning sovereign.⁸ Yet the Roman pontiffs left no means untried to free themselves from these many restraints, and to obtain supreme authority not only over the church, but also over kings and over the whole world; and these efforts of theirs were greatly favoured by the wars and tumults of the following century.

17. Among the writers of this century very few deserve much praise either for their learning or their genius. Among the Greeks, Germanus bishop of Constantinople obtained some celebrity by his talents, but still more by his immoderate zeal in defence of images.⁹ Cosmas of Jerusalem gained renown by his skill in composing Hymns.¹⁰ pecting the exemption of the clergy from taxation, published in Holland in seven volumes under the title of: Ecrits pour et contre les Immunités Prétendues par le Clergé de France; Hague, 1751, 8vo.

⁷ See Charlemagne, De Imaginibus, lib. i. cap. iv. p. 48, ed. Heumann.

⁸ All these points are well illustrated by Baluze, Pref. ad Capitularia; and by the Capitularia themselves, that is by the laws of the French kings. And all those who have discussed the rights of kings and princes in matters of religion, take up and illustrate this subject. See also Basnage, Hist. de l'Eglise, tom. i. p. 276, &c.

⁹ See Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. du Pin, tome i. p. 270. [Germanus was the son of Justinian, a patriarch of Constantinople, and was deprived of his virility by Constantine Pogonatus. He was made bishop of Cyzicum and then patriarch of Constantinople from A.D. 715 to 730. During the last four years of his patriarchate he strenuously opposed the emperor Leo and defended image worship, until he was deposed. He now retired to a peaceful private life till his death, about A.D. 740, when he was more than ninety years old. His writings all relate to image worship, and the honour due to the Virgin Mary; and consist of letters, orations, and polemic tracts, which may be seen, in the Acts of the Second Nicene Council, the Bibliotheca Patrum, and other collections. His orations in praise of the Holy Virgin are ascribed by some to another Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, in the thirteenth century. See Cave's Hist. Liter. vol. i.—Mur.

¹⁰ Cosmas was a native of Italy, captured by Saracen pirates, he was carried to Damascus, and there sold to

The histories of George Syncellus and Theophanes,² hold some rank among the writers of Byzantine history; but they must be placed far below the earlier Greek and Latin historians. The most distinguished of the Greek and Oriental writers was John Damascenus, a man of respectable talents and of some eloquence. He elucidated the Peripatetic philosophy as well as the science of theology by various works; but his fine native endowments were vitiated by the faults of his times—superstition and excessive veneration for the fathers; to say nothing of his censurable propensity to explain the Christian doctrines conformably to the views of Aristotle.³

the father of John Damascenus, who made him preceptor to his son. He was afterwards a monk in the monastery of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem, and at last bishop of Majuma. He flourished about A.D. 730, and has left us thirteen Hymns on the principal festivals, and some other poems, which are extant only in Latin, and may be seen in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xii. See Cave's Hist. Liter. vol. i.—Mur.

¹ George was a monk of Constantinople and syncellus to Tarasius the patriarch. A syncellus was a high ecclesiastical personage, the constant companion and inspector of the bishop, and resident in the same cell with him; whence his name συνκελλος. See Du Cange, Glossar. Mediæ et Infimæ Latinitatis, sub voce Syncellus. The Chronicle of George Syncellus extends from the creation to the times of Maximin; and is copied almost verbatim from the Chronicle of Eusebius. Scilicet made much use of it for recovering the lost Greek of Eusebius's work. It was published, Greek and Latin, with notes, by Goar, Paris, 1652, fol. See Cave's Hist. Liter. tom. i.—Mur.

² Theophanes surnamed Isaacus and Confessor, was a Constantinopolitan of noble birth, born A.D. 858. Leo, the patriarch, obliged him in his youth to marry his daughter; but his wife and he agreed to have no matrimonial intercourse, and on the death of her father they separated and Theophanes became a monk. He had previously filled several important civil offices under the emperor Leo. He retired to the monastery of Polyehronium near Singriana, A.D. 780; and thence to the island Calonymus where he converted his paternal estate into a monastery and spent six years. Then returning to Singriana he purchased the estate called the Field, converted it into a monastery, and presided over it as the abbot. In the year 787 he was called to the second Nicene council, where he strenuously defended image-worship. After A.D. 813 Leo, the Armenian, required him to condemn image-worship, which he resolutely refused to do. In 815 or a year later, he was imprisoned for his obstinacy, though now in declining health; and two years after was banished to the island of Samthrace, where he died at the end of twenty-three days. The patrons of image-worship accounted him a confessor, and honoured him as a saint. His Chronicon, which embraces both the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of the Greek empire, continues that of George Syncellus from A.D. 285 to A.D. 813. It is written in a dry style, without method and with numerous mistakes. The Chronicon of Anastasius Bibliothecarius is a mere Latin translation of this so far as it extends. It was published, Greek and Latin, with the notes of Goar and Combefis, Paris, 1653, fol. See Cave, Hist. Lit. tom. i.—Mur.

³ See Bayle, Dictionnaire, tome ii. p. 950, and Leo Allatus' account of his writings, which Le Quien has published with the Opera Damasceni [ed. Paris, 1712, and Venice, 1748, 2 vols. fol. Also Du Pin, Biblioth. des Auct. Ecclési. tome vi. p. 101, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. vol. viii. p. 772, &c.; and Schroeckh, Kirchen-geschichte, vol. xx. p. 222, &c. John Damascenus, called also Chrysorroas by the Greeks on account of his eloquence, and by the Arabs Mansur, was born at Damascus near the end of the seventh or beginning of the eighth century. His father, Sergius, a wealthy

18. At the head of the Latin writers stands Charlemagne, the emperor, who was a great lover of learning. To him are ascribed the Capitularia, as they are called, several Epistles, and four books concerning images; yet there can be little doubt that he often used the pen and the genius of another.⁴ Next to him should be placed

Christian and privy-councillor to the kalif, redeemed many captives, and among them a learned Italian monk named Cosmas, whom he made preceptor to his only son John. On the decease of his father, John succeeded him in office at the Saracen court. About the year 728 he wrote numerous letters in defence of image-worship, which the emperor, Leo the Isaurian, was endeavouring to suppress. This it is said induced Leo to forge a treasonable letter from John to himself, which he sent to the kalif in order to compass the destruction of John. The kalif ordered his right hand to be cut off. John replaced the severed hand, and by the intercession of the Virgin Mary had it perfectly restored the same night. This miracle convinced the kalif of John's innocence, and he offered to restore him to his office and favour, but John chose to retire to private life. He sold and gave away all his property, and repaired to the monastery of St. Sabas near Jerusalem, where he spent the remainder of his life in composing learned works on theology and science. His treatises are numerous, consisting of Orations, Letters, and Tracts, chiefly polemic, in defence of image-worship and against heresies, yet several are devotional and narrative. But few of his philosophical works have been published. His great work is De Fide Orthodoxa, libri iv. (Ἐκδόσις ἀκριβὴς τῆς ὀρθοδόξου πίστεως) which is a complete system of theology derived from the fathers, and arranged in the manner of the schoolmen. Mur. [This treatise, properly speaking, forms the third part of a greater work, entitled Περὶ ὁρίων. An edition of it was published by Le Quien, Paris, 1712, 2 vols. fol. See his Dissert. septim. Damasc. Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xx. p. 222, &c. Rösler, Biblio. der Kirchenrat. Leip. 1776—86, vol. viii. p. 246—532. Dörner has recently said:—"John Damascenus is undoubtedly the last of the theologians of the Eastern church, and remains in later times the highest authority in the theological literature of the Greeks. He may himself be considered as the starting-point of the scholastic system of the Greek church, which is yet too little known."—Entwickelungsgesch. der Christol. p. 113; Hagenbach, Lehrbuch der Dogmen-gesch.; Buch's Transl. vol. i. p. 391.—R.

⁴ See Fabricius, Biblio. Mediæ ævi, Lat. tom. i. p. 936. Hist. Littér. de la France, tom. iv. p. 368.—[Charlemagne was not only a great general and statesman, but a great promoter of learning. He possessed talents of no ordinary character; and though his very active life left him little time for study, he was a considerable proficient in all the branches of knowledge then generally pursued. He understood both Latin and Greek, was well read in civil history, and was no contemptible theologian. Eginhard indeed tells us he could never learn to write, having not undertaken it till too far advanced in life. But if he could not write a fair hand, he could dictate to his amanuenses; and by their aid and that of the learned men whom he always had about him, he composed and compiled very much that does him great credit. Besides a great number of Diplomas, Deeds, and Grants, which are to be seen in various collections, as those of Canisius, Duchene, D'Achery, Mabillon, &c. and numerous Letters interspersed in the later collections of councils, he wrote a Preface to the book of Homilies for all the festivals of the year, which Paul Diaconus compiled by his order; also a large part of the Edicts, chiefly in relation to ecclesiastical affairs, which are denominated his Capitularia. Of these the first four books, entitled Capitularia sine Edicta Caroli Magni et Ludovici Pii, were collected by the Abbot Ansgarius A.D. 827. Afterwards, three books more were collected by Bonodict Levita. The whole are best published by Baluze, Paris, 1677, 2 vols. fol. The Codex Carolinus is a collection of ninety-nine Epistles of successive popes to him and to his father and grandfather, with theirs to the popes, made by order of Charlemagne A.D. 791. This was published by Gretser, Ingolst. 1613, 4to. The four books against image-worship (De Imaginibus), called also the Capitula Prophanæ, if not dictated entirely by him, was at least drawn up in his name, by his order, and in accordance with his views. He caused it to be read in the council of Francfort a.d. 734, where it was approved; and he then sent a copy of it to Pope Hadrian, who replied to it as being the work of Charlemagne. It was first published by John Tillet (Tillius), afterwards bishop of Meaux, a.d. 1549; and last, by C. A. Heumann, Hanover, 1731, 8vo. For the genuineness of this work see Schroech, Kirchengez. vol. xx. p. 583, &c.; and Cave, Hist. Littér. tom. i.—Mur.

Bede, called the Venerable on account of his virtues,¹ Alcuin, the preceptor of Charlemagne,² and Paulinus of Aquileia,³

1 Concerning Bede, see the Acta Sanctor. tom. ii. April, p. 866; Nouveau Diction. Histor. Crit. tom. i. p. 178. A catalogue of his writings, drawn up by himself, is extant in Muratori, Antiquit. Italic. Mediæ ævi, tom. iii. p. 825, &c. [Beda or Bedan (as St. Boniface calls him) was born at Jarrow near the mouth of the Tyne in Northumberland, and within the territories of the monastery of St. Peter in that place. At the age of seven years he was sent to that monastery for education, and afterwards removed to the neighbouring monastery of St. Paul. In these two monasteries he spent his whole life, except occasionally visiting other monasteries for literary purposes. At the age of nineteen he was ordained a deacon, and at the age of thirty a presbyter. He was a most diligent student, yet punctual in observing the discipline of his monastery and attending its devotional exercises. At the age of thirty he commenced author, and became one of the most voluminous writers of that age. His works published at Cologne 1612 and again 1688, fill eight volumes folio. They consist of Commentaries on the greater part of the Old Testament and the whole of the New, numerous Homilies and Letters, a large number of Tracts, and an ecclesiastical history of Great Britain from the invasion of Julius Cæsar to the year a.d. 731. Bede was a man of great learning for that age, of considerable genius, and an agreeable writer. Yet his Commentaries and theological Tracts are little more than compilations from the fathers. As a historian he was honest but credulous. As a divine he was a mere copyist, following Augustine, Gregory the Great, and the more sound Greek fathers. His piety stands unquestioned. His only work now of much value is his church history edited by Wheelock, Cambridge, 1614; and still better by Smith, ibid. 1722, fol. See Bede's account of his own life and writings in his Hist. Eccles. lib. iv. cap. ii.; also Cave's Hist. Littér. tom. i.; Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 500—524; and Milner's Church History, cent. viii. chap. i.—Mur. [See also Lingard's Hist. and Antiq. of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1845, vol. ii. p. 189; Wright's Biogr. Britan. Littér. Anglo-Saxon period; Turner's Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii. p. 406, &c. and especially Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Littér. Suppl. vol. part ii. p. 475, &c. for an account of his writings and a critical estimate of his character and merits as a writer. His works have been frequently printed. His Opera Omnia appeared at Basil in 1544 and 1563, 8 vols. fol.; at Paris in 1554, 8 vols. fol.; at Cologne in 1612 and 1688, 8 vols. folio; his Opera Theologica, Lond. 1693, 4to. His History has been translated into English by Stapleton, Antw. 1565, 4to; by Stevens, Lond. 1723, 8vo; and recently by Dr. Giles, Lond. 1840, 8vo. The most complete edition of his works is the Opera Omnia quæ supersunt, &c. published by Dr. Giles in 12 volumes, 8vo, Lond. 1843—44, in the series of Patres Eccles. Anglicæ. Volumes ii. iii. and iv. comprising the historical works, have the Latin text and Dr. Giles's English translation, previously published, printed on opposite pages. There are also beautiful and accurate reprints of the Historia, and of the Opera historica minora, in 8vo, edited by Mr. Jos. Stevenson in 1838 and 1841, for the English Historical Society, to whom we are also indebted for excellent editions of Gildas, Nennius, Ricardus Divisiensis, Ricardus Monachus, and others.—R.

² Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 295; Nouveau Dictionnaire Histor. Crit. tome i. p. 122. A new edition of the works of Alcuin is preparing in France by Cotelinot, who has discovered his unpublished Tract all of whom were distinguished for their industry and their love of learning. These writers composed treatises on nearly every branch of knowledge prosecuted in their day, which show that no want of genius on the Procession of the Holy Spirit. See the Hist. Littér. de la France, tome viii. Préface, p. x. [But this edition it appears was never published; and that of Du Chesne, Paris, 1617, fol. continued to be used. Flaccus Alcuin, Alchwin, or Albin was a native of York, England, and educated in the episcopal school there. He was well acquainted with Latin and Greek, and some say had a knowledge of Hebrew. He was a man of learning and genius, of sound judgment, and of good taste. As an orator, poet, philosopher, and theologian, he was perhaps the most distinguished man of his age. His writings consist chiefly of expositions of the Scriptures, letters, and treatises on theology and science. His expositions like those of Bede, are little more than compilations from the fathers, particularly from Augustine. His letters are numerous, well written, and useful for elucidating the history of his times. Being sent by his bishop to Rome, Charlemagne met him and became so pleased with him that he allured him to his court, about a.d. 780, made him his preceptor and his counsellor, employed him to confute the errorists, Felix and Eilipandus, and committed to his care not only the palatine school, but several monasteries, and particularly that of St. Martin of Tours. To this monastery he retired a.d. 790 then advanced in years; there he established a school after the model of that at York, and spent the remainder of his days in high reputation as a scholar and a devout Christian. He died a.d. 804. See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 138—380; and Cave, Hist. Littér. tom. i.—Mur. [See also Lingard's Hist. and Antiq. of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1845, vol. ii. p. 203; Turner's Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons, vol. iii. p. 383, 414, 438, and 450; Wright's Biogr. Britan. Littér. Anglo-Saxon period. A very ample and most satisfactory account of Alcuin and of his works, is given by Bähr, in the Supplement to his Gesch. der Röm. Littér. par. iii. His critical remarks on Alcuin as a poet may be found at page 79; on his biographical writings, at p. 192; and on his expository and controversial works, from p. 302 to p. 347, where he gives a critical estimate of the character and style of Alcuin as a writer. The best edition of his works is that printed at the monastery of St. Emmeran at Ratisbon, under the editorial care and at the expense of the abbot Frobenius, who was also a prince of the empire, in the year 1777 in two volumes, folio. His life, written in German by Dr. Fr. Lorenz, has been translated into English by Jano M. Slee, Lond. 1837. His Commentary on the Apocalypse in five books, is published for the first time by Cardinal Mai in his Scriptura Vet. nova Collect. tom. ix. p. 257, &c. It is however incomplete, extending only to the 12th chapter. On Bede and Alcuin as biblical expositors, see Conybeare's Bampton Lectures on the Secondary and Spiritual Interpretation of Scripture, and Davidson's Sacred Hermeneutics, p. 163, &c. A most interesting relic of Alcuin is still in preservation. It is a copy of Jerome's Latin version of the Bible written by him in double columns on vellum, with beautiful illustrations, and presented by him to Charlemagne on Christmas day, 801! It was offered for sale in London in 1836, and was then in excellent preservation. What became of it I have not learned.—R.

³ See Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 286; Acta Sanctor. tom. i. Janmar. p. 713. [Paulinus is said to have been a native of Austria and a celebrated grammarian. Charlemagne raised him to affluence and then made him archbishop of Aquileia in the year 776. From the year 793 to the year 799, in connexion with Alcuin he was very active in opposing and confuting the errors of Felix and Eilipandus, and made a considerable figure in the councils of Francfort and Foro-Julii. He enjoyed the confidence of Charlemagne and the respect of his contemporaries, and died a.d. 804. His works are nearly all polemical, and opposed to the Adoptionists, namely, a Tract on the Trinity, against Eilipandus, against Felix, with several epistles, and a few poems. They were published at Venice, 1737, fol. See Cave, Hist. Littér. tom. i.—Mur.

but the state of the times prevented their attaining eminence. If to these we add Boniface, who has been already mentioned;¹ Eginhard, the celebrated author of a Biography of Charlemagne and of other works;² Paul the deacon, known to after ages by his History of the Lombards and some other works;³ Ambrose Authpert, who expounded the Apocalypse of St. John;⁴ and Theodulphus of Orleans,⁵ we have nearly all the writers of any merit who cultivated either sacred or profane learning.⁶

¹ See above, p. 260, note 2.—Mur.

² Eginhard or Einhard was a German of Franconia, educated in the court of Charlemagne, made tutor to his sons, chaplain, privy-councillor, and private secretary to the emperor. He was also over-see of the royal buildings at Aix-la-Chapelle. Whether his wife Emma or Imma was the natural daughter of Charlemagne has been questioned. After she had borne him one child, they mutually agreed to separate and betake themselves to monasteries. Charlemagne made Eginhard his ambassador to Rome in 806. In 816 he became abbot of Fontanelle; and the next year Lewis the Pious committed his son Lothaire to his instruction. In 819 he became the abbot of Ghent, and in 826 abbot of Seullgenstadt, where he died about A.D. 840. He was a fine scholar, and as a historian the first in his age. Besides sixty-two epistles and several tracts, he wrote the Life of Charlemagne, which has been compared with Suetonius' Cæsars for elegance; also annals of the reigns of Pepin, Charlemagne, and Lewis the Pious, from A.D. 741 to A.D. 829. The best edition of his works is that of Schnike, Utrecht, 1711, 4to. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. ii. and Schroeckh, Kirchengesch. vol. xxii. p. 150, &c.—Mur. [Ample information on the life, character, and writings of Eginhard with valuable references to other works respecting him, may be found in Bähr, Gesch. der Königs. Liter. Suppl. vol. par. iii. p. 200—216. On the question of his wife Emma being the daughter of Charlemagne, see Fr. Schlegler, Kritische Untersuchung des Leb. Eginhard's mit besond. Brück. der Frage, war Emma, eine Tochter Karls d. Gross. Hamb. 1836.—R.

³ Paul Warnfrid or Diaconus, a Lombard by birth and deacon of the church of Aquileia, was private secretary to Desiderius, king of the Lombards. When that nation was conquered by Charlemagne A.D. 774, Paul was sent prisoner to France; afterwards being suspected of favouring the disaffected Lombards, he retired to the south of Italy and became a monk at Mount Cassino, where he ended his days some time in the following century. His history of the Lombards is of considerable value. His Historia Miscella is a meagre thing. The first ten books are those of Eutropius, with some interpolations. The next six were composed by Paul, and the remainder by some writer of even less value. His Homiliarium or Collection of Homilies for all the Sundays and holy days of the year in 2 vols. 4to, was compiled (not by Aleuin as some suppose, but by Paul) by direction of Charlemagne; and was intended to afford to preachers who could not frame discourses, some which they might read to their congregations. The collection is made from Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Origen, Leo, Gregory, Maximus, Bede, &c. Some discourses were added to it after the death of Paul. He also wrote the life of St. Benedict, and biographies of several other saints. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. and Bellarmin, Scriptores Ecclesiast. ed. Venetæ, 1728, fol. p. 258, &c.—Mur.

⁴ Ambrose Authpert or Autpert was a native of France, and became abbot of St. Vincent in Abruzzo, Italy, about A.D. 760. He must not be confounded with an abbot of Mount Cassino of the same name, who lived in the 9th century. To him has been attributed the work entitled, The Conflict of the Vices and Virtues, published among the works of Augustine, and also of Ambrose of Milan, and likewise some other places. But his great work is his Commentary on the Apocalypse, in ten books. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. and Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iv. p. 234, &c.—Mur.

⁵ Theodulphus, an Italian, whom Charlemagne, patronised. He first made him abbot of St. Fleury, and then bishop of Orleans about A.D. 794. Lewis the Pious greatly esteemed him, employed him much at his court, and sent him as his envoy to the pope. But in the year 818, being suspected of treasonable acts, he was deposed and confined to the monastery of Angers. He died about A.D. 821. He wrote tolerable poetry, namely, Carmina ad diversos, besides Poenata. His prose is inferior to his poetry, consisting of forty-six Canons for his diocese, a Tract on Baptism, and another on the Holy Spirit. Most of the preceding were published by Sirmond, Paris, 1646, 8vo. There is still extant an elegant MS. Bible which he caused to be written, and to which he prefixed a preface, and some poems, in golden letters. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. and Bellarmin, Script. Eccles. p. 281, &c.—Mur.

⁶ Among the Greek writers omitted by Mosheim, are the following:—

John, patriarch of Constantinople under Philip Bardanes, the Monothelite, A.D. 812—815. Being deposed after the death of Philip, he wrote an Epistle to the bishop of Rome, purging himself of the Monothelite heresy, which is printed in the Concilia.

Anastasius, abbot of St. Euthymium in Palestine, against whom John Damascenus wrote an epistle, flourished A.D. 741. He is author of a Tract against the Jews, published in a translation by Canisius, Lect. Antiq. tom. iii. and in the Biblioth. Patr. tom. xiii.

Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople. He was of noble birth and privy-councillor to the emperor when the empress Irene A.D. 785 raised him to the see of Constantinople, and employed him to restore image-worship in the East. He presided in the second Nicene council A.D. 787, and wrote several letters extant in the Concilia. He died A.D. 806.

Basil, bishop of Ancyra, a recanter in the second Nicene council A.D. 787. His recantation for having opposed image-worship is published in the Concilia.

Elias, metropolitan of Crète, flourished A.D. 787. He wrote Commentaries on Gregory Nazianzen's Orations still extant in a Latin translation, Answers to questions on cases of conscience by Dionysius, extant, Gr. and Lat. His exposition of the Scala of John Climax is said still to exist in MS.

The Latin writers omitted by Mosheim are much more numerous.

Acea, a celebrated English monk of York, who flourished A.D. 705—740, and was an intimate friend of Bede. He accompanied St. Wilfrid to Rome, became bishop of Hexham (Hagulstadiens) in Northumberland, and wrote lives of the saints of his diocese, several letters, &c.

John VII. pope A.D. 705—707, has left us one Epistle addressed to Ethelred, king of Mercia, and Alfrid, king of Deira, respecting Wilfrid, bishop of York, in the Concilia.

Constantine, pope A.D. 708—715, was called to Constantinople A.D. 710 by the emperor and treated with great respect. His Epistle to Brietwald, archbishop of Canterbury, is extant in the Concilia.

Gregory II. pope A.D. 715—31, famous for his opposition to Leo III. the emperor, who endeavoured to suppress image-worship. He has left us fifteen Epistles published in the Concilia. In his pontificate the Liber Diurnus, containing the ancient forms of proceeding in the Church of Rome, is supposed to have been compiled. See Cave, Hist. Liter. tom. i. p. 620, &c.

Felix, an English monk who flourished A.D. 715, was a writer of some distinction. His life of St. Guthlac, the anchorite of Croylad, is above the ordinary level of the legends of that age. It is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 256, &c.

Heddius, surnamed Stephen, an English presbyter and monk, well skilled in church music. Wilfrid, archbishop of York, invited him from Canterbury to instruct his clergy in singing about A.D. 720. He composed an elaborate life of archbishop Wilfrid, which is in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 631—709.

Gregory III. pope A.D. 731—741. He pursued the contest begun by his predecessor against the emperor Leo. III. and also invited Charles Martel to aid him

CHAPTER III.

HISTORY OF RELIGION AND OF THEOLOGY.

1. THE fundamental doctrines of the Christian religion were preserved both by the Greek and the Latin writers. This will appear unquestionable to one who shall inspect the work of John Damascenus among the Greeks, on the orthodox faith, and the profession of faith by Charlemagne among the Latins.¹ But to this pure seed against the king of the Lombards. He has left us seven Epistles, and a Collection from the ancient canons, which are extant in Harduin, Concilia.

Fredegarius Scholasticus, a Frank, who flourished A.D. 740, wrote a History or Chronicon de Gestis Francorum, from A.D. 596 (where Gregory of Tours ends) to A.D. 739. It is commonly subjoined to Gregory's History.

Cuthbert, an English monk of Durham, a disciple and intimate friend of Bede. He wrote the life of Bede, some letters, &c.

Zacharias a Syrian monk and pope A.D. 741—752. He has left us eighteen Epistles, and a Greek translation of St. Gregory's Dialogues.

Chrodegand, Chrodegang, or Rodegang, a Frank of noble birth, educated in the court of Charles Martel, and bishop of Metz from A.D. 742 to 766. He first composed rules for regular canons. See sec. 14 of this chapter, and note 6, page 272 above.

Willibald, an English monk, traveller, and bishop of Eichstadt in Germany. He was an assistant of St. Boniface, and wrote his life. See note 3, p. 263, above.

Stephen II. pope A.D. 752—757 has left us six Epistles extant in the Concilia.

Isidorus, bishop of Badajoz (Pacensis) in Spain, flourished A.D. 754. He continued Idacius' supplement to Jerome's Chronicon, from A.D. 609 to A.D. 754.

Paul I. pope A.D. 757—767. Twelve Epistles ascribed to him are extant in the Concilia.

Aribo, bishop of Freysingen A.D. 760—783. He was a monk educated by St. Corbinian, whose successor and biographer he was. See Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. iii. p. 470, and Meichelbeck's Historia Friangens. tom. i. p. 61, &c.

Florus, a monk of St. Trudo in the diocese of Liege, who flourished about A.D. 760, and enlarged Bede's Martyrologium.

Godescalc, a deacon and canon of Liege who flourished about A.D. 780, and wrote the life of St. Lambert, bishop of Liege in this century. It is extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. &c. tom. iii. 59, &c.

Stephen III. pope A.D. 768—772, has left us three Epistles and some Decrees.

Hadrian or Adrian I. pope A.D. 772—795, has left us eighteen Epistles, an Epitome of Ecclesiastical canons addressed to Charlemagne, a collection of canons for the use of Ingilram, a bishop, and a letter in confutation of Charlemagne's books against image-worship.

Donatus, a deacon of Metz about A.D. 790, who wrote the life of St. Trudo, extant in Mabillon, Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 1022, &c.

Etharicus or Heterius, bishop of Axuma in Spain, and Beatus, a Spanish presbyter of Asturia, distinguished themselves by their opposition to the error of Elipandus, which they endeavoured to confute, in a work still extant, in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. xiii.

Leo III. pope A.D. 795—816, has left us thirteen Epistles.

Leidradus or Lerdrachus, bishop of Lyons A.D. 798—813, was twice sent into Spain by Charlemagne to reclaim Felix and Elipandus. He has left us three Epistles and a Tract on Baptism.

Jesse or Jesséus or Tesse, bishop of Amiens, A.D. 799—834, was much employed on embassies and in civil affairs by Charlemagne and his successors. He wrote a long Epistle to his clergy concerning sacred rites, particularly in relation to baptism, still extant in the Biblioth. Pat.—Mur.

¹ See Charlemagne's Treatise De Imaginibus, lib. iii.

of the word more tares were added than can be well imagined. The very nature of religion and the true worship of God were corrupted by those who contended for image-worship, and for similar institutions, with a fierceness which extinguished all charity. The efficacy of the merits of our Saviour all acknowledged; and yet all tacitly depreciated them, by maintaining that men can appease God, either by undergoing voluntary punishments or by offering Him gifts and presents, and by directing those anxious about salvation to place confidence in the works of holy men.² To explain the other defects and superstitions of the times, would carry us beyond the limits prescribed in this work.

2. The whole religion or piety of this and of some subsequent centuries consisted in founding, enriching, embellishing, and enlarging churches and chapels, in hunting after and venerating the relics of holy men, in securing the patronage of saints with God by means of gifts and superstitious rites and ceremonies, in worshipping the images and statues of saints, in performing pilgrimages to holy places, especially to Palestine,³ and in other similar practices. In

p. 259, ed. Heumann. Add from among the Greeks the Profession of faith by Mich. Synecellus, published by Montfaucon, in the Bibliotheca Coddiniiana, p. 90, &c. From among the Latins, an Exposition of the principal doctrines of religion by Benedict of Ariane, in Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. v. p. 56, and the Creed of Leo III. which he sent into the East, also in Baluze, tom. vii. p. 18.

² We will quote a few passages as proof. Bede says (lib. i. on Luc. cap. i.) Decebat ut, sicut per superbiam prime nostre parentis mors in mundum intravit, ita denuo per humilitatem Mariæ vite introitus panderetur. And (lib. iii. in Job. cap. i.) he says:—Cum confectus homo etate consumptus morti et infernalibus ministris appropinquaverit, si fuerit quispiam sanctorum, qui nomen sancti angeli habere meratur: is pro hujusmodi, qui pro peccatis suis a Deo ita corripitur, poterit impetrare: si de multis operibus bonis, que operari debuerat, saltem unum bonum opus ejus, quod tanquam sacrificium pro eo placabile offerat, valuerit invenire. Commenting on Psalm iv. he says of the words, Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, that they mean: Ita dico, ut irascimini præteritis peccatis, ut sacrificiis sacrificium, id est, præteritis propria vitia vestra, faciendo fructus dignos penitentia: unum scilicet pro singulis nos affligentes, quam tum digna expetit penitentia: quod est sacrificium justitia, id est justum sacrificium. Nam nihil justius est, quam qui punit aliena peccata, ut puniat propria: et ut quisque tantum se affligat, quantum fœdatis ejus conscientia meruit, et sic se ipsum Deo faciat suave sacrificium.—Schl these services, which were supposed to have the greatest efficacy in procuring salvation, the virtuous and good were equally zealous with the vicious and profligate; the latter that they might cancel their crimes and wickedness, and the former that they might obtain earthly blessings from God, and secure a more ready admission to heavenly bliss. The true religion of Jesus Christ, if we except the few doctrines contained in the Creeds, was wholly unknown in this century even to the teachers of the highest rank; and all orders of society, from the highest to the lowest, neglecting the duties of true piety and the renovation of the heart, fearlessly gave themselves up to every vice and crime, supposing that God could easily be appeased and become reconciled to them by the intercessions and prayers of the saints, and by the friendly offices of the priests, the ministers of God. The whole history of these times avouches the truth of these remarks.

³ Such pilgrimages were likewise made to Rome, and they were called pilgrimages for Christ, and the performers of them, Pilgrims of St. Peter. Many disorders attended these pilgrimages. Hence Boniface in a letter to Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury (to be found among the Acts of the council of Cloveshoe, in England, A.D. 747), desired that women and nuns might be restrained from their frequent pilgrimages to Rome, alleging this reason: Quia magna ex parte pereunt, paucis remanentibus integris. Pæpauca enim sunt civitates in Longobardia, vel in Francia, aut in Gallia, in quibus non sit adultera vel meretrix generis Anglorum: quod scandalum est et turpitudinis totius ecclesiæ vestrae. See Harduin, Concilia, tom. 'lii. p. 1950.—Schl.

3. The Greeks believed that their forefathers had fully explained the sacred volume. They therefore conceived that they conferred a great favour on the biblical students by making extracts from the writings of the fathers, and embodying their interpretations of scripture, whether good or bad. How judicious these compilations were will appear, among others, from the Commentary of John Damascenus on St. Paul's Epistles, compiled from Chrysostom. The Latin interpreters are of two classes. Some, like the Greeks, collected and embodied the interpretations of the fathers. Among others Bede took this course in his Exposition of the Epistles of St. Paul, compiled from Augustine and others.¹ The other class made trial of their own skill in expounding the sacred volume; and among these, Alcuin, Bede, Ambrose Authpert (the interpreter of the Apocalypse), and a few others, stand conspicuous. But they lacked the ability requisite for this office; and neglecting altogether the true import of the words, they hunted after recondite meanings, which they distributed into the allegorical, the anagogical, and the tropological;² that is, they tell us not what the inspired writers say, but what they vainly suspect those writers would signify to us. We may name as examples, Alcuin's Commentary on John, Bede's Allegorical Explanations of the Books of Samuel, and

Charlemagne's Books on Images, in which various passages of scripture are expounded after the manner of this age.³

4. Charlemagne's reverence for the sacred volume was so great⁴ that it went beyond due bounds, and led him to believe the fundamental principles of all arts and sciences to be contained in the bible; a sentiment which he undoubtedly imbibed from Alcuin and the other divines whom he was accustomed to hear.⁵ Hence originated his various efforts to excite the clergy to a more diligent investigation and explanation of the sacred books. Laws enacted by him for this purpose are still extant, and there are other proofs that on no subject was he more earnest.⁶ That errors in the Latin translation might be no obstacle to his designs, he employed Alcuin to correct and improve it;⁷ indeed he himself spent some time during the last years of his life in correcting such errors.⁸ Some also tell us that he procured a translation of the sacred books into German, but others attribute this to his son, Lewis the Pious.⁹

5. These efforts of the emperor had the effect of awakening some of the slothful and indolent to exertion; yet it must be admitted that some of his regulations and plans tended to defeat in part his excellent purposes. In the first place, he sanctioned the practice, which had prevailed before his day, of reading and expounding only certain portions of the sacred volume in the assemblies of worship; and the diverse customs of the different churches he endeavoured to reduce to one uniform standard.¹⁰

³ See Charlemagne, ubi supra, lib. i. p. 84, 91, 123, 127, 131, 133, 136, 138, 145, 160, 164, 165, &c. passim.

⁴ See Charlemagne, ubi supra, lib. i. p. 40.

⁵ Charlemagne, ubi supra, lib. i. p. 231, 236.

⁶ See Frick, De Canone Scriptur. Sac. p. 184.

⁷ Baronius, Annales, ad ann. 778, sec. 27, &c.; Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 137; Hist. Littér. de la France, tome iv. p. 300.

⁸ Fabricius, Biblioth. Lat. Mediæ ævi, tom. i. p. 950, &c.; Ussher, De Sacris et Scripturis Vernaculis, p. 110, &c. [See also Schroeckh's Kirchengesch. vol. xx. p. 196, &c.—Mur.]

⁹ See Du Chesne, Scriptores Hist. Franc. tom. ii. p. 326.—Mur.

¹⁰ It must be acknowledged that it is a mistake to suppose the emperor Charlemagne to have first selected those portions of the sacred volume, which are still read and expounded every year in the assemblies of Christians. For it appears that in preceding centuries, in most of the Latin churches, certain portions of the inspired books were assigned to the several days for public worship. See Thamer, Schediasma de Origine et Dignitate Pericoparum, quæ Evangelia et Epistolæ vulgo vocantur; which has been several times printed. Also, Buddeus, Tragoge ad Theologiam, tom. ii. p. 1640, &c. [1436, &c.] Yet Charlemagne had something to do in this matter. For whereas before his time, the Latin churches differed or did not all read and expound the same portions of the Bible, he first ordained that all the churches throughout his dominions should conform to the custom of the Romish church. For those Gospels and Epistles, as they are called, which have been expounded in public worship from his times to the present, were used at Rome as early as the sixth century; and it is

¹ On the Commentaries of Bede, see Simon, Critique de la Biblioth. Ecclési. de M. du Pin, tome i. p. 280, &c. See also his Exposition of Genesis derived from the fathers, in Martone, Theaurus Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 111, 116, 140; and the Interpretation of Habakkuk, ibid. p. 295, &c.

² See Charlemagne, De Imaginibus, lib. i. p. 133.

In the next place, knowing that few of the clergy were competent to explain well the Gospels and Epistles, as the lessons were called, he directed Paul the Deacon and Alcuin to collect from the fathers homilies or discourses on these lessons, that the ignorant and slothful teachers might read them to the people. This was the origin of what is called his Homiliarium or Book of Homilies;¹ and his example led others, in this and the next century, to compile at their own pleasure similar works for the encouragement of laziness among the teachers.² Lastly, the emperor caused the lives of the most eminent saints to be collected into a volume, so that the people might have among the dead, examples worthy of imitation while they had none among the living. That all these regulations proceeded from honest and good intentions, and indeed that they were useful in that age, no one can doubt. But still, contrary to the intentions of the emperor, they contributed not a little to confirm the indolence of the public teachers, and to increase the neglect of the sacred volume; for from this time onward, most of the clergy directed their attention exclusively to those portions of the bible which were to be expounded to the people, and did not exercise themselves in reading and examining the whole volume of scripture; and few were to be found who were inclined to compose their own public discourses rather than resort to their Homiliarium.

6. The business of discussing formally and systematically the doctrines of Christianity was scarcely attempted by any one of the Latins; for the essays of some few respecting the person and natures of Christ, against Felix and Elipandus, and concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit and other subjects, exhibit no specimens of thorough investigation. The whole theology of the Latins in this century consisted in collecting opinions and testimonies out of the Fathers, that is, the theologians of the six first centuries; nor did any venture to go beyond their views or presume to rely upon his own understanding. None but Irish scholars, in that age called Scots, employed philosophy, which others detested in the explanation of religious doctrines.³ But among the Greeks, John Damascenus, in his four books on the orthodox faith, embraced the entire theology of the Christians in a systematic form. In this work the two kinds of theology, which the Latins call scholastic and dogmatic, were united; for the author uses subtle ratiocination in explaining doctrines, and confirms them by the authority of the fathers. This work was received by the Greeks with great applause, and gradually acquired such influence that it was regarded among them as the only guide to true theology. Yet many have complained that the author relies more upon human reason and upon the faith of the fathers than upon the holy scriptures, and that Outfrid of Weissenburg. See Lambecius, De Biblioth. Indobon. Augusta, tom. ii. cap. v. p. 419.

³ I was aware that Irishmen, who in that age were called Scots, cultivated and amassed learning beyond the other nations of Europe in those dark times; that they travelled over various countries of Europe for the purpose of learning, but still more for that of teaching; and that in this century and the following, Irishmen or Scots were to be met with everywhere in France, Germany, and Italy, discharging the functions of teachers with applause. But I was long ignorant that Irishmen were also the first who taught scholastic theology in Europe; and that so early as this century they applied philosophy to the explanation of the Christian religion. This fact I learned first from Benedict of Aniane, some of whose short pieces are published by Baluze, Miscellanea, tom. v. He says, in his Epist. to Guarnarius, p. 74: Apud modernos scholasticos (i. e. teachers of schools), maxime apud Scotos (who held the first rank among school teachers), est syllogismus delusionis ut dicant, Trinitatem, sicut personarum, ita esse substantiarum (by a syllogism which Benedict here calls delusive, i. e. sophistical and fallacious, these Irishmen proved the Persons in the God-head to be substances; but the syllogism was a very captious one as appears from what follows, and brought the inexperienced into difficulties): quatenus si adscerit ille auditor, trinitatem esse trium substantiarum Deum, trium deogetur cultor Deorum: si autem abnuerit, personarum denegatur cultor. That is, these philosophic theologians perplexed and troubled their hearers with this syllogism. If any one assented to their reasoning they accused him of tritheism; if he rejected it they taxed him with Sabellianism. Either grant that the three Persons in God are three substances or deny it. If you grant it, you doubtless are a tritheist and worship three Gods; if you deny it, you destroy the Persons and fall into Sabellianism. Benedict strongly reprehends this subtlety in theological discussions, and recommends the love of simplicity. Sed hæc de fide et omnis calliditatis verutia simplicitate fidei catholica est puritate vitanda, non captiosa interjectione linguarum, scæva inactione interponenda. The philosophic or well known that Charlemagne took pains to render the Romish form of worship the common form of all the Latins. And hence down to this day those churches which have not adopted the Romish rites, use for lessons other Gospels and Epistles than those of ours and the other Western churches, which Charlemagne commanded to conform. The church of Milan is an example, which retains the Ambrosian ritual; likewise the church of Chur (Curia), according to Muratori, Antiquit. Ital. tom. iv. p. 836, and undoubtedly some others. What Gospels and Epistles were used by the French and other Western churches before the time of Charlemagne, may be learned from the ancient *Kalendar*s published (among others), by Martene, Thesaurus Anecdotor. tom. v. p. 66; and from Bede's Discourses, Ibid. tom. v. p. 389, &c.; from Mabillon, De Antiqua Liturgia Gallicana; and from others. See also Peyrat, Antiq. de la Chapelle du Roi de France, p. 566.

¹ See, on this subject, the very laborious and learned Jo. Hen. a Seelen, Selecta Literaria, p. 252. (Also Mabillon's Annales ord. Bened. tom. ii. p. 328, &c.—Mur.)

² Halanus or Alanus, for example, an Italian abbot of Farfa, compiled in this same century a huge Homiliarium, the preface to which was published by Pezsius, Thesaur. Anecdotor. tom. vi. par. i. p. 83. In the next century Haymo of Halberstadt made up a Homiliarium, which has been printed. In the same century Rabanus Maurus, at the request of the Emperor Lothaire, formed a Homiliarium; and likewise, Hericus, mentioned by Pezsius, ubi supra, p. 93. All these made use of the Latin language. The first who composed a German Homiliarium I suppose was the celebrated he thus subverts the true grounds of theology.¹ To this work must be added his Sacred Parallels, in which he carefully collects the opinions of the ancient doctors respecting the articles of faith. We may therefore look upon this writer as the Thomas and the Lombard of the Greeks.

7. Instructions for a Christian life and its duties were given by no one in a formal treatise. John Carpathius among the Greeks, left some Hortatory Discourses containing little that deserves much commendation. In the monasteries the opinions of the mystics, and of Dionysius Areopagita the father of them, received exclusive approbation; and John Darensis, a Syriac writer, in order to gratify the monks, translated Dionysius.² The Latins did no more than offer some precepts concerning vices and virtues and external actions; and in explaining these they kept close to the principles of the Peripatetics, as may be seen in some tracts of Bede, and in the treatise of Alcuin on the virtues and vices.³ To exhibit examples of piety before the public, several reputable men, as Bede, Florus, Alcuin, Marcellinus, and Ambrose Authpert, composed biographies of persons who were distinguished for piety.

8. Only a small number in this century entered into controversies on important religious subjects, and among these there is hardly an individual who merits commendation. Most of the Greeks engaged in the contest about images, which they managed unskillfully and without precision of thought. The Latins entered less into this controversy, and expended more effort in confuting the opinion of Elipandus, concerning the person of Christ. John Damascenus assailed all the heretics, in a small but not a useless tract. He also contended resolutely against the Manichæans and Nestorians in particular, and ventured also to attack the Saracens. In these writings of his there is some ingenuity and subtlety, but a want of clearness and simplicity. Anastasius, an abbot of Palestine, attempted a confutation of the Jews.

9. Of the controversies which disquieted this age the greatest and the most pernicious related to the worship of sacred images. Originating in Greece, it thence spread over the East and the West, producing great harm both to the state and to the church. The first sparks of it appeared under Phi-lippicus Bardanes, who was emperor of the Greeks near the beginning of this century. With the consent of the patriarch John, in the year 712 he removed from the portico of the church of St. Sophia a picture representing the sixth general council, which condemned the Monothelites whom the emperor was disposed to favour; and he sent his mandate to Rome requiring all such pictures to be removed out of the churches. But Constantine, the Roman pontiff, not only protested against the emperor's edict, but likewise caused pictures of all the six general councils to be placed in the portico of the church of St. Peter; and moreover, having assembled a council at Rome, he caused the emperor himself to be condemned as an apostate from the true religion. These first commotions however terminated the next year, when the emperor was hurled from the throne.⁴

⁴ See Spanheim, Hist. Imaginum restituta, which was published both separately and in his Works, vol. ii. Malm-bourg's history of this controversy in French is full of fables. Muratori, Annali d'Italia, tom. iv. p. 221, &c. [For the history of this controversy see Walch's Hist. der Ketzer, vol. x. p. 66—828, and vol. xi. p. 3—400; also Schroeckh, Kirchengesch., vol. xx. p. 513—602, and vol. xxiii. p. 345—432. The origin of this controversy is not generally carried back to the collision of Philip-pus with the Roman pontiff, which related perhaps wholly to the doctrines of the Monothelites; nor is there good proof that the pontiff ventured to excommunicate the emperor. See Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. p. 180, 181. The following remarks of Schlegel are worth inserting in this place. In order to understand the history of this controversy in its whole extent, it is necessary to go back to the earlier history of the church, and to investigate the origin of image-worship among Christians. It is certain, and even the impartial Catholics themselves admit it, that in the three first centuries and also in the beginning of the fourth, pictures were very rarely to be found among Christians. See Du Pin, Bibliothèque, tome vi. p. 152, and Pagl. Crit. ad Annal. Baronii, ad ann. 55, p. 43. Indeed there were Christian writers on morals who disapproved of a Christian's pursuing the trade of a painter or statuary. See Tertullian, Contra Hermog., cap. i. and De Idolatria, cap. iii. Even in the time of the seventh general council A. D. 787, the use of statues was not yet introduced into churches, as appears from the seventh Article of that council. Still less did the ancient Christians think of giving worship to images. The occasion of introducing images into churches was in a great measure the ignorance of the people, which rendered pictures a help to them, whence they have been called the people's Bible. On this ground it was that Gregory the Great censured Severus, bishop of Marseilles, who had removed the pictures out of the churches on account of the misuse the people made of them. Gregory's Epistola, lib. ix. ep. 91. Quia eas (imagines) adorare vetuisses, omnino laudavimus; fre-gisse vero reprehendimus. To this cause may be added, the superstition of the people and the monks, who were influenced very much by sensible objects, and who began as early as the close of the sixth century to ascribe to the images miracles of various kinds. They now began to kiss the images, to burn incense to them, to kneel before them, to light up wax candles for them, to expect wonders to be wrought by them, to place infants in their arms at baptism, as if they were godfathers and godmothers, to carry them with them in their military expeditions to secure a victory and give confidence to the soldiers, and in taking an oath to lay their hand on them just as upon the cross and upon the Gospels. Indeed nearly the whole of religion in this century consisted in the worship of images. In particular, the superstitious worship of images proceeded so far Scholastic theology is therefore much more ancient among the Latins than is commonly supposed.

¹ Hottinger, Biblio. Quadrip. lib. iii. cap. ii. sec. 3, p. 872; Chemnitz, De Usu et Utilitate Locor. Commun. p. 26.

² Asseman, Biblioth. Orient. Vatic. tom. ii. p. 120.

³ It is extant in his Opera ed. of Du Chesne, tom. ii. p. 1218.

10. Under Leo the Isaurian, a very heroic emperor, another conflict ensued, which was far more terrific, severe, and lasting. Leo, unable to bear with the extravagant superstition of the Greeks in worshipping religious images, which rendered them an object of reproach both to the Jews and the Saracens, in order to extirpate the evil entirely, issued an edict in the year 726 commanding all images of saints, with the exception of that of Christ on the cross, to be removed out of the churches, and the worship of them to be wholly discontinued and abrogated. In this proceeding the emperor obeyed the dictates of his own feelings, which were naturally strong and precipitate, rather than the suggestions of prudence, which recommends the gradual and unobserved extirpation of inveterate superstitions. Hence a civil war broke out, first in the islands of the Archipelago and a part of Asia, and afterwards in Italy; for the people, either spontaneously or urged on by the priests and monks, to whom the images were productive of gain, considered the emperor as an apostate from true religion, and of course supposed themselves freed from their oath of allegiance and from all obligations of obedience.

11. In Italy the Roman pontiffs, Gregory II. and Gregory III. were the principal authors of the revolt. The former of these pontiffs, when Leo would not at his command revoke his decree against images, did not hesitate to say that the emperor in his view had rendered himself unworthy of the name and the privileges of a true Christian. This opinion being known, the Romans and the other people of Italy who were subjects of the Greek empire, violated their allegiance, and either massacred or expelled the viceroys of Leo. Exasperated by these causes, the emperor contemplated making war upon Italy, and especially against the pontiff, but circumstances prevented him. Hence in the year 730, fired with resentment and indignation, he vented his fury against images and their worshippers much more violently than before; for, having assembled a council of bishops, he deposed Germanus, bishop of Constantinople, who favoured images, and substituted Anastasius in his place, commanded that images should be committed to the flames, and inflicted various punishments upon the advocates of them.¹ The consequence of this severity was, that the Christian church was unhappily rent into two parties—that of the Iconoduli or Iconolatre, the adorers or worshippers of images, and that of the Iconomachi or Iconoclastæ, the enemies or breakers of images; and these parties furiously contended, with mutual invectives, abuses, and assassinations. The course commenced by Gregory II. was warmly prosecuted by Gregory III.; and although we cannot determine at this distance of time the precise degree of fault in either of these prelates, thus much is unquestionable, the loss of their Italian possessions by the Greeks in this contest, is to be ascribed especially to the zeal of these pontiffs in behalf of images.²

nary and legal way. He wished to have the subject discussed and determined in a general Council. But the pope would not agree to it, and urged that the emperor should remain quiet, and not bring the subject under agitation. Leo's first requisition was that the images should be hung higher in the churches. But in this the patriarch Germanus opposed him. And as the opposition of this man was confined to no limits he was deposed; yet the emperor allowed him, as we are informed by Theophanes, to spend his life quietly in his father's house. Next followed the edict of the emperor, by which he forbade the worshipping of images, and required their removal, if the worship of them could not be prevented by the mere prohibition. And it was not till after the horrible tumult at Constantinople and the insurrections of the Italian provinces, that he ordered all images upon the church walls to be effaced and the walls to be whitewashed, and the moveable images to be carried away and burned; and laid heavy punishments upon the riotous monks and blind zealots, who insulted him to his face with the title of Antichrist, a second Judas, &c. See Spanheim, ubi supra, p. 115, &c. and Basnage, ubi supra, tom. ii. p. 1278.—Schl.

² The Greek writers tell us that both the Gregories debarred Leo and his son Constantine from the sacred communion, absolved the people of Italy from their oath of allegiance, and forbade their paying their taxes or performing any act of obedience. And the advocates of the Roman pontiffs, Baronius, Sigonius (De Regno Italæ), and numerous others who follow these writers, admit that all these things were facts. Yet some very learned men, particularly among the French, maintain that the Gregories did not commit so gross offences; they deny that the pontiffs either excommunicated the emperors, or absolved the people from their allegiance and their duties to them. See Launoi, Epist. lib. vii. ep. 7. p. 456, in his Opp. tom. v. par. ii.; Natal. Alexander, Hist. Eccles. Select. Capit. sæcul. viii. diss. i. p. 456; De Marca, De Concordia Sacerdotii et Imperii, lib. iii. cap. xi.; Bossuet, Defensio Declarationis Cleri Gallic. de Potest. Eccles. par. i. lib. vi. cap. xii. p. 197; Giannone, Histoire Civile de Naples, tome i. pag. 400. These rest chiefly upon the authority of the Latin writers, Anastasius, Paulus Diaconus, and others; who not only are silent as to this audacity of the pontiffs in assailing and combating the emperors, but also tell us that they gave some proofs of their loyalty to the emperors. The facts cannot be fully ascertained on account of the obscurity in the history of those times. And the question must be left undecided. Yet this is certain that those pontiffs, by their zeal for image-worship, occasioned the revolt of their Italian subjects from the Greek emperors. [The arguments adduced by the apologists for the popes above-named, seem to be conclusive as to this point, that the popes did not then feel themselves to have jurisdiction over kings and emperors, or to have authority to dethrone them and to transfer their dominions to other sovereigns. In particular, Gregory II. stated very well the boundary between civil and ecclesiastical power; and reproached Leo with overleaping that boundary.—Mur.] among the Greeks that the rich at Constantinople used to send their bread to the churches, and have it held up before an image previously to eating it. Schlegel's note.—Mur.

¹ Leo was led on to one degree of innovation after another, by the opposition to his measures from the friends of images. At first he proceeded in the ordi-

12. The son of Leo, Constantine surnamed Copronymus¹ by the furious tribe of image-worshippers, after he came to the throne A.D. 741, trod in his father's steps, for he laboured with equal vigour to extirpate the worship of images, in opposition to the machinations of the Roman pontiff and the monks. Yet he pursued the business with more moderation than his father; and being aware that the Greeks were governed entirely by the authority of councils in religious matters, he collected a council of eastern bishops at Constantinople in the year 754, to examine and decide this controversy. By the Greeks this is called the seventh general council. The bishops pronounced sentence, as was customary, according to the views of the emperor, and therefore condemned images.² But the pertinacity of the superstitious, who were borne on by their zeal for images, was not to be overcome by these decisions. None made greater resistance than the monks, who did not cease to disturb the public tranquillity and to excite sedition among the people. Constantine therefore being moved with just indignation, punished many of them in various ways, and by new laws bridled the turbulence of this restless class of people. Leo IV. who succeeded to the throne A.D. 775 on the death of Constantine, entertained the same views as his father and grandfather had done; for when he saw that the abettors of images were not to be moved at all by mild and gentle measures, he coerced them with penal statutes.

13. But Leo IV. being removed by poison, through the wickedness of his perfidious wife Irene in the year 780, images became triumphant; for that guilty woman who governed the empire during the minority of her son Constantine, with a view to establish her authority, after entering into a league with Hadrian, the Roman pontiff, assembled a council at Nice in Bithynia in the year 786, which is known by the title of the second Nicene council. Here the laws of the emperors, together with the decrees of the council of Constantinople, were abrogated, the worship of images and of the cross was established, and penalties were denounced against those who should maintain that worship and adoration were to be given only to God. Nothing can be conceived more puerile and weak than the arguments and proofs by which these bishops support their decrees.³ And yet the

¹ This nickname was given to Constantine, from his having defiled the sacred font at his baptism.—Macl.

² This council was composed of 333 bishops, a greater number than had ever before been assembled in any council. In his circular letter calling the council, the emperor directed the bishops to hold provincial councils throughout the empire for discussing the subject; so that when met in the general council, they might be prepared to declare the sense of the whole church. The council held its sessions in the imperial palace of Hiera over against the city on the Asiatic shore, and deliberated from the 10th of February till the 7th of August; when they adjourned to the church of St. Mary ad Blachernas in Constantinople, and there published their decrees. The patriarch of Constantinople, Anastasius, died a few days before the council met, and the emperor would not appoint a successor to that see till the deliberations of the council were closed, lest it should be thought he placed a creature of his own at the head of it. Of course two other bishops—namely, Theodosius, exarch of Asia, and Pastillus, metropolitan of Pamphylia, presided in the council. Its Acts and deliberations have all perished, or rather been destroyed by the patrons of image-worship; except so much of them as the second Nicene council saw fit to quote, for the purpose of confuting them in their sixth act. (Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 325–444.) From these quotations it appears that the council deliberated soberly, and reasoned discretely from Scripture and the Fathers; that they maintained that all worship of images was contrary to Scripture and to the sense of the church in the purer ages; that it was idolatry and forbidden by the second commandment. They also maintained that the use of images in churches and places of worship was a custom borrowed from the pagans, that it was of dangerous tendency and ought to be abolished. They accordingly enacted canons expressive of these views, and requiring a corresponding practice. See Walch's Hist. der Kirchenversam. page 463, &c.; Cave, Hist. Liter. vol. i. p. 646, &c.; Bower's Lives of the Popes, vol. iii. p. 357–368. On the side of the Catholics may be consulted Baronius, Annales, and Pagl, Critica, ad ann. 754.—Mur.

³ Chemnitz, Examen Concilii Trident. par. iv. loc. ii. cap. v. p. 52, ed. Frankf. 1707; Lenfant, Préface contre la Réunion avec le Siège de Rome, par. lii. lettre xvii. p. 446. [Irene was undoubtedly an ungodly, hypocritical, ambitious woman, eager after power, and from this passion prone to cruelties even the most unnatural, and she was at the same time much devoted to image-worship. Her first step was to grant liberty to every one to make use of images in his private worship. She next removed Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, because he was an Iconoclast; and made Tarasius her secretary, who was devoted to images and to her, to be patriarch. And as the imperial guards were inclined to Iconoclasm and might give her trouble, she caused them to be marched out of the city under pretence of a foreign invasion, and then disbanded them. At last, in the name of her son Constantine, who was a minor, she called the council of Nice. Tarasius directed the whole proceedings. Yet there were two papal envoys present. In the Acts which we still have entire (in Harduin, Concilia, tom. iv. p. 1–820), there is mention of the representatives (προτερονομα) of the two eastern patriarchs, those of Alexandria and Antioch. But according to credible accounts, under this high title two miserable and illiterate monks were designated, whom their fellow monks had arbitrarily appointed and whom forged letters legitimated. The bishops assembled were at least 350. Besides these, two officers of the court were present as commissioners, and a whole army of monks. At first Constantinople was appointed for the place of meeting; but the Iconoclasts, who had the greater part of the army on their side, raised such a tumult that the empress postponed the meeting, and changed the place to Nice. In the 7th act of this council, the decree was made that the cross and the images of Christ, Mary, the angels and the saints, were entitled to religious worship (εὐσεβὴς προσκύνησις); that it was proper to kiss them, to burn incense to them, and to light up candles and lamps before them; yet they were not entitled to divine worship (λατρεία). The proofs adduced by these fathers in support of their decree, and their confutations of the contrary doctrine, betray their gross ignorance and their total want of critical sagacity, if not also some intentional dishonesty. Their Acts are full of fabulous tales of the wonders wrought by images, of appeals to apocryphal books, of perversions of the declarations of the fathers, and of other false and puerile arguments. Even Du Pin and Pagl cannot deny the fact; and it seems strange that it was possible for doctrines sup-

Romans would have these decrees held sacred, and the Greeks were as furious against those who refused to obey them as if they had been parricides and traitors. The other enormities of the flagitious Irene, and her end, which corresponded with her crimes,¹ it belongs not to this history to narrate.

14. In these contests most of the Latins—as the Britons, the Germans, and the French—took middle ground between the contending parties; for they decided that images were to be retained indeed and to be placed in the churches, but that no religious worship could be offered to them without dishonouring the Supreme Being.² In particular, Charlemagne, at the suggestion of the French bishop, who were displeased with the Nicene decrees, caused four books concerning images to be drawn up by some learned man, which he sent in the year 790 to the Roman pontiff, Hadrian, in order to prevent his approving the decrees of Nice. In this work the arguments of the Nicene bishops in defence of image-worship are acutely and vigorously combated.³ But Hadrian was not to be taught by such a master, however illustrious, and therefore issued his formal confutation of the book. Charlemagne next assembled in the year 794, a council of three hundred bishops at Frankfort on the Maine, in order to re-examine this controversy. This council approved of the sentiments contained in the books of Charlemagne, and forbade the worship of images;⁴ for the Latins it seems did not in that age deem it impious to dispute the correctness of the decisions of the Roman pontiff, and to discard his opinions.⁵

15. While these contests respecting images were raging, another controversy sprang up between the Greeks and the Latins respecting the procession of the Holy Spirit, which the Latins contended was from both the Father and the Son, but the Greeks that it was only from the Father. The origin of this controversy is involved in much obscurity, but as it is certain that the subject came up in the council of Gentilly, near Paris, A.D. 767, and was there agitated with the ambassadors of the Greek emperor,⁶ it is most probable that the controversy originated in Greece amidst the collisions respecting images. As the Latins defended their opinion on this subject by appealing to the Constantinopolitan creed, which the Spaniards first and afterwards the French had enlarged, (though at what time or on what occasion is not known) by adding the words 'and from the Son' to the article concerning the Holy Spirit, the Greeks charged the Latins with having the audacity to corrupt the creed of the church universal by this interpolation, which they denominated sacrilege. From a contest about a doctrine therefore it became a controversy about the insertion of a word.⁷ In worship. Charlemagne laid his books, De Imaginibus, before the council. The council approved of them, and passed resolutions in conformity with them; that is, they disapproved of the decisions of the Nicene council, and decided that while images were to be retained in churches as ornamental and instructive, yet no kind of worship whatever was to be given to them. See Walch, Hist. der Kirchenversam. p. 483; and Harduin, Concilium, tom. iv. p. 904, can. 2.—Mur.

⁵ On this protracted and violent controversy see Milman's Gibbon's Decline and Fall, &c. vol. ix. p. 113, &c.; Gieseler, Lehrbuch, &c. Cunningham's Transl. vol. ii. p. 1, &c. with the valuable extracts in the notes; Waddington's Hist. of the Church, vol. ii. p. 357, &c. The student will see in Walch, Biblioth. Theol. Selecta, tom. iii. p. 888, 889, the names of several important works on image-worship; the only English one referred to is by Jas. Owen, The History of Images and of Image-worship, &c. Lond. 1709, 12mo.—H.

⁶ See Le Coigne, Annales Ecclesiast. Francor. tom. v. p. 698.

⁷ Men of eminence for learning have generally supposed that this controversy commenced respecting the word filioque, which some of the Latins had added to the Constantinopolitan creed; and that from disputing about the word they proceeded to dispute about the thing. See above all others Mabillon (whom very many follow), Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. Præf. p. 4. But with due deference to those great men, I would say the fact appears to have been otherwise. The contest commenced respecting the doctrine, and afterwards extended to the word filioque or to the interpolation of the creed. From the council of Gentilly it is manifest that the dispute about the doctrine had existed a long time, when the dispute about the word commenced. Pagi, Critica in Baronium, tom. iii. p. 323, thinks that the controversy grew out of the contest respecting images; that because the Latins pronounced the Greeks to be heretics for opposing images, the Greeks retaliated the charge of heresy upon the Latins for holding that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Son as well as ported by such false reasonings, to become the prevailing doctrines of the whole church.—See Walch's Hist. der Kirchenversam. p. 477, &c.—Seld.

¹ This most atrocious woman procured the death of her own son Constantine in order that she might reign alone. But in the year 802 she was banished by the emperor Nicephorus to the island of Lesbos, where she died the year following.

² On the abhorrence of the Britons of image-worship, see Spelman, Concilium Mag. Britan. tom. i. p. 73, &c.

³ These books of Charlemagne, De Imaginibus, are still extant, republished when become very scarce with a very learned preface, by Heumann, Hanover, 1731, 8vo. The venerated name of the emperor Charlemagne is attached to the work; but it is easy to discover that it was the production of a learned man, bred in the schools, or of a theologian, and not of the emperor. Some very learned men have conjectured that Charlemagne employed Alcuin, his preceptor, to draw up the book. See Heumann's Preface, p. 51, and the Illustrations Bünau, Historia Imperii Germanici, tom. i. p. 490. Nor would I condemn the conjecture. And yet it appears to me somewhat doubtful; for when these books were written Alcuin was resident in England, as is manifest from his history, he having gone to England in 789, whence he did not return till the year 792.

⁴ See especially Mabillon, who is ingenious on this subject in his Pref. ad Acta Sanctor. Ord. Bened. tom. v. p. 5, &c.; also Dorscheus, Collatio ad Concilium Francofurtense, Argentor. 1649, 4to. [The council of Frankfort was properly a general council, for it was assembled from all the countries subject to Charlemagne, Germany, France, Aquitaine, Gaul, Spain, and Italy. Delegates from the pope were present, Charlemagne presided. Two subjects were discussed, the heresy of Felix of Urgel, and the subject of image-

the following century this dispute became more violent, and accelerated the separation of the eastern from the western churches.¹

CHAPTER IV.

HISTORY OF RITES AND CEREMONIES.

1. THE religion of this century consisted almost wholly in ceremonies and external marks of piety. It is therefore not strange that everywhere more solicitude was manifested for multiplying and regulating these, than for correcting the vices of men and removing their ignorance and impiety. The mode of celebrating the Lord's supper, which was considered the most important part of the worship of God, was protracted to a greater length, and deformed rather than adorned by the addition of various ceremonies.² The manifest traces of private and solitary masses, as they are called, were now distinctly visible, although it is uncertain whether they were sanctioned by ecclesiastical law or introduced by the authority of individuals.³ As this one practice is sufficient to show the ignorance and degeneracy of the times, it is not necessary to mention others.

2. Charlemagne, it must be acknowledged, was disposed to impede the progress of superstition to some extent; for, besides the Father. But this is said without authority and without proof, and is therefore only a probable conjecture.

